Since the organization of the church the following have been pastors: Thomas Mack, Erastus Seymour, Theron Brittain, George E. Northrup and Samuel Murdoch, the present pastor. Service is held every second or third Sunday in the month, and the church is a branch of the Presbyterian Church of Cochecton.

In connection with the Union Church is the Eldred Cemetery, a well laid-out plot, surrounded by a substantial stone wall, a handsome iron gateway separating it from the main road. The grounds slope pleasantly to the eastward, and were first used as a denominational burying-ground. The first interment was that of Margaret McArthur, July 8, 1858; the second, that of James Smith, on the 27th of August following. At present many monuments and well-lettered tomb-stones mark the resting-places of hundreds who have passed away.

One of the first schools in Eldred was the old block school-house, near where the Union Church now stands. It was built shortly after 1836, and Miss Emily Stearns was the first teacher. In 1850 the present school-house was built, and the attendance there has been steadily increasing.

The Christian Church.—The people of Damascus township, at Boyd's Mills, were attracted to the plea for primitive Christianity as presented by Orrin Noble, of Ohio, and Elder Z. W. Shepherd, of Providence, Lackawanna County, Pa.

At different times during the years 1869 and 1871, which, together with a series of meetings, held in October, 1872, by Elder L. B. Hyatt, of Lock Haven, assisted by N. P. Laurence, of Scranton, Pa., resulted in the immersion of Thomas J. Crocker, William H. Crocker, Florence Crocker, David Taylor, Mrs. David Taylor, William Garritt, Clark Wood, Homer C. Noble, Sarah Lovelass, Florence Lovelass and Lizzie Walker.

On behalf of the above-named persons, the hand of welcome was extended to Charles Bartlett, Christopher C. Tegeler, Mrs. William H.

Tegeler, William Eighney, Mrs. William Eighney, Charles B. Noble, Eliza Noble, William Noble and Abbie Skinner.

From time to time others were added, until at the present there are sixty-five members enrolled. The church has no house of its own, but worships in a Union Church building, in which the members share by contributions with the general population of the neighborhood.

Elder C. W. Cooper, of Providence, Pa., after which it was without a regular pastor for some time.

The present pastor, Elder C. E. Wells, of Troy, N. Y., has been with the church four years. By his zeal the church is being strengthened and much good accomplished. Hence, the Christian Church here has a bright future before her.

Three of her former pastors—L. B. Hyatt,

Israel Tyler

This building is mentioned in another part of this volume.

The following gentlemen have served as pastors: Z. W. Shepherd, of Scranton, Pa., one year; S. B. Hyatt, of Kingston, Pa., one year; G. W. Headley, about one year; J. J. Harvey, of Lewisburgh, Pa., two years; J. W. Lowber, of Providence, Pa., two years; Charles W. Cooper, of Providence, Pa., six months; E. E. Orvis, of Scranton, Pa., one year; D. W. Kinter, of Stillwater, Columbia County, Pa., paid the church a few visits, accompanied by J. J. Harvey and E. E. Orvis—have gone to their reward, together with several of the original members.

The church has suffered greatly from opposition and religious intolerance, but she has carefully guarded against retaliation. This, together with the unanimity of her members, has maintained a steady increase in numbers and influence. Its present officers are C. E. Wells, pastor; William Eighney, Charles Noble, elders; William H. Crocker, deacon; Thomas J. Crocker, church clerk.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

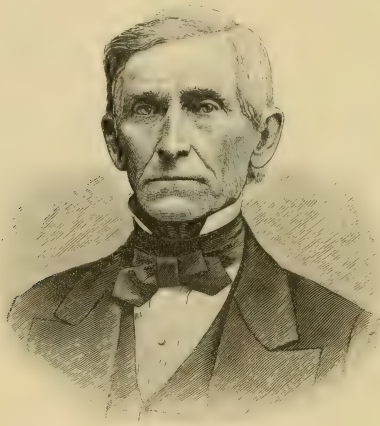
ISRAEL TYLER.

Among the prominent families of Wayne County, whose representatives are descended from the early settlers, none has filled a more important place in the local annals of the county than the Tyler family. Bezaleel Tyler, the first of the name to come to this section, was from Connecticut, and the ancestor of the now numerous family of that name. His settlement was contemporaneous with that of the first settlers. He married Sarah Calkins, a member of another pioneer family, and had a large family of children, of whom fourteen attained to years of maturity, viz.: Hannah, Bezaleel, Sarah, Silas, Paul, Abigail, Timothy, Nathaniel, William, Charles, Mary, Rebecca, Zuriah and Amos. Of these, William was the father of Israel, to whom this sketch is chiefly dedicated.

He married Mary Monnington, and his children were Israel, Raymond, Alfred, Freeman, Sally (who married Cortland Skinner), Eliza (who married Kinney Skinner) and Emeline (wife of David Fortnam, of Tyler Hill).

The eldest son, Israel, was for many years one of the influential and prominent residents of Damascus township, and lived at Tyler Hill. There he engaged extensively in farming and lumbering, operated a saw-mill and planing-mill, and kept a general country store. No man in the township has borne a more prominent relation to its material development, nor sustained a higher representation for integrity and correct business methods. He was a warm supporter of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Damascus village, and assisted in the erection of the church edifice at that place and the academy. He was no seeker after office, but led a simple, unostentatious life. He died in 1874, leaving his sons, Moses and Lorenzo D. Tyler, as his business successors. He married Lavina, daughter of Moses Tyler, a descendant of another branch of the same family.

CALVIN SKINNER.



The Skinner family is one of the oldest in Wayne County, and was early identified with the settlement of the northern section lying along the Delaware River.

Joseph Skinner, the first settler, came from Connecticut and was one of the original purchasers of land from the Indians. His son, Daniel, was also one of the pioneers of Damascus township, and called his plantation on the river, St. Tammany, where he passed his days in farming pursuits and in lumbering, running the first raft that ever went down the Delaware River to Philadelphia.

His son Nathan was the father of the subject of this sketch, and married Sarah, daughter of Oliver and grand-daughter of John Calkins, one of the original Connecticut settlers, who located on the New York side of the river, opposite Damascus. The mother of Sarah Calkins was a sister of Moses Thomas, who was killed at the battle of Lackawaxen. After residing on the old Calkins homestead for a number of years, Nathan Skinner removed to the neighborhood of Milanville, Damascus township, Wayne County, where he passed the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits, and lumbering. He was for many years a justice of the peace, and a man of character and influence. He was also the first settled surveyor of Wayne County, and held a captain's commission in the State militia. His brother Reuben was the first justice of the peace commissioned in Wayne County.

Colonel Calvin Skinner, who is the oldest living native-born citizen of Wayne County, was born November 15, 1799, on his grandfather Daniel's farm, in Damascus township. His early life was passed in attendance at the district schools, where his education was obtained, and in assisting his father in his farming and lumbering occupations. At the early age of twelve years he accompanied a raft, laden with lumber, to Philadelphia, and from that time until 1861, a period of fifty years, went regularly each year down the Delaware, on a similar mission. About 1820 his father removed to Cochecton, and Colonel Skinner remained on the farm at Milanville, where he still resides in a house built by his father in 1815. He has led an active and industrious life, characterized by the strictest integrity, and is one of the last connecting links between the pioneer development of Wayne County and the new era of manufacturing and agricultural prosperity upon which it is now entering. Although at the advanced age of eighty-six years, he has a wonderfully retentive memory, and is one of the best informed men in the county upon the early events that characterized its settlement, and upon the lives and habits of its first settlers. He has held the various township offices of Damascus, and in the early training-days took a prominent part in the martial displays that attended the turning-out of the militia, and was colonel of the Seventieth Regiment of the Second Brigade and Eighth Division of that body. He married, in 1820, Sarah, daughter of Jonathan Lillie, of Damascus township, and has had a family of twelve children, of whom eight are now living, namely: Calista; Leila, wife of Charles Drake; Volney; Martha; Weston D.; Octavia, widow of Edward Fenwick, of Matamoras; Abigail, wife of Walter Illman, M.D.; and Milton L. Skinner.

CHARLES IRVINE.

Charles Irvine was born in Cochecton, Sullivan County, N. Y., April 8, 1814, and was the seventh of eleven children of Charles and Weighty Calkin Irvine, of that place.

In 1825 his parents moved to Selin's Grove, Snyder County, Pa. A few weeks later, July 23d, the whole family was seized with fever, of which the father died.

In September of the same year the mother, with her family, returned to Cochecton, and although but nine years old, Charles drove an ox-team back, his only companion being a sick brother, dependent on him for care. The rest of the family, having horses, arrived three days earlier.

Ten years later he entered the store of Hiram Bennett & Co., at Damascus, Pa., as a clerk under Walter S. Vail, one of the junior partners. The next year he made a more permanent engagement with W. S. Vail and D. B. St. John, they having bought Mr. Bennett's interest. In November, 1844, he associated himself in business with the Hon. N. W. Vail, now of Middletown, N. Y., the new firm buying out Vail & St. John, and continuing business until 1855, when W. W. Tyler succeeded Mr. Vail in the firm. The following year Mr. Irvine disposed of his interest to J. S. Vail.

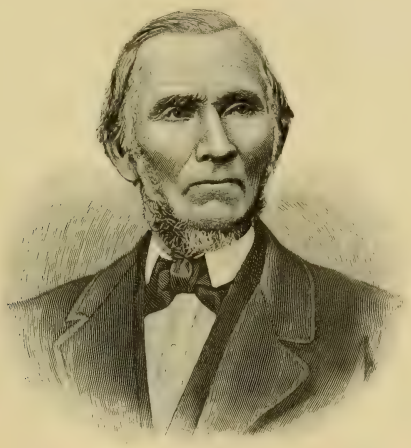
Nearly five years later, in 1860, he formed a partnership with T. & P. O'Reilly, their store being on the same ground where he first entered the mercantile business nearly forty years before. The next year he finally retired from the business and engaged in the management of various important interests with which he was connected. In these, as in all his business affairs, he was eminently successful, adding to his already acquired property by judicious investments after he had retired from active life.

Mr. Irvine was a man of quick and clear perceptions, liberal and progressive views, strict integrity, admirable business methods and enterprise, of warm impulses and sympathies and superior judgment. He was recognized as one of the most useful citizens of his locality, for, unlike many others, he remained where he had been successful and spent his life with those who patronized him when in business. His education was that given by the common school, which, with the general literature of the day and the long contact of an active, observant and receptive intellect with the world, resulted in a mental growth and an extent of information that won for him the respect and confidence of the community. Mr. Irvine was married, October 9, 1844, to Allamanda, daughter of Charles and Weighty Bush Drake. Two sons and a daughter were born to them. Clarence, the oldest, died in infancy; Frederick A., at the age of nineteen. The mother and daughter survive him. He was closely identified with the interests of the Presbyterian Church of Cochecton, of which he was for several years a member and one of its main supporters. He passed away after a brief and sudden illness, October 17, 1885.

J. HOWARD BEACH.

Mr. Beach was born at Pike Pond, Sullivan County, N. Y., June 17, 1836. His grandfather, James Beach, was a native of Litchfield County, Conn., but at an early day removed to Cairo, Greene County, N. Y., where he engaged in farming and lumbering. At this place was born Eli Beach, the father of our subject, who became an apprentice in the tanning business to Col. Edwards, of Cairo, and soon after his marriage erected a tannery at Pike Pond, where he cleared off a large tract of land and carried on the tanning business for a number of years. He subsequently removed to the State of Maine, where he followed the same occupation, on the Kennebec River, for six years. He then returned to Cairo, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits for some time, and then for five years operated a tannery at Callicoon, in Sullivan County, New York, in partnership with Charles Horton, the firm being known as Horton & Beach. In the year 1854 he purchased of David Clements a tannery property at what is now Milanville, in Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa., including large tracts of wild land in that section. Here he carried on a large and successful business for many years, being one of the pioneers of that section, and associating himself with its general development. He died in 1876, at the age of seventy-two years. He was a man of superior business qualifications, strict integrity and excellent judgment. He exerted a commanding influence among his neighbors and associates, frequently acted as their adviser and counsel, wrote contracts and deeds and often held a fiduciary relation to his friends. His wife was Mary A., daughter of Ephraim Gay, a former resident of New England, who also located in Greene County, New York. Six children resulting from the union attained mature years,—namely: Matilda Connor; J. Howard; Charles E., a merchant at Cochecton, New York; Mary, wife of Mark Appley, of Damascus; Adelia, wife of Henry K. Nichols, of Colorado; and Watson E., engaged in the banking business at North Flat, Nebraska.

J. Howard Beach passed the earlier years of his life in Cairo and in the State of Maine, in both of which places he enjoyed the advantages of a common-school education. He subsequently attended the academy at Monticello,



N.Y., and completed his higher education at the Union Academy, at Damascus. After finishing his educational course he learned the tanner's trade under the supervision of his father. In 1858 he purchased the interest of Loren Andrews, of New York City, who was then in partnership with his father at Milanville, and became a partner himself, the new firm being known as E. Beach & Son. This business connection continued until the death of his father, in 1876, and near its close was carried on under the sole management of J. Howard Beach. It embraced not only the extensive tanning operations of the concern, but, in connection therewith, the store at Milanville, and the cultivation of that portion of the land of the firm that had been cleared and devoted to the uses of agriculture.

J. Howard Beach

Upon the death of Eli Beach his wife assumed his place in the firm, and the business is still carried on under the old firm-name by J. Howard Beach. The latter is also a partner in the firm of Charles E. Beach & Co., merchants, at Cochecton, and has been extensively engaged in the lumber business on his own account. He is also a member of the firm of Nichols, Beach & Co., who carry on a large cattle business in Nebraska. He is treasurer and manager of, and a large owner or stockholder in the Cochecton Bridge Company over the Delaware River, between Cochecton and Damascus; president of the Wayne County Agricultural Society, of which he has been a director since its organization; a director in the Wayne County Savings Bank, at Honesdale, and holds the office of postmaster at Milanville. In politics he is a consistent and ardent Democrat, and is one of the most influential members of the party in Northeastern Pennsylvania. He has been a member of the State Central Committee, and a member and chairman of the County Committee of Wayne County on many occasions. He has held various local offices, and in 1871 was chosen to represent Wayne and Pike Counties in the State Legislature. He was nominated and re-elected to the same office in 1872, the Republican party making no nomination against him. He is a man of generous impulses, liberal and kind-hearted, and occupies a high place in the respect and esteem of his neighbors and friends. He married, July 1, 1884, Mrs. D. McCollough, a daughter of Elihu Page, and a representative of one of the early and prominent families of Sullivan County, N. Y. She is a lady of many excellencies of character, and presides with dignity and grace over the hospitable home at Milanville.

WILLIAM HARTWELL.

WILLIAM HARTWELL.

Mr. Hartwell was for many years recognized as one of the most industrious farmers of Damascus township, and has the reputation of having cleared as much land with his own hand as any of the old residents of the township. He was a native of Haverhill, N. H., where he was born March 14, 1813. His educational advantages were extremely meagre, and he was compelled at an early age to support himself. He removed to Connecticut, and for a number of years drove a truck between Hartford and New Haven. On April 8, 1838, he married Eliza J. Nettleton, a native of Middlesex County, Conn., and in October, 1841, came to Damascus township, Pa., where he bought of George Wilcox a portion of the farm now occupied by his only child, Jane E. Hartwell, and her husband, John L. Burcher, where he engaged in farming and lumbering for many years. He was a man of frugal habits, great industry, firm in his convictions, and a regular attendant and subsequent member of the Presbyterian Church. For a great many years he rafted his lumber down the Delaware River to Philadelphia. His wife died January 12, 1879, and he afterwards married again and took up his residence in Honesdale, where he died December 28, 1881.

His daughter married John L. Burcher, of Damascus township, in 1865, and now occupies the homestead-residence of her father, erected by him in 1867, in the southwestern section of Damascus township. Their only son, William E. Burcher, was born June 29, 1865, and is engaged in farming pursuits with his father.

pioneers of the township, and being a poor man, without capital, was compelled to labor arduously for others in clearing up and subjecting to the uses of agriculture the wild section of country in which he located. In later years he worked some leased land on his own account, but his living was necessarily a precarious one. Thinking to improve his circumstances in life, he made a journey to Michigan, but returned in no better financial condition, but with his

Thos. Y. Boyd

THOMAS Y. BOYD.

Mr. Boyd was born in Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa., January 9, 1823. His grandfather, John Boyd, was killed during the bombardment of Tripoli, in 1813, while serving under Commodore Decatur, of the American navy. His father, James Boyd, was born at Philadelphia, in 1795, and about 1808 accompanied the Duffield family to Damascus township, as an apprentice boy. He was one of the health seriously impaired by hard work. In 1842 he died leaving a wife, née Nancy, daughter of David Canfield, of Litchfield County, Conn., and a family of children. Of the latter, but four are living at this writing (1885), viz : Thomas Y., David and Joseph, who reside in Warren County, Pa., and Caroline, wife of William Eighney, of Damascus township.

At the death of his father, Thomas Y. Boyd, the eldest son, was but nineteen years of age, and at that early time the care and support of the family devolved upon him. All the schooling advantages that he had enjoyed was an attendance of two quarters and a half at the district school of his neighborhood, which itself was not of the highest character, in the wild country in which it was established. Up to the time that his father died he had supported himself by working by the day at lumbering and farming, turning his hand to anything that promised a moderate compensation for a hard day's work. Before he attained his majority he had the old lease of his father revived through John Torrey, of Honesdale, and embarked in a small way in the lumbering business. Incidental to this work was the old custom of rafting down the Delaware to Philadelphia, and for more than forty years, and until two years ago, he made his rafting journeys to the Pennsylvania metropolis, being widely known by the residents along the river from his home in Damascus to the city. As his business increased, his opportunities widened, and, in partnership with Joseph Wood, he purchased the old saw-mill of Truman Tymmerson, at what is now Boyd's Mills, and erected in its stead the large steam saw-mill which he now owns and operates alone. Besides that, he operates a grist-mill at the mills and runs a store and blacksmith-shop at the same point, and his landed possessions include about nineteen hundred acres of land in Wayne County, the most of which is timber land.

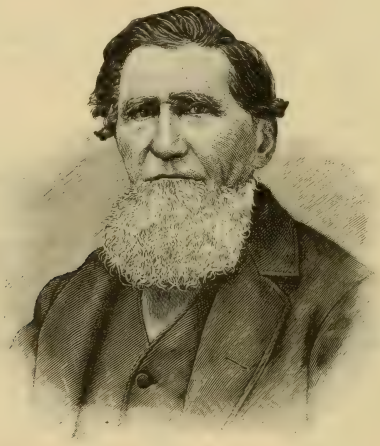
Thus, from the smallest of beginnings, and amid obstacles only surmountable by the greatest labor, perseverance, patience and economy, Mr. Boyd has come to be one of the most representative and influential men of his section, and a living example of how much can be accomplished by persistency of purpose, industry and integrity. He was originally a Douglas Democrat, but since the breaking out of the Rebellion has acted with the Republican party, and has served as a member of the County Committee. For many years he was postmaster at Boyd's Mills, and in March, 1874, was elected a member of the State Legislature at a special election, his district including both Wayne and Pike Counties, and he being the first Republican chosen to represent it. He was re-elected in 1875 to represent Wayne County alone, the adoption of the new Constitution changing the basis of representation, and closed his legislative career in 1877, having, by the faithful and conscientious discharge of his public duties, merited the approval and commendation of his constituents. Mr. Boyd has occupied his present residence at Boyd's Mills since 1868. He married, in March, 1849, Betsey Jane, daughter of Isaac and Ursula Mitchell, of Damascus township (formerly of Litchfield County, Conn.), and had a family of twelve children, of whom five survive, viz.: Joseph, Elizabeth, Rena, Charles E. and Thomas Y. Boyd, Jr., all living at home.

JOHN JACKSON.



Thomas Jackson, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was an ingenious clock-maker, and emigrated to this country from England prior to the Revolutionary War, settling at Preston (now Griswold) Connecticut. His fame as a clock-maker was far-reaching. He cast the wheels and other movements himself, made the case and set the time-piece going. One of these clocks made by him is in the possession of Moses Coit Tyler, president of the University of Michigan, and is highly prized by him; another stands in the house of his grandson, John Jackson, in Damascus township, and has been running over one hundred years. Its movements are in excellent condition, and seem good for another century of usefulness. The name of the maker is inscribed upon the neat, brass face, and the cabinet-work is unique and durable. It is a veritable "grandfather's clock," and is highly prized by its owner. Thomas Jackson died November 23, 1806, aged seventy-three years, and is buried in the cemetery at Patchaug Plain, Conn.

He was a member of the Second Congregational Church in Preston, and married Mary Knight, by whom he had an only son, Thomas, born in 1774. An old discharge of Thomas Jackson from the Continental army, in the possession of his grandson, John Jackson, is dated Springfield, April 4, 1780, and shows that he was a soldier in the First Regiment, and was discharged with "reputation."

Thomas Jackson married Esther, daughter of Jeremiah Phillips, of Preston, November 5, 1807. The family continued to reside in Griswold until about 1834, when they removed to Norwich, Conn. Mr. Jackson died in 1853, and his wife in 1862. They had five sons and seven daughters,—Thomas, who engaged in teaching and was afterwards a surveyor in the sides in Griswold, Conn.; Abbie, in Groton; and Julia, for the last three years, in Honolulu, Sandwich Islands.

John Jackson was born in the town of Preston (Griswold), Conn., September 10, 1812. The early years of his life were spent at Griswold, where he received the rudiments of an ordinary English education. When nine years of age his father removed to Jewett City, Conn., and during the summer of 1821 our subject

West; John; Albert, who died at the age of sixteen; Horace W., who resides in Chelsea, Mass.; and Orrin Fowler, who edited a paper in Newport, R. I., and was afterwards murdered, near Jackson, Miss., by guerrillas, having leased a farm near that place. Of the five daughters now living, Esther is unmarried and resides with her brother John; Louisa married a Mr. Gardiner and resides with her daughter, the wife of D. H. Brown, Esq., of Honesdale; Mary reworked for a farmer in the neighborhood. The three following years he worked in a woolen-factory at Jewett City, and later in the cotton-factory of John Slater, of the same place. October 1, 1833, he married Abbie, daughter of Chester Appley, of Canterbury, Conn., and in the spring of 1834 removed to Norwich Falls, in the same county, where he acted as overseer of the weaving-room in a cotton-factory. In the spring of 1835 he removed to Hawkins'

Depot, N. Y., and engaged in farming and lumbering at that point, until the fall of 1837, when he crossed the Delaware River to Manchester, Pa. There he remained engaged in farming until the spring of 1845, when he bought one hundred acres of land of David Nathan, in Damascus township, where he now lives. At that time the country was wild and heavily wooded, and only a few acres of the tract bought by Mr. Jackson were cleared. With great energy and determination he set to work to carve a farm out of this wild tract, and succeeded so well that at the present writing (1886) his farm comprises two hundred and fourteen acres, one hundred and thirty acres of which he cleared himself. In 1872 he purchased of William Hartwell one hundred and three acres of land on the turnpike in Damascus, and gave it to his son, John O. Jackson. In 1884 he bought of Ransom Y. Mitchell one hundred and ten acres of land on the same turnpike, which he handed over to another son, Hannibal C. Jackson. He is one of the most successful and representative farmers of Damascus township, and has acquired all that he has by the closest industry and the most persistent effort. He is a Republican in politics, but votes independently on local elections. He has held various offices in his own and Manchester townships, but has never been a seeker after place. He has been a director of the Wayne County Agricultural Society for a number of years, and is held in general respect for his integrity and uprightness of character. As early as 1831 he united with the Congregational Church at Jewett City, Conn., and has always proven faithful to the professions he then made. He is a regular attendant of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Damascus, and a liberal contributor to all worthy objects. He has been a trustee of the church since 1847, and was one of the building committee upon the erection of the First Methodist Church edifice at Damascus. He has frequently acted as executor, administrator, trustee and guardian for his friends, and has discharged his duties in a faithful and able manner. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Jackson were Charles R., a doctor of medicine, who died in Illinois in 1865; Chester T., a member of Company I, Eighty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, who died in July, 1864, from the effects of disease contracted while in the service of his country; John O. and Hannibal C., already referred to; William L., who resided on the old homestead with his parents; and Sarah L., wife of E. B. Gager, of Dyberry township, Wayne County. His sons are all members of the Methodist Church at Damascus, and feel a deep interest in its work. Mr. J. O. Jackson has been a member of the board of trustees for about ten years, and is one of the supervisors of Damascus township at the present writing.

GEORGE SHEARD.

George Sheard was born at Hotisfield, Yorkshire, England, November 19, 1828, and was the oldest son of John and Ann N. (Exley) Sheard The former was a shoemaker by trade, and emigrated to this country in 1841, locating at Poughkeepsie, where he followed his avocation for a number of years. Subsequently he removed to Tylertown, Sullivan County, N. Y., where he purchased land and engaged in farming until his death, in 1844. His wife died in 1871. Their children were George, our subject; Maria, widow of Anthony Wall, of Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa.; Ann, wife of John Marks, of Damascus; Elijah B., engaged in farming in the same township; and Sarah, widow of Martin Groner, of Honesdale, Pa.

George Sheard enjoyed but limited educational advantages, and at nine years of age worked in a woolen factory in England. At the time of the emigration of his father to this country he was thirteen years of age, and then learned the trade of a shoemaker with his father in Poughkeepsie.

After his father's death, in 1844, the support of the family devolved upon him, and he removed from Tylertown to Damascus village, Wayne County, Pa., with the intention of working a farm at that place. But he abandoned that purpose at the solicitation of friends, and worked at his trade for Alvah Smith and William E. Raymond. He remained there for three years and then worked for James Lovelass, at what was then known as the "south settlement" of Damascus. In June, 1855, he married Mary, daughter of Isaac Lovelass, originally from Nova Scotia, who finally settled in Wayne County, Pa., and died there in 1847. Soon after, he bought a small tract of land at the point where he now resides in Damascus township, erected a small shop and began to work at his trade. Here he has remained ever since, having added to his original purchase of land and erected a substantial residence thereon.

George Sheard.

By great industry and perseverance he has succeeded in accumulating a desirable estate, and is one of the many self-made men of his township. He has served as a school director for the past six years, and is a consistent member of the First Baptist Church of Damascus, and a deacon of that body. His children are Alfred Ellsworth, George W. and Mary Alice Sheard.

GEORGE ABRAHAM.

Isaac Abraham, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was an early resident of Montgomery County, Pa., where many of his descendants still reside. The house occupied by his grandson, James, in Upper Merion township, near Norristown, was built in 1775 and enlarged in 1806. His son Joseph engaged in farming and lumbering at the old place and also operated a saw-mill on the site now occupied by the paper-mill of his son Thomas. He married Ann Davis, of Montgomery County, and had a large family of children, among them being James, Benjamin, Thomas, George, Sarah (who married Jonathan Philip, of Montgomery County), Anna (wife of Owen Evans, of Philadelphia), and Eliza (widow of Jonathan Supplee, residing in Norristown).

George Abraham was born at the old homestead in Montgomery County, December 3, 1827. He received a good English education, which he completed at the Norristown Academy, and in the spring of 1850 left his native county to establish a home for himself in the then wild section of Wayne County, Pa. He purchased seven hundred acres of land of his father-in-law, Jacob Wager, in the northern part of Damascus township, where there was scarcely a tree cut or a clearing made, erected a small house, built a mill and entered upon the life of a lumberman, conveying the products of his industry on rafts to Philadelphia, which he has continued to do ever since.

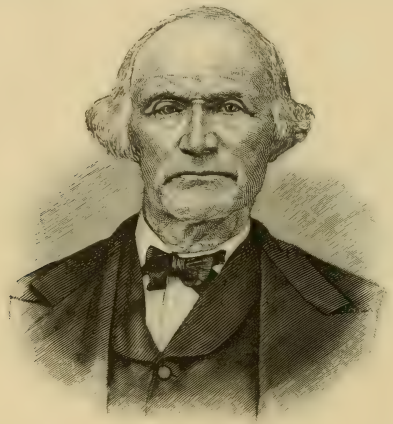
tial men of his section, and is held in general respect. He is a Democrat in politics and has held the offices of school director and supervisor a number of years.

He married, in 1853, Mary C., daughter of Jacob Wager, of Damascus township, and has had ten children, of whom seven are living, namely,—Lydia (wife of John J. Canfield, of Damascus), Hannah (wife of James Rowan, of Manchester), George C., Jane, Addison, Joseph and Gertrude.

Geo. Abraham.

Twice his mill was burned, but he rebuilt, the present one in 1883, one of the first steam saw-mills in that section of Wayne County and capable of cutting twelve thousand feet of timber a day. He also operates a grist-mill at the same point. In October, 1870, while engaged at his work, he met with a serious accident, and was compelled to have one of his arms amputated. He is one of the most industrious of the many lumbermen of Damascus township, and has cleared up a large tract of valuable land. He is recognized as one of the successful and influen-



JOHN BURCHER.

Of all the old families of Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa., none is more numerously represented or more highly respected than the Burcher family. John Burcher, to whom this sketch is inscribed, was born at Westminster, London, England, September 27, 1803. His grandfather, John Burcher, after whom he was named, worked at the trade of a carpenter in England, and is said to have done work for King George III. William, father of John, was also by trade a carpenter and joiner, but emigrated to this country in 1807 as agent for a friend in England, and bought of Tench Coxe a thousand acres of land in Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, Pa. Owing to the death of his principal, he was obliged to take the land himself, and after clearing about fifty acres of it, found it necessary to release it. He then bought fifty acres of land of Robert Mason, of Mount Pleasant, for which he was to pay by building Mason a house and barn.

He also lost this property through not receiving the deed, after performing the services. In 1819 he bought two hundred acres of land of a Mr. Salter, in Damascus township, and in the year following brought his family from England and located at Mount Pleasant, residing there about ten or twelve years. He died in 1839, after having led an industrious and useful life. His wife, whom he married in England, was Betsey Passmore, by whom he had six children,—Mary, who became the wife of Aden Cramer, of Mount Pleasant; Elizabeth, who married Joseph W. Yerkes, of Damascus; Sarah, who married Warren Dimmick, of Herrick, Wayne County; Helen, who married Titus Yerkes and removed with him to Michigan; John, our subject; and Samuel, who died nine days after his father, in December, 1839.

John Burcher assisted his father in clearing up the homestead in Damascus, and after his death added largely to it. His present tract comprises nearly four hundred acres. He also bought and cleared most of the two hundred and twenty acre farm occupied by his son, Walter V. Burcher, and also engaged extensively in lumbering, having rafted down the Delaware to Philadelphia for over forty-two years. He erected his present residence in 1842, and that occupied by Joseph Burcher, his son, in 1874. He purchased and cleared portions of other farms in Damascus, and is one of the oldest and best known of the early settlers of Wayne County who came to this wild region and carved out homes for themselves and their children from the primeval forest. He has been a member of the First Baptist Church of Damascus since

JOHN BURCHER.

1835, assisted largely in the erection of the very beautiful church edifice, and for a long period served on the board of trustees. To the pastors of the church he has been a true friend; to his home they were ever welcome, and no one has contributed more liberally to their support than he.

John Burcher married, July 14, 1825, Maximilla, daughter of John Land, one of the original settlers of Damascus. She was born April 2, 1807, and died June 8, 1879. She was a woman of many excellencies of character, a worthy helpmeet, good wife and faithful and devoted mother, and was a consistent member of the Baptist Church during the same period as her husband. Their children were William P., died June 26, 1873; Lydia M., died August, 1878; Samuel, farming in Damascus; Phebe T., who married Jonathan Yerkes, of Damascus; Caroline, residing with her father as housekeeper; Walter V., John L. and Joseph I., farmers in Damascus; James F., who died May 15, 1884; Titus C., died May 30, 1867; and Avis, died June 19, 1877.

John Burcher's life has been one continued struggle from a boy. When only ten years of age it was a common thing for him to walk over stones and stumps for three or four miles —there were no roads then—with a bushel of rye on his back, to the mill, and subsequently, when clearing his farm, he worked day and night, keeping one team in the barn whilst working the other, and it can be truly said that no resident in Wayne County has endured more hardships or worked harder than the subject of this sketch.

His home was always open to the stranger as well as the friend, and there is scarcely a family for twenty miles around but at some time has partaken of his boundless hospitality. Man and beast were alike cared for. His unobtrusive benevolence will never be known until around the throne in heaven the Master shall say unto him, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto me."

He is a man of sterling integrity. It is a daily saying, in speaking of Mr. Burcher, "Uncle John's word is as good as his note." As a politician he was never a blind follower of party, preferring to vote for the man whom he considered would best serve the interests of his country.

And now in the evening of his long, useful and active life, he is beloved by all, hated by none, and when the summons shall come calling him to his reward, "A great man in Israel will fall" and hundreds will gather at his tomb to pay the last token of respect to the memory of a truly noble and generous citizen.

CHRISTOPHER T. TEGELER.

Mr. Tegeler was born in New York City, April 24, 1846. His parents were Wm. H. and Catherine (Tennant) Tegeler, the former a cabinet-maker by trade, who engaged in the furniture business in New York City for many years. In April, 1854, he removed his family to Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa., and located them on a farm which he purchased of Thomas Shields. He himself remained in business in New York for some time, but subsequently removed to Damascus, where he passed the remainder of his days. In 1865 he bought the store property of J. H. Lounsbury, at Eldred, in Damascus township, and engaged in trade until his death, in 1871. He left two children, Christopher T. and Frederick W., the latter a farmer in Damascus township.

The former was eight years of age at the time that he came to Damascus township with his parents. He had already attended the public schools of New York City, and after a further attendance at the district school in Damascus, completed his educational course at the academy at Monticello, New York. After clerking for a year in his father's store he engaged in farming and lumbering for a number of years, selling his lumber along the Delaware to be rafted down that water route to Philadelphia. In March, 1880, he embarked in trade at the store (his present location) at Eldred. Besides carrying on the usual business of a country store-keeper, he has dealt largely in cattle and stock throughout Wayne County, and has been the agent for the Champion Mower and Reaper for eleven years. He also owns the farm formerly belonging to his father, near Eldred, and is thus still identified with the agricultural interests of his township. He has been prominently identified with the interests of the Democratic party in Wayne County, served as a school director in Damascus township for three years, and in 1881 was elected a member of the Board of County Commissioners for the usual term of three years. He was appointed postmaster at Boyd's Mills, September 24, 1885, and reappointed November 27, 1885, there having been considerable opposition to the removal of the office to Mr. Tegeler's store at Eldred, where it now is. He has always been interested in all movements tending to develop and improve the locality with which he has been identified since boyhood, and is held in general respect. He is a member, and was for several years a deacon, of the Christian Church, at Eldred. He has been a member of, and officially connected with, the Delaware Lodge, No. 561, F. and A. M., since 1874, and as administrator of the Jarrett P. Yerkes estate and committee of the estate of Frank McCollum, his ability in their successful management is recognized. He married, December 4, 1868, Amelia M., daughter of James Lovelass, of Damascus, who died in August, 1873, leaving three children,—Wilhelmina E., Grace and Amelia Tegeler. His present wife, whom he married in 1874, is Fannie A., daughter of C. B. Noble, of Damascus. Her children are Hattie, Charles B., Beulah and Luella Tegeler.

JOEL G. HILL.

Joel G. Hill is a descendant of Silas Hill, who was an early settler of Otsego County, N. Y. His son Alpheus, father of Joel, in 1848, removed to Equinunk, Wayne County, Pa., bringing his wife, Elmira, daughter of Culver Gillette, of Otsego County, and two sons, Abner G. (now residing in Tioga County, N. Y.) and Joel G. Hill, with him. He engaged in farming and lumbering at Equinunk until 1864, when he removed to California, where he now lives.

His son, Joel G. Hill, was born in the town of Lawrence, Otsego County, August 1, 1845. He was reared at Equinunk, Wayne County, and received a common-school education at that place. In 1863 he responded to his country's call for volunteers and enlisted in the Fiftieth Regiment of New York Volunteers, commanded by Colonel Spaulding. He served in the engineer corps in front of Petersburg and elsewhere, in the building of forts and intrenchments, and was present at the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox Court-House, Virginia. After the close of the war he returned to Equinunk and worked for Holbert & Branning for four years, in the lumbering business at that place, and, in 1869, entered the employ of Isaac Young, who owned a large tract of land in the northern section of Damascus township. Two years later he purchased fifteen hundred acres of this land, including a saw-mill and dwelling-house, and entered into the lumbering business on his own account.

At that time only about twenty-five acres of his land was cleared, while he now has a good farm of seventy-five acres reclaimed from the condition of primeval nature and devoted to the purposes of agriculture. He built a grist-mill in 1881 and a cider-mill in 1882, and now gives employment to a number of men and has developed quite a little settlement around him. He is engaged in farming, lumbering, in carrying on the mercantile business in the store which he found it necessary to establish and in operating his grist and cider-mills.

He conveys the products of his mill to Philadelphia on rafts and has been making regular trips down the Delaware for that purpose since he was nine years of age, with the exception of the time he served in the army. He now has about eight hundred acres of land left of his original purchase, and is one of the most popular and highly esteemed residents of his township. He has uniformly declined to accept political office, and has no ambition in that direction.

He married, June 17, 1873, Mary J., daughter of Thomas and Margaret Flynn, of Manchester township, and has had four children, all of whom are living, viz., Lewis G., John A., Harris G. and Myra A. Hill.

CHAPTER XII.

THE BOROUGH OF BETHANY.

The legislative act of 1798, which erected the new county of Wayne, named trustees who were authorized to select a place for a county-seat, and Milford was their choice, though this location of the courts proved very unsatisfactory to the majority of the people in the county. At that time Milford was one of two principal settlements, using the word in its broad sense to signify not only the few centrally located houses that composed the village, but also the scattered pioneers' cabins within a radius of many miles that were tributary to it. In this sense, Milford included all the settlements along the Delaware, while Stantonville was the centre for the population of the western part of the new county. Travel was much impeded by the absence of roads, and the location worked great hardship on the Stantonville settlers, who were obliged to make long circuits through an almost unbroken wilderness, to attend to the smallest legal matters. There was much dissatisfaction, and the pressure brought to bear upon the Legislature of 1799 caused it to pass an act directing a re-location of the county-seat within four miles of "Dyberry Forks," as the site of Honesdale was then designated, and that the courts should be held at Wilsonville until the permanent county-seat should be decided upon, and suitable county buildings erected by the trustees named. During the few months next ensuing, the probable choice of the trustees much agitated the sparse population scattered along the valleys of the principal streams, and Indian Orchard, Cherry Ridge, Seely's Mills and other locations had their advocates. Proposals to furnish land for the county town were sent in by the owners of various tracts, and in those of Mr. Tilghman, who owned land in Cherry Ridge, and Mr. Drinker, who had twenty-four tracts of four hundred acres each, lying between the Dyberry and the West Branch of the Lackawaxen, were made offers of any contiguous one thousand acres of land, if the county buildings were erected upon a portion of the gift. On the 15th of May, 1800, the trustees, accompanied by Jason Torrey, who was agent for the Drinker lands, went out to view the various lands offered. Esquire Stanton and George Levers, who were also of the party, are recorded in Mr. Torrey's journal as having urged the selection of Cherry Ridge. It is presumable that Mr. Torrey favored the Drinker tracts, as he had located them for the owner, and afterward received four hundred acres near the site of the county town for his services. The vote was three to one in favor of the Drinker tract, and on the following day, May 16th, a stake to designate the site of the court-house was driven in the presence of many witnesses, and the proceedings were entered on the minutes, duly subscribed to, and witnessed by all present.

The broad slope selected was then covered with virgin forest; deer bounded through its shadowed runways, stately elk stood listening in the long aisles beneath its hardwood trees, and buds were swelling on the rhododendron copses where now fair fields stretch up to peaceful Bethany amid the hills. The selection of the trustees was most gratifying to the settlers about Stantonville, and satisfactory to those in Salem and Paupack, and all were most anxious that the county-seat should be fixed there without delay. The friends of the location at once sent to Philadelphia to obtain money and supplies on their own credit, that the work of clearing and erection might proceed without awaiting the more tardy action of the authorities to provide the necessary funds. On June 2d, the trustees met Mr. Torrey on the spot selected as the site of the new buildings, and examined a plan he had drawn for the court-house and jail, and eight days afterward the settlers in the vicinity were called together to assist in putting up a log house to shelter the mechanics and laborers employed in the constructive work. This was the first building erected in Bethany. The work of surveying the thousand acres, which later on was deeded to the county, followed. There were laid off two hundred and fifty-four house-lots to form the town, and one hundred and sixty-three out lots, of five acres each, adjacent to and surrounding the town.

A contract between the trustees and Walter Kimble, of Indian Orchard, who was to furnish the sawed lumber, was drawn on the 9th of August, and the work of erection commenced soon after. The building was thirty-six feet front and thirty-two deep, and a large log jail, disconnected from the other buildings, was built near by. The jail was afterwards destroyed by fire, while, in 1816, when the second court house was erected, the old one was moved to the west side of Wayne Street, where it is still used as a store.

A healthful impetus had been given to the town, and it commenced to grow rapidly. Within a few months after the first tree had been felled there were acres of fallow about the spot where the trustees drove the stake, and several houses were under way. There were three families at Bethany in September, 1801, and in December of that year Jason Torrey moved from Stantonville, making the fourth.

A sudden check was given to the growth of the place by the adverse action of the Legislature, which, in February, 1802, yielded to the importunities of the people of Milford, and removed the county-seat to that place "for three years and no longer." This was the cause of much financial embarrassment to those who had advanced money for public improvements, with the expectation of being more than repaid by the business derived from the sessions of the courts and the appreciation of property that must necessarily follow the prosperity of the village. Building ceased, business was depressed, and there was much uncertainty and anxiety as to whether the same influences that had succeeded in getting the courts once more in Milford would not be successful in keeping them there at the expiration of the three years. During the following winter an attempt to induce the Legislature to repeal the obnoxious act proved abortive, and the people settled down to the hard labor of clearing their blackened fallows, and awaited the term of removal to expire. But there was some private enterprise. In December, 1802, arrangements were made for a "post," once in two weeks, from Stroudsburg, the nearest post-office, and the next year a school was started. Relieved from the pressure of business which was incident to the courts, the people found time, too, for religious meetings, and the foundations of two strong churches were laid, so that the period was not altogether unprofitable.

THE FIRST DEATH.—It was on the 26th of May, 1803, that John Bunting, Jr., the son of Esquire John Bunting, was found drowned at Seely's Mills, a fact which made the settlers aware that they had no burial-place available. Lots for such a purpose had been set aside from the Drinker lands, and were in the hands of the trustees; but the act which had remanded the county-seat to Milford had also suspended their powers, and they could not make a legal deed of the lots intended for school, church or graveyard. Under the circumstances there was a very natural unwillingness to make an interment on lands that might possibly revert to their grantor. In this emergency an agreement was made between Jason Torrey and Esquire Bunting to use, as a private burying-ground, the rear end of a fifty-foot lot which adjoined the cemetery plot and was owned by Mr. Torrey. Here it was that young Bunting was buried, on the 27th of May, 1803.

The lot was inclosed with a neat board fence, and there being no other ground set apart for such use, it was for several years used by all families in the vicinity having occasion to bury the remains of deceased friends. These facts will explain why the families of so many of the early settlers were interred in that extreme southern corner of the Bethany Cemetery grounds. Subsequently the rear part of the church lots and school lots were appropriated for use as a burial-ground.

Soon after the death of John Bunting, Jr., his mother visited friends in New Jersey, and on her return brought with her some strawberry plants, and, under the impulse of a fond mother's love, she carefully planted them on the grave of her son. These plants flourished, and the seeds of the delicious fruit were scattered by birds in various parts of the cleared fields in and around Bethany, so that in a few years all the meadows within a mile or two were largely stocked with these Bunting strawberries.

They differ from any of the other wild-growing varieties, in that they are white, are free from acidity, and in being plucked from the plant, separate entirely from the hull, like a blackberry.

While the Bunting strawberry was so abundant in the vicinity of Bethany, and did not exist in other parts of the county, the grass fields in the other settlements were well-stocked with wild-growing varieties of the red strawberry, which, being more hardy, have nearly supplanted the Bunting strawberry. Some of the latter, however, are still growing in the grassy fields around Bethany.

THE RETURN OF THE COURTS.—The very positive refusal of the Legislature of 1804–5 to alter or amend the act that limited the removal of the courts to Milford for three years, and this in the face of very strong influences from the latter place, brought about a restoration of the county-seat to Bethany in the spring of 1805. As soon as this was assured, in anticipation of the event, Mr. Jason Torrey had commenced building his house in the summer of 1804. The building was hurried to such completion during the winter that it was opened as a hotel on the first court week, and the court itself was convened in the east front chamber, the first day of the session. It was at this time that Hon. John Biddis, president judge, and Hon. John Brink, associate, occupied chairs on a carpenter's bench, a literal "Bench of Judges," and the jurors sat on rough plank seats below. At that term the grand jury ignored three bills, and found one true indictment for assault and battery. The subsequent attempts of the people in the lower part of the county to re-locate the county-seat, the refusal of the county commissioners to entertain the legislative proposition to erect county buildings at Blooming Grove, and other matters pertaining to the early civil history of the county, have been referred to at length in the chapters devoted to those topics, and it is proper here to write only of those details that were intimately connected with the history of Bethany as a village. In spite of the dissatisfaction of those who lived below "The Barrens," as the region between the Delaware River and the Wallenpaupack Creek was called, and the sharp animadversions that it bred, the town continued to increase in size and healthful prosperity. At this late date, when most of the actors in these early scenes have passed away, it is impossible to give minor events in their exact chronology; but the principal changes of the first few years are substantially summed up in the following paragraphs:

It has already been stated that John Bunting's hotel was one of the first buildings. Soon afterward the red store north of Judge Manning's was erected, and about the same time Sally Gay built a small house below Dr. Scudder's; John Bishop built on the Bunnell place; James Woodney finished a house and other improvements were made near by. From 1802 to April, 1807, John Bunting, then a venerable man, had a small room in his tavern fitted up with a little stock of goods, and this was the beginning of mercantile business. A most judicious, accurate and indefatigable collector of local history[1] has kindly furnished the writer with the following hitherto unpublished interview with one of the earliest residents:

"My earliest recollections date to when the only houses in Bethany were the Henderson place, then called the Bunting house, the Drinker place, the Major Torrey house, the court-house and old log jail, and the dwellings of Sally Gay, James Woodney, John Bishop and David Bunnell. Mr. David Wilder built his house in 1809. Captain Charles Hoel came from New Jersey and built a little house near where Hamlin's now stands. Benjamin Raymond, a New Yorker, located near where you turn to go to the old glass factory. After Solomon Moore dissolved partnership with Major Torrey, he built a store where Oscar Hamlin now is; Alva Flint, of Connecticut, but more lately of Salem, located opposite. After Mr. Wilmot had built his first house he exchanged properties with Captain Hoel. Mr. Miller, who succeeded John Bunting, sold to Eliphalet Kellogg, and erected the house where Mrs. Scudder now resides. The first resident lawyer of Bethany was Mr. Oliver Bush, of Damascus; he settled soon after the courts had been removed from Milford the second time. Judge Isaac Dimmick and his brother Ephraim were teachers, and both taught in the old court-house. Isaac built the house now occupied by Mrs. Butler, and I remember that he had a stove in it, which was the wonder and admiration of all the neighborhood. Up to that time nobody about Bethany or in Wayne County, so far as I know, had used anything except fire-places. The old log jail was used several times as a residence. Major Torrey lived there first; afterwards, when the school-house was built, Judge Eldred and Jacob S. Davis, both of whom were just married, were living there. After the academy was built, Judge Eldred bought the old school-house, built an addition to it and lived there for some time. He finally sold it to Mr. Baldwin, a hatter, and a brother-in-law of Mr. Hamlin, who taught the latter his trade. Its next tenant was Esquire Little, who occupied it as a residence, and also carried on a leather and harness business there. Joseph Miller sold his place to Judge Eldred, and Walter Weston bought the old court-house building, and moved it to where he now keeps store on Wayne Street. The first printing-office, that of Mr. Manning, was near his late residence, in a house afterwards occupied by E. Hadfield. The Spangenburg house was built by Major Torrey."

With this rapid growth of the village, there was also an influx of settlers to the country round about, and farms were purchased and cleared up, and people of all occupations kept busy by the thrift and industry that were rapidly crystallizing into substantial improvement. Soon after the return of the courts, in 1805, a letter from Jason Torrey states that "the place is thronged with people seeking situations for settlement, and I conceive the place has a preference, when considered under all its advantages, to any of which I have knowledge."

The First Murder in the County occurred at Bethany on the evening of October 18, 1808, and the following account of it is from a letter written four days afterward. As will be seen from a reference to this tragedy in the chapter on South Canaan, the actors were men between whom a feud had long existed, and the death of Tice was the culmination of a series of petty quarrels extending over several years. The letter runs as follows:

"Bethany, October 22, 1808.

"On the evening of the 18th instant a horrid murder was committed in this town. A battalion of militia had been drilling on the square and in the evening the officers and many of the men were together in Miller's tavern. About eight o'clock a trifling dispute arose between two men, which they inclined to settle by blows, and went into the street for that purpose. About a dozen men followed them out, apparently to witness the combat. Solomon Tice, the murdered man, is represented to have interfered as a peacemaker, and Peter Allen, who had taken no part in the dispute, stepped from the group and, with his left hand seizing Tice by the shoulder, commenced stabbing him with a knife held in his right hand, and retaining his hold until he had stabbed him seven times, Tice endeavoring to escape and crying murder repeatedly. On receiving the last and fatal stab, which was in the lower part of the abdomen and much lacerated the intestines, Tice, by a great effort, escaped from Allen's grasp, exclaiming 'I am a murdered man—Allen has stabbed me." Allen immediately threw the knife from him and attempted to escape, but was seized and made secure in the county jail. The regimental surgeon, assisted by a young physician, accidentally present, dressed his wounds, but with no hope of his living, and on the twentieth Tice died. An inquest was held, who charged Allen with having murdered him. Allen says he is a native of Connecticut, whence he removed to New Hampshire and from thence coming to this county, bringing one son with him and leaving a wife and four children in New Hampshire. Allen had some time previously escaped from the jail in this county and was advertised by the sheriff and rearrested by Tice. Since that time Allen has declared he would have satisfaction or Tice's life. It is not known that any dispute had existed between them that evening previous to the murder."

Allen was tried at the December court, 1808, and convicted; and, on the 18th of March, 1809, was executed by a deputy sheriff, Abisha Woodward, on the public square, nearly in front of the Dr. Roosa property.

The second hanging in Wayne County was that of Cornelius Jones. On the 6th day of February, 1817, Elizabeth Roswell, who lived on the road leading from Seelyville to the old glass factory, on what is now the farm of John Robertson, appeared before Squire Spangenberg, and swore away the life of her only son, who, she said, had poisoned his step-father. Cornelius Jones was arrested the day following, and that afternoon Coroner Matthias Keen held an inquest, and the jury brought in a verdict that Roswell was murdered by Cornelius Jones. On the 27th of the following August, Foreman of the Grand Jury Oliver B. Bush signed a "true bill" against Cornelius for administering "white arsenick mixed with cider." The trial came the next day, and one of the witnesses testified that she heard the prisoner say that he killed his father because he hated him. A verdict of guilty was returned, and the execution took place on November 15, 1817. The scaffold was erected about forty rods east of the old court-house, in Bethany, in a lot now used as a cornfield by Isaiah Scudder. Bungling work was made of the execution, and the rope broke after only half strangling the doomed man. Before it could be readjusted, he recovered his powers of articulation, and begged them most pitiously not to haul him up again. The sentence of the law had to be complied with, and he was dragged a few inches off the ground, where he ended his life in horrible agony, while the crowd turned away appalled at the sickening scene.

Some days after the execution it was discovered that the murderer's grave had been robbed and his body was found in an old log hut, on the hill west of Bethany, where it was being cut up preparatory to boiling for the skeleton. An alarm was given, and the dismembered remains were taken over to the court-house and placed on the table, where they were identified as those of Jones. They were then reinterred just outside of the Presbyterian graveyard. The grave robbery created much excitement, and Dr. Seely and several others were arrested, but the affair never came to anything.

The Early Settlers.—John Bishop is accounted the first settler in Bethany, having located there as soon as the site of the county buildings was fixed by the trustees. He was a native of New Jersey, and after serving in the Continental army, being present at the famous crossing of the Delaware and enduring the hardships of the winter at Valley Forge, he settled at the Narrows, in Pike County. He was a carpenter by trade, and built the first frame house in Dyberry township for William Schoonover. He also worked upon the first court-house and jail at Bethany. In 1802, when a "Post" from Stroudsburg, the nearest post-office, was run to Bethany by private enterprise, the contract was let to Jesse Walker, and he hired John Bishop to carry the mails. The distance was twenty-six miles through the woods, and the path was a marked trail. It took him three days to make the trip, and he often carried his provisions and camped in the woods. His wife was Mary Snyder, also of New Jersey, and their children were John, William, Hiram, Henry, David, Jacob, Harvey, Hettie (who married John Kelley and went to Michigan) and Rachel (the wife of Elijah Schoonover, who settled in Berlin). John Bishop, the eldest son, never came to Pennsylvania; Hiram married Annie Conscalus and located in Palmyra, where he died in 1880, aged ninety-two years, he was buried at Indian Orchard; Henry married Amelia Kimble and settled in Berlin; David married Mariah Thurston and is a resident of Hawley; Jacob married Betsy Kimble and settled on the Bishop homestead; Harvey married Lucinda Brink and located at White Mills.

John Bunting was a New Jersey Quaker, who settled first in Canaan township, where he commenced the first clearing between Colonel Asa Stanton's and the Swingle settlement. He was commissioned a justice of the peace in 1799, and continued to serve as long as he lived. In 1802 he removed with his family to Bethany, occupying the building since known as the Henderson house, as a tenant under Henry Drinker, who erected it. It was one of the first, if not the first, dwelling put up in the village. In 1807 he removed to the valley of the West Branch, below Aldenville, where he died in 1811, aged sixty-eight years. The children who survived him were Daniel, Michael, Sally (the wife of Conrad Swingle) and Rebecca (who married John Parkinson). Michael went West, while Daniel remained on the homestead and left numerous descendants.

Jason Torrey, or, as he was commonly called, "Major" Torrey, was among the earliest settlers in Bethany. He was prominent in the history of the county, and is very frequently mentioned in this work, especially in Chapter VII. of the general history, in Chapter I. of Wayne County, and the chapter upon Honesdale. He was born in Williamstown, Mass., June 30, 1772, and, when scarcely twenty years of age, in the spring of 1793, came on foot into the township of Mt. Pleasant, where he found Elijah Dix, whom he knew in his native place, and there he became acquainted with Samuel Baird, of Pottstown, near Philadelphia. Mr. Baird was a noted surveyor, and employed Mr. Torrey to assist him in making some surveys; after he had traveled through different parts of New York and Pennsylvania, he concluded to settle in Mt. Pleasant. Having selected his land, he began to make improvements upon it and built a log-house, and moved into it in February, 1798. He continued to improve his land in Mt. Pleasant until 1802, when he removed to Bethany. His actions in the pioneer developments at Honesdale are fully set forth in proper place. By his first marriage to Lois Welch, on January 11, 1797, there were nine children, viz.: William, born in September, 1798; Ephraim in October, 1799, and Nathaniel in November, 1800; Minerva, born September 19, 1804; Maria, born January 1, 1806; John, born April 13, 1807; Stephen, born November 9, 1808; Asa, born October 13, 1810; Charles, born July 17, 1812.

By his second wife, Achsah Tyler Griswold, a widow, whom he married August 4, 1816, he had two more sons, James, born September 9, 1817, and David, born on the 13th of November, 1818.

Major Torrey after the death of his second wife made his home with his son John in Honesdale and died there November 21, 1848, aged seventy-six years, after a life of remarkable activity and usefulness. His sons, John and Stephen, still reside in Honesdale, and David, a clergyman, is living in New York State. Ephraim, Nathaniel, Asa, Charles, James, Maria and Minerva, are all deceased. The former was the wife of Richard L. Seely and the latter of Elijah Weston.

Asa Torrey, the sixth son of Jason Torrey, was born in Bethany in 1810. In 1827 he removed to Honesdale, but afterwards returned to Bethany, where he followed farming for the rest of his life. He married Polly G. Bush and had two children, Charles W., of Bethany, and James B., who died in 1871. Mr. Asa Torrey met with an untimely end. He was visiting his granddaughter, Mrs. C. W. Babbitt, of Honesdale, and on the evening of December 12, 1884, he left the house for a short walk. This was the last time he was seen alive by any of the members of his family. Several acquaintances noticed him on Ladywood Lane that evening, and the next day his body was found floating in the Lackawaxen, near the dam at the junction of the Dyberry. It is surmised that after crossing the Goodman bridge he had directed his steps toward the gas lamp at the head of Third Street, on the opposite side of the river, and had walked into the stream before he realized his whereabouts.

David Wilder was a native of New Hampshire, who located at Bethany in 1803 and married Sophia, a daughter of Paul Tyler, of Damascus. They had one daughter, Charity B., who married Hon. James Manning, and is one of the few surviving persons born in Bethany, and Hester and David. Mr. Wilder was one of the early hotel-keepers of the village, having taken out a license in 1811; he was also a successful farmer.

David Bunnell came from Stroudsburg and located on the place afterwards owned by William Stephens, where he cleared up a farm and built a house in 1804. Although a blacksmith by trade, he devoted most of his time to farming. He married Parthenia Kellam, of Palmyra, Pike County, and their children were Rockwell, who was the first child born in Bethany, and is now a resident of Prompton; Eleanor, the wife of Isaac Olmstead; Eunice B., who married Brooks Lavo; Henry Z. M. Pike; Charles F.; John K.; Sarah E., the wife of Rev. Gilbert Bailey; David S.; Harriet A., and A. Jane Bunnell.

Judge Isaac Dimmick, as he was always known, was from Orange County, N. Y., and came to Bethany in 1805, when he bought and commenced clearing up the farm now owned by Edwin Webb. He was an associate judge of the county in 1830–33, and was much employed in the county offices. His wife was a daughter of Hon. Abisha Woodward. When he sold his farm and moved West, Mr. Dimmick took his family with him.

Abisha Woodward, a son of Enos Woodward, one of the first settlers on Cherry Ridge, was elected sheriff of Wayne County in 1807, and about that time located in Bethany. He bought and cleared up the farm now occupied by Henry Webb, about half a mile west of the village, and married Lucretia, a daughter of Jacob Kimble, of Palmyra, Pike County. Among their children were the following: John K., who married Mary, a daughter of Silas Kellogg, and was the father of the late Warren J. Woodward, judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; Jackson K. Woodward, late attorney-at-law, of Honesdale; and Density Woodward, who married Johnson Olmstead, of Dundaff, Pa. The second son, Nathaniel Woodward, once represented the county in the Legislature; he went West. George W. Woodward, a Congressman and a judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, was the third son. The eldest daughter married Hon. Isaac Dimmick; the youngest, George Little, Esq.

George W. Woodruff, ex-chief justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, was born at Bethany March 26, 1809, and died in Rome, Italy, May 9, 1875. After completing his preliminary education he went to Wilkes-Barre, where he studied law, and was admitted to the bar. In 1852 he was appointed to the Supreme Bench by Governor Bigler, and served the usual term. In 1867 he was elected to Congress from the Twelfth District, to fill an unexpired term, and was re-elected in 1868. At the close of his term he removed to Philadelphia, where he practiced law until his death.

Eliphalet Kellogg was a brother of Silas Kellogg, one of the first settlers at Stantonville, and when the county-seat was first moved to Bethany, Eliphalet was appointed clerk of the county commissioners. He kept a tavern for many years, and, in 1809, was made register and recorder, which office he held for three successive terms, being reappointed by Governor Snyder at each re-election. Mr. Kellogg had five children,—Martin; Mary, the wife of Dr. Isaac Roosa; Sarah, who married Reuben R. Purdy; Abigail, who married Dr. Halsey; and Eunice, the wife of Washington E. Cook. Eliphalet Kellogg died in Bethany, September 9, 1844, aged seventy-nine years.

William Williams, an old Continental soldier, was also one of the early settlers, and built a cabin of such humble pretensions, just below the church lot, that the assessors did not place any value upon it. He left no descendants in the village. Judd Raymond, another of the first citizens, was a carpenter, and the father of John Raymond, Esq., and William Raymond. One of his daughters married Philander K. Williams, and another, Joseph Miller, Jr.

Captain Charles Hoel settled in Bethany about the same time that his twin-brother, Jacob, located in Dyberry township. He was one of the earliest borough officers and also was the proprietor of the brick-yard, where most of the brick used in the village were made. He built the house where George Hauser now lives. Captain Hoel had two sons,—John, deceased, and Washington, a resident of Lake township.

His daughters were Louisa, the first wife of Dr. Otis Avery; Martha, wife of Rezzia Woodward; Joanna, wife of Ezekiel Birdsall; and Mary, wife of John J. Schenck.

Jonathan S. Bidwell came from Connecticut, and moved on to the Major Torrey place, where Asa Torrey afterward lived. He was married to Elizabeth Hodges, in Litchfield County, Conn., and his children were Rachel, the wife of William Bryant; Eliza, who married Gilman Page; Lucretia, the wife of Francis Stephens; Nancy, the wife of Beniah Savage; Axcy, who married Oren Park; Olive, the wife of William Stevens, of Berlin; and one son, A. Jackson, who lives in Delaware County, N. Y. Mr. Bidwell, Sr., moved to Berlin township in 1831, and located on the place now occupied by Jacob Dewitt.

Solomon Moore, who was from New York State, was the first postmaster at Bethany, and was also elected sheriff in 1820, and was afterwards appointed clerk of the several courts. In connection with Jason Torrey he kept the first store in the village, and afterwards, when that partnership was dissolved, in 1814, he built a house and store on the corner afterwards occupied by Hon. E. O. Hamlin. He had a number of daughters, the youngest of whom married E. W. Weston, of Providence Place, Scranton.

Amzi and Thomas Fuller, who were prominent as attorneys-at-law in the early history of the county, are mentioned at length in the chapter devoted to the legal profession. The former came to Bethany, in 1814, as a school-teacher, and afterward studied law with Hon. Dan Dimmick, of Milford. He practiced in the Wayne County courts until the removal of the county-seat to Honesdale, when he removed to Wilkes-Barre. He had but one son, Hon. Henry M. Fuller, who went to Congress from Luzerne County. Thomas Fuller studied with his brother, Amzi, but was not admitted to the bar until many years after the latter had been a full-fledged counselor. On the removal of the county-seat, he took up his residence in Honesdale, where he died. One son, William, still lives in the homestead, and Mary, the only daughter, married Dr. Ralph L. Briggs, who died in Wisconsin in 1863.

James Manning was a native of South Coventry, Tolland County, Conn., who located in Bethany in 1815, and began as a merchant, carrying on a general business for twenty years. He was shrewd, enterprising and successful, and was from the first popular and a leading citizen. He served as register and recorder, and was afterwards elected associate judge, which position he retained many years. It was through his enterprise that the first newspaper of Wayne County, The Wayne County Mirror, was started, in 1818. He married Charity B. Wilder, and his children were Lucy, James, Sophia, David, Henry, George, Augusta, Charity and Mary. Mrs. Manning still occupies the residence he built in 1819.

Randall Wilmot, the father of David Wilmot, author of the famous "Wilmot Proviso," was a resident of Bethany, and built the residence and store now occupied by the Hon. A. B. Gammell. Randall Wilmot married a daughter of James Carr, of Canaan. David, the jurist and statesman, was born in Bethany January 20, 1814. He received his early education in the village, and afterwards went to school at Aurora, N. Y., studied law, and in 1834 was admitted to the bar at Wilkes-Barre, and commenced to practice at Towanda, Bradford County, in which place he has since resided.

Hon. Warren J. Woodward was born in Bethany September 24, 1819. He received his early education in the schools of the region, and afterward attended the academy at Wilkes-Barre. On completing his term there he entered the office of the Honesdale Democrat, which he edited for some time. He then returned to Wilkes-Barre, and commenced the study of law under the tuition of his uncle, Hon. George W. Woodward, late chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. This was in May, 1840. In August, 1842, he was admitted to the bar of Luzerne County, and soon gained a large practice. In 1856 he was appointed chief justice of the Twenty-sixth Judicial District, then embracing the counties of Columbia and Sullivan, and before the term was over he was selected to preside over the courts of Berks County. He was re-elected, and continued to fulfill the duties of that high position until the fall of 1874, when he was elected to a seat on the Supreme Bench of the State. After occupying the judicial bench for more than twenty-three years, he died at his country-seat, in Hamden, N. Y., September 23, 1879, and was buried at Wilkes-Barre.

Judge Nathaniel B. Eldred, of whom a more extended sketch is given in the chapter devoted to the Wayne County bar, located in Bethany in 1816, and continued to practice law there for more than twenty years. As a man of fine ability and great impartiality, he was called to fill various judicial positions, which required his residence elsewhere; but when these trusts had been faithfully executed, he returned to his old home, and was identified with the place until his death, which occurred in 1867. He had seven children, four of whom died in youth. The others were Mary, now deceased, the first wife of Hon. E. O. Hamlin; Lucinda, also deceased, the wife of Ara Bartlett; Charles, who removed to Wisconsin; and Carrie, the wife of Mr. Watson, of Warren County.

Moses Ward, who was a joiner by trade, came from Chatham, N. J., in 1822, and first settled upon the Dyberry, but afterward moved into the village. His children were Rev. E. O. Ward, pastor of the Presbyterian Church; Mary; and Stephen D., cashier of the Honesdale Bank at one time. Rev. E. O. Ward graduated at Hamilton College in 1838, and in 1841 completed his theological studies at Auburn Seminary. He became pastor of the Bethany Church in 1853, a position which he still holds.

E. W. Hamlin, a son of Harris Hamlin, one of the early settlers of Salem township, located in Bethany in 1822, and there learned the trade of hat-making, a business which he subsequently carried on for himself. As a broad-gauge man and a good thinker, he took an active part in public affairs, and was elected county treasurer. Subsequently he was a deputy in the same office. He was elected representative to the State Legislature in 1838, and was re-elected the year following. He was chosen State Senator to represent the counties of Wayne, Pike and Monroe, in 1851, and served for three years. After the expiration of this term of office he gave his attention to business, and was a prominent figure in the enterprises of his day. He died in Bethany April 3, 1884.

Charles Grandison Reed, who lived near Bethany, was born at Salisbury, Litchfield County, Conn., December 13, 1796. He was descended from an old English family, dating from John Reed, of Cornwall, who settled at Norwalk in 1730. Mr. Reed married Samantha E. Bird. He came to Wayne County in 1832 and resided near Bethany until his death, which occurred October 6, 1883. His children were Dr. Dwight, Dr. William H. and Egbert Reed, of Honesdale, Charles B. Reed, of Sharon, Conn., and Mrs. Ellen S., wife of Rev. Mellville Smith, of Boon County, Ill.

A number of other early settlers, more or less connected with the annals of Bethany, are spoken of in the chapter on Dyberry township.

Hotels and Post-Office.—The establishment of a private "Post" between Bethany and Stroudsburg, the nearest post-office, in December, 1802, has already been referred to. This mail service, commenced in the middle of winter, when the deep snows concealed all traces of the rude roads, and the dangers of travel were increased by the hungry wild beasts that everywhere abounded, was a marked and expensive enterprise for those days, but one that conferred great benefit on the projectors and their neighbors. When John Bishop arrived with his first little bag of letters and papers, he was met by half the sparse inhabitants of the little village and was the hero of the occasion. Under the contractors, Jesse Walker and others, he carried the mails for several years, until the "Post" was succeeded by a regularly established office. About the 1st of June, 1811, a regular office was located at Bethany, and once a week the mails were distributed at the store of Solomon Moore, who was the first postmaster. This mail came from Wilkes-Barre, by the way of Mount Pleasant, and returned through Milford, Paupack and Cobb's Gap. Subsequently the mail service was increased and a succession of "expeditions" have given the village the daily mail it now has. Among those who have been postmasters are Eliphalet Kellogg, John A. Gustin, E. W. Hamlin, Robert Lancaster, William Ketchem and Walter W. Weston.

The first licensed house of public entertainment in Bethany was that of John Bunting, who obtained the necessary papers in December, 1805. In May following Jason Torrey took out a license and during the session of the courts that then ensued, he entertained between sixty and seventy guests. In 1807 John Bunting sold out his goods at public sale and moved to Aldenville, where he remained the rest of his life. For a while the hotel stood vacant, and then Joseph Miller opened what was known as the "Yellow Tavern House," for years a noted hostelry. Mr. Miller sold to Colonel Asa Stanton, and he, in turn, was succeeded by Eliphalet Kellogg, who refitted the place and painted it yellow about 1814 or 1815. This old hotel was standing in 1845, and before it swung the same old red sign bearing Masonic emblems that had invited the traveler for many years.

It was in this old hotel that the Bethany Masonic Lodge was instituted about August, 1816. It was known to the craft as "Freedom Lodge, No. 147." Its membership was large and persons came from places as remote as Milford to attend the meetings. These were held on Tuesday evening, "from five till nine o'clock from September ye 25th to March ye 25th; and from six o'clock to ten o'clock from March ye 25th till September ye 25th." The initiation fee was sixteen dollars, and from a receipt for dues dated October 16, 1826, it seems that at that time Abisha Woodward was treasurer.

In 1819 (Anno Lucis 5819) a Masonic work gives some of the officers as follows: Benjamin Raymond, W. M.; George Spangenberg, S. W.; Jacob S. Davis, Secretary; Robert Beardslee, Treasurer. The members mentioned were Thomas Spangenberg, Eliphalet Kellogg, Matthias Keen, William R. Walker, Abisha Woodward, Charles Stanton, Benjamin King and Jeremiah Bennett. After Honesdale had grown up and the courts been established there, the membership of this lodge, like that of St. Tammany's, became so reduced that it was given up, and the records and jewels were removed to the new lodge at the county-seat, where they were destroyed in the great fire.

Schools and Churches.—It has already been noted that in 1803 the first school was started in Bethany. This venture was made by Esquire John Bunting and Jason Torrey, who engaged a teacher on their own responsibility. Other parents were charged a tuition fee of two dollars a quarter for each child sent, and the deficiency, if there was one, in the teacher's salary was paid by the originator of the plan. It was thus by private effort that a school was maintained, for a part of each year at least, in the old log school-house, until 1809, when a substantial frame building was erected by private subscription, and the work continued much as before. Among the teachers who served in the frame school-house were Ephraim Dimmick and Ephraim Torrey.

The act of the Legislature incorporating Beech Woods Academy, and appropriating one thousand dollars on the condition that a like sum was raised by the people, was passed in 1813, but it was several years before the conditions were complied with and the people availed themselves of the gift. Meanwhile Amzi Fuller, who afterwards became a man of much distinction, come to Bethany and taught in the frame schoolhouse. In 1816 the State appropriation was secured, and the Beech Woods Academy was erected on the school-lots that had been set apart for the purpose by the county trustees, and transferred to Jason Torrey, Abisha Woodward and Isaac Dimmick. The walls of a brick building were erected to the height of the first story that year, but the academy was not ready for occupancy until the winter of 1820, when Ephraim Torrey was selected as the first principal. The academy was a substantial brick building, two stories high, and accommodated two grades of pupils. Although the course of study was not extended, it was thorough and practical, and a number of men who afterwards rose to distinction were among the pupils of the next few years. Thomas Fuller, a brother of Amzi, before mentioned, taught it about 1824; and in 1826 or 1827 L. C. Judson, the father of "Ned Buntline," the well-known writer of adventurous tales, was principal.

After the removal of the county-seat to Honesdale, in 1841, the court-house was used as an academy until 1848, when the Legislature chartered the University of North Pennsylvania. An immediate enlargement of the building followed. It was ready for occupancy on the 2d of December, 1850, at which time an advertisement of the trustees announced that the main building would accommodate from one hundred and fifty to two hundred students. It comprised two large study-rooms, three recitation-rooms and a handsome recess for library and apparatus. The sleeping-rooms accommodated eight students each, and the entire building was heated by Culver's patent hot-air furnaces. Four teachers were employed, and there were eighty pupils the first term. E. Curtis, a graduate of the State Normal School at Albany, N. Y., was the first principal in the new building, and J. F. Stoddard, professor of mathematics and natural and moral science at Liberty Normal School, was announced to deliver a course of lectures during the term. The trustees of the university at this time were as follows: Hon. N. B. Eldred, chairman; P. G. Goodrich, secretary; Dr. Otis Avery, Hon. Pope Bushnell, Hon. James Manning, Hon. Paul S. Preston, Rev. E. O. Ward, Dr. Urial Wright, John M. McIntosh, Earl Wheeler, Esq., Phineas Arnold, Dr. Harrison Gregory, Armoy Prescott, Orin Hall, Ira Vadakin, Osborn Olmstead, Henry Jennings, Richard Webb, Rev. Henry Curtis, D. W. Church, William R. Stone, R. F. Lord, Rev. W. Richardson, John Sloan, R. L. Seely and D. S. West.

The next year Professor Stoddard was elected principal, and the institution was patronized by over two hundred students, giving a great impetus to the cause of education in the entire vicinity. Then, for a time, the university was managed by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The institution got into debt, and on November 28, 1856, all the real estate was sold by the sheriff to E. W. Hamlin, who bought for Professor Stoddard. The latter put the buildings in excellent repair, and reopened it as a private school in the following spring. On April 18, 1857, the building was burned to the ground, entailing a loss of six thousand dollars, only one-half of which was covered by insurance. Professor Stoddard reopened his school in the Baptist Church edifice, but soon after abandoned the enterprise and generously gave the fire-proof building to the borough, to be used as a public school.

The First Presbyterian Church.[1]—On the town plot of Bethany three lots were set aside and designated as "the church lots." They were not sold by the trustees in whom the title to the Drinker grant was vested, but by them were conveyed to the county commissioners, together with the county property and the unsold residue of the nine hundred and ninety-nine acres donated for the town of Bethany. On the 10th day of September, 1810, the county commissioners conveyed these three lots to Jason Torrey, Abisha Woodward and Isaac Dimmick as trustees, "To be held by said trustees as a site for erecting thereon a house for divine worship, for the use of the inhabitants of the Town of Bethany, or such of said inhabitants who, together with other inhabitants in the vicinity, shall associate for the purpose of erecting, and shall erect thereon, a church or meeting-house for publick Divine Worship, and a burying-ground for the use of the inhabitants aforesaid." Thus, coeval with the organization of the town, was provision made for the spiritual welfare of its people, and there was then due recognition of the necessity for more than temporal prosperity.

The ground thus set apart as "God's Acre" was soon hallowed by human clay, but beyond the interment elsewhere referred to, the purpose for which it was set aside was not achieved until some years afterwards.

During the same year the first religious meeting was held in the town, and the first sermon was preached.

Early in 1805 the inhabitants were favored with occasional preaching by missionaries and other ministers of the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, and the seed was sown that afterward bore much fruit; but few seemed interested, the Sabbath was openly disregarded and profaned, and vice prevailed to an alarming extent. In 1806 and 1807 Elder Peck, of Mount Pleasant, visited Bethany regularly once a month, and in January, 1809, under his ministration, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time in the town. This service was held at the house of Jason Torrey. Other services, the details of which are given in the history of the churches under whose auspices they took place, followed, and there was a better religious atmosphere in the town.

In May, 1812, Rev. Worthington Wright, a Congregational missionary from Connecticut, came into Wayne County and preached at different settlements. After he had labored for a few months, it was proposed that he become settled as pastor of the Congregational Societies of Salem, Palmyra, Dyberry and Canaan, for a period of four years, dividing at least one-half his time between these towns, and devoting the other half to labors in destitute portions of the county. Subscriptions were accordingly circulated for Mr. Wright's support, and the result was communicated to a meeting of the subscribers on December 22, 1812.

Residents of Dyberry had subscribed $162; of Salem, $42.50; of Palmyra, $25; of Canaan, $27.50,—in all, $257, a fund ample for the purpose.

The sums which were variously subscribed by residents of Bethany and vicinity were as follows:

Jason Torrey	$20	R. Beardslee	2
E. Kellogg	15	John Woodward	5
Isaac Dimmick	10	Abm. Stryker	5
Solomon Moore	8	Jacob Schenk	2
Randall Wilmot	2	Enos Woodward	2
Benj. Doughty	2	Timothy Gustin	4
Ephraim Dimmick	5	Thomas Lindsay	2
Charles Hole	5	Lewis Collins	10
Caleb Hole	2	Isaac Brink	2
Amos Polly	2	Aaron French	1
Peter Smith	2	Moses Sampson	1
David Wilder	4	Stephen Kimble	2
Ephraim Torrey	5	Walter Kimble	6
Abisha Woodward	10	Benj. Kimble	2
Isaac Seaman	2	Charles Kimble	2
George Seely & Bro.	8	Aug. Collins	2
Sylvanus Seely	6
Isaac Oakly	2	Total	$162
Cooper Osborn	2

Those in Palmyra were,—

Hez. Bingham	5	Jos. Atkinson	2
John Pellet	4	Jonathan Brink	1
Eph. Kimble	4	Simeon Ansley	3
Leonard Labar	2
George Labar	2	Total	$25
Robert Rupett	2

In Canaan,—

Thos. Starkweather	5.00	George Morgan	1.00
Asa Stanton	3.00	John Folis	5.00
Charles Stanton	1.00	George Rix	3.00
James Carr	1.00	Samuel Davis	.50
Silas Woodward	1.00	Fred. Swingle	1.00
Jesse Morgan	2.00
Conrad Swingle	4.00	Total	$27.50

In Salem,—

Jos. Woodbridge	$10.00	Wm. Hollister	3.00
Seth Goodrich	6.00	Ashbel Miller	2.50
A. Woodbridge	6.00	Henry Stevens	3.00
Jesse Miller	3.00	Henry Harmen	1.00
Wm. Woodbridge	5.00
Elijah Weston	3.00	Total	$42.50

In these subscriptions it was conditional that Mr. Wright should reside in Bethany or Dyberry township, and the Salem subscribers expressed a willingness to double their subscriptions of $42.50 if he would make that township his home. The following resolution was passed by the meeting:

"Whereas, It appears from the subscriptions produced that a sum has been pledged adequate to the object of procuring the settlement of Mr. Wright; therefore be it

"Resolved, that a committee of five be appointed to address the Connecticut Missionary Society on the subject, and to negotiate with Mr. Wright in relation of his proposed settlement."

The committee consisted of Jason Torrey, of Bethany; Dr. Lewis Collins, of Cherry Ridge; Joseph Woodbridge, of Salem; and Asa Stanton, of Canaan. On the following day Mr. Wright accepted the invitation conditionally to the consent of the Missionary Society, and this was given. His installation took place May 26, 1813, the services being held in the court-house at Bethany, in the presence of a large assemblage. He took up his residence in Bethany and served the congregations in his charge for two years, during which time he purchased lot No. 141, where Mrs. Groff afterward lived, and erected a dwelling. He also contracted for sixty-four acres of land, now included in the Charles G. Reed farm, and commenced an improvement. In 1815 his wife died, and as his eye-sight had begun to fail, he resigned his charge, relinquished the ministry and left the county.

During the three years following, the church was without a pastor, and the services were desultory, depending upon the advent of some missionary from adjacent stations. The desire for regular services did not die out, however, and in 1817 two hundred and eighty-eight dollars was subscribed as an annual contribution to secure the services of Rev. Gresham Williams, then of Springfield, N. J. The negotiations fell through, notwithstanding the anxiety of the people for a settled minister. In 1818 the Sabbath-school, elsewhere spoken of, was established, and a week later, on the 26th of July, Rev. Thomas Camp, a missionary of the Presbyterian General Assembly, commenced preaching at Bethany and holding social meetings during the week. His labors brought about a religious revival, and Rev. Gideon N. Judd came to assist him. The people became much attached to Mr. Camp, and in September a subscription was circulated and pledges to the amount of four hundred dollars were secured for two-thirds of his time. This subscription was so worded that it seemed to imply an independence from all ecclesiastical control, and was declined by Mr. Camp, as injudicious for both people and pastor. He strongly advised the Christians to connect themselves with some recognized church organization. This suggestion was acted upon, and after a free discussion of the form of church government most desired, it was concluded to organize a Presbyterian Church. On Tuesday, September 22, 1818, Rev. Phineas Camp, assisted by Deacon John Tyler, of the Congregational Church of Ararat, organized the First Presbyterian Church of Bethany, with the following constitutional members:

John Bunnel.	Delia Gleason.
Gideon Langdon.	Nancy Bunnel.
Erastus Gleason.	Mary Day.
Virgil M. Dibold.	Asuba Langdon.
Achsah Torrey.	Betsy Hole.

Sally Bushnell.

In all, eleven members,—four male and seven female.

Virgil M. Dibold was chosen ruling elder, and, the next day after the sermon, was set apart by prayer to the duties of his office.

On the Thursday and Friday following still greater fruit was born of Mr. Camp's labors, and the following persons were received on profession of faith:

Mrs. R. Schoonover.	Louisa Collins.
Philena Collins.	Elias Day.
Mary Day.	Pope Bushnell.
Abigail Day.	Nancy Blandin.
Polly Wilmot.	Jason Torrey.
Lidia Mussey.	Spencer Blandin.
Ephraim Torrey, Jr.	James Houghton.
Christianna G. Faatz.	William Torrey.

Betsy S. Raymond.

Mrs. Irene Gleason was admitted to fellowship by a letter from Harmon, N. J., making in all twenty-nine members, to whom the Lord's Supper was administered on the following Sabbath, in the court-house, in the presence of a large audience. Mr. Camp departed the next day, and for nearly a year the infant church was left without other ministrations than those of an occasional visiting preacher.

On the 5th of June, 1819, Messrs. Loring Parsons, Jason Torrey and Pope Bushnell were chosen as ruling elders, and on the following Sabbath, Loring Parsons and Betsy, his wife, Thomas S. McLaughy and Margaret, his wife, Lorenzo Collins, Olive Woodward, Mary Kellogg, Frelena Brooks, Eli Henshaw and Abigail, his wife, and Lucy Ross were admitted on profession of faith. Thus, without a settled minister, this church in the wilderness gradually increased in numbers and gained the confidence of the community. At this time it had forty members.

As yet the church had not been formally organized and placed in the care of any Presbytery, and at a meeting on the 4th of September, 1819, a few days short of one year after the organization of the church, a committee, composed of Gideon Langdon, Pope Bushnell and Erastus Gleason, was appointed at a congregational meeting to prosecute a call to Rev. Gresham Williams and Jason Torrey, Virgil M. Dibold, Pope Bushnell, Jacob S. Davis and Amzi Fuller were selected to prepare articles of association.

On the 10th of September in the same year the session, with the moderator of the Hudson Presbytery, presented an application to place the church under the care of that body, and it was duly received. Mr. Williams accepted the call and was installed as pastor on the 26th of February, 1820. His salary was six hundred dollars per annum and two-thirds of his time was to be devoted to the Bethany Church, and the remaining third to that of Mt. Pleasant. In May following the first trustees of the Bethany Church were chosen. They were Benjamin Jenkins, Solomon Moore, Jason Torrey, Pope Bushnell and Stephen Day. Mr. Williams remained pastor a year and a half, during which time the membership of the church increased to sixty-one. At the expiration of this period the relations were dissolved and the church was once more without a minister until 1824.

Up to this time the desire for a church edifice had been freely expressed, though it had not been deemed advisable to attempt to realize it. During the next two years the subject was more fully agitated, and in 1822 a meeting was called to take definite steps in the matter. Committees to confer for the site of the church-lots, to circulate subscriptions and to obtain plans for the proposed edifice were appointed, and subsequently reported favorably. In January, 1823, it was reported that the subscriptions amounted to two thousand one hundred and ninety-six dollars, principally in labor and materials, and that more could be relied on when the paper had been more completely circulated; that a conference had been held with the leading spirits of the Baptist and Methodist Churches, and that those congregations were willing to relinquish their claim to the church lots for a price to be fixed by arbitration. Subsequently Amzi Fuller, James Manning and Jacob S. Davis, none of them members of any of the denominations concerned, fixed the value of the lots at fifty dollars each, and this arbitrament was accepted, it being stipulated that the Presbyterian Church organization should pay to each of the other congregations fifty dollars when the latter desired to build a church edifice. Thus the front part of the church lots came into the possession of the Presbyterian Church while the rear half was leased as a public burying-ground. The amount due the Methodist society was paid by Jason Torrey, individually, in November, 1836, and that due the Baptists raised by subscriptions in 1841.

The framing of the church was raised on the 19th and 20th of August, 1823, but the exterior of the edifice was not completed for several years.

In the spring of 1824, aided by the Domestic Missionary Society of New York, the congregation engaged Rev. Daniel Young to preach one year. His health failed and he was not able to remain but a few months, so that in October Rev. E. W. Goodman was secured. As Baptists and Methodists each had preaching regularly once in two weeks, it was difficult to arrange the hours of service, and in 1825 a temporary floor and seats were put in the meeting-house, so that it could be used in warm weather, and the second story of the academy building was fitted for occupation in the winter. Subsequently the second story of the fire-proof building was similarly arranged. During the pastorate of Mr. Goodman the church was sadly distracted by internal feuds and cases of discipline, although some additions were made to its membership. During his term the charter of the church was granted, the articles of association having remained for nearly five years in Philadelphia awaiting the approval of the Supreme Court, after they had been adopted by the congregation. Mr. Goodman's term expired in May, 1827, and his engagement was not renewed. Soon after his removal Mr. Joel Campbell, a theological student at Auburn, visited the church and remained four weeks, and in October following, when he had been licensed, he was engaged as stated supply. He was installed as pastor in December. In February, 1829, the Presbyterian Church of Honesdale was organized, and he divided his labors between the two charges until 1830, when he was installed as pastor of the latter church. In 1831 Rev. Lyman Richardson commenced labors in Bethany as a stated supply and continued a year. The church was then without a minister until July, 1835, when Rev. Alfred Ketchum was engaged. He was stated supply until September, when his installation took place.

The first effort to raise funds to complete the church edifice had failed, and a congregational meeting was called to consider the matter. A subscription that should be obligatory when the sum amounted to one thousand dollars was circulated and, at a meeting in December, 1835, the deficiency of sixty-four dollars was made up by additional contributions. The building was at once completed and the dedication took place December 27, 1836. The cost up to this time was $3560.61. The first pew-rental took place February 11, 1839, and the amount realized was two hundred and thirty-six dollars. Mr. Ketchum's pastorate ended in September, 1838, and in February, 1849, Rev. William Toby became stated supply, remaining until 1840. Rev. Jeremiah Miller was then called, but was never installed as pastor. He remained supply until 1844. Rev. Seth Williston next supplied the pulpit, until June, 1845, and was succeeded by Rev. J. J. Slocum, who remained until January 1, 1847. Rev. John Male then filled the pulpit for three months, after which it was vacant until Rev. Albert Worthington commenced his labors, in 1850. Rev. William S. Smith succeeded him in 1852, and was stated supply for three months. On October 1, 1853, the present pastor, Rev. Elias O. Ward, was called, and under his ministrations the church has grown both in strength and grace. In 1854, and again in 1872, the church edifice was repaired and renovated. Fine trees have been set out and the property enclosed. The number on the church rolls is over three hundred and fifty names, and the present membership is about eighty. The following persons have been ruling elders since the organization of the church :

Virgil M. Dibol.	Jason Torrey.
Pope Bushnell.	Loring Parsons.
Thos. S. McLaughy.	Augustus Collins.
Eli Henshaw.	Ephraim Dimmick.
Samuel Bartlett.	Solomon Langdon.
Nathan Kellogg.	Elijah D. Bunnell.
Ethel Reed.	Edwin S. Day.
Joseph Bodie.	James B. Ward.
Luther C. Fuller.	Sumner R. Isham.
John Sipperl.	Dinglet Henshaw.
Theodore Day.

Rev. Elias O. Ward, who, for nearly a half century has been a minister of the Presbyterian Church, and for the past thirty-three years pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Bethany, Pa., was born at Chatham, Morris County, N. J., February 5, 1810. He removed with his parents from Chatham to Bethany in 1825, and for a few years worked there at the trade of a hatter. Early religious influences impressed him, and in 1832 he began studying for the ministry with Rev. Preston Richardson, of Harford, Susquehanna County, Pa., under whose tutorship he was prepared for college, and entered the second term of the Freshmen Class at Hamilton, in 1834. He was graduated from this institution in the Class of 1838, and in September of the same year entered the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., from which he was graduated after the usual course of three years study. On September 16, 1841, he was licensed to preach at Great Bend, and four days thereafter preached his first sermon at Harford, where he had begun his studies nine years before. On October 4th following he preached as a candidate in the Presbyterian Church at Dundaff, was accepted, and remained as pastor of that church for twelve years. During his incumbency as pastor he labored faithfully in every good work in the interest of the church, and sought to promote and foster Christian unity. He saw his labors successfully crowned by many and frequent accessions to the church rolls, together with a general religious sentiment in the community.

With the beginning of his ministry began also his married life, for, on October 14th of the same year he married Emeline Amy, daughter of Eliab and Jemima Farrar, of Harford, whose parents were from Massachusetts, and both died at Harford.

For forty-five years Mrs. Ward has shared with him the loyalty and devotion of the church, and bore up his hands in time of depression. She is a woman of high Christian character, in full sympathy with all religious work, and the helps and hospitality requisite to make a pastor's home the welcome place for all.

In 1853, having closed his labors with the church at Dundaff, he was settled with the church at Bethany, where he has remained faithful to his trust until the present time (1886.) During this long period as pastor he has been at the head of the Sunday-school, and as its superintendent, has so led the youth of the vicinity in Bible instruction, as to make the school the true feeder of the church. Nor have his labors been confined to the church and Sunday-school at Bethany, for he has, through a long series of years been active in establishing and keeping up Sunday-schools in neighborhoods outside of Bethany, where his labors have also been largely successful. For many years he has been officially and otherwise identified with the Wayne County Bible Society. Rev. Mr. Ward's name is probably more familiar in Wayne and adjoining counties than almost any other minister of the gospel, from the fact, that during his long sojourn in Bethany his acquaintance has obtained a wide range, and during his ministry he has joined in wedlock some four hundred and thirty couples, and been called upon to bury four hundred and sixty persons.

He has taken an active interest in schoolwork, and for a little over six years served as school superintendent of Wayne County. His proficiency in this capacity is well known, and has worked inestimable benefit to the schools of the county.

His father, Moses Ward (1784–1867), and mother, Jane (1790–1871), daughter of Stephen and Mary (Bonnel) Day, were both natives of New Jersey, were members of the Presbyterian Church, and their remains rest in the cemetery at Bethany. Moses Ward was a carpenter by trade, was engaged in building the Gravity Railroad, and was in the employ of that corporation the remainder of his active life. His maternal grandparents settled on Dyberry Creek, in Dyberry township, in 1816. A sketch of them may be found in another part of this volume.

The other children of Moses and Jane Ward were Stephen D. (1818–74), clerk and cashier in the Honesdale National Bank for many years; Mary Budd (1811–33), was the mother of the late Mrs. Thaddeus Fitch, of Honesdale. The children of Rev. Elias O. and Emeline Amy Ward are Stephen Day, served in the late Civil War in the army of the Potomac, was in the Peninsular campaign with McClellan, and in the battles of Chancellorsville and Second Bull Run. He died soon after the latter battle at Fairfax Seminary Hospital, Va., September 8, 1862, aged twenty years and eight days. Edward Oscar married Alice, daughter of Hon. A. B. Gammell, and is a merchant at Bethany, and Mary Elizabeth is the wife of Dr. Reed Burns, of Honesdale, Pa.

The Bethany Baptist Church.—Rev. Epaphras Thompson was one of the earliest Baptist preachers in Bethany, and as early as 1807 preached there occasionally. He was followed by Rev. Elijah Peck, and, as has already been stated, the first communion took place under the auspices of the Baptist Church. On the 12th of December, 1809, a meeting was held at the residence of Mr. David Bunnell, at which five persons were received as candidates for baptism, and this ordinance was performed the next day at the house of Mr. Coleman. On the following Sabbath, Rev. Jesse Hartwell, of Massachusetts, preached twice, and, on the following day, baptized Ephraim Torrey, the ordinance being administered in the Lackawaxen Creek, a few rods below the residence afterward occupied by Rev. Henry Curtis. In 1810 Mr. Peck again visited the place and three more converts received the ordinance. Rev. John Lowton, of New York, while on a tour, under the patronage of the Hamilton Missionary Society, preached twice at the court-house, in Bethany, in the summer of 1811.

The early converts united with the Baptist Church, of Mount Pleasant, and acted as a branch of that body, until, by the settlement of several members of the Palmyra Church in the vicinity, it was deemed advisable to organize a separate congregation at Bethany. This was done on December 28, 1816, at a meeting held at the house of Mr. Isaac Dimmick, when a committee was appointed to draft a Covenant and Articles of Faith and Practice. The final report was made and accepted on June 8, 1817, at the residence of Mr. Benjamin Raymond. This church was reorganized by a council, which convened in the court-house at Bethany, June 17, 1817, composed of delegates from Palmyra, Abington and Mount Pleasant Churches, Rev. John Miller acting as moderator. Eighteen persons were then received. Other additions followed, and the list of constituent members contained the following names at the time and was entered in the records:

Rachel Jennings.	Catherine Raymond.
Betsy Jennings.	Elvira Raymond.
Mary Arnold.	Eleanor Smith.
Hepzibah Arnold.	Azubah G. Torrey.
Parthenia Bunnell.	Lavenia Purdy.
Elizabeth Pullis.	Eunice Purdy.
Eunice Torrey.	Elizabeth Bidwell.
Sally Dimmick.	Violette Olmsted.
Jonathan Jennings.	Deborah Chamberlain.
William Purdy, Jr.	Elvira Brooks.
Isaac Dimmick.	Eleanor Bunnell.
Conrad Pullis.	Clarissa Dimmick.
Ephraim Torrey.	Eleanor Nelson.
David Arnold.	Hannah Thomas.
Charlotte Sibley.	Randall Wilmot.
David Oakley.	Josiah Purdy.
Richard Briggs.	Jonathan S. Bidwell.
Osborn Olmsted.	Isaac Olmsted.
Amy Purdy.	Rockwell Bunnell.
Hannah Purdy.

At a meeting held on the 11th of July following, William Purdy, Jr., was appointed standing moderator and Ephraim Torrey clerk of the church. The church was united with the Abington Association the next autumn, and was the first received by that body. As yet there was no settled pastor, though services were held regularly, and the Word was preached by occasional visiting ministers. A call was extended to Rev. John Smitzer, who assumed charge in the fall of 1821, dividing his labors between the churches at Bethany, Damascus and the Canaan branch of the Mount Pleasant congregation. Under his pastorate, which terminated in the spring of 1826, the church greatly enlarged, more than doubling its membership, though there occurred some cases of protracted difficulty, and painful discipline. For the next three years, the church had no settled pastor, until in 1829 Rev. Charles H. Hubbard was called, supplying the Mt. Pleasant church a portion of the time, and afterwards dividing his labors between Bethany and Damascus. During the year 1831 there was a great revival which accomplished much. Mr. Hubbard resigned in 1832, and in the fall, Rev. Henry Curtis assumed the pastoral charge, remaining until 1845. During his ministrations the church reached its culminating point in numerical prosperity, having two hundred and ten communicants, and then, by the formation of independent churches in the surrounding region, and from other causes, a decline commenced, which progressed steadily until the church was extinguished. When Mr. Curtis retired there were one hundred and thirty-three communicants.

In 1841 the meeting-house was built at a cost of seventeen thousand dollars and was occupied for the first time in January, 1842, its dedication occurring on the 18th of February, of the same year. Until this time the meetings had been held in the fire-proof building the academy and at private dwellings. At a revival that followed the dedication, the work extended to Honesdale and resulted in the formation of an independent church there. Rev. M. M. Evarts was the next pastor, and remained for two years, being succeeded by Rev. Andrew Hopper in 1847. The latter was succeeded by Rev. L. L. Still in 1850, and closed his labors in the spring of 1852.

Early in 1853 Rev. Henry Curtis again became pastor and remained for three years. He was succeeded by Rev. D. W. Halsted. Several other pastors served the church, but it grew weaker each year, and about fifteen years ago regular services were given up. At present the congregation exists only as a name.

The First Sunday-School. — At Bethany was founded not only the first Sabbath-school in Wayne County, but the first in northeastern Pennsylvania. In the summer of 1818 Dr. Virgil M. Dibold was returning from a visit to friends in Massachusetts and spent the Sabbath at Florida, Orange County, N. Y., where he found a Sunday-school in operation and became much interested in its work. Having studied carefully the plan on which it was conducted, he returned to Bethany and told Sheldon Norton and some other Christian friends what he had seen. He proposed that they, too, start a Sabbath-school, and his enthusiasm was such that they acquiesced. Notice was given on Sunday, July 12, 1818, that the school would be commenced in the court-house on the following Sunday morning at nine o'clock. The young people of the village were all visited and asked to commit the first ten verses of the fifth chapter of Matthew. Thirty scholars and five or six teachers accepted the invitation and Dr. Dibold was chosen superintendent. These early teachers were Sheldon Norton, Josiah Purdy, William and Ephraim Torrey, Miss Lydia Musey (Mrs. Dr. Dwight, of Salem), and Miss Maria Sanford. The number of scholars soon increased to ninety-three. A few months after this Benjamin Tilghman, of Philadelphia, visited Bethany, and, having been detained over Sunday, he was invited to visit the school and inform himself as to what was being accomplished. Through his influence the Female Bible Society of Philadelphia made a handsome donation of Bibles and Testaments, and Mr. Tilghman supplemented this with a supply of hymn-books and tracts.

During the severe winter months the school was divided into three parts,—one meeting at the court-house, one at the residence of Judge Woodward, a mile west of the town, and one at the residence of M. M. Whitman (now the residence of Mr. Sidney Bushnell). All of these were organized as union schools and so remained for more than twenty years, all denominations of Christians assisting in sustaining them. Afterward separate Sunday-schools were organized by the Baptist and Methodist churches, and the original organization was left in charge of the Presbyterians, ultimately becoming incorporated as a branch of that church, by which it is still maintained.

JUDGE JAMES MANNING.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JUDGE JAMES MANNING.

Among those who followed the pioneers, and subsequently settled in Wayne County, none were more entitled to a niche in its history than the subject of this sketch. Born at South Coventry, Conn., April 3, 1792, where education is regarded the sure foundation of the Republic, he early in life acquired more than an ordinary education for the young men of his time, and his literary attainments in after years, his general intelligence, and his ability in life's pursuits, all attest how well he spent his boyhood.

He spent sometime in the store of his brother Royal, at Coventry, and was for a time in Brooklyn and New York. In 1815 he sought a place where he might establish himself in business, and with a team laden with goods, he set out from his native place, and found his way, after a tedious journey, to Bethany. Adding to his stock of goods bought in New York, he opened a store and began a regular mercantile business, which he continued successfully for a period of some twenty years. The field of trade seemed not large enough at first to gratify his ambition, and as there were no means of communication with the sparsely settled people of the county, and Bethany having been made the county-seat of Wayne, he saw the necessity of establishing a newspaper, not only to record the incidents of daily occurrence, but also to place before its readers what might be gleaned from the great centres of trade and commerce in the country, and for the purpose of disseminating general information.

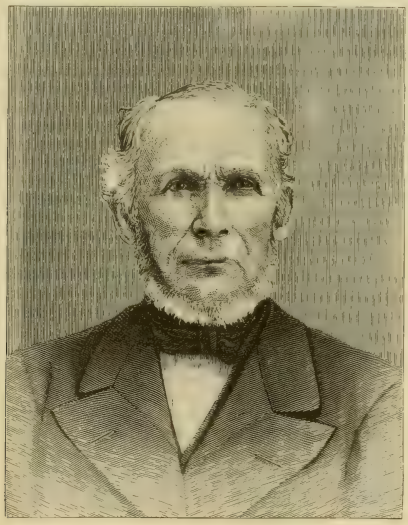
In March, 1818, without assistance from others, he bought a printing press, and type, and published the first newspaper—Wayne County Mirror—in the County, which he conducted for some time, and afterwards assisted his successors with capital and in other ways to continue the paper, an account of which may be found in the chapter on the "Press" of the county in this volume.

Mr. Manning, upon settling in Bethany, identified himself with church and Sunday-school work, and it is said he was the prime mover in founding the first Sunday-school in the county. In connection with Sheldon Norton, he went to New York and purchased a library, and established a Sunday-school at Bethany, which he superintended for many years. He was always interested in the cause of education, and those who remember him, say that he found time to frequently visit the "Old Beech Woods Academy," and encourage those engaged in pursuit of an education. He gave his children a liberal education, not only at the Academy and the University, but he sent them away to the best boarding schools and colleges, and was generous in his support of all interests tending to improve the condition of others. For several years Mr. Manning served the county as register and recorder, and he sat on the bench as associate judge, where his counsel was always on the side of justice and right, and his opinions respected by those associated with him. His political affiliations were with the old Whig Party, and, although conservative in his opinion, he allied himself to the first movement in the formation of the Republican party, was a loyal supporter of the Union cause during the late Civil War, and stood firmly intrenched in the justice and right of the suppression of the Rebellion and the abolition of slavery. Judge Manning continued an active business man, until nearly the time of his death, which occurred December 26, 1867. His parents were Calvin and Lydia (Robertson) Manning, who resided at South Coventry, where they died.



His wife, Charity B. Wilder, was born in Cochecton, Sullivan County, N. Y., March 1, 1804, and is at the writing of this sketch in 1886, the only surviving person, perhaps save one, who was born of parents who were among the first settlers of Bethany. She retains largely the faculties of mind and body common to persons younger in years than herself, has been a devoted wife and mother, and reared her children under Christian influences. She early united with the Presbyterian Church, and by her religious zeal and high Christian character, has retained her membership with that church since seventeen years of age,—a period of sixty-five years. She is the daughter of David Wilder (1764–1840) and Sophia Tyler (1785–1824)—the former a native of New Hampshire—the latter a native of Cochecton.

David Wilder removed to Bethany from Cochecton, Sullivan County, N. Y., in 1803, built a house there in 1809, and bought land and was a farmer until within a short time of his death. His only child that reached mature years is Mrs. James Manning. Her mother, Sophia Tyler, was the daughter of Paul Tyler and Hester Brink—the latter a sister of Judge Brink, of Sussex County, N. J., and her maternal grandfather, Paul Tyler, was the son of Bezaleel Tyler and Sarah Calkins, who came from New England, and were the first settlers of that name along the Delaware. The children of Judge James Manning and Charity B. Wilder are:—Lucy, widow of Oliver D. Dunham, of Hartford, James, of Bethany, Sophia, widow of Z. W. Arnold, of Clinton City, Iowa, David, of Bethany, Henry, of Keokuk, Iowa, George S., of Clinton City, Maria F., deceased, Augusta M., widow of Jackson Woodward, of New York, Charity L., wife of Clayton E. Sweet, of Dutchess County, N. Y., and Mary Melissa Manning, residing on the homestead with her mother at Bethany.

HON. EPHRAIM W. HAMLIN.

Judge Hamlin (1803–84) was eighth child in a family of eleven children of Harris Hamlin (1767–1854) and Rue Easton (1770–1833), who were natives of Connecticut, left their home in Middletown, that State, in 1801, and with five children made their way via Newburg and Carpenter's Point, below Port Jervis, to Milford; thence by way of Shohola, Blooming Grove and Palmyra to Major Ansley's and finally through the Seven-Mile Swamp to Little Meadows, in Salem township. They erected a log house in which they resided until about 1808, when it was supplanted by a framed one —the first built in that part of the county. Until he reached the age of sixteen years, Ephraim worked on the home farm and attended the district school for a few months during the winter season. He was delicate in health while young and in consequence of this, unable to avail himself of even all the then meagre opportunities for an education from books, but this he partially made up by study at home, so that on reaching manhood he had secured a good knowledge of the elementary branches. At that age he began a clerkship in his brother Oliver's store at Salem, where he remained until 1822, when he went to Bethany, then the county-seat, and engaged with Daniel Baldwin, his brother-in-law, to learn the trade of a hatter. Three years later he bought the shop and tools of Mr. Baldwin and began business for himself. In the following year, 1826, he married Damaris, daughter of Stephen and Mary (Bonnel) Day, who had settled in the township of Dyberry, from Chatham, N. J., in 1816. She was born in 1804 and resides in the house in 1886 where herself and husband began housekeeping sixty years ago, and where their many friends celebrated with them their fiftieth anniversary and golden wedding. Her hospitality through life, her kindness of heart, her charity and good works and her identification with moral influences and religious work in the community are numbered among her many virtues. In 1840 Mr. Hamlin entered the mercantile business in Bethany and continued in trade until 1852, since which time he has been engaged only in agricultural pursuits so far as his private interests have been concerned.

Notwithstanding the unpropitious commencement of Mr. Hamlin's career, and the disadvantages of a limited education and feeble constitution against which he was forced to struggle, it is doubtful whether Wayne County has ever produced a more useful and honored citizen or one the impress of whose life will be longer felt, not only in the community amidst whom his lot was cast, but among the generations who shall follow them. For the past fifty years scarcely a concerted movement for the moral or intellectual improvement of our people has been inaugurated with which he has not been in active sympathy if not indeed its originator. His name gleams like a golden thread through the records of all the temperance organizations which had an existence in the county, and is linked with every step in advance taken by the church of which he was a communicant and in whose official board he was senior warden at the time of his death. Nor was his desire to advance the interest of the community confined by any means to their spiritual welfare. We have before us as we write the report of a meeting held in Honesdale in February, 1834, to consider the necessity for the establishment of a bank in this place, whereat Mr. Hamlin was appointed one of a committee to defend resolutions embodying a statement of the needs and claims of the community in this direction, to accompany the application to the Legislature for a charter. The Honesdale bank, as the result of this movement, was incorporated in 1836, Mr. Hamlin being chosen one of its first board of directors, a position which he continued to hold until his death. He entered heartily into the movement for the building of the Jefferson Branch to Honesdale, and was personally instrumental in disposing of a large proportion of the stock issued by that corporation to raise the necessary funds. Among the farmers of the county he has been for many years held in the highest esteem, being regarded as the father of the Wayne County Agricultural Society, which he was largely instrumental in establishing, and of whose board of directors he was from its organization in 1861 to the date of his decease either an active or honorary member. On his retirement from the presidency of the society a few years since his associates in the board adopted a series of resolutions expressive of their appreciation of his services, and presented him with an elegant gold-headed cane, appropriately inscribed, as a token of their personal regard.

In politics Mr. Hamlin was always a pronounced and consistent Democrat. That he was a trusted and honored member of the party may well be inferred from the fact that he was repeatedly called to head its ticket in important elections, and invariably led it to an overwhelming victory. He was appointed postmaster at Bethany in 1829 and retained the office until elected to the State Legislature in 1838. On the 8th of January, 1832, he accepted the deputy treasurership under Richard Lancaster, serving one year, when he was himself appointed county treasurer and filled the office for two years. He then served as deputy for two years under Thomas Mumford, and two years more under Thomas Clark. In 1838 he was elected to represent Wayne and Pike Counties in the Legislature, and was re-elected in 1839, serving until July, 1840, including the session made memorable by the famous "Buck-Shot War." In 1840 he again accepted the position of postmaster of Bethany and held the office until his election to the State Senate in 1851. He was twice nominated for Congress by the Democracy of Wayne and Pike Counties, but was defeated in conference by what were always regarded as underhanded and inexcusable alliances between the delegates from Northampton and Carbon and Northampton and Monroe Counties. While in the Legislature Mr. Hamlin's course was always conspicuous for his devotion to the interests of his constituents. When a senator he secured the passage of a bill increasing the capital of the Honesdale bank from one hundred thousand to three hundred thousand dollars. The act was vetoed by Governor Bigler, but through the influence of Mr. Hamlin the bill was passed over the veto and became a law. He was also largely instrumental in crowning with success the effort of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company to retain their charter as amended in 1852, a service which was never forgotten by that corporation, and whose benefits to this community can hardly be over-estimated.

Mr. Hamlin possessed a strong and well-balanced mind, sound judgment, and a large measure of administrative ability. His course in all matters demanding his attention was always carefully considered, and it was uniformly marked by a sterling common sense and an application of practical methods and considerations which contributed in a high degree to the success attending the various enterprises in which he was engaged. He was known as one of the most public-spirited men in the community, and was looked to as a leader in every measure tending to the public good. He was generous, unselfish, of inflexible integrity and in every posititon and relation of life commanded absolute confidence. Many years ago he united with the Protestant Episcopal Church, and amid the varied labors of a long and active life he maintained a consistent Christian character.

The only surviving child of Ephraim W. Hamlin is Hon. Edward O. Hamlin, of Bethany, whose sketch may be found in the law chapter of this volume.

CHAPTER XIII.

BERLIN TOWNSHIP.

On the 27th of November, 1826, many citizens living in the eastern part of Dyberry joined in a petition to the court then sitting at Bethany to erect a new township bounded by lines therein specified, since the condition of the roads and the location of the election house was such as to cause the petitioners great inconvenience in the exercise of their rights as citizens. On the same day the court appointed Jason Torrey, Bulkley Beardslee and Jacob S. Davis a committee to view the proposed new territory and report on the advisability of a division, and submit a dividing line for approval. On the following day, the report was submitted, and the court directed the excision to be made, and the new township to be called Berlin. The first township officer of whom there is any record, is Lawrence Camfield, who was sworn in as constable, April 23, 1827.

In 1846 its area was diminished by the excision of Oregon and left the township bounded on the north by Oregon and Damascus, east by Pike County, south by Palmyra and Texas, west by Texas and a small portion of Dyberry. The divide between the drainage areas of the Delaware River on the east and the basin of the Lackawaxen passes through the township from north to south, and the surface is watered by a number of brooks, and broken by several natural ponds. While in contour the topography conforms to the general character of the adjacent regions, it is not broken by any very high hills, and is, for the most part, excellent farming country, with plenty of red shale soil and some rich alluvial deposits. There are, however, some sterile lands near the Adams pond. The chief streams are the tributaries to the Mast Hope and Beardslee's Creeks, and the Holbert Brook, and the ponds are Long, Beech, Adams, Open Woods and a portion of Catchall.

The early settlements of the township took place in the northern portion—then nearly the centre—at Beech Pond, Berlin Centre and along the ridge known as "Smith Hill," which extends into Oregon township. The earliest assessment list extant is that for the year 1829, which contains the following taxables:

Lester Adams.	Robert Lovelace.
Stephen Bunnell.	Jesse D. Lillie.
Samuel Camfield.	James Myers.
John Cressman.	Charles M. Lillie.
William Carr.	Hugh McCrandle.
Andrew Davidson.	Thomas McWilliams.
Hiram Divine.	Charles McStraid.
John Garrett.	Thomas Melony.
Jeremiah Garrett.	Augustus H. Rogers.
John Garrett, Jr.	Peter Pullis.
Benjamin Garrett.	Abraham I. Stryker.
William Howe.	Henry Pullis.
Abraham Kimble	Samuel Smith.
Thomas Lindsey.	Charles W. Smith.
James Lovelace.	Frederick Smith.

Peter Smith.
Henry Smith.
John Smith.
Joseph Spangenburg.
Elijah Schoonover.
Amos Y. Thomas.
Amory Thomas.
Ephraim Torrey.
John Youngs.

Samuel Smith was probably the first settler in what is now Berlin township, and located on the ridge that has since borne his name, about the close of the last century. He was of German extraction, though born in Canada, and emigrated to Pennsylvania accompanied by his three oldest sons. In 1801 he was assessed in Palmyra township as the owner of two buildings valued at ten dollars, and five acres of improved land. He also owned two horses and two neat cattle. Four years later he had increased his improved land to thirteen acres, and subsequently cleared up a fine property. His children were Peter, John, William, Frederick, Henry, Sarah (who became the wife of Samuel Camfield and settled at Berlin Centre), Clarissa (the wife of Daniel Wickham, and afterwards of Washington Brown), Betsy (who married James Myers), Susan (the wife of James Young) and Eleanor (who married Asa Maloney).

Humphrey Bellamy came from Cornwall, England, in 1832, and settled in this township. He married Grace Hicks, and was the father of nine children—Margaret (who married Edward Marshall, of Beech Pond), Grace (the wife of William Tamblyn, of the same place), Robert, Elizabeth (the wife of Thomas Ham, of Texas), Thomas, Charles, Mary (the wife of George Sandercock, of Cherry Ridge), Arabella (who married first William Male and afterward Shepherd Warfield). The progenitor of the family was killed by a falling tree in 1845.

The same tide of English immigration that populated the eastern portion of Oregon township also bore some of the earlier settlers to Berlin, and the fertile farms about Beech Pond were, many of them, taken up by the better classes of tenantry from Cornwall and Devonshire. Among those who commenced on the west side of the pond, in 1830, were William Olver and the Tamblyns, all from the same neighborhood in Cornwall. Mr. Olver took up a good tract of land and raised a sturdy family. His wife was Ann Bryant and their children were Mary, the wife of Jonathan Tamblyn; Ann, the wife of Aaron Pullis; Sarah, who married Edward Babcock; Thomas and Richard. Most of them moved West, where they left numerous descendants.

Jonathan Tamblyn, whose farm was one of the earlier ones, moved West after a few years' residence. William, his brother, lived near the Methodist Church. He maried Grace Bellamy, but had no children.

John Olver came also from Cornwall, in 1831, and, after working a short time at the old glass-factory, near Bethany, settled near Long Pond, where he died some years ago. Before his emigration from England he had married Sarah Ainger, and their children were Thomas, John, William (who lives near Bethany), Richard (who resides on the homestead), Edmund, Elizabeth (the wife of William Deckover, of Wilkes-Barre), Sarah (who married C. P. Treverton, of Beech Pond), George, Francis (who died near Bethany), James A., Daniel, Amos, Moses (who left a widow at Long Pond), and Joseph, who resides with his brother at the homestead.

William Spry, who settled about the same time, near the pond, and about a quarter of a mile from the village, still lives on his original location. He married Ann Tamblyn and their children were Tamizen, the wife of Dr. J. A. Baldwin; Ann, who married J. C. Male; Elizabeth, the wife of Daniel Olver; James and Jonathan. The two last-named married and went west.

Edward Marshall, another Englishman, settled where his son Edward now lives, in 1831. Edward, Sr., married a Ballemy and had five children,—John, Edward, Robert, Thomas and Grace, who married Charles Barnes.

Oren Park came from Delaware County, N. Y., about the time Honesdale was settled, but, after a brief residence, returned to his native State. In 1835 he came once more to Pennsylvania, and settled where he now lives at Berlin Centre. He married Achsah M. Bidwell and had a number of children. Those who survive are Josephine, the wife of Frank Mills, and Irwin D. Park.

The Garretts were early settlers in Berlin and were also of English birth. Benjamin married Virtue Tripp, of Lackawanna Valley, and had Alice, Sarah (the wife of Daniel Bullock), Minerva (the wife of William Dunnell), Smith, Jeremiah and Isaac. John Garrett was born in England in 1795, and came with his parents to this country when he was six years old. The family settled in Philadelphia, from which place he moved to Bethany fifteen years later. Subsequently he settled on Smith Hill, where he died in 1877, aged seventy-nine. Mr. Garrett married Patience Albro in 1829, and left five children,—John S., Shepard, Curtis, Elizabeth (the wife of Mark Compton) and Unice (the wife of Nobles Lyman). Jeremiah Garrett married Betsy Tripp, and his children were Millicent, Myron, Benjamin and Lydia, who married a Parmenter.

John S. Cressman came from New Jersey early in the history of Berlin Centre. His children were John S., Jr., Ann E. (who married Elijah Adams), Daniel, Catharine (the wife of Edwin Smith), Oliver (a resident of Pike County), and Miranda, the wife of Jacob Smith.

C. B Seaman, who lived to be the oldest citizen of Wayne born within the county, spent the closing years of his life in Berlin Centre and died there in 1882, aged ninety-three years. Mr. Seaman was born in Milanville, in July, 1789, and afterwards moved with his parents to Dyberry township, where his father cleared up the northern portion of the Deming & Eno farm. Charles lived at the farm until 1807, when Jason Torrey, who was then keeping a tavern in Bethany, engaged him during the month of December when the court was in session. Young Seaman soon found that he lacked sufficient education, and returned to Bethany during the following winter to go to school, paying his board by the service he was able to give Mr. Torrey out of school hours, and reading and studying by the bright fire-light at night. He went regularly behind the counter at the tavern the next spring, and continued to work for Mr. Torrey until 1809, when he erected a little shoe-shop, where he spent a portion of his time at the trade which he had learned a year before. In 1811 he went to the Narrows of the Lackawaxen, then called "Mount Moriah," where Jason Torrey and Solomon Moor had opened a store, and two years later was appointed the first postmaster there. Meanwhile he had married Esther, a daughter of Ephraim Kimble. In 1826 he was elected sheriff of Pike County for three years(?), and in April, 1830, he was appointed prothonotary, register and recorder of the same county by Governor Wolfe, those offices not then being elective. After residing for several years in Sullivan County, he settled in Berlin township in 1840. In 1822 Mr. Seaman married, for his second wife, Roxy, a daughter of Jacob Kimble, of Paupack. They lived together for nearly sixty years, her death occurring but a few weeks before his. Mr. Seaman enjoyed the confidence of his fellow-citizens in a marked degree. In 1849 he was elected county auditor for three years, and in 1858 was made county treasurer. These offices he filled with the same efficiency that marked his administration of affairs in Pike County. He left two sons and five daughters.

Henry Bishop, the fourth son of John Bishop, one of the first settlers in Bethany, is a resident of this township, having settled on a farm in the southeastern portion soon after he reached maturity. He married Amelia Kimble for his first wife, and of this union four children were born: Fanny, Zoubie, Amelia and Henry S. Mr. Bishop's second wife was Amelia Ainsley, who was the mother of Ira K., ? Amelia, Mifflin, Esther and Theodosia. Though now in his eighty-seventh year, Mr. Bishop is hale and hearty, and has a lively recollection of the early days. His father, who had been a Revolutionary soldier, was a man of much hardihood and thought little of enduring the hardships of a trip on foot to Minisink with his grist. The journey usually occupied several days in good weather and often, in the winter, he would be gone for as many weeks. During his absence, the family subsisted on game and fish, but plenty as this was, it was not unusual for them to know the pangs of keen hunger. Twenty years later, when Henry Bishop settled in what is now Berlin township, the country all about was a dense wilderness, in which hardly a tree had been felled. Lumbermen were busy on the river flats, and here and there a pioneer and his family were living in little clearings of an acre or two. The Milford and Owego turnpike was the only road through to the tract he had taken up, and his nearest neighbors were the Kimbles, at Indian Orchard, and one or two families at White Mills. Mr. Bishop remembers distinctly when he attended the first religious meeting held at Walter Kimble's, and also gatherings at Daniel Kimble's and Cornelius Corryelle's. The first regular preacher he ever listened to, except at Bethany, was Elder Peck, of Mt. Pleasant. The first school his children attended was held in the old plank school-house at Indian Orchard, and a Mr. Normand was their teacher. This was maintained by subscription. Mr. Bishop lives with one of his sons, on the farm he cleared so many years ago.

Industrial Growth.—Ephraim Torrey, who, as has already been stated, was the first settler at Beech Pond, built a saw-mill at the outlet in about 1820. This was the first mill in the township, and ran for many years after his death. Fine timber covered all the hills, and as the number of settlers increased lumbering became very profitable. In 1840 Asa Corwin came from the Delaware lumber regions and took several contracts. In a year or two he erected a saw-mill. About 1845 George Wells put up the lower mill, as it has been since known; and, in course of time, sold it to R. S. Olver, who converted it into a circular mill about 1868. The steam mill, which stands on the upper side of the road, was built by S. Swift in 1850. Bark was then plenty, and during this same year Friend and Otho Burr built a tannery. They did not run it very long, however, and the property passed into the hands of one Smith, who sold it to Henry W. Stone and Horace Drake. This firm increased the capacity of the business considerably, and also built a large store, now occupied by George Olver. Afterwards Mr. Stone sold out his interest to Drake & Sons, who continued operations until the firm became financially embarrassed in 1878–79, when the tannery was finally closed. It was a two-hundred vat plant, and paid very handsomely during the war. Its abandonment has been of great disadvantage to the prosperity of Beech Pond.

The saw-mill at Berlin Centre was built by John and Frederick Smith about 1831, and three or four years later the same firm put up another mill just below the first. Still another mill was erected by John Garrett in 1835, and for fifteen or twenty years all did a thriving business. In 1850 all three were rebuilt and enlarged, Oren Park being the millwright. At present they are doing very little, business being limited by the scarcity of lumber.

The saw-mill at the outlet of Adams' Pond was built by Stephen W. Genung about the time that Beech Pond began to do such a flourishing lumber business, and was for some years one of the busiest mills in the township, the lumber being hauled from the mill through Catchall settlement to the Delaware River. The collection of dwellings that sprang up about the mill was called Genungtown. Later the place was sold to William Holbert, now of Equinunk, who made substantial improvements and pursued the lumber business on a large scale, so that the place became a thriving settlement. As lumber grew more scarce and business declined, the mill was sold to James Williams, who operates it on a small scale at present. It is about two miles south of Beech Pond.

As the opening of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, which gave an impetus to the settlement of the country all about Honesdale, was of especial benefit to Berlin township, so the completion of the Erie Branch from Lackawaxen was in some respects a disadvantage. As Honesdale sprang rapidly into existence, the Big Eddy turnpike was built, and subsequently converted into a plank-road—an admirable highway over which all the travel between Honesdale and New York, via Narrowsburg, passed. The tide of travel thoroughly opened up the country, supplied it with good taverns and threaded it with much better roads than those of the adjacent townships. A plank-road was built from near the residence of the late Bulkley Beardslee to Mast Hope, now called Pine Grove, and other similar projects made it a most active township two decades ago. But railroad connections directed the travel in other directions, the busy taverns were abandoned, the tannery closed, the lumber was exhausted and saws stopped, and the Berlin of to-day is only a fairly rich agricultural district with memories of former activity.

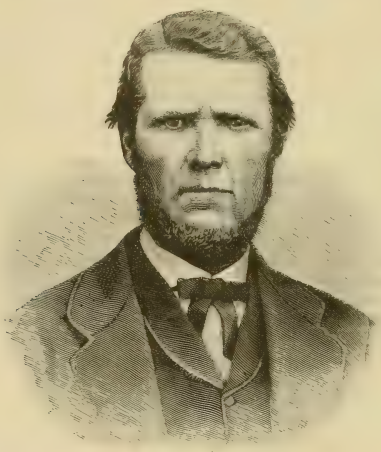
The first post-office in Berlin township was Ashland, and was established in 1844, with Isaac Doughty as postmaster. He was followed by George Drake, who gave place in turn to Jesse Wood, E. W. Warfield, R. S. Olver, Dr. Edwin Crocker, George A. Drake, R. G. Corwin, William S. Robbins and George Olver. The name of the office was changed to Beech Pond many years ago.

In 1855 a post-office was established at Berlin Centre and John W. Seamans was the postmaster. He was succeeded by Charles B. Seaman, who in turn gave place to Frederick Smith, during whose term the office was abolished. Soon after the post-office at Carley Brook, Oregon township, was established, and there most of the residents of this region receive their mail.

The First Baptist Church, of Smith Hill, was organized on Saturday, February 10, 1849, when a meeting of the inhabitants of that part of Berlin, known as SmithHill, assembled in the school-house to consider the propriety of procuring a suitable site for a meeting-house. Charles A. Seaman was chairman, and A. Silsby, secretary. The meeting adjourned after appointing the following committee to fix upon a suitable location: John Smith, Jonathan S. Bidwell, Jacob Smith, Nathaniel Reed, Jonas Mills and Benjamin Garrett. On March 17th, this committee reported in favor of a site on the lands of John Smith, and the recommendation was adopted. John Smith, Benjamin Garrett and Elder Andrew Hopper were appointed a building committee to collect subscriptions and material. This meeting also passed resolutions, naming the church and authorizing it to be used "for all religious denominations having their tenets based upon the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ and the doctrines of repentance, baptism, regeneration and a future state of rewards and punishments." The building was completed during the following summer, and was dedicated September 14, 1849, Elder Gray preaching the dedicatory sermon.



On September 30th, of the same year, at a meeting held after morning service, resolutions in favor of the organization of a congregation to be known as the First Baptist Church of Berlin were adopted, and Jonathan S. Bidwell and Jonas Mills were appointed a committee to call on Bethany Church for the proper dismissals. The members for whom the committee secured letters were as follows: Jonas Mills, Clarissa Brown, Mary Brown, Olive Brown, Betsy Myers, Jonathan S. Bidwell, Elizabeth Bidwell, Dorcas Garrett, Eleanor Malony, John Smith, Eleanor Smith, Jacob Smith, Almerson Beard, Julia Thomas, Catharine Young, Charles B. Seaman, Roxy Seaman, Betsy Garrett, Millicent Garrett and Virtue Garrett.

The council of recognition was held on Thursday, October 25, 1849, delegates from Bethany, Honesdale, Damascus, Paupack Eddy and Ten Mile River being present. Rev. J. T. Mitchell was appointed moderator, and Deacon C. M. Hayden, clerk, and Reverends D. F. Leach, Andrew Hopper, Henry Curtis, M. M. Everts and J. T. Mitchell took part in the services. Rev. Andrew Hopper became the first pastor, dividing his time between it and the churches at Bethany and Lebanon. He remained until 1850. In May, 1851, Rev. J. P. Stalbird, having settled at Smith Hill, accepted pastoral charge of the church. He resigned in April, 1853, and was succeeded by Rev. Sanford Leach, who remained a year and also resigned. Rev. Newell Callender followed, and remained until a call was extended to Rev. Edward Hall, in May, 1864. In August, 1866, a branch was established at Pigeon Roost, with preaching every fortnight, alternating with the Methodist mission at that point. Rev. A. J. Adams was the next pastor and remained until 1875, when Rev. Samuel Metz was called to give one third of his time at Pigeon Roost. Rev. David W. Halstead next occupied the pulpit, and after him, Joseph F. Bennett was stated supply. Jonas Mills was called in November, 1878, and served until 1880, when Rev. L. H. Goodnuff, the present incumbent, assumed pastoral charge.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JOHN CONKLIN.

The earliest mention we can find of the family from whence the subject of this sketch has sprung occurs prior to the Revolution, when two brothers left the old home, on Long Island, and started upon the sea of life. One of these brothers settled near the Hudson River, below Albany, N. Y., while the second located in Orange County, N. Y., and from these progenitors the large families bearing this name in the localities mentioned have come. The third brother, Nathaniel, remained on Long Island and engaged in the fishing business. His children were Elizabeth, Hannah, Nathaniel, Abraham and John. The son, Nathaniel, born August 1, 1788, married Elsie Van Auken, born January 22, 1794, and had children as follows: Abraham, born 1815; John Franklin, born 1816; Hannah, born 1818, married George Conklin; Nathaniel, born 1819; Elizabeth, born 1821, married Simon Marshall; Susan, born 1823, married Samuel Dolan; George S., born 1825; Matilda, born 1827, married Schaeffer Hendershott; Clarissa, born 1829, married Nicholas Simonson; Jacob, born 1832; David B., born 1835.

Nathaniel Scudder learned the trade of a tanner and currier, and in early manhood removed to Newton, Sussex County, N. J., where he carried on that business over thirty years and enjoyed the confidence and respect of a widely-extended circle as an upright, honorable man and neighbor. He died August 28, 1846, and was survived by his widow until October 11, 1873.

John F. Conklin was born at Newton, N. J., on November 23, 1816, and attended the district school until of sufficient age to help his father in the tannery. When about seventeen years old, finding the business was not to his desires, he left home and came into Wayne County, at once finding an opening with the late Mr. Z. H. Russell, who engaged his services during the following seven years in rafting and running lumber down the Delaware River. In this employ he developed considerable ability, and in 1840 made arrangements with Messrs. Hornbeck & Cator, also with Mr. Elias Stanton, to superintend their heavy operations in the same line,—i. e., taking the lumber, timber, etc., down the river to a market and there disposing of it to the best advantage. The reputation established by Mr. Conklin while so engaged was that of a man of sound judgment and strictest integrity, and during the connection of eleven years with these gentlemen he was favored with their entire confidence and countenance, which ended only with their decease. In 1851 he purchased certain timber lands in the county and became interested on his own account in cutting, rafting and selling the products, in which he continued until the spring of 1862, meeting with good success. He then accepted the appointment as steward of the county almshouse, and acted in such capacity eight years, at the end of which period he declined to remain longer, having desire to attend to a farm purchased in 1866.

Some time after this, however, his old friend, Z. H. Russell, pressed upon him the superintendence of the turnpikes, which, after being entered upon, took the next nine years' time, when, being strongly urged by warm friends, he again accepted the stewardship of the county almshouse, and in 1882 entered upon his third four years' term. In this position he has been an unqualified success and receives the good words of all without regard to party, the inmates particularly having a high regard for the man charged with their care. From his youth up Mr. Conklin has been a close student of men and things, and in his connection with county affairs has succeeded in making two blades of grass grow where one grew before. On first assuming the duties he found twenty tons of hay was the regular product of the farm; when he resigned in 1870 the crop was sixty-five tons of hay, besides heavy crops of grain. After an absence of twelve years he returned to find the crop reduced to forty-five tons, and has again raised the production to sixty-five and seventy tons of hay, the acreage being the same throughout. A Republican by conviction, he has never asked office from his party, though a regular and consistent worker. He was made a Mason in 1838, holding membership in the Damascus Lodge, which went down after the Morgan excitement. This honorable fraternity he again joined, under the new constitution, in 1846, and has retained connection since in Howard Lodge.

Mr. Conklin married, on May 12, 1842, Miss Auzebia, daughter of Henry and Amelia (Kimble) Bishop, who was born March 7, 1823. Henry Bishop was born in Bethany in 1796, the son of John Bishop, the earliest settler, and is now, in his ninetieth year, living in this (Berlin) township. From this union was born one child, a girl, which died before naming. In 1845 they adopted Martha Youngs, then three months old, and in 1852 adopted Frances Kellam, then three years of age. These children they raised as loving parents, educating and finally marrying them to worthy helpmates: Martha to Isaac D. Riemer, of Berlin township. Four children have come from this union,—Auzebia, Frederick, Harry and Florence. Francis married William Hankins, of Sullivan County, N. Y., and has borne him five children,—Nathaniel, Nellie, Margaret, Reeves and Samuel.

Though never identified with any particular church organization, Mr. Conklin has been a generous friend to all and his aid and support have been given to religious and educational matters quite freely and ever without regard to denomination or sect.

CHAPTER XIV.

BUCKINGHAM.[1]

This was one of the original townships, its boundaries when first established being the State of New York on the north and east, Damascus on the south, and Damascus and Mount Pleasant on the west, thus having an extensive length on the Delaware River of about thirty miles, and average width of about nine. Scott was created from the northern portion in 1821, Manchester from the southern portion in 1826. A portion of it was taken for the formation of Preston in 1828. Thus contracted, it has an extent of about fourteen miles on the Delaware, with an average width of about six. Its present boundaries are Scott on the north, Shrawders or Balls Creek separating the two; New York on the east, the Delaware River separating; Manchester on the south, Big Equinunk Creek dividing; Lebanon, Mount Pleasant and Preston on the west. The highest point in it is some fourteen hundred feet above tide water. Its surface is very uneven. For its whole extent on the river rises the river hill, rugged and often precipitous, but with occasional indentations of bottom land. Much of the river hills have been stripped of timber. Fire has often followed the axe; as a consequence there are stretches of unsightly "fire-scald," through which the rocks grin hideously as if to mock man's cupidity. Back from the river is alternate hill and vale, with perhaps three-fourths of the land susceptible to cultivation. Of the small lakes which are so liberally scattered through northeastern Pennsylvania, the township has six, viz.: Lizard Lake, High Lake, Adams Lake, Preston and Nabby's, and Fork Mountain. Its streams are the Big Equinunk, Shrawders, Shehawken, Toppolock and Fall Creeks, and their tributaries. Originally its hills and valleys were covered with timber, large tracts being covered mostly with hemlock. Along the river and on the Equinunk Creek was considerable pine. Little of either remain. Tanneries and lumbermen have done their work effectually. Of the deciduous trees every variety found in Northern Pennsylvania exists. These, too, are disappearing with a rapidity, which can but create grave apprehensions when the future needs of the people are considered, as well as the almost assured climatic effects of denuding a region of its timber. The soil on the uplands is a loam with a stiff clay subsoil, the last too often quite too near the surface—better adapted to grazing than the growing of cereals. On the river bottoms the soil is a sandy loam, underlain by gravel. The traveler through the township will notice that while nature has withheld in richness of soil and has heaped up rocks, and scattered stone quite too plentifully, she has compensated by giving lavishly of her choicest gifts in springs of bright, pure water. Water which for cool excellence is no where excelled.

Of the aboriginal dwellers here, scarcely any traces remain. No burial-places are known. No trails. With the passing away of the early settlers, tradition and reminiscences of the Indian measurably ceased.

The first permanent settlement was without doubt at Stockport, where Samuel Preston, Sr., located in 1790.[1] We gather from a document now in possession of the descendants of Mr. Preston that there were whites in the township prior to 1792, but from the tenor of the document (which was written by Anthony Butler, as agent for the Penns, in 1791) we infer that those who were here, were depredators, upon the timber of the region. Prior to the settlement of Mr. Preston, at Stockport, Josiah Parks had become owner of what is now known as the Stockport Flats, or at least one hundred and ninety acres thereof. Not realizing the value of these lands, he sold them to Mr. Preston for a consideration as insignificant as that for which Esau sold his birthright. Judge Samuel Preston who settled at Stockport, as already stated, in 1790, was born in Buckingham township, Bucks County, Pa., and his father, Paul S. Preston, was also born and reared in Bucks County. The family were Quakers, and the progenitors of the American branch of the family came over with Penn. He acquired the title of the land owned by Parks. Before us is an order written, in 1788, by Jacob West, to George Ross, certifying that he (West) had disposed of "that tract of land on Topolic (a portion of the Stockport lands), to Mr. Samuel Preston," and relieving Ross from further care of the same. Mr. Preston entered into partnership with Mr. Henry Drinker, of Philadelphia. Drinker owned large tracts of land in the county, particularly in Buckingham and Damascus.

Of these Mr. Preston had a general supervision. Previous to his locating at Stockport

he had looked through Luzerne and part of Wayne County for an eligible site for a town, to be built under the patronage of Drinker. Drinker was pleased with a situation on the Susquehanna River, now in Susquehanna County. Mr. Preston assisted in laying out, and starting the young town, calling it Harmony, then preferring Stockport, he located there. A road was cut through from Stockport to Harmony, and men from Harmony assisted in commencing improvements at Stockport. Mr. Preston gave the name Stockport to his chosen location, and Buckingham to the township, names which seemed as heir-looms to the Preston family, and cherished as having been the original home of the family in England. Evidently he was a man of enterprise and force of character, and possessing a liberal education. Improvement at Stockport went forward briskly under his management. This is shown by the assessment of 1806, which shows that he then had one hundred and thirty acres of improved land and three mills, two saw and one grist-mill. At this period, people have but a faint conception of the difficulties encountered, and the obstacles to be overcome by the early settlers of this region. All merchandize, machinery and implements were procured with much labor, much of it being brought up the Delaware in Durham boats. It was certainly twenty years after settlement was begun at Stockport, before there was any road through from the Hudson to this portion of the Delaware Valley. Mr. Preston remained single until 1795, when he married Mercy Jenkins, of Dover, Dutchess County, N. Y. The marriage took place at Stockport, and with Quaker ceremonials, but it having taken place "out of meeting," they were declared no longer members of the Society of Friends. Work went steadily forward on the Stockport plantation. Orchards were set out, and some of the trees planted before the commencement of the present century are standing yet, and bid fair to stand at the dawn of the next. Many anecdotes are extant, which well illustrate Mr. Preston's eccentricities. Letters, documents, etc., written by him, evidence a strong vigorous hand and a clear logical mind. His autograph affixed nearly a century since, stands in as bold relief, and as strongly marked, as the famous sign manual of John Hancock. One document possesses especial interest from its showing how he became possessed of Equinunk Manor. It appears that the Penn heirs, were allowed, in consideration of their proprietary rights, to hold certain tracts of land through the State. We infer that the State, on the formation of the State government, confirmed them in the ownership, i. e., if certain regulations were complied with, the principal of which was that they (the proprietary manors) should be resurveyed and returns thereof made prior to July 4, 1776.

Certain it is that Anthony Butler, as agent for the Penns, earnestly entreated Mr. Preston to take charge of the Proprietory Manors in this section, naming the different ones, but urging more strongly the care of the Equinunk Manor, which he represented as having been trespassed upon by parties who were stripping it of timber. Mr. Preston reluctantly consented, and Butler executed power of attorney (copy of which taken from the records at Easton is before the writer). This gave to "Samuel Preston, Gentleman, of Stockport, Pa.," full power to evict all trespassers, to have the lands resurveyed, in short, to have full supervision of the same. Equinunk Manor contained two thousand two hundred and twenty-two acres lying on the Delaware, embracing the mouth of Equinunk Creek, then on both sides of the creek for a distance of two miles from its mouth. Mr. Preston, says, in his memorial, that he found at Equinunk "several acres cleared, in part by Indians and people living on it, being a rendezvous and home for persons in the practice of stealing timber. Here they supported and kept their teams, and my endeavors to stop them in their evil practices were but little regarded." In February, of 1791, he represented to Butler the condition of affairs, and at the same time stating that he would be glad to purchase the manor at a reasonable valuation. Butler assured him he should have it as soon as he could be justified in selling it, at the same time desiring him (Preston) to try to buy the possession right of the trespassers, failing in which to eject them. Acting under these instructions, Preston bought possession of the trespassers, had more land cleared, fences built, yet to protect the property was obliged to keep men there to care for it, Butler assuring him that as soon as he could get a valuation of the manor from George Palmer, who had surveyed the tract, he would arrange for the transfer to Mr. Preston. Seeing Palmer soon after at Easton, he obtained from him the following:

"The Proprietaries manor at Equinunk containing 2222 Acres and allowances, contains to the best of my recollection about 200 Acres of bottom land along the creek, in many places badly gullied Worth 20 s. per Acre £200

2022 Acres on the hill, stoney land. The hills next the river when surveyed were finely timbered with pine timber, which I believe is now nearly all destroyed, worth 2 s. per Acre 202.4

"Easton, March 25th, 1791.

"GEORGE PALMER."

Mr. Preston continues: "I then wrote Butler what I had done, and that if the title to the manor was indisputable, that I would take it at Palmer's valuation, and at the same time of expenses incurred in obtaining possession, and of matters pertaining to the survey of the other manors. In his reply he was totally silent as to the Equinunk Manor." Having already been to considerable expense in caring for the manor, for which Butler showed no disposition to reimburse him, and becoming apprehensive that in some way John Nicholson, Esq., of Philadelphia, was likely to become owner of this land, he wrote to Philadelphia requesting that search be made in the land office for the date when the survey of the Equinunk Manor was made, and when returned to the land office. The reply as follows:

"Proprietaries 2222 Acres on the West side of the River Delaware, including mouth of Equinunk Creek, called 'Safe Harbor,' Surveyed the 23d, 25th, and 26th day of December, 1773. Returned Nov. 8th, 1779."

This was certainly three years later than the Act of Assembly specified. Learning this, Mr. Preston immediately wrote to have these lands entered for himself. Going soon after to Philadelphia he called on Butler with the view of effecting an amicable arrangement, but could do nothing with him, not even receiving "civil treatment." Mr. Preston therefore purchased the Equinunk Manor of the commonwealth. He further shows the duplicity of the Penns, and their agent Butler, by the statement to the effect that "on the 19th of November, 1779, the Proprietaries presented a memorial to the Legislature mentioning, that by a law of the State, such of their manors as were not returned on or before the 4th of July, 1776, were escheated to the State and praying relief in the premises." Prayer not granted. In conclusion, Mr. Preston says: "I have a long unsettled account with Mr. Butler, but wish it had been with a gentleman furnished with good manners and candor, of which he appears to be very destitute." This matter has been dwelt on at length, from its being considered of especial interest, as affording an insight into the policy of the Penns, as well as showing how the young commonwealth regarded the family and treated their claims. No doubt the Penns were notoriously disloyal, while professing to be friends and supporters of the struggling Republic.[1]

To return to the settlement at Stockport. While giving much of his time to other affairs, Mr. Preston pushed forward improvements here. But space allowed will not permit the

[1] The implication is often made that Judge Preston became possessed of much of his land in a questionable manner, i. e., from tax sales, &c. In the documents kindly furnished us by Miss Preston, are several letters written by Mr. Preston to parties informing them that he had at treasurer's sales bid in certain tracts designating them, and naming sum paid, at the same time stating how and for how long they were redeemable. It is difficult to see any great wrong-doing in this.

It is also insinuated that he wronged the Drinkers. Before us is a document showing that some difference existed between him and Henry Drinker, and that five men were appointed to appraise the property at Stockport. Before us is the original valuation of all the real estate and personal property to the most insignificant articles. Total of real estate, twenty-two thousand six hundred and ninety-nine dollars. Personal property at $2922.90. Work completed and signed by the appraisors on the 15th of December, 1812. With this and proper accounts it is hard to see how the Drinkers could have been wronged to any great extent. The Drinkers seem to have been uniformly unfortunate in their operations in the county. It could not have been entirely Judge Preston's fault.

dwelling too long here. Considering how largely he was connected with other matters, it is a matter of surprise that he (Preston) should have found much time to devote to Stockport. He was interested in and had a sort of supervision of the "Union Sugar Company's" undertaking in Manchester, and had a road cut through from Stockport to the Company's location. He frequently journeyed to Philadelphia, to his old home in Bucks County. Either of these was as formidable an undertaking as a voyage to Europe is at present. He was appointed the first associate judge of the county in 1798. For a long time his mail was received from Mt. Pleasant. A post-office was established at Stockport, in 1820. Before the writer is a letter from R. J. Meigs, postmaster-general, to Mr. Preston, informing him of the establishing of the office and of his (Preston's) appointment as postmaster. Mail matter then came by way of the Newbury turnpike to Mt. Pleasant, thence to Stockport. To the early settlers in this section Stockport was indeed a haven of refuge, and many were the needy who looked for, and found assistance here, in dark and trying hours.

From the commencement labor was in steady demand at Stockport, and the settlers were often glad to resort there to obtain supplies in exchange for labor. Judging from all the information obtainable it is easy to conclude that Mr. Preston earnestly desired that the region in which he had located should be settled and improved. To promote this he gave every encouragement possible to those who settled near him. A few aged people in this vicinity yet speak of him, but not disparagingly. His house was noted for the liberal hospitality shown to the many who frequented it.

John Knight came with Mr. Preston to Stockport in 1789. He was then eleven years old. He evidently lived with the Prestons for some years and married Rebecca Jenkins, a sister to Judge Preston's wife. He first settled in Buckingham, on Shrawder's or Ball's Creek. He appears in the assessment of 1806, as owning three hundred and thirteen acres of land and one horse. Subsequently he settled opposite Stockport. His sons were William, Daniel, John, Richard, George and Charles. They were all highly respected citizens. Charles only of the family is living.

Abram Dillon came into the township with Judge Preston. He settled on the river, about half way between Equinunk and Stockport. Here he cleared a large and valuable farm. He reared a family of five sons, viz.: John K., William, Hamlet, Hamilton and Abram, and two daughters. John K. and William lived and died on the old homestead. George R. and Robert, sons respectively to John R., and William, are now owners and occupants. Two of the sons, Hamlet and Hamilton, are yet living in the State of New York. No family in the township has been more highly respected than the Dillons.

North of Stockport the first settler was Benjamin Owens, at the mouth of Shehawken Creek. The writer can learn nothing of his antecedents. He was succeeded there by Thomas Travis, who cleared there a large farm. He was succeeded by his son, Thomas Jr., who was unfortunate in business, and the farm passed to other hands. Benjamin Sands located near Travis. He appears in the assessment of 1806, as owning a mill. This was on Shehawken Creek, a short distance from its mouth. His descendants yet live in the town of Hancock, N. Y. Thaddeus, Paul and Ezra Newton were certainly early settlers, as all of them appear in the assessment of 1806, as farmers, Thaddeus and Paul being assessed for a mill. They located on the west branch of the Delaware, opposite what is now the village of Hancock, N. Y. That they were good citizens, we infer from the fact that they are yet spoken of with reverent respect by those who knew them. Ezra Newton, Jr., yet lives on a portion of the old homestead. The Newtons were from Massachusetts. Thomas Holmes settled on Shehawken Creek, about one mile from the Delaware, in 1816. He was very eccentric, yet a man of considerable energy and perseverance. He cleared here quite a farm, and built a saw-mill. He died, leaving a fine estate to his family, but lawyers and crafty manipulators have absorbed it. Blackall W. Ball settled prior to 1806, at the mouth of Shrawder's Creek, Ball's Eddy receiving its name from him. He was a Quaker, and from the vicinity of Philadelphia. He also had a saw-mill.

Subsequently the farm was owned by James More, now by his son, Clay V. More. At what is known as Little Falls, George W. Hubbell settled at an early period. He is mentioned as being a wheelwright. John Barrager settled prior to 1806, on the river between Dillons and Stockport. One of his sons, George, is still living in the township.

Abiel Squires came into the county at an early date, probably about 1800. He lived for some time with Judge Preston at Stockport. About 1810 or 1812 he, with Thaddeus Newton, started and for some time maintained a distillery, near Little Falls. His son, Mr. Justin G. Squires, informs the writer, that his father was making money at his distillery, but after running it a few years he, for some reason, abandoned it altogether. This was the first and only venture in the distillery business in this part of the county. After abandoning the distillery, Squires located at Lizard Lake, some four miles from the Delaware.

The situation there is well described in a letter written in June of 1799, by Jason Torrey, Esq., to Blackall W. Ball, at whose request Mr. Torrey had explored the lands. The land is described as being excellent in quality; the fine water-power, etc., are graphically dwelt upon. He says: "The road from Stockport to Susquehanna passes within one mile of the land. Affixed to the letter (or copy of letter), is a draft of the tract, and the attest that said tract had been surveyed in November, 1793, to Blackall W. Ball. Signed Anthony Crothers, D. S. Daniel Broadhead, Surveyor General. Evidently Ball was not struck with the advantages of the location, but settled, as stated before, at Ball's Eddy. Mr. Squires, however, at a later date, thought the situation a desirable one, and located there, built a saw-mill, and cleared a large fine farm, and lived there until his death. The property is now owned by M. D. Wheeler, Esq., of Hancock.

Jonathan Jones settled near the mouth of Shehawken Creek, on the place where Benjamin Sands commenced. He was an esteemed citizen, being for a long time a justice of the peace, and once county commissioner. His son, Frank M., lives on the homestead; another, S. Perry, near. A daughter, Mrs. Theodore Murray, also lives in the township. They are worthy descendants of a good stock.

On Kingsbury Hill, some two miles from the Delaware and four from Hancock, N. Y., are some fine farms, and good society, composed chiefly of descendants of those who first located there. The first to permanently locate there was a Mrs. Kingsbury, a widow with a large family of children. She came there from Connecticut, in 1816. She had a large family of children, Elias, the oldest, being a young man. There were no improvements, no roads, and the nearest neighbor two or three miles away. Nevertheless, the family dropped into the forest home; and, although the howl of the wolf was their nightly music, and the yell of the panther often awoke the echo of the hills, and though hardships, unremittent toil and privation were daily with them, yet they had come to stay. Thomas Kingsbury, Esq., one of our most esteemed citizens, lives now on the farm where his mother settled. He is the last of the family living in the township. Descendants of the others live in this and adjoining townships.

Mr. Abel Belknap, from Stillwater, N. Y., were the next, settling there in 1817.[1] Mrs. D. B. Belknap, a daughter of Abel, resides with her husband on the farm where the father settled. D. B. Belknap and George H., worthy residents of this neighborhood, were from Chenango County, N. Y. After Abel Belknap and prior to 1820 came on to the Hill, John Hoffman, Abel and David Whelpley. None of them nor of their descendants remain in the township.

The Woodmansees, Gideon, James, and Thomas, natives of Connecticut, settled in 1818, on the Stockport Road, some six miles from the Delaware.

Among the settlers in the township prior to 1806 were the Coles. Three of them, viz., Nathan, Peter, and Joseph, lived in the present limits of Buckingham. They have left numerous descendants in this and adjoining townships.

In returning to "the place of beginning," as surveyors have it, we may mentally come over to the west part of the township, striking the Equinunk Creek at High Lake. No settlement was attempted in this part of the township until as late as 1840 About this time several families of Irish settled here. It was, at as late a period as that, an uninviting place in which to locate. There was no road through to the Delaware, or good ones in any direction. John Cary was one of the first. He settled near High Lake. His son John lives now on the farm on which Cary settled. Within a few years many other families of Irish dropped in. About High Lake, the Clunes, McGraths, Kanes, Gilchrist, and Murphy. South of this, about Fork Mountain Pond and Crooked Creek, the McGarys, McKennas, Connelys, Flannigan, Rourk, Kennedys, and others. As a rule, they came with little but their muscle ; but by patient industry and economy, they now possess good, comfortable homes, many being in affluent circumstances, and are good, law-abiding citizens,—constant in their attachment to their Church, and in their undying love for the Green Isle of Erin, yet ardent in their attachment to the country of their adoption. The chance sojourner among them will long remember their open-handed hospitality.

Coming down the Equinunk Creek it is found that one Hubbard Wainwright located about one and a quarter miles from the river, on the flat near the junction of the Creek with its south branch, over sixty years since. He made some little improvement here, and was engaged in lumbering. He was killed accidentally within a few years after settling. It appears that some parties had dropped in between Wainwright and the river. Evidently they were nomads, and dropped out, and their names are forgotten.

Extended notice has already been given of Judge Preston's becoming owner of the Equinunk manor, and of his making some improvements here, building a mill, &c. But for some reason, but little in the way of improvements was carried forward here before 1830, when Mr. Alexander Calder saw the place, and saw at once the advantages it possessed for lumbering, &c.

Mr. Calder was a minister of the M. E. Church, and in his journeyings as an itinerant he became acquainted with Mr. Israel Chapman, then of Andes, Delaware County, N. Y. Through the representations of Mr. Calder, Chapman was induced to remove to Equinunk. Prior to the removal, however, they jointly purchased the entire Equinunk manor of twenty-two hundred and twenty-two acres, the most of which lay within the present limits of Buckingham. Soon after the purchase, both removed here with their families, and commenced improvements. First they built a saw-mill on the Manchester side of the Creek. Soon after this they commenced the erection of a tannery on the small stream called (from the proposed tannery) Factory Brook, the site of which is some fifty rods from the Delaware. The tannery was to be of stone. Considerable work had been done, the foundation laid, and the walls raised to quite a height, when an apple of discord fell into the concern. Work was abandoned on the tannery, and for years its walls stood defying the elements. A division of the land was then effected, Mr. Calder being awarded the portion on the river and on both sides of the Creek for a distance of about half a mile from its mouth ; Mr. Chapman that part lying above on the Equinunk Creek. (Further mention will be made of Mr. Calder in the chapter on Equinunk.)

After the division, Mr. Chapman located on the portion awarded him, about one mile from the Delaware. He was in every respect a remarkable man.

His strong points were tireless industry and indomitable perseverance. He was sincere in his professions, unyielding in his convictions, earnest and forcible in his denunciation of every species of vice, immorality and wrong, and thoroughly honest. Though confronted by many difficulties, he set resolutely to work, built one saw-mill about two miles from the river, at a later period another about half a mile; cleared a large and valuable farm, erected good buildings, and he passed to the control of his children in 1852 a valuable property. He died in 1854 at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. Hamlet Dillon, at Conklin, N. Y. Mention should have been made that notwithstanding the multiplicity of his cares and labors, he for many years preached to the people of the vicinity. He had four sons and five daughters. Three of each survive him, one son, John W., residing in the township. A large portion of the farm is owned and occupied by Mr. Thomas Tyner, a genial son of Erin, who was at one time one of the commissioners of Wayne County. The lower portion of the Chapman farm is owned by F. R., T. J. and William Holbert. This brings us back to the Delaware. In the necessarily brief retrospect of the township past, there has been much which must remain unnoticed—many names of those now living in the township on whom it would be pleasant to dwell. Of such citizens as J. E. Woodmansee, George W. Sherman, George Wainwright and many others the writer would make especial mention would the limits of the work allow.

Roads.—Much uncertainty exists as to when the first roads were laid out and by whom. It is certain that before 1790 a road had been cut through from Stockport to Harmony on the Susquehanna. This was under the direction of Judge Preston. From the letter of Jason Torrey to Blackall W. Ball we may infer that it touched the Shehawken Creek within one mile of Lizard Lake; thence over hill and dale to Harmony. A road was cut through from Stockport to Mount Pleasant prior to 1820. None of the present residents know who surveyed it. This was an important road to people on the Delaware, for it was by this they reached the Newbury Turnpike and Bethany, the county-seat. The road from Stockport to Equinunk along the river was opened at an early period. From the best information obtainable, it is safe to assume that it was opened as early as 1806, as was also the road leading from Stockport to Shehawken Creek and beyond.

The only post road in the township at present is that from Equinunk to High Lake, semi-weekly; Michael Spratt, carrier. One from Hancock to Lake Como and Preston, daily. Sunshine, on Shehawken Creek, is supplied by this route. Another from Hancock to Autumn Leaves, on Kingsbury Hill, semi-weekly; D. B. Belknap, carrier.

Religious Matters.—It would be quite impossible to fix a date or name a place where the first religious meeting was held, or whose was the first preaching. The Prestons were Quakers, a peculiarity of which sect is that they do not care for much preaching. The early settlers in the township being forced to a constant struggle to care for the material, had but little time to bestow to the spiritual. No doubt itinerants came in occasionally from Shehawken (now Hancock) as well as from other places. The first preacher of whom there exists an authentic account as being hired to preach regularly in the township was Rev. Levi Tucker, a Baptist minister located at Deposit, N. Y. He was hired by the people of Kingsbury Hill as early as 1828. He preached there with great success for some time. A number of conversions followed his preaching, the converts meeting with Baptist Church at Deposit. He finally went from Deposit to Philadelphia, from whence he went to Egypt as a missionary, from which field he went to his reward. In 1831, the Rev. Charles Hubbard, of Bethany, came to preach statedly at Kingsbury Hill, and in November of that year organized the Buckingham Baptist Church, with twenty-eight members, among whom were the Belknaps, Kingsburys and others.

This was certainly the first organized church in the township. Has never had a church edifice. The organization still exists, but in conjunction with a similar one in Scott. History of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Lake Como will belong to Preston. History of Methodist Episcopal Church at Equinunk will be given in the chapter on Equinunk. The Irish in the southwestern part of the township are, with the exception of one family, devoted adherents of the Catholic Church, their church edifice being in Mount Pleasant township.

Schools.—The first school-house in the township was built near Stockport, about 1808. The first teacher's name not obtainable. A school was established near the mouth of She-hawken Creek, in 1825. In 1828 another near the Woodmansees. A school was established on Kingsbury Hill, in 1832; taught by Miss Berthia Jones, at one dollar per week. Part of the time she had as many as ten scholars. Some bills which the writer finds among some papers kindly loaned him by Miss Ann Preston indicate the names of some of the early teachers, and give some insight into the amount paid for teaching. Of the teachers we find the names of James Woolley, Sarah Abbott, Harriet Hubbell, Cassandra Lukin, Olive Chapman, Theodosia Newton and Berthia Jones. Men seemed to have received about eleven dollars per month; females from one to two dollars per week. There is no date to show what the action of the township was on the school-law of 1834. The township has never been formally divided into districts. Schools are named after their several localities. All the school-houses now in the township have been built under the present system. There are at present ten school-houses, but two or three really good school-buildings; all of wood, the most expensive one costing six hundred dollars. Number of pupils, two hundred and eighty.

INDUSTRIES.—The first saw-mill in the township was built by Judge Preston at Stockport, soon after his locating, probably as early as 1792. Very soon after he built a grist-mill. Both grain and saw-mills have been maintained there until the present time.

Mention has been made of the building of a distillery by Abiel Squires and Thaddeus Newton, and of its being discontinued. The building rotted down, and no distillery has existed since in the township.

An axe-factory was built by the Messrs. Preston at Stockport, in 1847. The business was first carried on by Thomas Coon & R. S. Dorin. Subsequently by Ira Snyder. Burned down in 1865. Another axe-factory was built at Equinunk in 1866 or 1867.

The first tanning ever done in the township was by Thomas Holmes, on Shehawken Creek. The tannery was run in a small way and a primitive manner. It was burned down in 1867; rebuilt by Cole Brothers, of Equinunk, in 1876, and burned two years later.

In 1849 a tannery was built at High Lake by Ezra Brown and Isaiah and D. C. Scudder. Brown withdrew in about three years. In 1856 Isaiah Scudder conveyed his interest to Scudder & Bates. Subsequently Scudder & Bates sold to the firm of Deegan & Wrede. This firm failed to make the business a success, and for some years no business was done in the tannery. In 1866 Ed. Jones and R. Wales, under the firm name of Jones & Wales, commenced business there. After a few years it passed into the hands of Stout Bros., of New York. The fatality which attends old tanneries overtook it in 1880, when it was burned. Its capacity was two thousand sides per year.

In 1870 William Holbert and John D. Browning, under firm name of Holbert & Browning, built a tannery near Equinunk Creek, and about half a mile from Equinunk. After a few years Browning dropped out of the concern. It is now owned by William Holbert. Capacity, three thousand sides.

There are three chemical works in the township. These are establishments for converting wood into acetate of lime, wood naphtha and charcoal. The first was built, in 1880, by Finch & Ross, of Binghamton, N. Y. About two thousand cords of wood are used per year. It has twelve retorts. The next was built in 1882, and run by the Equinunk Chemical Company. It has eight retorts, and consumes about twelve hundred cords of wood per year. The third was built in 1882 by the Ball's Eddy Chemical Company, limited. It has six retorts, and uses about one thousand cords of wood per year. The kinds of wood used are beech, birch and maple, (hard and soft.) The factory of Messrs Finch & Ross is on Shehawken Creek, about one mile from the Delaware; the Equinunk Chemical Works, at Equinunk; the Ball's Eddy, at Ball's Eddy. There is a very small margin for profit at present in the business.

There are works for wood-turning about two miles from Lake Como, doing a small business. They were constructed in 1865, and are owned now by H. A. Williams.

There is a planing-mill and machine-shop at Equinunk, built in 1880, by L. W. Lord, the present proprietor.

There are at the present time eight saw-mills in the township. While their united capacity would probably be seven million feet of lumber per year, they do not, through lack of material saw one-half that amount. To be brief, the supply is cut off. At the present time there is not a foot of lumber to spare from the township.

POST-OFFICE.—The first post-office established in the township was at Stockport, in 1820, Samuel Preston, Sr., postmaster. Mails were received from Mount Pleasant for a number of years. After the completion of the Erie Railroad, mails came by that route and were delivered at the station on the opposite side of the Delaware. The office was kept by the Preston family until 1870, when it was removed to the New York side of the Delaware. A post-office was established at Kingsbury Hill, in 1870, under the name of Autumn Leaves. D. B. Belknap was the first, and is the present, postmaster. Mails are received from Hancock, N. Y. Another was established on Shehawken Creek, about two miles from Hancock, N. Y., under the name of Sunshine, in 1882, John Terwilleger, postmaster. Mails received from Hancock, N. Y. A post-office was established at High Lake in 1853.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

THE PRESTON FAMILY.[1]

For a century this family has been as prominent as any other in the annals of this county, and has been noted for intelligence, probity, purity, charitableness and enterprise.

The founder of it was Samuel Preston, a Quaker, from Bucks County. He was certainly here in 1789, and probably before engaged as a surveyor and conveyancer for Henry Dein Kee, of Philadelphia, one of the original proprietors. Of his ancestors what little knowledge we have is mainly through communications he made in his life-time to John F. Watson, author of "Annals of Philadelphia," published in 1830, and by him embodied in that work. In these communications Samuel Preston states that the Christian name of his grandfather was Amos, and that he was living near the Delaware at or before the first coming of William Penn in 1682. There is a tradition in the family that he either came with Penn or very early under Penn's auspices, but no historic confirmation of this domestic tradition is attainable. Many Quakers were settled in and near Burlington, N. J., before 1681. Proud, in his "History of Pennsylvania," mentions that thirteen Quaker marriages were celebrated at Burlington before that date. He further states that on the Pennsylvania bank of the Delaware, and particularly at the falls thereof, and at Bristol and contiguous places Quakers were established as early as at Burlington. In a foot-note he gives the names of a number of these persons. So far as definitely appears, Amos Preston may have been one of these post Penn Quakers.

Who or what the wife of Amos was Samuel did not inform Watson. He, however, gives several particulars concerning her, that she died in 1774, and was then one hundred years old, making her eight years old when she first came; that she was living with Swedes at Neshaminy, where that event occurred; that she was present with Swedes and Indians to welcome Penn when he landed at or near where Philadelphia now is; that Penn was present at her wedding, at or near Pennsbury; that she spoke the language of the Indians living thereabout; that she and Amos resided with the Swedes after their marriage at Wicaco, and that he made up frocks, trousers and moccasins for the Swedes, those people adhering to the national fondness for skin dresses; that after Penn's coming the Swedes through these fifty years before soon lost their distinction and existence as a separate race; that the Wicaco settlement was burnt out by being surrounded by fire, and that upon invitation of friendly Indians Amos and his family went to Buckingham, in Bucks County, to live, and that the wife served as interpreter at the negotiation of a treaty with Indians at Halle-Konck. Upon this showing it must have been during Penn's second visit to Pennsylvania in 1699, that the marriage happened, his bride being then twenty-five years old.

Samuel mentions, in Watson, only one child of his grandparents, and that was Paul, his own father. This Paul married a woman whose Christian name was Hannah, and this is about all the family records disclose relative to him. In Watson, Samuel mentions that Paul, his father, was present in some capacity, in 1756, at Easton, when Lieutenant-Governor William Denny made a treaty with the Indians, and that Benjamin Franklin was there as adviser of the Governor, and that a memorable display of wit and humor happened between those high personages.

This is essentially all that can now be gleaned as to the first two generations of these Prestons in this commonwealth. Coming down to Samuel, the founder of the family in Wayne County, the essential facts are all known and attainable. He was a man of excellent natural mental capacities; well educated; strong in mathematics, and an exact surveyor and conveyancer. He could not have failed, with his endowments, of attaining conspicuity and power whether his lot had been cast upon the outskirts of civilization or in one of its crowded and brilliant centres. His correspondents among public men were numerous, and he carefully preserved all letters. Goodrich, in his History, states that Samuel made frequent journeys to Bucks County; that he brought merchandise up the Delaware River in Durham boats, propelled by setting poles, except in ascending Foul Rift, and other swift waters, the boats were drawn upwards by long ropes extending to the shore.

His original thought was to locate on the Susquehanna River, and he laid out the village of Harmony, a few miles above the present village of Susquehanna. Drinker was principally concerned financially in that project. Then Preston resolved to fix himself permanently on the Delaware, which he did by contracting for the domain which he named Stockport. The township in which that domain is situated he called Buckingham, after the township from whence he came in Bucks County. He farther projected and made a road from Stockport, by way of Cascade, to Harmony, under the belief that it would become an important line of travel between East and West. He erected the first mills in Buckingham township, and, before 1806, cleared and brought under cultivation one hundred and thirty acres of land. He did much in various ways to promote the settlement of the region. Upon the erection of the county of Wayne he became its first associate judge, and at the December Sessions of 1798 charged the first grand jury impanneled therein.

He was as notable in personal appearance as he was vigorous and incisive in mental organization. Much above the average stature, as years increased upon him he ordinarily walked with a long staff of hickory wood, and presented an unusual configuration. In speech and writing there was force, piquancy and aggressiveness in whatever proceeded from him. As an illustration, it may be recalled that in 1799, when Thomas McKean, then Chief Justice, was a candidate for the office of Governor, Preston wrote letters to certain persons denouncing him as unfit for public station, and this with so much directness and force that McKean had him indicted for libel. Preston faced the matter with characteristic boldness, and obtained an acquittal from the traverse jury.

Samuel Preston, son of Paul and Hannah, was born in Buckingham, Bucks County, Pa., June 17, 1756. Bucks County was named Buckingham by Penn, and was one of the three original counties established by him in 1682. The borough of Bristol was first called Buckingham.

September 1, 1796, Samuel Preston married Marcia Jenkins, daughter of Valentine and Marcia Jenkins. She was born in Dover, Dutchess County, N. Y., October 14, 1763, and died at Stockport June 12, 1835, aged seventy-one years six months and nine days. He died at Stockport December, 8, 1834, aged seventy-eight years and six months.

Samuel and Marcia Preston's children were:

1. Paul Samuel, born at Stockport, August 24, 1796. He married Henrietta M. P. Mogridge June 11, 1818. He died September 8, 1873, and she August 8, 1875.

2. Hannah and Samuel (twins), born at Stockport, December 21, 1797. He died unmarried, April 15, 1871, aged seventy-three years, three months and fifteen days. Hannah married Mr. Randall, and they will be referred to farther on.

3. Warner Mifflin, born at Stockport, March 2, 1802. He died, unmarried, at Philadelphia, March 25, 1873, aged seventy-one years and five days.

Paul S. Preston became early the owner of Stockport by purchase. He married Maria, a daughter of Samuel R. Mogridge, who came from England and settled in Manchester township. She was a remarkable woman, some years older than her husband, and outlived him a number of years. Industrious, frugal, hospitable she never forgot the poor and needy. She brought up fifteen orphans. Paul was a man of uncommon natural abilities; was well educated; accumulated a library of substantial books; was a terse and felicitous writer, abounding in information; a brilliant, witty and versatile correspondent; and as thoroughly honest and truthful a man, even to his own hurt, as ever lived.

As characteristic of him, it may be stated that one autumn, in the early time, seed-rye was scarce in the district about Stockport, while the Preston granary was full. One day a man drove up, having a good wagon and span of horses, and asked Paul if he had rye in store. Paul answered that he had. The man inquired the price, and upon being told said he would take a certain quantity. Paul inquired whether he had the money to pay for it, and whether he was the owner of the horses and wagon. The man answered that he had money to pay for all he wanted, and was owner of the team and vehicle. Then rejoined Paul, "You cannot have rye of me, for you have money to pay and a team and wagon to go where you will and get what you require, whereas many of my neighbors have no seed rye, no money to buy it with and no horses and wagons to go for it if they had money with which to pay; and they must have what rye I can spare."

Warner acquired quantities of timber land, much of which he retained till his death. Samuel was content with less. Neither Warner nor Samuel married. They lived at Stockport with Paul. Samuel took charge of the farm and stock; Warner in the main of the lumber, and Paul looked after the grist-mill and other matters that did not fall under the supervision of his brothers.

Paul had two children, both daughters,—Gulielma (so called in honor of William Penn's first wife, nee Gulielma M. Springett), who married Allen K. Hoxie, dying a few years later, leaving three children, a boy and two girls, and Ann, who never wedded. Upon Paul's death he bequeathed one undivided half of Stockport and its belongings to his wife and the other half to his daughter Ann, then his only surviving child. Upon the death of his wife she bequeathed her half of the estate to Ann.

The Preston brothers, as part and parcel of inherited Quakerism, as well as by instinct and upon conviction, were opposed to slavery. Upon the organization of the Republican party Paul contributed to the direction of its movements in his section of the State. Samuel was a declared abolitionist; devoting much time and money to running slaves off on what was known as the under-ground railroad. Warner was less impulsive, and hence less demonstrative in the advocacy of his views.

Paul, in 1828, was sheriff of the county; in 1835 he was clerk of the courts and register and recorder, and later still he became associate judge, but not liking the office resigned it.

Paul's death was sudden. The week before he had been in Honesdale some days, had paid taxes on unseated lands. He went home on Saturday. On Monday he went to post-office, mailed letters, asked for a quantity of postage stamps and while the postmaster was getting them fell back and expired.

Hannah Preston married Benjamin Randall, an Englishman. She and her husband are dead. They left two sons—Benjamin Randall, Jr., and Peter Randall—and a daughter, who married J. A. Pitcher. This daughter was a favorite of her uncles.

The Preston name, so far as relates to the family in this county, is destined to extinction. There is no male descendant of Samuel Preston, the founder thereof. His daughter is represented by the Randall group. Of his sons Paul alone married, and he left no son. His eldest daughter, Gulielma, married A. K. Hoxie, who now lives in Iowa, and has with him his only son, Paul Preston Hoxie. Gulielma, the eldest of Hoxie's daughters, married Denison Crary, who now holds Stockport under lease from Ann Preston, the owner. He has a number of children. Etta, the other daughter of Hoxie, married Warner P. Knight, who died in 1884, leaving her with six small children. She has making all due allowances for the frailties of human nature, truth compels me to say that I shall never look upon their like again."

GEORGE R. DILLON.

The first man bearing this family name in Wayne County was Abraham Dillon, who was born in Bedminster township, Bucks County, July 11, 1770, and removed to Wayne County in 1797, taking up a large tract of land situated half way between Equinunk and Stockport, purchased a dwelling-house in Middletown, N. Y., and removed thither to procure educational advantages for her family.

While the Preston name has thus disappeared from the Wayne County branch the flavor of the Preston reputation is likely to remain as a fragrant tradition for generations to come. Goodrich in his history truly declares,—"Knowing as I do, the moral, social and intellectual excellencies of the Preston family, and which latter place had just then been commenced by Judge Samuel Preston an old time acquaintance of the new settler. He was married to Miss Ester Bascom, who was born on April 18, 1780. Their children were as follows, viz.: (1) William, (2) John K., (4) Calvin, (6) Abraham, (8) Hamilton, (5) Hamlet, (7) Martha (Lloyd), (3) Rebecca (Baker), (9, Electa (Cole). Mr. Dillon engaged in farming and lumbering and was quite successful. He was an upright, earnest man, and died December 8, 1850. His wife died November 4, 1825.

John K. Dillon was born December 23, 1800, and followed his father's example by launching out in lumbering operations. On June 14, 1827, he married Miss Lura Read, who was born December 23, 1806, in Delaware township, Delaware County, N. Y. Their union was happy and resulted in the birth of (1) Chester H., born May 7, 1828, married to Delilah D. Hicks, and on her decease to Helen Rood. (2) Rebecca, born November 8, 1830, married to Chester Rood. (4) Julia, born January 21, 1835, married to George McKune. (3) George R., born March 17, 1833. In connection with his eldest brother William, John K. Dillon erected the saw-mill at the mouth of Dillon's Creek, Wayne County, on Delaware River, about the year 1840, and commenced to cut the lumber which was obtained from their extensive lands. They carried on a large and prosperous business until the dissolution of partnership August, 1856, when George R. took the interest of his father in the mill.

He afterwards attended to the farming of his lands and was a highly respected and valued citizen. His death occurred on February 7, 1872, and his widow followed him April 4, 1880. George R. was sent to the district schools some several years, and when in his eighteenth year attended the Franklin Academy, Delaware County, N. Y., where he remained two terms increasing in breadth of culture. In his twenty-first year he returned to the homestead and jobbed in lumbering and bark operations besides managing the mill business, continuing in this associated with his uncle, William Dillon, for some years and subsequently with his cousin Robert, the son of William, until January, 1876, when he sold out the manufacturing department and entered upon his present work of lumbering and farming. For over thirty years he has rafted and run lumber down the Delaware River to various large towns below, making a specialty of cut lumber to Philadelphia and bark to Chester, Pa.

Through a long business career his reputation has been high, and to-day his character is unassailable. An honorable, upright and progressive man, he has the hearty respect and esteem of the citizens without regard to party affinity. He was elected by the Republican party of his township to the responsible office of supervisor, in which he served three years. Always a strong partisan from fervent belief in the principles of the Republican party, he has nevertheless held aloof from political offices, though frequently proffered them.

Married to Miss Louisa, daughter of Daniel and Sophia Ann (Pierce) Knight, on October 3, 1860, their union was blessed in the birth of one child, a son, Ralph, on April 23, 1879. This true helpmeet and loving mother was not spared to enjoy the family relation many years, succumbing to the insidious disease consumption on March 4, 1885 (Inaugural day of President Cleveland).

Together with his wife, Mr. Dillon had been prominent and valued members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Stockport since 1876, and in 1879 he was elected steward, and still fills such responsible duties. The Knight family have been representatives of the highest grade in Delaware County, N. Y., since the early days, and several of its members have been prominent in business and manufacturing circles, and they still occupy an honorable position before the community, being universally respected and esteemed.

WARNER PRESTON KNIGHT.

Born in Delaware County, N. Y., opposite Stockport, Wayne County, Pa., on January 8, 1846.

When the late Judge Samuel Preston removed from Philadelphia to the then wilds of Wayne County, he brought with him a young lad named John Knight, the son of old family friends in the Quaker City. This lad, being adopted into the family, grew up in such connection and married twice,—first, Rebecca Jenkins, by whom he had two children, William and Daniel; and second, Hester Sands, who bore him Richard, John, George and a number of others who died young.

The family homestead was on the New York side of the Delaware River, opposite Stockport, and here Richard Knight married Cassandra Lakin, whose son, Warner Preston, was the only child attaining youth.

After the death of this lady Mr. Knight was united to Mrs. Deborah Gardiner, the mother of Hon. Charles L. Gardiner, (member of the Pennsylvania State Legislature 1883–84,) and partner for many years with the subject of this sketch. Mr. Richard Knight was one of the most prominent lumber operators along the river, known everywhere as a man of worth and integrity. About 1853 the family moved to Equinunk, where Warner P. Knight obtained the education afforded by the common schools and was then sent to the Delhi (N. Y.) Academy one year, during the war. While in attendance there, party feeling was running high, and the scholars generally voiced the sentiments of their parents. One, a Southern lad, exhibited a secession flag, which, being shortly observed by our subject, was torn to pieces and stamped upon as an emblem of treason. He was afterwards placed at the Delaware Literary Institute, Franklin, N. Y., where he completed a liberal education.

On returning to Equinunk he commenced his mercantile career as a clerk in the store of Mr. C. F. Rockwell, and followed that by entering business in partnership with his stepbrother, under name of Knight & Gardiner, which firm continued until 1873, when upon the death of Judge Paul S. Preston, the grandfather of his wife, he removed to Stockport, to superintend the extensive business interests of Miss Ann Preston. In this connection he remained until his early demise on March 3, 1885, consequent upon a too close application to the large and complicated business interests he had in charge, lumbering, mill, store, etc., in which he established a high reputation for business capacity, great energy and earnest integrity. It is said of him as of but few men, that so implicitly was his reputation relied upon by purchasers of rafts, of timber and lumber shipped by him, that purchase was made without so much as an inspection on their part.

A large employer of labor, he was generous and kind, always recognizing right endeavor and aiding with both money and counsel whenever called upon by worthy subjects.

Mr. Knight early affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and was a member in good and regular standing of Hancock Lodge and Shehawken Chapter, No. 258, R. A. M. He was also a charter member of Equinunk Lodge, Knights of Honor, and belonged to the Independent Order of Good Templars.

On February 14, 1872, he was married to Miss Henrietta M., daughter of Allen K. and Gulielma (daughter of Hon. Paul S. Preston) Hoxie, born at Summer Hill, Cayuga County, N. Y. The children of Allen K. and Gulielma Hoxie are as follows: Paul Preston, married Nora Washburn, and, with two children, resides at Raymond, Iowa; Elma Ann, married Dennison Crary, now residing, with eight children, at Stockport, Pa.; and Henrietta M., married as above stated.

From this union were born seven children, viz.: Henrietta M., born November 14, 1872; Richard, born March 4, 1875; Samuel Preston, born December 5, 1876; Anne, born November 4, 1878; Elma, born April 20, 1880; Harold, born October 28, 1881; Ruth, born August 2, 1884.

Recognizing the immense value of a liberal education and desiring to afford her young family advantages hardly obtainable in the vicinity of their birth-place, Mrs. Knight purchased a home in the beautiful city of Middletown, N. Y., and removed there during December, 1885, proposing to remain at least during their early youth.

CHAPTER XV.

EQUINUNK.[1]

THE place derives its name from the Equinunk Creek, which here unites with the Delaware. The Indian name, "Equinunk," is said, traditionally, to signify "The Trout Stream." Certainly a name it well deserved.[2] The little village which has grown up here, almost entirely from the lumber and tanning industries, has been built without much regard to regularity or appearance, and the traveler viewing it from the cars on the Erie Railroad, which runs at the base of the hills on the opposite side of the Delaware, views it as a straggling, ill-conditioned hamlet; but the traveler first seeing it as he comes over the mountains from the direction of Honesdale, especially in the summer, considers it very attractive both as to location and general appearance. It is built up on both sides of the creek, hence has the distinction of being in two townships, Buckingham and Manchester, probably the larger portion being in the last named.

It is entirely on the "Equinunk Manor," especial mention of which was made in the history of Buckingham. The Delaware (which the writer thinks the most beautiful river in America) makes here an abrupt turn, thus forming at the base of the Equinunk Rocks, a deep quiet eddy, where the clear pellucid waters seem to rest from their course of life and beauty, to the sea. Looking up the stream from many points on the Manchester side a vista of quiet landscape beauty presents itself, which can scarcely be surpassed. A stretch of some two miles of the river with the island known as Equinunk Island, is before one. Viewed in the summer, when the hills are clad in verdure down to the water's edge, the island clothed with green, with occasional trees flinging their branches out over the water, cattle standing in the river and seeming to enjoy not the comfort only, but the quiet beauty, and all in repose and quiet, unbroken except by the roar and rush of occasional trains passing on the railway, the scene is one of rare loveliness and beauty.

The first white man of whom there is an authentic account as living at Equinunk, was Josiah Parks, a native of New London, Conn. The life of this man, if properly written, would read like a romance, giving, as it would, account of thrilling adventures, with examples of heroic purpose, patient endurance and unwavering devotion to his country.

The limits of this article will allow but a brief sketch. He was born in 1745. When quite young he served on board an English man-of-war. Here he distinguished himself for bravery, and was made boatswain, hence the appellation, which went with him through life, of "Boatswain," or in the common rendering, "Bosen Parks." Leaving the navy, he first settled in Ulster County, N. Y., where he lived when the American Revolution began. With true patriotic ardor he entered his country's service, choosing a most dangerous branch of service, that of a scout, his field for practice lying between the Hudson and the Delaware, a region infested by loyalists, and their less savage allies, the Indians. An account of his adventures here would give his name a place with that of Murphy, Quick and others, to whom the country owes so much, but of whom it knows so little. At some period during the Revolution, and prior to the massacre of Wyoming, he came with his family to Equinunk, reaching it by way of the Delaware, against the strong current of which he pushed a canoe containing his family and worldly goods. Reaching Equinunk, he lived for some time in a sort of cave in the Equinunk Rocks. People are living here yet, who well remember the place, but vandal hands have long since obliterated every trace of it. Still following his occupation of scout, he became the especial object for the vengeance of the Tories and Indians. He was once taken prisoner by them, but while they were enjoying the prospect of roasting him, he escaped. Finally, being warned by a friendly Indian of a plan to destroy him and his family, he again took to his canoe and the Delaware, and in the night with the river high and filled with floating ice, he went down the stream to the fort at Cochecton.

While he was here he learned of the intended attack on Wyoming. With only a pocket compass to guide him, he went over the mountains to Wyoming, to warn the inhabitants. Arriving there, he was arrested as a spy, but fortunately, people were there who knew him, and who vouched for his integrity, and he was released. But his warning was unheeded, except by two or three families. These he piloted through to the Delaware.[1] After this he returned to Equinunk, but was again obliged to leave. Again he returned and soon after peace came, and the occupation of Parks was gone. After the war, he built a house on Equinunk Island, which it was then reasonable to suppose, belonged to Pennsylvania. He cleared a portion of the island and alternately cultivated the land, hunted and followed the river as a pilot, at which he became celebrated. He seems to have been improvident or unfortunate, and remained poor. Notice is made in the sketch of Buckingham of his having owned the Stockport Flats. He died in 1829. He has numerous descendants in the valley of the Delaware.

One of his daughters, Mrs. Prudence Lakin, lived to the extreme age of one hundred and nine years; retaining her memory and mental powers until past one hundred. A great niece visited her when one hundred and six years old, and hearing Equinunk spoken of, remarked that she supposed "Equinunk had changed some since she saw it last." On the niece asking how long since she saw it, she replied, "ninety years."

Of his descendants, one, a highly esteemed and cultured lady, Mrs. A. W. Cole, resides at Equinunk, in sight of the place where her great-grandsire braved the privation and dangers of the picket line of civilization. It appears from the correspondence between Anthony Butler and Samuel Preston in 1790, that there were whites here prior to that, and subsequent to the location of Parks. But no names are given, and the inference is, that they were lawless characters, intent only on getting the timber.

Prior to 1806, one Sylvester Roylston lived here, but nothing is known of his antecedents, or what became of him. Judge Preston had built a saw-mill here prior to 1806, and it is presumed that Roylston was in his employ.

In 1822 Christopher Teeple came here from near the Delaware Water Gap. He built a house on what was known as "The Point," about fifty rods north of the mouth of Equinunk Creek. In 1832 he removed to the Union settlement in Manchester.

In 1831 Alexander Calder and Israel Chapman bought the whole of the Equinunk Manor. Mention is made in the sketch of Buckingham of their commencing a tannery and of the division of the lands, etc. Mr. Calder was a native of Greene County, N. Y., his parents having come there from Scotland a short time before his birth. He always possessed a warm regard for the land of his fathers, and was intensely Scotch in thought and feeling. At an early age he was ordained as preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church and gained renown as a revivalist, and was noted for his earnest, fiery eloquence, masterly logic and rapid flow of language. He belonged at one time to the New York Conference, afterward the Oneida. After commencing business at Equinunk, he still remained in the ministry, being last stationed at Sydney Plains, N. Y. After the division of the lands between him and Chapman, noticed in the chapter on Buckingham, he engaged in business at Equinunk, and was noted for his restless energy and unflagging industry. For many years he kept a store, and, at the same time, was largely interested in lumbering and farming. His wife was a Miss Affie Waldron, also of Greene County, N. Y., a most estimable woman, and one whose "children rise up to call her blessed." Eight children—four sons and four daughters—were born to them, all of whom reached man and womanhood. But a sad fatality seemed to follow the sons. James H., the eldest son, a young man of great promise and probity, was stricken down by death soon after entering upon what promised to be a successful and useful business career. Alexander, the third son, left his home in the summer of 1856, and over his ultimate fate hangs a mournful uncertainty. The presumption is that he perished with Walker in his ill-starred Nicaraguan expedition. Levi B., while returning from California in 1865, died at sea. Joseph W., while engaged in railroad enterprises in Texas, was shot down by desperadoes in the streets of Dallas in September of 1878. Amelia, the eldest daughter, is the wife of the Hon. W. M. Nelson. Myriam, the third daughter, is the wife of H. N. Farley, Esq., both residing at Equinunk. Carrie, the second daughter, is the wife of Mr. Charles Knight, of Hancock, N. Y. Alma, the youngest, is the wife of Mr. H. J. Johnston, of New York City. She is an authoress of considerable note. All are ladies of culture and refinement and real excellence of character.

The writer, feeling that Mr. Calder and his family were the pioneers of actual improvement at Equinunk, has given to them what he would otherwise feel unwarranted space. To conclude, it may be added that Mr. Calder died in 1879, aged eighty-one years, and the writer feels that it does no injustice to his memory to add that then ended an earthly existence of unrest. His was a life of ceaseless activity. By nature very irascible, he was easily irritated and annoyed. He was very tenacious in his views and unyielding in his convictions, and terribly in earnest in his denunciations of the liquor traffic and kindred evils, equally so in his advocacy of all that tended to elevate and purify society.

Herman Matthew and his son Aldrich W. came to Equinunk from Greene County, N. Y., in 1834. In 1835 they commenced building a mill near Dillons, on the Delaware. They had the dam completed on a portion of the stream which ran west of an island. An ice freshet came, and their dam, contrary to all philosophy and experience, was moved up stream some distance, and they abandoned the enterprise. A. W. next bought the mill which Calder & Chapman had built at Equinunk and yet resides at Equinunk. In 1847 Isaiah and D. C. Scudder, of Prattsville, N. Y., came to Equinunk and commenced building a tannery, completing it in 1848. They were men of energy and perseverance. Quite a number of people came at about the time they did from Prattsville and vicinity; others were attracted by the labor and business the place afforded. About the time the tannery was completed the New York and Erie Railroad was completed through the Delaware Valley. This gave a fresh impetus to business, and Equinunk soon grew to about all that it is now or is ever likely to be, unless new resources are developed. Subsequently Isaiah Scudder sold his interest in the tannery and removed to Missouri. Returning from there he took the tannery again, sold it in 1865 and removed to Bethany in this county. At this writing we learn that he has removed to Orange County, N. Y., a good citizen for any community. D. C. Scudder is living at Elmira, N. Y.

The first hotel built in the place was by John Lord, known, to distinguish him from half-a-dozen other John Lords, as "Long John." Among those who early located here were Colby and A. C. Teed, Runsom Cole, Levi Felter, Morris Eldred, James Calder, Richard Knight and others. Some of these reside here yet, while others have gone to the shadowy land.

William M. Nelson, of whom an extensive sketch appears at the close of this chapter, located here in 1854, his wife, as already mentioned, being Amelia, daughter of Mr. Alexander Calder.

Equinunk has no municipal regulations separate from the township in which it is situated. It has about three hundred inhabitants, has four stores, two hotels, grist-mill, blacksmith-shop, wagon-maker and undertakers'-shop, planing-mill and various other industries.

The first laid-out road to the place was that between it and Stockport. There is much uncertainty as to the date of its survey, and no one knows who was the surveyor. The road up the Equinunk Creek was extended by degrees, as the needs of the people settling upon, or lumbering upon it, made it necessary, but was not laid out and worked through until 1845. The road from Equinunk to Long Eddy and Little Equinunk was not laid out until 1840. After the Scudders established themselves here, they were mainly instrumental in getting a fairly good road laid out and worked through to the "Union," and another on the Manchester side of the creek to intersect, a half-mile from the river, with the road up the Equinunk Creek.

As to the first religious meeting or preaching at what is now Equinunk, the same uncertainty exists. From all the writer can learn, he infers that Mr. Calder preached the first sermon ever preached in the place. As mentioned in the chapters on Manchester and Buckingham, this region, as far down as Long Eddy, was for many years attached to the Hancock, N. Y., charge of the Methodist Episcopal Church New York Conference, and itinerants from there labored through this uninviting field. In 1854 the Equinunk Methodist Episcopal Church was established, with something like one hundred members. This included the Society at the "Union," and also at Stockport. The first minister settled here was William J. Ives. His successors, as far as can be learned, have been Revs. Blakey, Ferow, Birch, Powell, Krogan, Roe, Gamble, Van Keuren, Heroy and Carpenter, the present incumbent. Present membership of the church about one hundred and eighty. The society has a comfortable church edifice and parsonage, which, together, cost about three thousand five hundred dollars. No other church organization exists here. Some twelve years since a small Episcopal Society was organized, but the number and means of the members would not admit of regular services here.

The people depended for many years upon Hancock, Honesdale and Mt. Pleasant for physicians. A Doctor Tingley settled here about 1847 or 1848; he left in 1857. Resides now at Newark, N. J. The next was Dr. George S. Redfield, a native of Delhi, N. Y., a graduate of Geneva Medical Institute. Located here in 1852. Was fairly successful as a physician until 1857, when he engaged in the lumber business. After a short time, in the mercantile business, in 1861 he entered the army as first-lieutenant in Company G, Forty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers. He resigned in 1862. In 1863 he again entered the service as a captain, and was with Sherman in his famous "March to the Sea." After the war he located at Conklin, N. Y. He returned to Equinunk in 1875, remained here until 1884, and now resides at Conklin, N. Y. The next to locate here was Dr. William H. DeLong, a native of Herkimer County, N. Y. A graduate of University of Albany. He entered the army in 1862 as a private, and at the end of the war was discharged as assistant surgeon. He located at Equinunk in 1868, was very successful as a practitioner, and remained here until 1874. He resides now at Emporium, Cameron County, Pa. Dr. Frank P. Hough, a native of Wyoming County, Pa., a graduate of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, located here in 1884.

A mill for grinding grain on a small scale was erected here about 1850. The first saw-mill was built by Samuel Preston, of Stockport, in 1804. It was built on the Manchester side of the Equinunk Creek but a few rods from the river. No trace of it excepting a portion of the raceway by which the water was brought to it, remains. The next saw-mill was built by Messrs. Calder & Chapman in 1833. This was a few rods above where Preston built. It passed into the possession of A. W. Matthews, and was torn down a year or two since. The Scudder Brothers tannery was built in 1847 and 1848. Business was done under the firm name of I. & D. C. Scudder. In 1856 Isaiah Scudder parted with his interest to D. C. Scudder and Joseph Bates; firm known as Scudder & Bates. In 1859 Isaiah Scudder again became owner, and continued so until 1865, then sold to H. & L. B. Richmyer. This firm after a few years sold to Munson Sherwood and D. Crary, who soon closed out their interest to William Holbert. It was burned down in 1875. Its capacity was two thousand five hundred sides per year. A factory, for the making of excelsior, also a feed-mill were erected in 1881, on the site of the tannery. It was burned in October, of 1885.

In 1866 J. D. Dillon and C. H. Cole built an axe factory on Factory Brook. It became the property of M. M. Hedges, and was burned in 1867. Another was built in 1875 on the site of the other, by Cole Brothers, of Equinunk. It was burned in 1877.

In 1880 L. W. Lord erected a planing-mill and machine-shop on the site of the burned axe factories. He continues to own and run it. In 1883 a hub factory was built on the site of the Matthews saw-mill, by J. G. Halbert. The business did not pay and was discontinued.

A Lodge of Good Templars was organized in 1868. After a precarious and stormy existence, it died in 1874. It was reorganized in 1879.

In June, of 1881, a Lodge of Knights of Honor was established with a membership of twenty. Present membership, forty-five. Condition, healthy.

In 1882 Lieutenant George P. Scudder, Post No. 340, Grand Army of the Republic was established. It now has a membership of seventy, and is in a flourishing condition.

A post-office was established in 1833. Alexander Calder was appointed postmaster. Mails until 1848 came from Honesdale semi-weekly; after 1848 via the Erie Railroad daily. Mr. Calder was postmaster until 1853, when D. C. Scudder was appointed and the office was taken to the Manchester side. In 1857 W. M. Nelson was appointed and it was returned to Buckingham. In 1861 C. F. Rockwell was appointed and again it went to Manchester. Mr. Rockwell continued postmaster until he closed out his business in 1865, when Mr. Richard Knight was appointed. He held the office until his death, in 1882, when C. L. Gardiner was appointed. He being elected as representative in the fall of 1882, H. N. Farley was appointed. He is the present incumbent. It became a money order office in July, 1884.

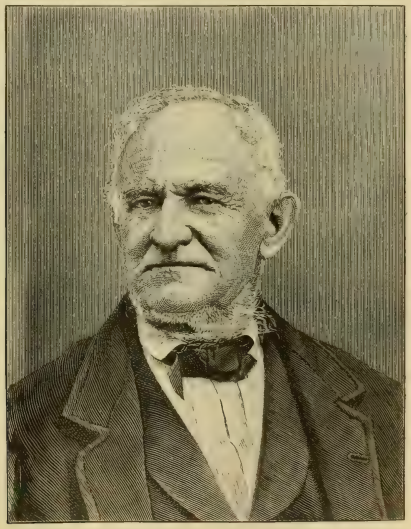
The public schools of the place are included with those of the two townships.

For many years the place was noted for the amount of lumber run down the Delaware from it. Year after year the banks for half a mile were covered with piles of sawed lumber, while every available foot of ground for many rods from the river was covered with logs. Then with the early spring time there came from the "Beech Woods" and other places hard-handed and stalwart yeomen, eager to "raft and go down the river." Then for weeks there would be a general racket of shouting, swearing and whipping and slashing of unfortunate teams as they hauled logs through the mud to the river. Though there was mud everywhere out of doors, frequent storms incident to the season, the river rushing on swollen water, in short a general dampness prevailing, yet the average raftsmen had a dryness which could scarcely be satisfied. "Steersmen" or pilots were in great demand, and made about their own terms. "Going down the river," had for those who became accustomed to it a strange fascination, though there was some danger with much discomfort through exposure to storms, and often severe labor through the day. Then the landing at night to find such accommodation as could be had. Not more than one raft is run now to fifty ten years since. Very soon there will be none. Then old "steersmen" and raftsmen will wander along the river when there is a "fresh," as disconsolate as lost souls along the "Styx."

Railroad facilities are afforded the place by the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Station, Lordville, one mile distant. A substantial suspension bridge across the Delaware at Lordville facilitates intercourse.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

ISAIAH SCUDDER.



Isaiah Scudder's paternal grandfather, Captain William Scudder, of Welsh extraction, served in the Revolutionary War, in defense of the Colonies. While out on a scouting excursion he was taken prisoner by the British. He assisted in burning a British frigate on Long Island Sound, and is said to have replied, when asked if he was not sorry for having done so much damage, "No, I am sorry I did not do as much more."

His wife was a Wood, and with his family he settled in Roxbury, Delaware County, New York, in 1801, from Westchester County, where the family had resided since its settlement in this country from Wales. He had four sons,—Philetus, Jotham, Obadiah Smith and David Scudder.

Obadiah Smith Scudder was born in Westchester County, New York, in 1778, and married Peace Corbin, an estimable young Quaker woman of Dutchess County, New York, in 1801. He located in Roxbury, New York, where he was a blacksmith and farmer, and where he died in 1830, four years after the death of his wife. Their children were Benjamin, born in 1802; Ireneus, born in 1805; Samuel, born in 1807; Isaiah, born March 26, 1808, subject of this sketch; Anna, born in 1810; Daniel C., born in 1811; Rebecca, born in 1813; Micaiah, born in 1815; Abraham, born in 1817; Abigail, born in 1819, and John, born in 1821.

Isaiah Scudder, a native of Roxbury, was in boyhood a diligent and studious scholar, in the district school at home, which afforded him his early book-knowledge. He was fond of mathematics, in which he early became proficient, and his love for the study has made it a pleasant recreation from all the care and toil of an active business life. His original manner of analyzing and solving, even the most intricate problems, has astonished and delighted college professors and teachers of mathematical science. They have long recognized him as being one of the best mathematicians in Northern Pennsylvania. His mechanical genius has been turned to practical account in the patented invention of machinery, which still bears his name. In the deep and abstruse subjects of scientific investigation, he has ever been an interested and critical student. He also seemed intuitively and naturally to comprehend the subject of medicine and to be able to diagnose disease, and although he never gave physic his regular attention, as a study, he practiced very successfully for many years among his friends gratuitously, and in consequence thereof, was known as "Doctor Scudder."

Isaiah Scudder

Inclining to a business, rather than a professional life, at the age of eighteen, in 1826, he apprenticed himself to the veteran tanner, Col. Zadoc Pratt, of Prattsville, Greene County, New York, where he remained in that capacity until he had fully mastered the trade, and afterward as a reliable and trusted foreman, until 1844, when he succeeded to Col. Pratt's business, having for his partner his brother, Daniel C. Scudder. They continued the business there until 1847, when they bought the site and barklands, at Equinunk, Wayne County, Pa., consisting of some two thousand acres, upon which they erected the Equinunk Tannery, in which they began operations the following year. From this tract of land they cut timber which they rafted down the Delaware, and bark for use in their tannery, employing in the tannery and out about one hundred men.

In 1849 they built the "High Lake Tannery," seven miles up the Equinunk Creek, at a point in the woods called Brownsville, but which, a few years later, was called High Lake, and still bears the name.

In 1856 Isaiah Scudder sold his entire interest in these tanneries and lands to Joseph S. Bates, a son-in-law of his partner, D. C. Scudder, and that firm, "Scudder & Bates," continued the business.

Upon being relieved of this business, Doctor Scudder removed to Nodaway County, Missouri, with the intention of making there a permanent home. With this object in view he made purchase of one thousand one hundred acres of rolling prairie land, embracing a fine homestead for his family. But the panic of 1857 so affected the interests of the new tanning firm, as to make necessary the return of Doctor Scudder, and his resumption of the work at the Equinunk Tannery, in 1858. Here he remained until 1866, when he disposed of the property to H. and L. B. Richtmyer. The upper, or "High Lake" tannery had been sold to Degen & Wrede in 1856.

The "Doctor" had now spent some forty years in the tanning business, and was the acknowledged head of that large interest so extensively carried on in that part of the State. To him was accorded the reputation of producing as good, if not the very best sole-leather in the market.

On his retirement from business he purchased a village farm in Bethany, Pa., and subsequently a dairy farm in Orange County, New York. Members of his family are settled upon each place, and make pleasant and comfortable his homes as he elects one or the other.

Doctor Scudder has led an active business life, and by honesty of purpose, persistent effort, indefatigable industry, judicious management and integrity in all his business relations, he has earned a competency—a just reward of faithful labor.

From early manhood he has been a consistent and honored member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, serving as class-leader and steward through a long series of years. Christian ministers were always sure of a cordial welcome to his hospitable home. With a liberal hand he has responded to the call of the poor and needy. To all worthy local enterprises he has contributed commensurate with his means.

A man of strong mind, good judgment and of marked individuality, though his life has been largely given to business, he has always kept pace with local and national affairs, and accordingly as he thought proper he has identified himself with the great political parties of his time. He was a Democrat until 1852, when he cast his vote for the Whig candidate, General Winfield Scott, and upon the formation of the Republican party in 1854–56 he allied himself to it, to which principles he has since adhered.

On January 10, 1833, at Prattsville, New York, he married Margaret Hadsell, a woman of rare excellence and Christian character, who died at Bethany, Pa., in August, 1876. Their children are Harriet A., married at Equinunk, Pa., July 2, 1855, to Charles F. Rockwell, of Milford, now a resident of Honesdale, Pa. They have two children, a son and a daughter. Julia M., married to Henry S. Richtmyer in 1856, and died in 1872, at Bethany, leaving a son and a daughter. Libbie P., married July 26, 1858, in Missouri, to Dr. J. M. Starnes, who served as surgeon of the Eleventh Missouri Union Cavalry during the late civil war, and who died at St. Louis, Mo., January 22, 1864; his remains are buried in Glen Dyberry Cemetery, at Honesdale, Pa. His widow and daughter reside in last-named town; a son lives at Bethany. Benjamin F., married Elizabeth Stevenson, at White Cloud, Mo., and they reside in Colorado. Isaiah Scudder, Jr., married Lavinia Varcoe, and lives in Otisville, New York. Charlotte A., married at Bethany, in 1869, to Thomas F. Ham, of the law-firm of H. H. and T. F. Ham, of Wauseon, Ohio, where they now reside. Homer A., married Libbie Ham, and resides at Wauseon. Florence R., married to Hon. William B. Guinnip, ex-member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, residing in Damascus township, Wayne County, Pa.

W. M. Nelson

HON. W. M. NELSON.

The paternal grandfather of our subject, Henry Nelson, was born in Massachusetts about 1760, and, animated by an ardent love of country, enlisted shortly after the battle of Bunker Hill, when but sixteen years of age. For bravery and ability he was promoted through the various grades of office until his appointment as colonel (the parchment commissions for the two ranks of captain and colonel have ever since been retained in the family as valuable mementos of the past), in which rank he served until the close of the Revolution, and was honorably discharged at Washington's headquarters in the town of Newburgh, N. Y. Colonel Nelson died in Newburgh, Orange County, N. Y., whither he had removed after the close of the war. He was twice married, and of his children, Henry, the only son by his first wife, was the father of Senator William M. Nelson. Henry Nelson, born at New Windsor, Orange County, N. Y., April 14, 1788, married in 1810 Azubah Mailler, who was born at Cornwall, in the same county, September 16, 1791. They had six children, of whom William Mailler Nelson was the youngest. Shortly after his marriage the trouble with the mother country culminated in an appeal to arms in 1812, and he, inheriting the spirit of his father, enlisted and served in the company commanded by Captain Belknap, of Newburgh. His active service was more particularly identified with events occurring in New York and Canada, and at the close of the war he was honorably discharged and returned to Newburgh, where he followed carriage making some thirty years prior to his death in 1858. His wife died in 1841 at Newburgh.

William Mailler Nelson was born at Newburgh October 14, 1826, and obtained his early book knowledge in the district schools, where he acquired a good acquaintance with those branches which are of the greatest value in a practical career. Being of a religious turn of mind from his youth, he united with the M. E. Church at fourteen years of age, and devoted much of his spare time during his minority to the reading of theological works. In 1848 he had become so proficient in the knowledge of the Scriptures that he was accepted by the Church as a local preacher, and in this capacity served as a supply for one year on the Sugar Loaf circuit, New York Conference, and subsequently on the Sullivan County circuit. In 1850 he joined the New York Conference of the M. E. Church, and for some four years, until his health failed, labored as a minister of the gospel. In 1854 he married R. Amelia, daughter of Rev. Alexander Calder, of Equinunk, Wayne County, Pa., and located at that place, where he engaged in general mercantile trade, which he carried on successfully for some twenty years. For six years, during the administrations of Presidents Pierce and Buchanan, he was postmaster at Equinunk. Whether in a public or private capacity, Mr. Nelson has ever been busy, either for himself or others. He is president of "The Equinunk Chemical Company," which was established in 1882 at that place for the manufacture of pyroligneous acid from ordinary cordwood. The works consist of four furnaces and eight iron retorts, holding about a cord of wood each, for the dry distillation of the wood, and turn out about a half-ton of acetate of lime per day, besides the wood-naphtha and large quantities of charcoal. In the fall of 1862 he was elected on the Democratic ticket a member of the State Legislature from Wayne County, and by re-election served through the sessions of 1863, '64, '65, '66, '69, '77, and '78, and was the caucus nominee of his party for Speaker of the House in 1865. In the fall of 1878 he was elected to the State Senate from the Twenty-sixth District, comprised of Susquehanna and Wayne Counties, and by re-election in 1882 is now serving his fifteenth year of public life,—bespeaking the confidence of his constituents,—comprising a district largely Republican. During his first term in the House, the contest between General Simon Cameron and Hon. Charles R. Buckalew for United States Senator was exceedingly earnest. Strong efforts were made and large sums of money used by the partisans of General Cameron to overcome the Democratic majority of one on joint ballot, and secure his re-election, but Mr. Nelson could not be induced by any consideration to become a party to corruption, and Mr. Buckalew received the election. His record in the Legislature on all questions coming before that body relative to the sale of intoxicating liquors is clearly defined and unimpeachable, and his position has never been changed from that first assumed as a champion of prohibitory measures. Firm and unyielding in character and disposition, his abilities long since placed him foremost in the ranks of those endeavoring to put a legal stop to the liquor traffic and the evils growing out of it. Being in the Legislature during the war, he was the representative of the soldier as well as of the people, and as a war Democrat, his voice and vote were invariably given for the success of the Union cause. He strenuously advocated the measure allowing Pennsylvania soldiers in the field the right of suffrage. He contributed in every way in his power to aid those who enlisted, and he shared largely in the sympathies of the volunteers from his section, whose families still remember his generosity as a merchant, while their friends were at the front. Recognizing the value of proper railroad communications, Mr. Nelson in 1863 revived the charter for the Jefferson Railroad, and subsequently at various times added such supplements to it as made it in the interest of the coal companies to build the road from Carbondale to Lanesborough, on the Erie Railroad, which has since become a Northern outlet for coal through to Canada, in connection with the Albany and Susquehanna

Railroad, and added vastly to the wealth and value of his senatorial district. At the Democratic State Convention held in Harrisburgh in 1882, Senator Nelson was one of the nine candidates for Governor of Pennsylvania, and received a very complimentary vote. Seeing, however, the tide of the Convention drifting towards Robert E. Pattison, the present Governor, he withdrew on the fifth ballot, and his friends, led by Thomas J. Ham, of Honesdale, went over to Pattison, who was nominated on the sixth ballot. There seems to be but one sentiment among all classes relative to Senator Nelson's public career, and he enjoys the confidence and respect of his constituents in a wonderful degree, being often referred to as the man in public life for many years without spot or blemish on his escutcheon. At home he is known as a man of public spirit and enterprise; a generous contributor to all charitable, benevolent and church work, and a practical friend to the poor. A writer conversant with Senator Nelson's career says of him: "Among Mr. Nelson's noteworthy characteristics are his benevolence, steadfast adherence to friends, magnanimity towards enemies, cheerfulness in disposition, kindness of heart, and fixedness and honesty of purpose. In no wise has his life, either public or private, been a mystery. Elevation to important trusts never raised him above his fellows. The humblest can approach him and feel at home in his presence. Though deep, he is transparent; though strong, he is gentle; though decided and pronounced in his convictions, he is tolerant toward those who differ from him, and patient under reproaches; and even to those who are not acquainted with him his public acts and utterances indicate a clear idea of his strength of character and personality."

Although Senator Nelson is evidently a man in delicate health, he is now in his sixtieth year, with apparently even chances for several years more of natural life. His friends would gladly wish they might be many. He still holds the relation of a local deacon in the M. E. Church, in good and regular standing, preaches occasionally, in the absence of the pastor, at camp-meetings and on public occasions, and his services are considered almost indispensable at the funerals of his friends and neighbors. He is found on the right side of all moral issues, both in public and private life. He has no children of his own, but has adopted a niece of his wife.

The following extract is from an editorial in the Philadelphia Daily Times of June 23d, reviewing the retiring State Senate of 1886, and pays a high compliment to Senator Nelson:

"This district is always Democratic when William M. Nelson is the Democratic candidate, and that has happened most of the time lately. It is naturally Republican on a full vote, but both counties are of the Independent type, and a man of Nelson's stern integrity and independence just about suits them. If he should be a candidate again, his election would be more than probable; if not, the district would be doubtful, with chances in favor of the best candidate."

CHAPTER XVI.

CANAAN AND THE BOROUGHS OF WAYMART[1] AND PROMPTON.

CANAAN was an original township established 1798, and then included Salem, which was set off in 1808. From the northern part was formed Clinton in 1834. Waymart Borough was formed from the northwestern corner in 1851, and a portion of the eastern side of the township was added to Cherry Ridge. Upon the erection of that township the remaining territory was by an order of the court, February, 1852, divided into Canaan and South Canaan As now constituted it is bounded on the north by Waymart and Clinton, south by South Canaan, east by Prompton, Texas and Cherry Ridge, west by Lackawanna County. Its population is five hundred and seventy-six. Its geological formation is principally Catskill sand stone, except in the range of the Moosic Mountains, which form the western portion of the township, where can be found the Pocono Sandstone, Red Shale and Pottsville Conglomerate, the outcrop of the Northern Anthracite coal fields. At several points north of Rix's Gap, in this range, traces of iron may be found, but not in paying quantities, south of this gap. Traces of copper and lead have also been found. The general elevation of the township is about fourteen hundred and fifty feet above the tide. At Far View, the new summer resort of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, the highest point of the Moosic range is reached at an elevation of two thousand seven hundred and forty feet, from which point one of the finest views in the State is obtained. The general surface is hilly, the soil a clay loam, from which excellent crops of hay, oats, buckwheat, corn and potatoes are raised. Nearly the whole of the township is good grazing land, and the inhabitants are paying considerable attention to stock raising. The whole is well watered by numerous small streams and ponds, the latter being Hoadleys, Stantons, J. L. Keas and J. B. Keens. The Belmont and Easton turnpike, built in 1820, passes through the township north and south, the Milford and Owego built in 1815 north and south, and the Honesdale and Clarksville, built in 1831, passes through the northern part. The Gravity Railroad, of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, passes through the township.

SETTLEMENT.—An assessment made by John Bunting, in 1798, shows but twenty-nine taxables, viz.:

John Bunting, farmer; Henry Curtis, farmer; William Cooper, farmer; Moses Dolph, farmer; George Emstin, blacksmith; Robert Freeland, farmer; William Harrison, farmer; Clement King, mill-wright; Chester Kimble, mason; Edward London, farmer; Elisha Potter, weaver; Hansure Swingle, farmer; John Swingle, farmer; Jane Swingle, farmer; Conrad Swingle, farmer; Asa Stanton, inn-keeper: John H. Shank, gentleman; John Shaffer, farmer; Gabriel Sutts, farmer; Ephraim Vannorman, farmer; Joseph Wheatcroft, farmer; Edward Wheatcroft, laborer; Adam Wagoner, farmer; John Woodward, farmer; Enos Woodward, farmer; Asahel Woodward, farmer; Silas Woodward, farmer; Samuel Wheatcroft, farmer.

Canaan Corners was for some time in the earlier history of the county a noted stage station, it being the intersecting point for stages from Easton and the South to Belmont and Southern Central New York, and those from New York and the East to Montrose, Owego, Western New York and the Lake country; large droves of cattle, sheep and hogs were also driven over these roads.

Much of the personal history of the township must necessarily be included in the history of the townships formed from this.

Captain George Rix removed from New London, Conn., in the summer of 1780, bought a large tract of land about one mile west of what is now Canaan Corners, on the east slope of the mountain, made a small clearing and built a log cabin. In the spring of 1801 he walked back to New London, married a young lady by the name of Benjamin and brought her on horseback to his new home, the furniture of which he had made with his own hands. Four daughters and one son were born to this pioneer couple. Two of the daughters, after reaching young womanhood, died the same day. Phœbe married Minor Lee, and is still living in Wisconsin. Roxie married Alexander McMillian, and lived on a portion of the old homestead until her death. The only son, George, Jr., born in 1804, married Clarissa Whitman in 1828, and lived upon the homestead until his death, December 10, 1869. His widow is still living in her eighty-fourth year. George Jr., had two children. Warren, who gave his life for his country October 11, 1864, after whom the Grand Army of the Republic Post, at Waymart, was named, and Ann, who married J. B. Keen, and is still living. The house on the Milford and Owego turnpike, now occupied by W. A. Thorp, was built by Captain George Rix in 1816.

Harvey Perkins, born at Woodbridge, Conn., November 6, 1797, came to Canaan February 5, 1821, married Caroline Fobes, daughter of John Fobes, Esq., January 6, 1822, and built his house on the Milford and Owego turnpike about one half mile west of Canaan Corners. He was a carpenter and builder by trade and assisted in building most of the frame houses in the early settlement of the township and also built the first Methodist Episcopal Church at Honesdale and the first hotel at Carbondale. Mr. and Mrs. Perkins lived in the house in which they began housekeeping in 1823 until her death, May 14, 1884, nearly sixty-two years. They had seven children—Thomas, born July 3, 1823, died July 30, 1865; Emily, born March 30, 1826, died May 24, 1850;

Nathan, born January 21, 1829, died December 30, 1874; Abner, born September 10, 1832, died January 21, 1851; Ann E., born November 26, 1836, died October 12, 1877; George, born January 7, 1842; and Lucretia, born April 9, 1847, are still living. Mr. Perkins is well preserved and bids fair to live for years to come.

John Fobes, Esq., came from Connecticut to Canaan in 1808, and settled a few rods west of the present location of the Belmont and Easton turnpike between Waymart and Canaan Corners. He was soon after elected justice of the peace, which office he held for nearly thirty years. He was also a civil engineer and school teacher. Many of his text books were written by himself, and are now in possession of Horace Perkins, his son-in-law.

Captain Mathias Keen moved from Milford, Pike County, to Canaan in 1811, and settled near and built the first dam at what is known as Keen's Pond. At the same time he began the erection of a grist-mill. By an accidental discharge of a gun he was wounded in the hip. The ball, after several surgical operations, was removed, but he suffered from the effects of the wound through life. After his recovery he erected a carding-machine and completed his grist-mill. He was a public-spirited man and did much to assist in developing the county. Among his sons were Elihu C. Keen, now dead, whose son, James B. Keen, owns and operates the only grist-mill in the township. J. L. Keen, now living on the old homestead, served the county creditably as county commissioner. James R. Keen, who lived in Honesdale until his death, was for several years commission clerk. Captain Keen was well known as a prominent member of the Masonic Order.

Noah Rogers, Esq., came from Branford, Conn., and settled on the Milford and Owego turnpike where it crosses the Moosic Mountain. He was a man of good common sense, upright and manly. He was employed by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company for many years, furnishing horses to draw cars across the summit level on top of the mountain. Ambrose Rogers, his son, is now superintendent and engineer of the "Bob Tail" mine in Colorado, and is well-known and respected in that state. Another son, William, was educated as a physician and built a water cure on the mountain near his father's house, which has since been abandoned and torn down.

Isaac Plant, also from Connecticut, settled about two miles west of Rogers on the same road, in 1830. He was a man of strong character, a zealous Christian, and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Waymart, from its organization until his death. He was a celebrated hunter, and in company with George McMullin, of Mount Pleasant, Asa Stanton, of Waymart, and John Sharp, of Canaan, had many narrow escapes and thrilling adventures. It is said he killed nine deer in one day. He was accidentally killed by the cars on Plane No. 9, Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Gravity Road, in 1866.

Among the early settlers in the eastern part of the township was James Moylan, who settled there in 1820. John Moylan came soon after Thomas Burk and Michael Lobey, in 1826; William Nagle, David Moylan and David Cashman, in 1828; John Foley, Daniel Foley, Thomas McGraw, Owen Roach, J. Cashman and John Leary, in 1830. These men bought lands adjoining, in what has since been known as the beech woods, cleared farms and built houses, and have lived steady, honest and industrious lives.

The only post-office in the township, Fermoy, established in 1885, is located on lands cleared and owned by James Moylan. C. E. Moylan, post-master, a son of John Moylan, also keeps the only store in the township. The first school building erected in this section of the township was a log building erected on lands now owned by John Foley.

Silas Hoadley settled one mile south of Canaan Corners on the Belmont and Easton turnpike. He had three sons,—Luther, who lived on the old homestead until his death; Oliver, who died of heart disease; and Eli, who was accidentally killed. James, a son of Luther, now lives on the old homestead and enjoys the distinction of being the tallest man in the county.

James Carr was among the earlier settlers.

His farm was a short distance east of Canaan Corners on the Milford and Owego turnpike. John A. Gustin, of Honesdale, married one of his daughters, and another married Randall Wilmot.

Edward Carr, well-known by the present generation, was a descendant of James. Charles Reuben, Cyprian, Francis and Wilmot, sons of Edward, are still living.

Thomas Starkweather came from Connecticut in 1811. In 1822 he built a large hotel at Canaan Corners, which was for many years one of the best known hotels in the northern part of the State. As it was a stage station, and horses were changed at that point on both lines, it was a place of great activity. He gave the ground for and laid out the cemetery at Canaan, Corners in 1834, and also the ground on which was erected the first church edifice in Canaan, in 1838. He was a public-spirited man, and personally connected with nearly all the public works in the early history of the county. He died in 1843. He had three sons and two daughters,—John B., died in 1833; George A., who is now living at Waymart; Daniel, who died in 1862; Isabell, and Sarah, who died in 1833. The farm on which Thomas located is now owned by Mrs. Alexander.

Vena Lee came from Connecticut in 1810 and settled on lands now occupied by John F. Lee. His wife, well-known in those days to the settlers for miles around and now to the present generation by reputation as Mother Lee, was a noble woman; she had considerable knowledge of medicine, and went at all times of day or night to assist her neighbors in sickness. They had two sons,—John F. and Horace, whose son, John F., and one daughter, Mrs. G. A. Starkweather, are living.

Canaan has one church (Roman Catholic) and four schools.

BOROUGH OF WAYMART.

Waymart Borough was organized from Canaan township, in 1851. It is bounded on the north by Clinton, and on the south, east and west by Canaan. The Honesdale and Clarksville turnpike passes through the borough east and west and the Belmont and Easton turnpike north and south. The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Gravity Railroad passes through the borough. It is the centre and railroad point for a large farming territory and does an extensive mercantile business.

The first assessment made after the organization of the borough, in 1851, by George Hubbard, assessor, shows eighty-three taxables as follows:

Abner Amey.	Silas Hoyle.
Stephen Blockley.	Wm. Iddings.
Wm. H. Bassett.	Michael Law.
Francis Barre.	Timothy Langan.
Philander Beattys.	Michael Lenahan.
Richard Brockway.	Reuben Lawrence.

Wm. Hurley.	Michael Vankdole.
George Hubbard.

CHURCHES.—There are two churches in the borough, Presbyterian and Methodist Episcopal. The early records of the Presbyterian Church have been lost and no exact data can be obtained. It is probable, however, that the society was organized in 1835, as the Presbyterian Church at Carbondale, Pa., has this record, viz: that Oscar Hudson and Margaret his wife, were dismissed by letter in that year to join the Presbyterian Church at Canaan. There is a record that at the time of organization Oscar Hudson and wife, Amzi Hall and wife, and daughter, Dan'l Everett, Caroline Carr, Mrs. Bartlett and daughter, Mrs. Wm. Grenell, connected themselves with the church. Amzi Hall and Oscar Hudson were elected deacons. The church had no settled pastor for some time. Rev. S. Holcom preached six months in 1846. Rev. Barr Baldwin, who preached during the winter of 1848 and also in the summer of 1851, was a general missionary of Montrose Presbytery. During the labors of Rev. S. Holcom, in 1846, the church edifice was erected. The trustees becoming indebted to the builder about two hundred dollars, a mechanics' lien was entered and the church advertised for sale, but through the efforts of Rev. Mr. Baldwin the debt was paid in 1848. On September 1, 1853, Rev. J. O. Boswell commenced preaching as regular settled pastor and remained as such until 1855. Israel Brundage settled as pastor January 30, 1856, preached until August, 1863. Rev. Jacob Best settled as pastor May 1, 1864, and remained until September, 1875, since which time the church has had no regular pastor.

When the Methodist Episcopal society was first organized it held its services in the church at Canaan Four Corners, one mile from the village. When Waymart promised to become the centre of population and business the society secured the use of the Presbyterian Church in the village and held all its services there until a misunderstanding arose about the joint occupancy of the house. The Methodist society appointed Thomas Thomas, and the Presbyterians Oscar Hudson as a committee to harmonize the differences. They met and agreed upon terms of settlement but the Presbyterian society rejected the terms, and on April 10, 1850, the Methodist society held a meeting and decided to build a church and appointed the following building committee. Thomas Thomas, James Carr, Emmons Eaton, Asa W. Dimock, Wm. Bayley. When the new church at Waymart was built the old church at Canaan was moved to what was then known as the Eaton settlement, but now known as No. 16 on the Gravity Railroad in Prompton Borough and is still used as a house of worship and is in a fair state of preservation. The membership of the church at Waymart is about one hundred. The church property is valued at four thousand eight hundred dollars. The following pastors have served the church since its erection.

Rev. S. W. Weiss	1856–58
Rev. C. L. Rice	1858–60
Rev. A. Brigham	1860–61
Rev. Henry Wheeler	1861–63
Rev. Joseph Madison	1864–65
Rev. C. L. Rice	1865–67
Rev. G. C. Hart	1867–70
Rev. J. L. Race	1870–72
Rev. R. J. Kellog	1872–75
Rev. S. F. Wright	1875–76
Rev. F. Gendall	1876–79
Rev. J. F. Warner	1879–80
Rev. Joseph Madison	1880–82
Rev. L. Cole	1882–84
Rev. S. Homan (present pastor)	1884–86

The church has been repaired, and is now in excellent condition.

Colonel Asa Stanton was the first settler in what is now the borough of Waymart. He came from New London, Conn., in 1790 and built a log cabin a few rods east of the present residence of his grandson, F. H. Stanton. At this time his nearest neighbor was a family by the name of Collins, in Cherry Ridge, nine miles distant. He at once began clearing land and erecting out-buildings for a permanent home. Near his house was a land-mark remembered by people now living—a large hemlock tree completely stripped of bark. This was done by an eccentric character, Solomon Tice by name. (Tice was killed at Bethany by Samuel Allen—the first murder committed in the county). Stanton's house became at once a stopping place for travelers and continued such long after his death. He was for some time compelled to go to Wilkesbarre to mill on horseback and carrying his grain in a bag. When Captain Geo. Rix settled on the east slope of the Moosic Mountain, near Colonel Stanton's, they at once became friends and had many thrilling adventures while hunting together. At one time they had set a bear-trap on the mountain near where the Gravity Railroad now crosses, and upon going to the place they found the trap gone and evidence of a large bear having been caught in it. On following the track they came up with the bear on the ground now owned by the city of Carbondale. Stanton's dog at once attacked the bear and at the same time Captain Rix shot it, wounding it but slightly. Upon Stanton's going to the rescue of his dog with a hatchet the bear loosed his hold upon the dog already dead and caught Stanton's leg in its mouth, lacerating it terribly. Captain Rix succeeded in getting hold of Stanton's gun with which he shot the bear through the heart; he then skinned it, taking part of the skin to bind Colonel Stanton's wound, who, with the assistance of Captain Rix succeeded in reaching home very weak from the loss of blood. He was confined to his house several months by this accident.

Colonel Stanton built the first saw-mill in this section of the county, at what is still known as Stanton's Pond, 1805. He was drowned in the Delaware River, near Cohecton, N. Y., November 12, 1817. Himself and wife had been on a visit to Westfield and were returning on horseback and on reaching the river at Cohecton near nightfall the ferry-boat ready to cross, the regular stage coach with four horses attached on the forward end of the boat, they rode on the boat occupying the extreme rear end. When nearly across the river there came a terrible wind storm, and when the boat reached the bank the stage-horses becoming frightened plunged off forcing the boat back and that part on which their horses stood under the water. Mr. and Mrs. Stanton were carried off the boat by the current and wind and Mr. Stanton was drowned. Mrs. Stanton was caught by the hair and rescued by a man named Drake, who was standing on the river bank. Colonel Stanton was born March 2, 1760, and married Desire Kimble March 13, 1788. Mrs. Stanton died September 10, 1848. They had nine children—Charles, born February 6, 1789, died October 23, 1848; Sally, born January 22, 1797, died November 12, 1849; Asa, born July 27, 1793, died September 5, 1882; William, born September 20, 1798, is still living; Nancy, born January 6, 1801, died May 24, 1802; Levi K., born April 6, 1803, is still living; Harriet, born September 11, 1805, died October 26, 1885; Louisa, born August 27, 1807, died; Clinton, born February 15, 1810, died November 28, 1849.

Asa Stanton, son of Colonel Asa Stanton, born where he died July 24, 1793, was a great hunter and one of the best known men in the county. A favorite hunting ground of his was the "Twelve-mile Woods," on the head waters of the Wallenpaupack, Lehigh River and Tobyhanna Creek. He once killed six deer in one day in these woods. He took an active part in the building of the Belmont and Eastern turnpike road in 1821, constructing one mile of this road through his farm and assisting materially in the construction of other portions of the road.

Schools.—The first school-house in the borough was erected by Leonard Starkweather, in 1808, near the present residence of R. P. Patterson. Captain Thomas Starkweather was the first teacher. He was followed by Charles Kennedy, and he by Buckley Beardslee, Esq. A private school was held in the building for some time, but no record of the teachers can be obtained. Later we find an advertisement of the Phelps Institute, Alonzo Phelps, A.M., principal; Mrs. S. H. Phelps, assistant. The school with six scholars (limited to ten) was held in the private residence of Thomas Clark. Professor J. E. Howker established a county normal school in Waymart, and it was continued during the time he held the superintendency of the public schools of the county. The average attendance is now one hundred and ninety, sixty of whom are from outside the borough. For the higher grade a regular normal course has been adopted, consisting of twenty-two studies, and many of the most successful teachers in the county are graduates from this school.

Fires.—The borough has had several disastrous fires. The hotel and store of R. P. Patterson was burned at midnight July 29, 1858; loss, ten thousand dollars. The tannery of Alden & Patterson, burned in 1860, was rebuilt and again destroyed by fire, May 18, 1867, together with barn and other outbuildings. Dimock's Hall and two stores were burned April 2, 1878, with heavy loss. November 19, 1852, a small house occupied by Patrick Dougherty and his mother was burned during the night, and both perished in the flames. It was supposed the building caught fire from the stove and that both were suffocated by the smoke before being able to reach the door. Their charred remains were found in the ruins.

From the opening of the Gravity Railroad up to 1863 the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company piled here the coal that was run from their mines after the close of canal navigation in the fall, as high as one hundred thousand tons being thus stored here. Upon the opening of navigation in the spring it was reloaded and run to the canal at Honesdale. This gave employment to a large number of men. Since 1863 this dumping-ground has not been used, the coal being now stored at Honesdale.

Soldiers.—Bonds of the borough to the amount of four thousand dollars were issued by vote of the council, March 5, 1864, to pay a bounty to volunteers to fill the quota of the borough under the call of the President for five hundred thousand men. Thirteen men were furnished under this call, and two men under the call for three hundred thousand. The borough has no bonded debt and but very little floating debt. The names of these soldiers are as follows:

Co. M, 17th Pa. Cavalry.—Lucien Stanton, F. P. Cooper, Hubble Rounds, Henry Sampson.

Co. H, 77th Pa.—Levi Bennett, Frank Hollenbeck, John Pierce, Joseph Bennett, Thomas Clark.

Surgeon 178th Pa.—W. F. Peck.

Co. C, 6th Pa. Reserves.—M. W. Elmendorf, Franklin Stanton, George B. Porter, John Necle.

Co. D, 179th Pa.—Ira Utt.

Co. G, 141st Pa.—Lafayette Smith.

Co. D, 107th Pa.—Orrin Gunsauls.

Co. M, 4th Pa. Cavalry.—Charles O. Ellis.

Co. A, 3d Pa. Artillery.—Daniel Leonard, Charles Niles, James A. Minor, Warren Rockwell, Silas Buckland, Dwight Buckland.

Co. F, 50th N. Y.—Ludwig Rockwell.

Co. K, 2d N. Y. Cavalry.—Alexander F. Elmendorf.

Co. A, 137th Pa.—Silas E. Elmendorf.

Co. F, 88th Pa.—Hiram Inch.

Co. C, 2d Pa. Artillery.—Jabez Hyde.

Co. C, 104th Pa.—Watson Stanton.

Co. C, 67th Pa.—James Spry.

Unknown.—George Chase.

Lodges.—Waymart Lodge No. 542, F. & A. M., constituted in 1875, has a membership of forty, and is in a flourishing condition. The following have acted as Masters of this lodge: G. A. Caspar, H. B. Stephens, W. A. Thorp, Charles McMullen, Wallace Case, John S. Berry, William L. Carr, Orson Case, A. L. Patterson.

There is also a lodge of Knights of Honor, with a membership of thirty-four.

THE BOROUGH OF PROMPTON.

The Borough of Prompton was erected out of portions of Texas, Canaan and Dyberry, in 1845, but, in consequence of some irregularity or dissatisfaction, subsequently, at the September sessions, 1850, it was enlarged and reorganized. It is situated about four miles west of Honesdale, at the junction of Van Auken creek with the west branch of the Lackawaxen, and has been a busy and thriving village. Early in the present century, what is now Prompton was selected as the site of a scythe and axe factory, and the manufacture of these and other agricultural implements brought the settlement under the notice of persons for many miles around. The old forge was followed by other industries, which grew up to utilize the water-power of both its streams, and the building of the Gravity road, and location of a plane there brought fresh acquisition to its population. But from the opening of the road there was a decline in prosperity, which seems to have borne a close inverse proportion to the development of Honesdale and the extension of steam communication. The abolition of staging, the removal of the county-seat from Bethany, and the close competition of more advantageously situated places have made Prompton an out-of-the-way village, and, with one exception, closed its small manufactories and deserted its taverns. Like Bethany, it is now only the quiet centre and post-office for a limited agricultural area, and is handicapped by its proximity to larger and more active places.

Prompton was just beginning to feel the depression from these causes when it was erected into a separate borough organization, and though the number of taxables was then smaller than at present, the volume of business was proportionately much larger. By an assessment made by Edwin Foot, in 1846, the oldest one extant, it seems that the residents were then as follows:

Phineas Arnold.	W. M. Dimmock.
George Alvord.	David Edgett.
Peter Brink.	H. N. Edgett,
Levi Bronson.	Henry Edgett.
G. W. Boutell.	Edwin Foot.
Seth Benedict.	Samuel Grant.
A. H. Bronson.	Michael Grattan.
I. D. Conyne.	E. E. Guild.
Cornelius Conyne.	G. W. Hall.
Sylvius Cogswell.	Elam M. Lamb.
Edwin Haydn.	J. W. Mannery.
Anson Hall.	W. M. Gennis.
H. L. Hadsall.	Thomas Mitchell.
Benjamin Jenkins, Jr.	Asa H. Moon.
Edward Jenkins.	Sylvanus Osborn.
John Jenkins.	S. H. Plum.
Benjamin Jenkins, Sr.	Jacob Plum.
Asa Jenkins.	R. W. Powell.
William Jenkins.	James Quinlan.
James Jenkins.	James Robinson.
Jonathan Sanderson.	Alonzo Tanner.
John I. Spencer.	Emulas Tiffany.
C. K. Stearns.	Edwin Tiffany.
Alvin Stearns.	F. D. Thayer.
George Schoonover.	Lucius Walter.
Robert Spencer.	A. B. Woodward.
Josiah Skinner.	C. B. Woodan.
Henry Sweet.	W. F. Wood.
Jonas Stanton.	Luther West.
John Stearns.	E. G. Wood.
Charles D. Cox.	Alva A. Saunders.

George Dimmock.

The record of the early business transacted by the borough council is meagre. The first meeting was held at the school-house, July 10, 1844, when the following officers were appointed: Town Clerk, David Edgett; Collector, Cornelius Conyne; Treasurer, Edward Jenkins; Street Commissioners, Seth C. Benedict and William Jenkins. This seems to have been all the business transacted at that meeting, and little more was put on record at the next, which was held on the 8th of November, when it was "Resolved—That we render assistance to Mr. Daniel P. Jacobus on account of the sick girl bound to him by the town." The following still more singular enactment appears in the record of a meeting held in November, 1846: "Resolved—That we pay A. A. Sanders Two 50–100 dollars for balance due him for Bier, out Borough monies." This meeting also passed a resolution requiring a license of from one to five dollars for the right to perform "all shows, circuses and performances of a like discription," the amount being left discretionary with the burgess. The following list of borough officers is taken from the minutes:

1845.—Burgess, Edward Jenkins; Council, Lucius Walter, John Jenkins, William Jenkins, Elam M. Lamb and Oscar Stearns.

1846.—Burgess, A. H. Moon; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, Seth C. Benedict; Council, Jonas Stanton, Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., G. W. Hall, George Jenkins and Lucius Walter.

1848.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, David Edgett; Council, Lathrop B. Johnston, Benjamin Jenkins, Jr., Ara Bartlett, George Dimmock and George W. Boutell.

1849.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, David Edgett; Council, Seth C. Benedict, Edwin Hayden, Ara Bartlett, George Dimmock and Garner Clough.

1850.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, Edward Jenkins; Council, Abram Stewart, G. W. Hall, Levi Bronson and John Jenkins.

1851.—Burgess, G. M. Keen; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, John Jenkins; Council, Edward Jenkins, L. B. Johnson, Phineas Arnold, V. M. Keen and David Edgett.

1852.—Burgess, G. M. Keen; Clerk, David Edgett; Treasurer, John Jenkins; Council, Edward Jenkins, L. B. Johnson, Phineas Arnold, V. M. Keen and David Edgett.

1853.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, Edwin Foot; Treasurer, John Jenkins; Council, George W. Hall, William Jenkins, David Edgett, Phineas Arnold and Lathrop B. Johnson.

1854.—Burgess, R. Sweet; Clerk, Henry Edgett; Treasurer, John Jenkins; Council, Henry Edgett; John Jenkins, Alonzo Tanner and Almond Ketchum.

1855.—Burgess, G. W. Keen; Clerk, George Dimmock; Treasurer, John Jenkins; Council, Levi Bronson, Alonzo Tanner, V. M. Keen, A. Conyne and George Dimmock.

1856.—Burgess, G. M. Keen; Clerk, H. A. Woodhouse; Treasurer, John Jenkins;[1] Council, John

Jenkins, Lucius Walter, I. E. Sands, H. A. Woodhouse and George Davis.

1857.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, A. B. Edgett; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, A. B. Edgett, G. W. Hall, W. W. Snow, Alexander Conyne and V. M. Keen.

1858.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, H. A. Woodhouse; Treasurer, Lucius Walter; Council, William Jenkins, L. B. Johnson, W. F. Hurlburt, G. W. Hall and H. A. Woodhouse.

1859.—Burgess, George M. Keen; Clerk, H. A. Woodhouse; Treasurer, Lucius Walter; Council, Phineas Arnold, Lucius Walter, G. W. Hall, Wilmot Carr and H. A. Woodhouse.

1860.—Burgess, Alonzo Tanner; Clerk, H. A. Woodhouse; Treasurer, Lucius Walter; Council, Phineas Arnold, Isaac Osborn, Lucius Walter, R. W. Carr and H. A. Woodhouse.

1861.—Burgess, William Hoyle; Clerk, Erastus Skeels; Treasurer, Abraham Eade; Council, Abraham Eade, William Webley, William Schrinkhizen, Erastus Skeels and James Shafer.

1862.—Burgess, R. W. Carr; Clerk, Phineas Arnold; Treasurer, Phineas Arnold; Council, Phineas Arnold, William Webley, I. Hardwick and L. Walter.

1863.—Burgess, William C. Hoyle; Clerk, I. McMinn; Treasurer, Phineas Arnold; Council, Phineas Arnold, William Webley, J. Karswick, J. McMinn and G. W. Hall.

1864.—Burgess, L. B. Johnson; Clerk, L. E. Richardson; Treasurer, Alonzo Baty; Council, L. E. Richardson, L. B. Johnson, William Hoyle and William Bryant.

1865.—Burgess, Phineas Arnold; Clerk, E. Skeels; Treasurer, William Hoyle; Council, L. E. Richardson, William Hoyle, John Woodward, Alonzo Tanner, Lucius Walter, E. Skeels and P. W. Porter.

1866.—Burgess, Phineas Arnold; Clerk, A. Conyne; Treasurer, V. M. Keen; Council, P. W. Porter, George Alvord, V. M. Keen and Alexander Conyne.

1867.—Burgess, R. W. Carr; Clerk, P. C. Johnson; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, P. W. Porter, W. R. Longstreet, James Shafer and P. C. Johnson.

1868.—Burgess, Wilmot Carr; Clerk, P. V. Johnson; Treasurer, V. M. Keen; Council, Rockwell Bunnell, V. M. Keen, Deliverance Woodward and P. V. Johnson.

1869.—Burgess, Thomas Nichols; Clerk, R. J. Knapp; Treasurer, A. Conyne; Council, A. Conyne, P. W. Porter, B. Bunnell and R. J. Knapp.

1870.—Burgess, Thomas Nichols; Clerk, P. W. Porter; Treasurer, Alexander Conyne; Council, W. W. Snow, John Schoonover, Alexander Conyne, P. C. Johnson and P. W. Porter.

1871.—Burgess, Thomas Nichols; Clerk, R. J. Knapp; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, R. W. Carr, John Woodward, William Hoyle and R. J. Knapp.

1872.—Burgess, Thomas Nichols; Clerk, R. J. Knapp; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, R. W. Carr, William Hoyle, Delevan Woodward, Robert Barclay and R. J. Knapp.

1873.—Burgess, Aaron B. Lacy; Clerk, R. J. Knapp; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, R. W. Carr, Robert Barclay, Thomas Nichols, George Alvord and R. J. Knapp.

1874.—Burgess, Thomas Nichols; Clerk, R. J. Knapp; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, R. W. Carr, C. N. Alvord, John Barton, Delavan Woodward and R. J. Knapp.

1875.—Burgess, P. W. Porter; Clerk, Charles H. Sears; Treasurer, L. E. Richardson; Council, R. W. Carr, W. W. Snow, L. E. Richardson, John Woodward and James Burnes.

1876.—Burgess, George W. Alvord; Clerk, Charles A. Sears; Treasurer, R. W. Carr; Council, P. W. Porter, R. W. Carr, Justus Sears, R. A. Headly and Arlon Hendrick.

1877.—Burgess, John S. Bartron; Clerk, William Karslake; Treasurer, L. E. Richardson; Council, L. E. Richardson, N. C. Alvord, R. B. Spencer, Robert Thompson and R. H. Pearce.

1878.—Burgess, R. W. Carr; Clerk, C. H. Sears; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, William Hoyle, Robert Bellamy, W. W. Snow, D. G. Allen and John Short.

1879.—Burgess, R. W. Carr; Clerk, C. H. Sears; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, William Hoyle, D. G. Allen, W. W. Snow, Robert Bellamy and John Short.

1880.—Burgess, W. G. Jenkins; Clerk, W. R. Longstreet; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, L. E. Richardson, F. P. Kimble, N. C. Alvord and W. W. Snow.

1881.—Burgess, W. G. Jenkins; Clerk, W. R. Longstreet; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, F. P. Jenkins, W. W. Snow, Thomas Moore, N. C. Alvord and L. E. Richardson.

1882.—Burgess, Thomas Moore; Clerk, W. G. Jenkins; Treasurer, W. W. Snow; Council, L. E. Richardson, W. W. Snow, N. C. Alvord, W. G. Jenkins and James Burnes.

1883.—Burgess, George Alvord; Clerk, W. G. Jenkins; Treasurer, Thomas Moore; Council, J. D. Burnes, Thomas Moore, John Clift, B. F. Miller, and W. G. Jenkins.

1884.—Burgess, Thomas Moore; Clerk, W. G. Jenkins; Treasurer, L. E. Richardson; Council, J. W. Burnes, L. E. Richardson, R. B. Spencer and W. G. Jenkins.

1885.—Burgess, W. W. Snow; Clerk, W. G. Jenkins; Treasurer, Thomas Moore; Council, R. W. Carr, Thomas Moore, N. C. Alvord and W. G. Jenkins.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.—When what is now the pretty village of Prompton was an unbroken forest, and deer came unmolested down the runways beside Van Auken Creek, Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., took up a large tract of land in the warrantee name of James Chapman, and cut his way from Bethany to his new home. He was from Winstead, Conn., where he had been engaged in the manufacture of scythes and other agricultural implements, and he brought with him some of the necessary machinery to fit up a new forge on the banks of the West Branch. He was accompanied by his son, Edward, and together they felled the trees and made a little clearing near where the Jenkins homestead now stands. In 1818 the first dwelling, a small log house went up on the site now occupied by the residence of W. W. Snow. Subsequently he built a large and substantial log structure to be used as both dwelling and hotel. This is still standing and in a good state of preservation, exhibiting the honest joinery and mason work of fifty years ago. During the past few months, one of the old chimneys has been taken down to make room for more modern flues, and it was found to contain over seven thousand brick, all of which were made at Bethany. The large frame house now occupied by W. G. Jenkins, was built at a much later period, and was the dwelling in which Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., died, in 1853. He had married Elizabeth Boyd, while living in Connecticut, and had several children before coming to Wayne County. One who was born afterward, was the first white child to see the light in what is now the borough of Prompton. The descendants of Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., were as follows : Elizabeth (the wife of James Boutell), Susan (who married a Noble), Benjamin, Samuel, Louisa (the wife of Ara Bartlett, and afterwards that of —— Jacobs), Maria (who married Ralph Case), Edward, John, Henrietta (the wife of James Hubbell), and Marietta (who married Benjamin Jenkins, 3d).

Asa Jenkins, a brother of Benjamin, emigrated from Connecticut about 1825, and left many descendants in this vicinity.

Hon. Phineas Arnold was the son of Jonathan Arnold, who came from Connecticut in 1810, and located in Dyberry. Phineas married Jane, a daughter of Eliphalet Wood, and they had twelve children. David Arnold, once treasurer of the county, was a brother of Hon. Phineas Arnold. The writer was unable to obtain from any of their descendants fuller facts concerning the family.

Edwin Foot, who made the assessment quoted above, came from Susquehanna County in 1822, or 1823, and was for many years a prominent and valued citizen. He married a Miss Lyon, also of Susquehanna County, and had but one child, a daughter, who is now dead.

Levi Bronson, another early settler, was also from Connecticut, and located in 1825, building a dwelling just beyond where the Presbyterian Church now stands. His stick-factory was at one time a prominent industry of the village. He had two children, a son and a daughter, the latter becoming the wife of G. W. Hall. Mr. Bronson left Prompton twenty years ago. A. H. Bronson, a brother of Levi, who came a few years later, has also left the place.

Henry and David Edgett, who were for many years public officers of the borough, came from Connecticut about 1830. Henry first settled in Berlin township, and, after a few years, joined his brother at Prompton, where they had a general store. Henry Bronson's children were Alva, George and Francis, who married Emmons Eaton and moved west. David left but two descendants—Mary, who married and moved away, and Jewett, who is now living at Scranton.

G. W. Hall came from Elmira in 1838, and located at No. 2, on the Gravity Road, where, for two years, he had a small bedstead-factory. In August, 1840, he moved to Prompton, and commenced the business which he still carries on. Mr. Hall married Ann Tuthill, by whom he had one son, Charles, a resident of Ithaca, and afterwards led to the altar Abigail Reeve, of Orange County, who is the mother of Arthur, the son associated in business with him.

Benjamin Dimmick came from the Eastern States and located in Bethany, about 1840, and after a few years became a resident of Prompton, where he was interested in the mercantile business. His sons were Asa and George, and he also left several daughters, all of whom have married and removed. None of his descendants now live in the village. Some have moved west and some to Lackawanna County.

George Alvord, a son of Enos Alvord, of Dyberry, located in Prompton in the latter part of 1839, and, after a residence of six or seven years, went elsewhere. After an absence of nearly twenty years he returned, and is still a useful citizen of the borough. He married Lucy Burns and is the father of two children, —N. C. Alvord and Augusta.

Eber Walter settled on the Bethany road, about a mile from Prompton, in 1817, and his family have been closely identified with the interests of the village. His wife was a Miss Tuthill, and they had six children,—Lucius, of Prompton; Sarepta, who married a man named Pinley; Ruth, the wife of Richard Mathews; Luther, who lives at the homestead; and Tuthill, of Pittston.

James Haydn, a son of Moses Haydn, of Dyberry, is now located in Prompton. He is familiar with the history of the place from a very early date, and was frequently there in his boyhood. Soon after the forge was erected, accompanied by one of the hired men on his father's farm, he went through the woods to Prompton to get some new tools. It was in the dead of winter, and the snow lay several feet deep in the woods, so they found a path on the frozen bed of the West Branch. It was late in the afternoon when their business was finished, and the sun had gone behind the hills before they had come to the "still water" of the creek, where the stream widened and the ice was smooth and free from snow. Little Haydn had noticed, as he now remembers, that his companion was unusually talkative, and that for several minutes he had not been silent for a second. As they reached the smooth ice the man proposed that they run a race, and off they started like arrows across the frozen path. A sound that had been faint until then now grew louder, and even the boy distinguished the sharp bark of the pack of wolves that had scented the fresh meat that had been a part of their purchases. Fear lent wings to their flight, but every minute the wolves gained on them, and soon terrified glances over their shoulders revealed a dark line of tossing heads only a few hundred yards in the rear. They had no weapons except the new scythe and some smaller garden tools, and these offered them but little advantage in the hand to hand combat that was but a matter of a few minutes. The ice was slippery and the boy's small legs began to give out; his companion found him momentarily harder to drag along. Death threatened them both, when an idea struck him. Whipping out his knife, he cut open the sack in which he had put the fresh meat, and, without stopping, dropped it on the ice. A minute afterward the hungry wolves were upon it, snarling and fighting for the food, and before they were once more in pursuit of young Haydn and his companion, the latter had reached a place of safety. No sooner had the adventure been hurriedly told at the farm-house, than several men snatched up their guns and went in search of the sheep-stealing marauders. They encountered the pack on the banks of the West Branch, and had five wolf-pelts to commemorate the run for life.

Jacob Plum came from New York State at the beginning of the present century, and settled in Mount Pleasant, where he set up the first carding-machine, in 1813. Although he did no spinning his plant prepared the wool for that process and saved the women much hard work. Subsequently Mr. Plum moved to Prompton to spend his last days with his son, Simon H., who was a prominent borough officer for many years. Jacob Plum married Rhoda Plum, a cousin, and had nine children, —Maria, the wife of Ira Stearns, who lived in Susquehanna County, and is now ninety years old; Harriet, the wife of William Joseph; Clarissa, who married George Joseph; Charles, Simon, Elvira, the wife of William Morey; Louisa, the wife of James Madison; Lavinia, the wife of Rockwell Bunnell, and Hiram.

Captain —— Arnold, though a settler in Dyberry township at a point now outside the borough limits of Prompton, was so closely associated with the growth and prosperity of the village that it will not be out of place to mention him here.

Industrial and Commercial Life.—Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., cut his way through the woods from Bethany to Prompton, in 1813. It was, as has already been stated, for the purpose of starting an axe and scythe-factory. He had left a moderately successful business at Winstead, Litchfield County, Conn., and the machinery for his new plant was brought with him. His land purchase included about four hundred acres, and as soon as his dwelling was completed he set about the erection of the forge. It was located near where Hall's furniture-factory now stands, and was a small log building, containing a couple heating-furnaces, a small hand trip-hammer, and some hand-rolls. Benjamin Jenkins and his son, Edward, were the chief operators, though they employed other men, and some boys occasionally. The factory ran for three or four years, but the absence of shipping facilities limited the out-put to neighborhood consumption, and there was so little demand in the sparsely populated vicinity that it was found unprofitable to run the business. After the forge was abandoned, Mr. Jenkins erected a saw-mill about a quarter of a mile above his first location. There was plenty of timber in the hills about, and it proved a profitable investment, increasing in business each year, so that about 1846 a new mill was built just above the first one.

Levi Bronson started a shovel-handle factory near the saw-mill, about 1834, and the business soon increased so that ten or twelve men were employed—a large quota for those days. This establishment ran for over twenty years, but finally succumbed to the depressing influences above referred to. In 1833–34 Simon and Hiram Plum started a factory for the manufacture of umbrella handles, an industry which has since flourished in other parts of the county. After running it for several years they sold to Graves & Jenkins, and they in turn were succeeded by Graves, Lamb & Jenkins, in 1846. The latter firm gave place to Hiram Plum and Solomon West, who discontinued the business in 1862. During the palmy days of Prompton's industrial history, no less than seven saw-mills were in operation, the anvils rang busily at three blacksmith-shops, and two tailors, harness-maker and several other skilled artisans plied their trades. The village was on a great highway, and large droves of sheep and cattle had to be cared for during the night, and teamsters with teams laden with grain and provisions added to the business brought by the regular stages.

In 1840 G. W. Hall moved from Plane No. 2, of the Delaware and Hudson Gravity road, and erected a small shop for the manufacture of bedsteads, near the site of the present factory. The business increased, and in 1852 the present building was erected, and fitted with improved machinery for the manufacture of furniture. It is located on Van Auken Creek, and is also supplied with steam, so as to be unaffected by the droughts that are quite frequent, now that the timber has been cut down on the head waters of the stream.

The first hotel kept in the place was that of Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., which answered all the requirements of a public-house until the building of the old hotel, which stood on the river, near where Carr's store now is. This was erected about 1839, and Hon. Phineas Arnold was the first landlord, and a very popular one for many years. He was succeeded by Messrs. Coleman, Cox and others, and the house was kept open until its destruction by fire a few years ago.

A post-office was first established in Prompton in 1834, Edward Jenkins being the first postmaster. He served for about ten years, and was succeeded by Edwin Foot. The other postmasters held office in the following order: John Jenkins, Sanford Robinson, Henry Edgett, Harrison Dimock, Erastus Skeels, L. E. Richardson, William Karslake, L. E. Richardson, F. B. Kimble, L. E. Richardson and N. C. Alvord.

Church History.—The earliest settlers of Prompton were Universalists, and the first religious organization in the village was of that denomination. The congregation has been disbanded many years, and the records are scattered and lost, so that little of its history now remains. The congregation was organized about 1838 or 1839, and during the latter year secured a lot from Benjamin Jenkins, Sr., on which to erect a meeting-house. He donated the site, but neglected to give a deed for it, and the property is now part of the Jenkins' estate, although still used as a church property. The church edifice was completed in the latter part of 1839, or early in 1840, and Rev. S. P. Landers was the first pastor. Some of the constituent members of the congregation were the families of Benjamin and Edward Jenkins, Jacob S. Keen and wife, Phineas Arnold and wife, George Alvord and wife, James Robinson and wife, David Arnold and wife, and Levi Ketchum, of Bethany. The latter took a very active part in the building of the church. The congregation existed for about twenty years, though during the latter part of the time its meetings were irregular and spasmodic. The subsequent pastors were Revs. C. S. Brown, E. E. Guild, William De Long and A. D. Warren. In 1859 the church had become completely disorganized and the building was converted into an academy by making the auditorium into two stories. Here, on November 1st, a Normal School was opened. Subsequently the building was secured by the Methodist Congregation as a place of worship, and is so occupied at present.

A Presbyterial Committee, consisting of Revs. J. B. Graves and Jeremiah Miller and Elders E. Kingsbury and George Goodrich, organized the Presbyterian Church of Prompton on Sunday, September 4, 1842, at which time the following persons presented letters which were approved by the committee: Asa Jenkins, Ann Jenkins, Hubbard L. Hadsall, Julianna Hadsall, Hiram Dibble, Naoma Dibble, Isaiah D. Conyne, Eva Conyne, Levi Bronson, Elizabeth C. Keen, Sarah Anne Keen and Phœbe E. Hall, all of the Presbyterian Church at Honesdale, and F. Davis Thayer from the church at Harford. Levi Bronson and F. Davis Thayer, having been elected ruling elders, were ordained. The infant church had no pastor nor any place of worship. Its meetings were held in the schoolhouse, and the pulpit was supplied by such ministers as Providence brought to the congregation. Soon, however, an arrangement was made with Rev. Jeremiah Miller, then pastor at Honesdale, to preach every other week, and the church commenced to grow in interest and numbers. Mr. Miller was succeeded by Rev. Henry J. Rowland, and it was not until 1853 that the congregation had a pastor of its own. In that year Rev. J. O. Boswell was stated supply. He remained for about three years, and then, at a joint meeting of the congregations of Waymart and Prompton, Rev. Israel Brundage, a licentiate from the Third Presbytery of New York, was ordained and installed as pastor. The question of a church edifice had been agitated in the congregation for some time, and the building was commenced in the summer of 1859. The dedicatory services took place on September 16 of that year, being conducted by Revs. T. S. Ward, of Carbondale, and E. O. Ward, of Bethany. In 1864 Rev. J. Best was engaged as stated supply, and remained until 1875. Rev. George Guild, E. E. Northup and others then supplied the pulpit until Rev. W. H. Swift, the present pastor, was secured. The following have been ruling elders since the church was organized: Levi Bronson, J. Davis Thayer, Jonas Stanton, Seth C. Benedict, G. W. Hall, Nathaniel Spear, Abraham Eade and Robert J. Knapp.

HENRY C. AMES.

Henry C. Ames was born in Canaan township, Wayne County, Pa., October 28, 1828. His early life was not like the boyhood days of the present generation. He was early taught that in the struggle of life in a new country every one must do his or her share. His education was limited to a few months' attendance at the common schools of his day, and education that has been added to by a long and active business life. When twenty years old he bought the farm of his father in which he was born and which he now owns. He has added to the improvements by erecting new buildings and making new clearings. In 1866 he bought of Edward Carr one hundred and fifty acres of land, part of which was cleared. This farm he has also improved and built upon and still owns. In 1871 he again added to his real estate by purchasing forty-one acres of new land, which he has cleared and improved. In all this Mr. Ames has labored for his own and the general good, and has done his share towards making Wayne County what it now is. He carried on mercantile business in Waymart for four years, when his store burned and he returned to his farm. In 1879 he built the store at Waymart, conducted in 1886 by his son, Ellsworth F. Ames. Young

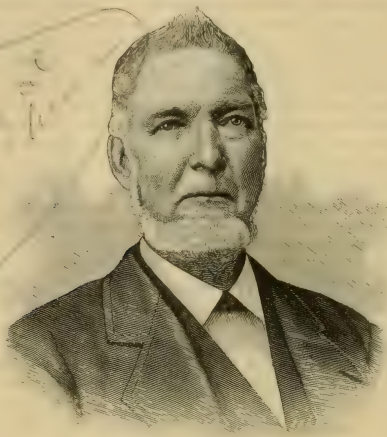
H. C. Ames



Ames took full charge of the business when but eighteen years old, and has managed it successfully. For forty years Mr. Ames has dealt in cattle, and has found a market for them in Kentucky, New York and other States. In politics he is a strong Republican, and by his fellow-townsmen has been elected justice of the peace and to other township offices. He has been a member of the Methodist Church twenty-five years, and one of its trustees and class leaders. On the 5th day of September, 1848, he married Miss Julia Ann, daughter of Frederick and Nancy (Quick) Enslin, who was born in South Canaan, Pa., June 31, 1826. She died October 21, 1881. Their children were Orrin E., born May 4, 1849, died September 28, 1854; Hannah, born November 25, 1850, married Orrin Shaeffer; Ann Eliza, born January 17, 1853, married William Pentecost. Children: Rena May, Archie H., Edna P. and Earl T. Gertrude, born October 27, 1855, married Warren S. Bryant; Sarah H., born October 21, 1857, died June 25, 1858; Earl T., born May 16, 1859, and Ellsworth F., born June 29, 1863. Earl T. was born and reared on the home farm in Canaan township, and was taught that labor was both necessary and honorable, and he did the work set for him to do on the farm during vacation with skill and willingness. When sixteen he was sent to the Franklin Institute, at Franklin, N. Y., where he remained two terms. Prior to that he had attended the high school in Prompton. In 1877 he went to Hawley, where he taught school three terms, and, as a teacher, was very successful, and, after leaving school on account of ill health, received many letters to return to Hawley and resume his school. In 1880 he took charge of his father's store in Waymart, and a year thereafter took the store off his father's hands and did business under the firm name of E. T. Ames. For two years he remained in the store, doing a nice business and adding daily to his popularity as a model and successful young business man. Then consumption, which had driven him from his school, fastened its relentless grasp upon him, and he was obliged to give up his business life. He went first to Minneapolis, Minn, but could not stand the cold winter, and he then went to Kansas, but came home the next spring without any improvement in health. The next winter he went to Denver, but grew worse, and his father went after him and brought him home. He bore his illness with heroism and passed away February 7, 1885. Of him, it is said, that he was one of Wayne County's most promising young business men, that his walk in life was a worthy example to his young associates, and his untimely death an almost irreparable loss. Joseph Ames, grandfather of Henry C., was born in Stonington, Conn., where he grew to manhood and married Hannah Tyler, in 1777, who bore him children as follows: William, Erastus, Hannah, Elijah and Joseph, Jr. He was a farmer, as were his ancestors, and owned a farm near Stonington, where he died. He was a soldier during the Revolutionary War, and died a pensioner. In politics he was a Whig, and held minor township offices. He came to Wayne County after the death of his wife, and remained for a time with his son Joseph, but returned to Stonington to end his days. Of his children Joseph, Jr., was born in Stonington, October 28, 1790. When twenty years old he came to Wayne County, Pa., on horseback, the horse being the property he then owned. During the following three years he taught school in the Wallenpaupack, where he became acquainted with and married Miss Gertrude Schenck, who was born in Huntingdon County, N. J. She was a daughter of Colonel John H. Schenck, a patriot of the Revolution. He was born in Monmouth County, N. J., and was a man of large wealth and influence, and raised and equipped, at his own expense, a regiment which he commanded in person. After the war he filled political offices of trust and importance. Soon after his marriage, Joseph, Jr., bought at what is now Canaan Corners, one hundred and twenty-five acres of wild land, part of which he cleared and improved, and made his home for many years. He subsequently sold the farm to Mr. Starkweather, and then bought another piece of wild land, of one hundred and fifty acres, which is now owned by his son, Henry C. At his time of life, to clear and improve another new farm would seem like a great undertaking, but nothing daunted, he commenced work and lived to see one hundred acres under improvement, and a good house and out-buildings erected. He made it his final home and died therein.

He was a member of the Masonic order and belonged to the Waymart Lodge. Like his father, he was a Whig in politics and held township offices. To Mr. and Mrs. Ames were born children as follows: Erasmus D., who married Jane Clawson; children, Agnes, Tyler, Katie, Mary and Harriet. Nelson M., who married Nancy Hoadley; children were Oliver, George and Rutter. He married for his second wife Miss Susan Crammer; children, Louisa, Susan, Newton and Fred. Eliza, married Alexander Anderson; children, Alexander, Jr., Mary, Charles and William; Eliza's second husband was William Annan; one child, Gertrude. Tyler, died in boyhood. George R.; married Catherine McClain; children, Joseph, John and George; married second time; one child. Clarissa, married John Clawson; children, Agnes, Jerome and Louise. Haner A.; Jacob, married Harriet Woodman; children, Helen, Gaston and Hattie. John H., married Melissa Woodard; children, William, Haner and Erasmus. Reuben T., married Ellen Thorpe; children, Sarah, Howard, James, Eliza (died) and Lucy. Sarah D., married John Stryker; children, Mary, William and John.

JACOB L. KEEN.

The Keen family, of Wayne County, Pennsylvania, are, it is thought, of Swedish origin, their ancester having emigrated from there two centuries ago. Jacob Keen, the grandfather of Jacob L., was a Virginian, or at least resided there, and Captain Mathias, Jacob L.'s father, it is believed was born there, and from thence went to Orange County, N. Y., where, at Dolsontown, he met and married Miss Muzzey.

J. L. Keen

She bore him two children, Jane and George. After his marriage the captain moved to New York city and engaged in the draying business. This must have been about the year 1801. He remained in the city a couple of years, then returned to Orange County, N. Y., and in Middleton engaged in the mercantile business, and afterwards in the hotel business. In 1808 he sold out and went to Mechanicsville and bought a farm; but, owing to endorsing for others, his farm was sold on a mortgage, and he then moved to Milford, in Pike County, Pennsylvania, and for two or three years worked at the mason trade. In February, 1815, he moved with his family into Canaan township, Wayne County, Pa., where, in what was then called Elk Forest, he purchased two hundred acres of wild land, which included Canoe Pond and which he intended to turn into a mill site. In the fall of 1814 he had, with the help of a hired man, built on his land a log house or cabin of the most simple structure possible. It had a bark roof, and its doors were only blankets. To get to it he drove through lumber roads and, part of the way, through an unbroken wilderness. Their household goods and the family were drawn in a sleigh, and while it was being unloaded Mrs. Keen sat in the sleigh and cried, so dreary and wild appeared what was to be her future home. The family settled in the new house, he at once commenced the work of improvement. Soon after his arrival he was badly wounded by the accidental discharge of a rifle, while hunting. However he had a log dam built across the outlet of the pond and thus raised the water ten feet. In 1816 he finished the grist-mill commenced the year previous and supplied a want which had been deeply felt by the inhabitants of the surrounding country for many miles. The stone for the mill were obtained in the mountains and shaped by Mr. Keen's own labor. In 1830 the grist-mill was torn down and a saw-mill built in its place. Mr. Keen, as stated, was a stone-mason, and he worked at his trade after he came to Canaan. He had charge of the building of the locks on the Lehigh Canal at Easton. Also built the lock at Durham, on the Pennsylvania Canal and locks on the Delaware and Hudson Canal. While in Orange County, New York, he raised a company of militia, called the Republican Blues, of which he was made captain. He became proficient in military drill, and on his arrival in Wayne County he took an active interest in military affairs and was commissioned by Governor Snyder captain of the eighth company of the One Hundred and Third Regiment Pennsylvania militia. Captain Keen was an ardent Free Mason and was installed, in 1816, Worshipful Master of Freedom Lodge, No. 147, of Bethany, and was its first Master. He was a Jackson Democrat, and a strong one. He held township offices at various times. His second wife was Anna Reeves, whose children were Julia, James, Mathias, Elvira, Mary, Jacob L., Ann, Catherine, Rosetta, Louisa and Elizabeth. Captain Keen died January 9, 1835.

Jacob L. Keen was born in Mechanicsville village, Orange County, N. Y., May 15, 1809. When five years old his father moved into the woods in Canaan, as before described, and he well remembers his father bringing fire from the last neighbor's house, three miles from his home. Jacob grew to man's estate on the farm of his father, attaining only a common school education at the winter schools in his district. On the death of his father he purchased one hundred and fourteen acres of the homestead. It was all new but five acres, and is now nearly all improved, and has a fine house and good out-buildings, all of which attest the industry and energy of Mr. Keen. He is and has always been a Democrat of the old school, and has been honored by his party with the office of county commissioner and other minor offices. He is a Universalist in religious belief, but has helped build churches for other denominations. On the 21st day of December, 1831, he married Miss Rachel Felton, who was born July 17, 1808. Her ancestor, Henry Felton, came from Germany prior to the Revolution and settled in Philadelphia. He married Miss Rachel Stoner, who was born in Maryland. Their children were Henry, George, Christian, Jacob, John, William, Polly, Eve, Betsey, Katy and Peggy. He served in the War for Independence, after which he moved to Nicholson township, Luzerne County, Pa., where he bought a farm on which he lived until his death. George was born in Philadelphia and was ten years old when his father moved to Luzerne County. He also became a farmer and married Sally Scott, daughter of Zara and Sybil (Sackett) Scott. He emigrated to Lenox township, Susquehanna County, Pa., where he died in 1863, his wife in 1864. Their children were Rachel, Miles, John, Cynthia, Lucy A., James, Mary, Elizabeth.

To Jacob L. and his wife have been born Ann M., September 17, 1833; married S. Hudson; one child, Josephine L., born June 25, 1833. Mary M., born November 27, 1835; married A. R. Edgett; one child, Lillian I, born May 4, 1858; she married Rev. E. H. Whitman; one child, Nellie E. George N., born November 27, 1837; he married Jane Jenkins; children, Edward L. and Willie. Jennette, born September 7, 1839; married J. R. Smith; child, Charles D. Hethacott M., born June 18, 1841. Edwin R., born July 2, 1842; married Agnes Shuster; children, Gracie, Judson, Arthur. James R., born August 18, 1845; married Teressa Weinmyer; children, Charley, Miles, Henry, Pauline. Sarah J., born May 22, 1848; married Walter Carr; one child, Sadie. Anna M., the oldest daughter, married for her second husband William Hoyle; children, William, Mary, Samuel, Grace, Katie and Robbie.

CHAPTER XVII.

SOUTH CANAAN TOWNSHIP.

CANAAN was one of the original townships erected at the setting off of Wayne from Northampton County, in 1798, and at that time embraced a large area that has since been cut up into several townships and a borough. Portions of this mother township were settled early in the history of the county, the first being in what is now Salem, and subsequent ones in Clinton and Lake. The clearings of new settlers were, of course, centripetal to these localities, and early in the present century, the first one had become strong enough for independent existence, and the excision of the territory now embraced in the townships of Salem and Lake took place. This was in 1808, and a small area which subsequently became a part of Cherry Ridge was included in the separation. This left a township bounded on the north by Mount Pleasant, east by Dyberry—Cherry Ridge not having then been erected—south by Salem and west by Luzerne County. A large slice of the northern section was then set off as Clinton, in 1834, Waymart was constituted a borough in 1851, and the next year, the Court of Quarter Sessions divided the remaining territory into two townships, the new one being called South Canaan. The township then contained one old settlement in the fertile valley of the Middle Creek, and much land still heavily timbered with virgin forest, broken only here and there with a little clearing. It had fair soil, good water-powers, and well-broken roads. At the time its history as an independent township commenced, the greatest hardships of pioneer life were over, and since that time, it has grown to be a prosperous community, with little of special interest in its local history. The present chapter will deal chiefly with events that transpired long before the excision from old Canaan took place, while the cotemporaneous history of the area now included in the newer townships above referred to will be found under those headings.

Henry Curtis was one of the first settlers, and located on Middle Creek about 1804. He was a German by birth, and after having served for several years in the army of his native country, he came to America, and enlisted in the Continental army three years before the close of the Revolutionary War. He married Mirilla Swingle, and their children were Jeremiah, or Hans, as he was best known, and Mary, the wife of John S. Reed.

Hans Curtis married Polly, a daughter of Adam Wagner, and lived on the homestead, the farm now occupied by J. Brooks. Hans had many children, and the township is filled with his descendants. His children were: Rhoda, the wife of Henry Spangenberg; Aaron, Priscilla, who married Moses Shaffer, 2nd; Mary Ann, who first married Samuel Shaffer and afterwards Lewis Lobshire; Elizabeth, the wife of Samuel Swingle; Moses, a resident of Honesdale; Rua, the wife of G. W. Barnes, of Manchester; Angelina, who married Charles Farrell, and Caroline, the wife of Rufus Frisbie. Hans Curtis married a second time, choosing Elizabeth Hoadley for his wife. Two children were born of this marriage, Charlotte, the wife of Thomas Dershimer of Dunmore, Lackawanna County, and Solomon, who lives in South Canaan township.

Hans Ulrich Swingle was another German, who had settled in the western part of the township a year previous to Curtis' arrival. Mr. Swingle married Polly, ~~a daughter of~~ John Shaffer, and had six sons and four daughters. The latter were Kate, the wife of George Enslin; Morilla, who married Henry Curtis; Christina, the wife of Silas Woodward, and Mary, who married Moses Shaffer. The sons were John, Jeremiah, Conrad, Jacob, Henry and Frederick, whose children are given below:

John Swingle, the eldest, married Catherine Moore, and settled where Hanson McMin now lives. His children were Elizabeth, the wife of Jonathan Nickerson; John, Ephe, who married Justus Cobb; Conrad. His second wife was Catherine Shorter, and the children of this union were: Andrew; Polly, the wife of Joseph London; Catherine, the wife of Peter Manes; Christiana, the wife of John Turner; Susan, who married Samuel McLean; Sarah, the wife of Stephen Sharpstine; and Joseph.

His third marriage was with Barbara Burleigh; from this union were born Ephraim, Margaret, the wife of Alfred Foot; Caleb, Joshua, Anson, Westley and Jane, the wife of Jonas Seeley.

Jeremiah, the second son of Hans Swingle, had by his first marriage only one son, Henry. By his second wife, Patience Bunting, were born Abraham and Israel.

Conrad, the third son, married Lucy Bunting, and their children were John, Mary, the wife of John Cobb, for whom Cobb's Gap was named; Daniel, Joseph, still living in his eighty-sixth year, with his grandson, Elisha Swingle; Samuel, a resident of Salem, aged eighty-three; Moses, now in his eighty-first year; Sally, the wife of George Ansley; Isaac, Michael, David and Jonathan, twins; Lucy, the wife of George Swingle; and Elizabeth, who married Simon Swingle.

Jacob, the fourth son, married Ephe Shaffer, and their children were Nancy, the wife of Lyman Kennedy; Julia, who married Joseph Bryant; Harmon; Emmaline, the wife of John Bates; Richard; Abby, who married an Arnold; Austin; Adaline, the wife of Joseph Swingle; and Cynthia.

Henry, the fifth son, married Elizabeth Enslin, and had four children. They were, George, Clarissa, the wife of Owen Bronson; Simeon and Sally, the wife of William Benton.

Frederick, the sixth son, married Susan Enslin, and his children were Charles, Elijah B., Leonard, Annie and Polly, the wife of Richard Beirs.

Adam Wagner was of Pennsylvania German extraction, and came to Wayne County from Maryland, in 1783. He first moved into a sugar house, built of logs and covered with bark, upon the farm now owned by Edgar Wells, and afterward located on the farm where Jonathan Swingle lives, in which place he died in 1793. He married Polly Wheatcraft, and his children were Rebecca (the wife of Joseph Jaggers), Sally (who married John Swingle), Otho, Rachel (the wife of Samuel Shaffer) and John.

John Shaffer was a German who settled in Orange County, N. Y., about the time the Revolution broke out, and there married a Miss Forbes. With his wife and their obedient son, John, he moved to Wayne County in 1783, and located on a tract of land on Middle Creek, below the old North and South road. Here his second son, Moses, the first child in the township was born, as were his other children,—Samuel, Susan (the wife of Joshua Berleigh), Effie (married to Jacob Swingle), Betsy (the wife of Edward Doyle, of Buckingham), Polly (the wife of Samuel Chumard). Catherine, the other daughter, was the eldest of the family. She married James McLean. John, the eldest son, married a Miss Forbes, and his children were Lydia (who married Alexander McMullin), Mary, Emma and John. Moses, the second son, married Mary Swingle. Their children were Jacob, Fannie (the wife of Aaron Curtis), Samuel, John, Sallie (who married John Cobb), Millie (the wife of Adam Wagner), Catherine (the wife of James Glen), Sylvester and Mary, who married Abraham Jaggers. Samuel, the third son, was married to Rachel Wagner, and was the father of Elizabeth (the wife of John Spangenberg, Moses, Abraham, Eli, Lydia (the wife of Simon Enslin), Amy (married to Daniel Everts), Mary (married to Henry Reed), Berzilla, Joseph, Rachel, Alexander and Martha (the wife of Francis Enslin).

James McLean was a native of Ireland, and was in the British army at the Battle of Bunker Hill. Soon after that, he deserted, and took up arms in the cause of American liberty. At the close of the war he moved to Canaan township, and located on the place afterward occupied by Nelson Bennett. He married Catherine Shaffer, and was the father of Samuel McLean, of Cherry Ridge; John (who died in Salem, fifty years ago), Christiana (the wife of Patrick Falconer), Hannah (the wife of Noah Cobb), Lavinia (married to Otho Swingle) and Margaret (who first married John Wagner, then Henry Swingle, and last, Stacy Chumard). Mrs. Chumard is still a resident of the township, and is, at eighty-five years of age, in possession of all her faculties, and full of interesting reminiscences.

Amos Bronson and his brother came from Schoharie, N. Y., about 1800. The latter was an ingenious, tough, self-taught mill-wright.

Amos married Eunice Lyons, and had six children. They were Daniel, Noah, Owen, Lyman, Mary (the wife of John Spangenberg, who is now living with Marcus Day, in her ninety-four year) and Rowena.

Samuel Chumard settled on the place afterward occupied by Hezekiah Leach, about the beginning of the present century, or possibly a little before. He came from New York State, and was of French descent. He married Polly Shaffer, and their children were William, Stacy, Eliza (the wife of John Lee) and Horace. George and John Chumard, who were the brothers of Samuel Chumard, were also early settlers.

George Enslin, who was one of the early settlers, came from Newport, Pa., and located on the property now occupied by his descendants. He married Kate Swingle, and his children were Simon, Jacob, George, Frederick, Elizabeth (the wife of John Burleigh), Christina (the wife of David Freeman), Sarah (the wife of John McLean), Polly (who married Moses Swingle) and Susanna (the wife of Jacob Shaffer).

Adam Frisby was a native of Connecticut, when much of the township was yet a wilderness, and cleared up a farm on which were born his four sons,—Solomon, Hiram, Philemon and Chester. Solomon married Charlotte, the youngest daughter of Jesse Morgan. Hiram moved to Carbondale, and lived in the first house ever built in the place. He it was who was said to have taken the first coal to market over the mountain to the Lackawaxen. Widow Frisby, who will be remembered by some of the old residents of the county, was a sister-in-law of Abram. Though a superior woman, she was possessed of many peculiar beliefs. One of these was that it was a sin to kill any living creature. Her clothing was all made from wool taken from living sheep; her shoes were made from the hide of some animal that had died a natural death; her food was strictly vegetable, and she did all she could to prevent the slaughter of the cattle of those who lived in her neighborhood. She died in Connecticut some years ago.

Justus Cobb was a brother of Asa Cobb, for whom the Cobb's Gap was named. Both were sons of Joseph Cobb, who came from Connecticut early in the history of the county. Justus married Ephe Swingle, and settled near Jonathan's Gap. Their children were Elizabeth (the wife of Moses Swingle), Catherine (who married Samuel Swingle), Justus, Abigail (who married a Swartz), Charlotte (the wife of Zachariah Emory), Benjamin and Jane.

George Morgan was a son of Jesse Morgan, of Salem, and lived to be nearly one hundred years old. He first married a Miss Hall, and his children were George, Horatio, David and Lucy. His second wife was Deborah Headly, and by this union were born Abel, Elliott, Marvin, and two daughters who married Justus Cobb, Jr. and William Swingle.

Daniel Jaggers came from Philadelphia, about 1807, accompanied by his son Joseph; the latter married Rebecca Wagner, and their children were Hannah, the wife of Israel Seeley; Betsy, the wife of Harrison McMin; Nancy, who married William Coleman; Phœbe, the wife of Lewis Butler; Rebecca, who married Samuel Shaffer; Abraham, Eunice, the wife of Ranford Smith; Susan, the wife of William Williams; Rachel, who married Thomas Glen, and John. Most of them are now dead.

Among the other early settlers may be mentioned George Rix, who was in the township before 1805, and was always known as "Captain," and was a prominent man in his day; Levi Sampson, who lived on the place afterwards occupied by John B. Tuthill; William, Elijah and Ward W. Sampson; John Spangenburg, a brother of Esquire Thomas Spangenberg, of Bethany; Wareham Day, Vene Lee and others.

Early Industries.—Of course one of the first needs of the early settlers was some means of reducing their grain to meal without the delays and difficulties of a long journey through the woods to Puddey's, Milford or Slocum Hollow. At all of these places there were mills at a very early date, and even after there were others nearer by, trips to these points were not infrequent. There was a mill, too, at Wilsonville, and this drew a fair share of patronage from Canaan. The first mill in the township of which there is any record, was a small handmill that did duty for the neighbors in the vicinity of Hans Ulrich Swingles. It was about three feet in diameter, and had a hard quartz stone that was turned by a crank and a home-made gear. It took two men nearly a day to reduce a single bag of corn to very inferior meal by the aid of it; but it was superior to the mortar and pestle, and made those who lived near by in a measure independent of the more pretentious machinery in adjacent townships. About 1800 John Shaffer put up a regular grist-mill, with one run of stone and a hand bolter. It stood near the site of the present mill in Shaffer Hollow, and the old foundation can still be seen. The year before this, there had been a mill for grinding corn erected west of Learch's, where Mitchell's carding mill now stands, by Conrad Swingle; but it was but little better than the hand-mill of his father. The Shaffer mill did duty with slight improvement until about 1835, when it was rebuilt by Moses Shaffer, who put in a new run of stone; and then, about 1839 or 1840, sold it to Henry Kenner, of Bucks County. After this it passed into the hands of Jairus Buckingham, George Enslin, P. W. Learch and L. A. Robinson & Company, in succession.

It was again rebuilt in 1856, by P. W. Learch, a new dam and walls being erected. In 1876 it was sold to G. W. Kipp, who, in turn disposed of it to Abraham Keiser, in 1883. It has four run of stone, driven by an overshot wheel on a ten foot radius, and runs chiefly on custom work in buckwheat flour and feed.

What is known as the Keiser mill was built by Howell & Jessup, in about 1843. After running it for a number of years, it was sold to a man named O'Donnell, who soon disposed of it to H. S. Blose. The latter sold it to William Benson, and then took it back again, and sold it to —— Matthew. It was then bought by John McCuoid, John Tobin and Thomas Swingle, who, in 1882, sold it to John Keiser, the present owner. It has four run of stone, and is driven by an overshot wheel, on a radius of seven feet. Its daily capacity is about one hundred and fifty bushels. Mortimer Arnold is the present miller.

About 1835, John Jessup and Gabriel Howell started a carding machine on Middle Creek, near the site of the old Conrad Swingle corn-mill. It was a small affair, but proved a lucrative investment, and was soon improved to meet the requirements of the neighborhood in the matter of blankets and yarns. Elias Compton was the next owner, and after him came Selah Davis and Henry Osborn. The latter took possession in 1850, and remained several years, but found the business so decreased that he became discouraged and sold to T. K. Fox. Matthew Mitchell, the present owner of the plant, came from Rheinbeck, N. Y., a few years ago, and has added some improvements to the plant. It now consists of three carding machines, one jack, one hundred and twenty spindles, two hand-looms and one picker. Both steam and water are employed as motive power, and there is a dye-house attached to the establishment.

Some years before the war, William Carlo started a shovel-handle factory at Shaffertown, which, like many similar establishments in other parts of the county, did not prove a permanent success. It was afterwards owned in succession by James Buckingham, George Freeman and William B. Swan; and the latter sold the property to C. C. Shaffer, who converted it into a planing-mill, in 1866. It is still in operation, and supplies a large local trade.

South Canaan Corners.—This hamlet, locally known as "Learch's Corners," is the only post-office in the township, and is also the principal center. Here it is that the churches are located, and here is the hotel, the store, the mill and the druggist. P. W. Learch, from whom the place takes the name by which it is now best known, moved from Easton in 1836, and built the hotel now kept by his son. He was a man of much enterprise and business capacity, and was prominent in the building of turnpikes, and many other public improvements. He married Ann Warters, a lady from New Jersey, and their children were John, Margaret, the wife of T. K. Varney; Henry, Spencer C., and Annetta. John Learch married Reua, the daughter of Hon. Phineas Arnold.

The first store in the place was kept by a man named Buland, who had a small shop near the Methodist Protestant Church for a year or two. Gabriel Howell then built the store now occupied by Swingle & McMin, and was afterwards succeeded by P. W. Learch, Learch & Varney, Learch & Carter, T. K. Varney and the present proprietors.

THE POST-OFFICE.—The first postmaster in South Canaan was John Jessup, who was appointed in January, 1837, when the office was established. He served until 1852, when P. W. Learch was appointed his successor. Mr. Learch served until 1878, when he died, and T. K. Varney succeeded to the place which he held for four years, and then the present incumbent, B. Frank Swingle took the office. There is a daily mail from Honesdale.

THE ALLEN MURDER.—The murder of Solomon Tice by Peter Allen, which occurred at Bethany, October 18, 1808, and is referred to in the chapter of that borough, was an event of much interest in the history of South Canaan, since both the men belonged in that township, and were well-known characters. Mrs. Stacy Chumard, who was a girl at the time, says that she can remember the event distinctly and the impression it made on her when she heard of the tragedy. She knew both the men, and they were frequently at her father's house. Allen was quite poor, and could not afford to dress as well as the men with whom he associated, and this gave Tice, who was a great tease, a subject for constant amusement at the expense of his less fortunate neighbor. He used to call him "Lousy Allen," and would call out the name whenever the latter came in sight. Several times the men quarreled, but never came to blows over the epithet, so far as she knew. She remembers that on several occasions Tice went up to Allen with a snuff-box in his hand, and snapped it so that the sound would simulate the killing of vermin. Tice also had a way of annoying all the children in the neighborhood, and Mrs. Chumard was much afraid of him. She says that the day of the murder her father had been to general training at Bethany, and did not return until late in the evening. When he came in, the first words he said were "Lavinia, Tice can't plague you any more." "Why," she asked. "Because Pete Allen killed him to-day with a knife." "I think," added Mrs. Chumard, as she recalled the circumstance, "that I was glad of it; for I disliked Tice very much, and did not realize the tragedy which had taken place."

AN ADVENTURE WITH A WOLF.—In this, like other townships, the early settlers were constantly annoyed by the wolves, which often grew bold enough to come right up to the cabin doors in search of food. Mr. Moses Swingle tells this story of an instance of this kind that came under his own observation. "When I was quite a small boy," he says, "my eldest sister, Polly, who was then married, and lived on the place now owned by Asa Cobb, killed a wolf right on the road before her door. Her husband had gone to Wilkesbarre to attend to some legal business, and my little brother, Israel, was staying with her. She was mixing bread, when the boy, who had been looking out the window, asked what kind of a thing that was smelling about the sheep-fold. She looked out the door, and there was a full grown wolf, within a few feet of the house. Her husband's flint locked musket was above the door, and she snatched it down and hurried out. As soon as the wolf saw her he growled and came nearer, and she took a deliberate aim and pulled the trigger, but the gun missed fire. Not daunted, she took a firm grasp of the barrel and dealt the gray varmint a good blow over the head, shivering the stock and only stunning the wolf. She then called to Israel to bring the axe, but before he could comply, as his wolfship began to show signs of life again, she finished him with a picket. I have forgotten what he measured, but he was quite a large wolf, even for those days."

ROADS AND TURNPIKES.—Early in the history of the township, there were few roads in the true sense of the word. The clearings were connected with one another by trails cut through the woods, and here and there by rude paths from which the underbrush had been cut away, so as to make them passable for sleds and drags. These improved somewhat, as the settlers became more numerous, but there was nothing worthy the name until the first turnpike was constructed. This was the old Easton and Belmont, better known as the "North and South," which was finished in 1819–20, and passed through the centre of the township. Mail and passenger coaches ran daily upon it, and large numbers of cattle and sheep were driven by this route from Western New York to Easton and Philadelphia. It furnished too, what was then considered a rapid and and convenient communication with Easton, then the source of most mercantile supplies, and the freightage by wagons amounted to a large traffic. This prosperity lasted for twenty-five or thirty years, and did much to open up the township, and improve the farms that lay along the great highway. In 1815 the Milford and Owego turnpike was completed, making another route that greatly benefited the section, and still later, in 1831, the Honesdale and Clarksville turnpike gave the township easy communication with the county seat. Although these turnpikes have given up their franchises, and are now county roads, they are in fair condition, and are kept at comparatively little expense.

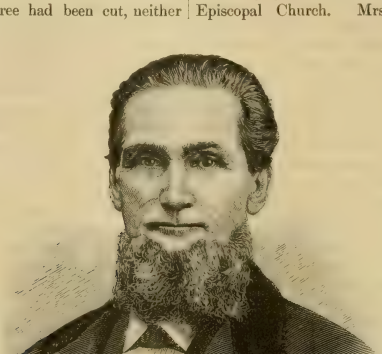
School and Churches.—It is probable that the first school regularly maintained in the township was that started by Jonathan Nickerson in a portion of Hans Ulrich Swingle's house, in 1812. Prior to that time, there had been several classes taught by any of the pioneers who could find time to instruct the three or four neighbors children who came when weather, roads and household duties permitted. The Nickerson school was kept up for several months, and had an attendance of about twenty pupils. Soon after this there was a school near Shaffertown, in an old log-house which stood about three-quarters of a mile above the Shaffer mill. Miss Lucy Goodrich afterwards taught in this same place. There was also a school on the John Swingle farm, now occupied by Harrison McMin, which was first taught by Miss Polly Potter. Capt. Abel H. Fish, who came from Connecticut, was the second male teacher, and is remembered by his former pupils as having been an excellent scholar, enthusiastic in his work, and with a rare faculty for imparting knowledge. Miss Abigail Frisbie was also one of the prominent teachers in the first quarter of the present century.



The first religious meetings in the township were held at the house of Hans Swingle, who was a Lutheran, and conducted the services himself. Afterwards meetings were held at John Swingle's and others of the neighbors. In 1810, Father Owens, a Methodist preacher used to visit the locality about once a month during the season; and afterwards Elder Fry came oftener. The Swingle family were all religiously inclined, and prayer-meetings were quite regularly kept up, until the first church, a German Reformed congregation, was formed. The first members of this were Joseph, Daniel, Mary and John Swingle, and a few others. Afterwards, as it grew in strength, its denominational preferences changed, and it was finally merged into the Methodist Protestant Church. This was organized about 1823, under the preaching of Rev. Joseph Barlow, and had a large membership from the start. It at first worshipped in the school-house, but, in 1831, erected its present house of worship at a cost of one thousand dollars. It was at first used by both the Methodist Protestant and Methodist Episcopal denominations. The church at Learch's Corners was started in about 1855, by the efforts of Rev. Elias B. Adair. It is now in a flourishing condition. About 1865, a Free Methodist class was formed, the constituent members being, G. W. Swingle and wife, S. Hines and wife, M. Reed and wife, A. Reed and Mrs. E. Spangenberg. This continued to grow in strength until, in 1871, a church edifice was erected about a mile west of the Corners. The congregation is now in a flourishing condition, and numbers about one hundred members. It has recently bought a parsonage and two acres of ground. At South Canaan Corners there is a lodge of Good Templars, No. 213, organized by E. E. Weed, November 11, 1884. It has sixty-seven members.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

SIMON SWINGLE.

The first settler in what is now South Canaan was Hans Ulrich Swingle, who emigrated from Germany prior to the Revolutionary War, and settled in Orange County, N. Y.

The name as pronounced in German was "Zwingle," but was Americanized, and in the days of Hans Ulrich was pronounced and spelled Swingle. Hans Ulrich Swingle was drafted into the Colonial army, but did not serve as he was not a naturalized citizen. In 1783 he came to Wayne County, Pa., and in what is now South Canaan, bought four hundred acres of land in the midst of an unbroken wilderness. Not a tree had been cut, neither were there any roads to or from his possessions. He at once erected a log-house and began the work of improvement which he continued until his death which occurred March 28, 1809. His wife, Mary Shaffer, bore him children as follows,—Christina, who married Silas Woodward; Elizabeth, married Heny Curtis, who served all through the Revolutionary War; Jeremiah; John, married three times and was the father of twenty-four children. Frederick, born in 1781, died May 10, 1861, married Susannah Enslin, born in 1780, died August 15, 1856; Jacob married Eva Shaffer, Jacob died July 23, 1870, his wife died June 23, 1862; Henry married Elizabeth Enslin, and Mary married Moses Shaffer. Mary died July 20, 1839. Both Mr. and Mrs. Swingle were for many years members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mrs. Swingle died in March, 1816. The site of the original homestead and part of the farm is now owned by Hans Ulrich's great-great-grandson, Eugene Swingle. Henry the fifth son of Hans was born in Orange County, N. Y., and came with his father to Canaan where he grew to manhood, and married November 12, 1806, Miss Elizabeth Enslin. He purchased fifty-three acres of unimproved land on which he built a house in which he resided nearly half a century. His education was in German, but his children were sent to the English schools of that day. He died September 13, 1851, his wife, January 14, 1850. Their children were George, born March 1, 1808, married Lucy Swingle, who bore him the following named children,—Washington, Sarah, Lydia, Lucy, Henry, Finley and Eleanora. Clarissa, born August 2, 1811, married Owen Bronson, who was born May 8, 1805, and died April 27, 1881. Their children were—Simon, Elizabeth, Michael, Harvey, Leonard, Rowena, Annie and Joseph. Mrs. Bronson died May 19, 1884. Simon, born December 14, 1814, and Sallie Ann, born August 28, 1817, died in May, 1885, as did her husband William Baton, who was born 1813. Their children were—Robert, Elizabeth and Mary.

Simon Swingle, the subject of this sketch was born on the home farm of his father, December 14, 1814, and grew to man's estate thereon. The country was then new and times were hard and Mr. Swingle was early taught that one of God's mandates was that man should get his bread by the sweat of his brow. And he was also instructed, that honesty and integrity was to be desired before riches. His chances for an education were limited to a few months attendance in winter, at the schools of his native township. An education which has been added to by a long and active business life. Arriving at his majority he commenced life on his own account by renting his father's farm for a few years and then buying it. In 1842 he exchanged it with his brother-in-law David Swingle for two hundred acres of land near where he now resides. This farm he improved and lived upon until 1861, when he moved into the large and comfortable house in which he now resides with his son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin. All the buildings where he now resides were built by him as also many others on the five farms he has owned. In politics, Mr. Swingle has been for many years a staunch Republican, but now belongs to the Prohibition party. He has never sought or cared for office and has held only township offices. Both himself and wife have been for nearly half a century consistent members of the Protestant Methodist Church in which he has been class-leader, steward and trustee. In May 1877, he was sent as a delegate to the General Convention of the Protestant Methodist Church of the United States which was held in Baltimore, Md. Mr. Swingle has been an industrious, enterprising business man, managing his farms with judgment and skill, and has proven by his example that a comfortable fortune can be made by farming and by honest upright dealing. He has retired from active business and is now in the seventy-second year of his age, in the full possession of all his faculties, surrounded by children and friends, passing away the even tide of a long and well spent life. On the 9th day of October 1835, he was joined in marriage to Miss Elizabeth Swingle, who was born December 20th, 1817. Her father Conrad Swingle was born in 1769 and died April 24, 1849. His wife Miss Lucy Bunton was born in 1774 and died 1850. Their children were John, born December 14, 1794; died March 9, 1879; he was twice married his wives being Sarah Cobb and Polly Quick. Mary, born September 13, 1796; died December 13, 1874; she married John Cobb. Daniel, born June 12, 1798; died December 21, 1878; married Eunice Buckingham. Joseph, born April 16, 1800; his wives were Hannah Cobb, Orrilla Parish and Elizabeth Shunard. Samuel, born March 13, 1802; married Catherine Cobb. Moses, born April 2, 1804; married Elizabeth Cobb. Isaac, born October 17, 1807; married Polly Croop. Michael, born April 26, 1811, his wife was Margaret Croop. Jonathan, born February 1, 1813; married Phebe Coss. David, now deceased born February 1, 1813; married Eliza Croop. Lucy, born July 26, 1815; married George Swingle, and Elizabeth, born December 20, 1817. Simon Swingle and wife have been blessed with the following named children,—Zachariah, born April 22, 1837; married Emma Jane Swingle; children-Lucina, (adopted) Edwin, Emma, Ida, Ellen, Evelena, Viola, Celesta, Norman and Mark. Ellen, born August 10, 1844; married to S. L. Dart; children are—Ernest C., Della I., Elizabeth, Jennie, Minnie and Frances L. Orrilla R., born April 4, 1846; married December 25, 1864; Irwin Benjamin, who enlisted August 6, 1862 in Company A, One Hundred and Thirty-Seventh Penna. Volunteer Infantry and was discharged June 1, 1863; two children, Jennie M., and Adelbert W., died in infancy. Adelbert M., born February 4, 1851; married Tillie Compton; children—Mamie (deceased, Myrtle, Pauline, and Charlie. Angeline A., born November 12, 1853; married Charles McKinney; children Alice deceased, Genevieve, Garfield, Adelbert and Martha. Della Ann, born in 1856, died April 12, 1860.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CHERRY RIDGE TOWNSHIP.

A PETITION to erect a new township from portions of Texas, Canaan and Palmyra, was laid before the Court of General Sessions on December 6th, 1843, and John McIntosh, Ralph Case and Phineas G. Goodrich were appointed viewers. On the following day, they came into court and made a favorable report, recommending the creation of a new township by a line beginning at the southeast corner of Canaan township and extending to the mouth of Wampum or Sand Pond Creek, and from thence along the line between Texas and Palmyra five hundred and forty perches, thence to the mouth of Cajaw Pond, thence due west to the east line of Canaan, thence south to the north line of Salem, thence to the place of beginning. This report was confirmed nisi, and continued to the April term, before which time several remonstrances were filed. They did not avail, however, and the final confirmation took place on April 30, 1844. Subsequently it was discovered that a mistake had been made in running the township lines, and the boundaries were changed to their present courses.

The township thus erected is bounded on the north and northeast by Texas, on the southwest by Palmyra and Paupack, on the south by Lake, and west by South Canaan and Canaan. The surface includes much of a high undulating plateau, that is free from the abrupt hills that are characteristic of the country to the south and west of it, and a large part of the land is cultivatable, though south of Middle Creek, the surface is rougher and less inviting. Sand and Cajaw Ponds, both of them picturesque sheets of water are in the township, and Middle Creek and Collins, Stryker and Pond Brooks drain the hills and afford several good waterpowers. Originally the hills were covered with a fine growth of hard wood, and the township takes its name from the abundance of cherry lumber that was felled in it.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.—An opening in the woods seems to have been made in the Cherry Ridge some time before the organization of the county, but the exact date at which the first settlers commenced their clearings can not be ascertained. It was probably but a few years after the close of the Revolution, for a number of the pioneers of the township are known to have been soldiers in both that and the Indian War which followed. About 1794, Benjamin King went from the Paupack settlement and located on the Schenck farm, remaining there for two years, after which time he went to Mount Pleasant. It is supposed that at this time Enos Woodward, with his sons, and Colonel H. Schenck commenced permanent improvements, though the date of their first location must have been before this. The first assessment for Canaan township was made out by John Bunting, in 1799, and this shows that the Woodwards had made a good-sized opening in the woods. Enos is set down as having fifty acres of improved land and one hundred and seventy-five acres that were unimproved; John had seventeen acres that were cleared and three hundred and eighty-three that remained in forest; Silas and Asahel had each twenty acres of improved and three hundred and eighty acres unimproved, while the farm of Colonel John H. Schenck was made up of forty acres of cleared and four hundred of uncleared land. It is probable that prior to the date of this assessment, the settlers had been joined by Daniel Davis and Abraham Stryker. The former located on the place now occupied by H. L.

Philips, on the Milford and Owego turnpike, where he kept a tavern for many years.

All of these settlers took up their lands under the impression that the legal title to them was vested in Connecticut, and they were not apprised of their mistake until several years after. Dr. Collins was one of the first to learn of it. He had bought out Enos Woodward's improvement for a few dollars, and gone on clearing the land. Under the Pennsylvania proprietorship the lands were warranted by Edward Tilghman, and the latter put them in the hands of Jason Torrey, who was his agent. As soon as Dr. Collins became aware that he was only a "squatter," he saddled his horse and rode to Philadelphia, where Mr. Tilghman then lived, and made a payment of three hundred dollars on the tract that he had secured from Woodward. He had one of the first legal titles in Cherry Ridge.

The fact that Enos Woodward was the first settler is proven by no less competent a witness than his brother-in-law, Benjamin King. The possession taken of these tracts under the domain of Connecticut, led to considerable litigation in after years, and in one of the cases, King was called as a witness relative to some early event. It is a matter of record that he then stated, that they had better ask Enos Woodward, because the latter came into the country six months before he did. Mr. Woodward was a conspicuous figure in the early history of this township, but left it about the beginning of the present century, and became more closely identified with the Wallenpaupack settlement, to which he returned. He was a native of Massachusetts, and was one of the company of New Englanders that went to Wallenpaupack in 1774. He was also a soldier in the revolution, and afterwards participated in several fights with the Indians. He is described as having been a man of tall stature and fine bearing, strict in his views, kindly in manner, and straightforward in all his dealings. His sons were William and Ansil, who went south, and settled near Lexington, Ky., and were the ancestors of the Woodward family in that state, Abisha, who married a daughter of Jacob Kimble, and located at Bethany, John, who located on the Jordan place, adjoining Dr. Collin's farm, and Ebenezer, who lived where Perry Clark now resides. The history of Abisha will be found in the chapter of Bethany. John was a quiet and unobtrusive man who ended his days in Cherry Ridge. He married Sarah Caywood, and had eight children, Elam, Asher, Enos, Amasa L., Keziah C., Daniel D., Sarah C., and John. Ebenezer married Sabra Chapman, and their children were Arthur, Benjamin, Joseph, Phœbe, Polly, Oliver, most of whom accompanied their parents to Michigan in 1849. Daniel D. Woodward is now one of the oldest living settlers in the township. He married Sarah Ann Rogers, and by her had Mary Ann, Francis and Thomas. By his second wife Francis D. Stanton were born, Sarah E., Harlan B., Alice L. and Franklin P.

Colonel John H. Schenck was a native of Sussex County, N. J., and had inherited considerable property in Orange County N. Y., through his wife. Shortly after the breaking out of the Revolution he mortgaged his farm to equip a regiment, which he led to the front. Although he was made a colonel, he was so poorly remunerated for his services that he was not able to redeem his property, and, in 1795, or 1796, he removed to Cherry Ridge and bought out the improvement of Benjamin King. Colonel Schenck married a Miss Benton, and his children were Magdalene (wife of Apollos Davis), Abigail and Gertrude (wife of Joseph Ames, of Canaan). About the commencement of the present century, Colonel Schenck moved to New Jersey and Jacob took the homestead. He married Sallie Davis, and their children were Phœbe, John J., Margaret, Henry V., Caleb B., Harriet (wife of Judge Giles Green, of Ariel), and Sarah (wife of Perry Brown. After the death of his father, Henry inherited the homestead and married Jane C. Taylor, by whom he had five children, and, after her death was united to Laura D. Smith, of New York State.

Abraham I. Stryker, who is mentioned as one of the early settlers, moved from the neighborhood of Easton, about 1801. He bought a large tract of land south of the Enos Woodward farm, which is now occupied by Isaac and Francis Bonear, and lived there for many years, late in life moving to Honesdale, where he died in 1846, aged seventy-four years. His children were Betsy (Mrs. Martin Kellogg), Lydia (Mrs. Dr. Stearns), and Abraham A., a resident of Damascus.

Dr. Lewis Collins, who is noted quite fully in the medical chapter, bought out the Woodward improvement. He was born at Litchfield, Conn., and married a daughter of Oliver Huntington, of Lebanon. Their children were Augustus, who located on the Charles Reed place, in Dyberry; Oristus, who was a practising attorney at Wilkesbarre, and afterwards president judge of Lancaster County; Lorenzo, who owned a farm in Cherry Ridge; Abner, who settled in Salem; Alonzo, of Jefferson, Lackawanna County; Philea, wife of Virgil Dibol, of Ohio; Lucius, twice sheriff of Wayne County, and for many years justice of the peace, in both Bethany and Cherry Ridge townships; Decius, who died in Salem; Huntington, who was a mill-wright, and built half of the mills in this section, and is still living with Lewis S. Collins, Esq., Theron and Aretius.

Augustus married Fannie Webster, of Manchester. His children were Claudius and Ann J., wife of Professor D. G. Eaton, of Packer Institute. Nancy Jewett, of Wilkes-Barre, was the wife of Oristus and his son is Rev. Charles J. Collins, of New York City. Wallace Collins, of Cherry Ridge, is the son of Lorenzo Collins and Sarah Sassman. Abner married Hannah Jones, and his children were Philander W., of Salem; Lysander, of California; Elizabeth, wife of Alfred Harding, of Salem; Julia A., wife of Thomas Cook, of the same place; and Hannah, Mrs. Warren Slocum, of Scranton.

Lucius married Sophia Sassman, and their children were Lewis S., Franklin and Worthington. The former is the owner of the homestead, and had been a valued citizen of the township; the others are dead. Decius married Elizabeth Sassman and was the father of Mrs. N. A. Hilbert and Miss Sophia Collins, both of Scranton.

In 1828, John Kirby came from Orange County, N. Y., and settled on the old Babylon pike, where he bought a tract of land. His children were Silas H., William, Charity, Jane (Mrs. David Whitney), Martha (Mrs. Henry Baker), Susan (Mrs. Clarence Reynolds), Mary, Robert P., John and Parmelia. Robert P. lives on the homestead, and has three children. John Kirby was in the War of 1812, and died in 1865.

Francis, Thomas and Isaac Bonear were from England, and settled on some of the Stryker property about 1835. Francis married Cynthia Kirby, and had eight children. Thomas married Sophia Taylor and had seven children, and Isaac was wedded to Cordelia Roberts, and his three children live near the old place.

Joseph Varcoe came from Cornwall, England, in 1835, and settled adjoining the Bonears. He married Elizabeth Doney, and left two sons, Davis, who lives in Lackawanna county, and William H., who lives at the homestead. The latter married Elsie Bonear.

John R. Hoadley, who has a fine farm at Hoadley's Crossing, was a son of John P. Hoadley, of Canaan. He located in Cherry Ridge in 1839, having been united in marriage to Laura Hoadley, a grand-daughter of Silas Hoadley, of Connecticut. They have no children.

In 1848 J. S. Kimble, a grandson of Walter Kimble, of Indian Orchard, located on Collins Brook, where he built a saw-mill which is still in operation. He has five children most of whom are married and live in the vicinity.

Henry Ilof, who is one of the commissioners of Wayne County, came from New York City with his family in 1849 and settled on the Milford and Owego pike. He has three grown children who have marrried and settled near him.

There was quite a little settlement of English people at the upper end of the township, and among the first to arrive was George Sandercock, who came from Cornwall, England, in 1849, and, after living a year or two on Smith Hill, located on the South road. He had five sons and two daughters. The latter are married and live West. Of the sons, William is a resident of Honesdale and Jack carries on a store at Arial.

John Male located on the farm adjoining Mr.

Sandercock in 1851. He also came from Cornwall, and has prospered. His two sons, Isaac and John, live with him at the homestead. The latter is town clerk. John Toms, who occupies a farm near by, is also a Cornishman, having come to this country in 1856. He married Martha A. Swingle, of Cherry Ridge, and has two sons and a daughter, all of whom live at the homestead. A year after Mr. Toms came John Richart, a native of Germany, settled near the Robinson tannery, where he remained until a few years ago, when he moved to his present location on the old South road.

Eben H. Clark located on the McLaury place, at Clark's Corners, in 1842. He married Maria G. Williams, and his children were Maria J. (wife of Jeff. I. King, of Honesdale), Perry A. (who was elected sheriff of Wayne County in 1877), Susan S. (wife of John S. Eno, of Brewsters, N. Y.), E. H. Clark (the present sheriff of Wayne County) and Emily E. (wife of William M. Sandercock, of Honesdale). The elder Mr. Clark was for many years a well-known hotel-keeper of Cherry Ridge.

Thomas Jordan, who died in October, 1868, aged sixty-seven, was born in England and came to this country in 1828, settling in Cherry Ridge on the place which still bears his name. He was prominently identified with the interests of the township, and is a conspicuous figure in its early history.

Mrs. Catherine Cowling was also an early settler. She was born in the parish of St. Issey, England, and came to this country with her first husband, Thomas Matthes, locating in Cherry Ridge. After his death she married Thomas Cowling, who had come to this country about the time she did.

Samuel Darling, who lived to be ninety-one years old, was one of the early residents of this township and occupied the farm that afterward passed into the possession of the Schencks. Mr. Darling died in 1858, leaving a number of children, most of whom have removed from the county.

The following names appear on the assessment list of 1847, the third taken after the erection of the township:

ROADS, TOWNS AND POST-OFFICES.—None of the first roads in this township were regularly laid out, and many of them were made by enlarging old trails. One of the first went from the Stryker place, past Enos Woodward's to Seelyville and Bethany. This is supposed to have been the road that Colonel Sylvanus Seely made when he moved his family to Seelyville, in 1805. The Salem and Bethany Road crossed Middle Creek near Middle Valley, and joined the road to Bethany. There was still another road that went from the Stryker place to Stephen Kimble's mill, at Traceyville. This crossed the Milford and Owego pike, near Mrs. Morgan's. Still another went from the Purdy settlement to Stryker's, Schencks', Waymart and the Moosic Mountain. None of these were ever surveyed, and most of them were vacated as soon as the county roads were put through.

When the stages on the Milford and Owego pike commenced to run, a post-office was established at the Darling farm. This was about 1824, and Thomas Lindsey was the first postmaster. He served until 1838–39, when William R. McLaury succeeded him, and the office was moved to Clark's Corners. Major McLaury was in office until 1842–43, when Eben H. Clark was appointed. Dr. A. B. Sloan came in about 1849, and a year later Lewis S. Collins bought out the store and became postmaster. He continued until 1857, when John J. Schenck was appointed, and served until 1875. William Sandercock, the present incumbent, then went into office, and appointed Perry A. Clark his deputy.

The post-office at Middle Valley was established in 1856, and Lyman Loomis was the first postmaster. He served until 1860, when Lewis S. Collins came in, and remained in charge of the office for eight years. He was succeeded by L. A. Robinson, who served until 1883, when William Box, the present postmaster, was appointed. Both these offices are reached by a daily mail, which is carried in the Hamlinton stage.

One of the earliest taverns of which there is any record is that kept by Daniel Davis, though when he first commenced to keep a public-house there were so few roads, and fewer travellers, that his place was hardly a tavern in more than name. Apollos Davis succeeded him, and Thomas Lindsey and Major McLaury also had taverns. As soon as the stages commenced running, almost every house along the road kept travellers, and many of them had regular licenses.

INDUSTRIAL GROWTH.—About the beginning of the present century Abraham I. Stryker built the first saw-mill in Cherry Ridge township. It was on the stream that has since been known by the builder's name, and was located opposite where Isaac Bonear now lives. The second mill in the township was built and constructed by Dr. Lewis Collins, on the farm where Perry A. Clark now lives. He intended to dig a ditch from Cajaw Pond and make it empty into the Stryker Brook, but the owners of the pond refused to let him have the water. The mill was then moved to Rining's place. In the year 1800 Daniel Davis made the first leather ever manufactured in Wayne County. He had but one vat, and the quantity produced was very small, though much sought after by the settlers, who pronounced it of excellent quality. Subsequently several others tanned a little, with indifferent success, and, until 1850, the business amounted to nothing. In that year L. A. Robinson came from New York and started a tannery at Middle Valley, which soon grew to be the largest in the State at that time. It was a three-hundred-and-sixty-five-vat plant, and employed from eighty to a hundred men. The annual disbursement for wages was about one hundred thousand dollars, and from six to eight thousand cords of bark were consumed. George Robinson, the father of L. A., came into the business soon after it started, and the style of the firm was L. A. Robinson & Co. In April, 1871, the establishment, which at this time was the largest in Northeastern Pennsylvania, was burned, together with ten thousand sides of leather, entailing a loss of fifty thousand dollars, covered by insurance. The tannery was re-built and ran until 1883, when the supply of bark in the surrounding country was found to be nearly exhausted, and the works were closed. In 1885 the property was sold to Michael Stahl. It was again burned in 1884.

Schools and Churches.—The first school in Cherry Ridge was a little log building within thirty rods of the residence of H. V. Schenck. Mr. Huntington Collins states that he can remember it quite distinctly. Nancy Ainsley was the first teacher, and was employed there about 1810. She was succeeded by Betsy Bircher, and a year later Robert Beardslee took charge. Oristus Collins and Joel Ames were also employed there. At present the township contains a number of good common schools, all of which are well equipped and largely attended; that of Middle Valley was one of the most flourishing in this section until the tannery closed.

About 1812 Elder William Purdy came from Paupack with his rifle on his shoulder to hold the first religious meeting at A. I. Stryker's. After this he used to come quite frequently, and the meetings were held at Dr. Collins' and other houses in the neighborhood. Later there was regular preaching at the school house, and among those who supplied the pulpit were Dr. Avery, Rev. Abel Barker and others. As the township grew more prosperous the question of a church edifice was agitated with good effect. In 1849 a subscription was started by Lucius Collins, and three hundred and twenty-four dollars were raised. The old paper, now in the possession of Lewis S. Collins, Esq., contains the following names:

Lucius Collins.	E. H. Clark.
Henry V. Schenck.	Isaac M. Moore.
Thomas J. Lindsey.	Benjamin N. Rider.
Charles Wilson.	Isaac B. Rider.

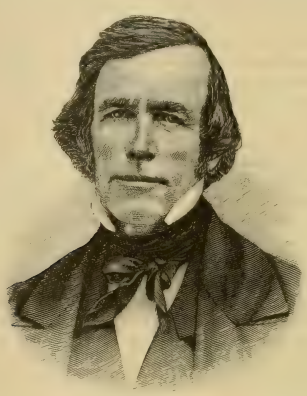
This Union Church, owned by the Presbyterians and Methodists, was erected in 1849, at a cost of above $550. The church, since that time, has undergone some repairs and has been enlarged. There is no debt upon the church property. For several years it has been used exclusively by the Methodists.



Cherry Ridge Circuit of the M. E. Church was organized in July, 1852. The first pastor was Marcus Carrier. There were three appointments, Cherry Ridge, Cherry Valley and Middle Creek. The pastors in order since the organization of the circuit have been Marcus Carrier, Charles White, Joseph Madison, Charles Smith, Alosi Johnson, William Sillsby, N. S. Reynolds, I. T. Walker, Cromwell Pierce, David Williams, Stephen Cramp, Richard Varcoe, J. H. Taylor, Olmstead, George M. Peck, J. L. Wells, J. B. Sweet, A. C. Olver and R. M. Pascoe.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

DR. LEWIS COLLINS.

Dr. Lewis Collins (1753–1818) a native of Litchfield, Conn., settled in Salem, Wayne County, in 1800, where he resided until 1804, when he bought two hundred acres of land in Cherry Ridge township, of Edward Tilghman, of Philadelphia, and rode on horseback the entire distance to make a bargain for the land and get his deed. He had bought out the right of Enos Woodward, the "squatter" on this land, previously. He erected a barn on the property in 1812, now standing in 1886, and during the remainder of his life made some other improvements, and cleared off a portion of the land. He was buried in Paupack graveyard, having died in that vicinity, caused a cold, in consequence of falling through a bridge with his horse and getting wet, while on one of his professional trips attending patients. A further sketch of his life may be found in the medical chapter of this volume. His first wife, Ruth Root, died in Connecticut, leaving one son, ship; Abner (1795–1875, a farmer, who resided in Lake township; Alonzo, born 1796, resided in Luzerne County Pa.; Philena (1798–1855), the wife of Dr. Virgil Dibol, resided in Ohio when she died; Lucius (1799–1875); Decius (1801–1870), a farmer in Salem; Huntington, born in 1803, a millwright, has followed that business throughout this part of the State, and has built over two hundred saw-mills; he resides on the homestead; Theron, (1805–1870)

Lucius Collins

Augustus Collins (1790–1829) who was a farmer, and died at Bethany. His second wife, Louisa (1763–1858) a daughter of Oliver Huntington, was a native of Lebanon, Conn. His children by this marriage were,—Oristus (1792–1884) a lawyer, who practiced his profession at Wilkesbarre, was for one term president law judge of Lancaster County, Pa., and died at Rye, N. Y.; Lorenzo (1794–1878), a farmer, lived and died in Cherry Ridge township; was a farmer in Cherry Ridge; Aretus, born in 1808, was a wheelwright, and died in the same township.

Lucius Collins, sixth son of Dr. Collins, married, in 1825, Sophia (1800–1866), daughter of John Sasman, a native of Hesse Darmstadt, Germany, who settled in Dyberry township in 1819. He began keeping house after his marriage in Bethany, where he served as constable, was elected sheriff of Wayne County in 1831, served one term and was re-elected to a second term in 1837. In 1840 he purchased the homestead property in Cherry Ridge township of his brother Oristus, and that year built the present residence. In 1841 he removed there with his family, and made the old homestead farm his residence until his death. Both himself and wife were members of the Presbyterian Church at Bethany, and after their removal to Cherry Ridge, he gave the ground upon which a Union Church by the Presbyterians and Methodists was erected, and continued to encourage and support religious work all his life. He was a man highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens, for his good judgment, integrity and unimpeachable character, in all the relations in life.

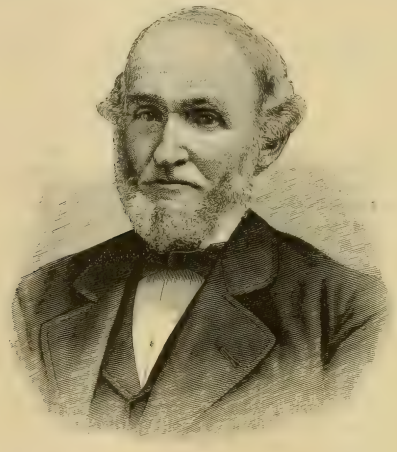
His only child who reached mature years is Lewis S. Collins, a man well known in Wayne County. He was educated at the old Beech Woods Academy, at Wilkesbarre and at Honesdale. He was always fond of mathematics, early gave his attention to the study of surveying and took instruction from Charles A. Collins, of Wilkesbarre, a graduate of Williams College. He succeeded to the homestead by purchase in 1866, where he has since resided. He has surveyed throughout Wayne County for thirty years, was deputy sheriff under Sheriff Eldred, book-keeper for L. A. Robertson & Co., tanners, at Middle Valley for six years, was elected county surveyor of Wayne in 1853, re-elected in 1874 and holds the office in 1886. He was elected a justice of the peace of his township in 1875, and by re-election has held the office since, a period of eleven years. He has an adopted sister, Fannie J. Bennet, but was never married.

JOHN R. HOADLEY

Was born in what is now South Canaan township, October 21, 1817. His father, John Price Hoadley, and Wareham Day, a brother-in-law of John Price, came from Branford, New Haven County, Conn., about 1810 and settled in Canaan township, Wayne County, Pa., and soon after this Abraham Hoadley, the grandfather, and his wife, Olive Price, also settled there from the same place, and they made their journey the entire distance on horseback.



Abraham Hoadley lived to be some seventy-five years old, but the death of his wife occurred several years earlier. Their children were John Price, Lucretia (was the wife of Wareham Day), Abbey, Charlotte, Miles and Louisa (who first married Mr. Forbes, and after his death a Mr. Weed.

John Price Hoadley died in 1822, aged about thirty years. His wife, Sarah Rogers, survived him, sold the farm upon which they had settled and, on account of ill health, engaged in millinery business near Waymart, which she carried on for several years. She died in Canaan township in 1843.

John R. Hoadley was their only child, and was but five years old at his father's death. On account of the ill health of his mother and the embarrassed condition of matters at his father's death, as soon as possible, he was obliged to care for himself. At the age of fourteen he began life for himself, and determined that if energy and industry, with his best judgment, would be a means of success, he would serve every honorable end to carve out a fortune for himself.

He received four dollars per month from William Sampson for his first season's work on the farm, and the same fall went to live with his wife's grandfather, Silas Hoadley, in the same township. The following spring he engaged with Luther Hoadley, son of Silas, to work for him until he should reach his majority, for one hundred dollars and a suit of clothes. He was let off from this bargain a little before the end of the time, but with full pay, and for two years he worked in a turning factory in Cherry Ridge. When he felt he could do this work for himself he, in 1841, started a turning-factory of his own at what is now "Hoadley Station," on the new road of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, which he carried on until 1847. About this time this company located and built their Gravity Road from Hawley to Pittston. For one year Mr. Hoadley assisted their engineer in locating the railroad, and in this work he showed such interest and calculation that the company engaged him to look after the saw-mills and lumber business located on Middle Creek. He superintended the lumber interests of their four saw-mills, one of which was located at "Hoadley Station," for some ten years or over, when the company gave him general superintendance over all their timber lands, comprising several thousand acres in Wayne County, which place he has filled since to the entire satisfaction of the company. In 1861 he purchased of the company seventy-one acres of land, upon a part of which "Hoadley Station" is built, and in 1866 erected his present residence. Mr. Hoadley is a man of correct habits, good judgment and sterling characteristics, and while he has been a resident of Cherry Ridge township he has been called upon to serve the people in an official capacity for many years, and has filled the office of school director, overseer of the poor, and on the board of election. He was first elected justice of the peace in 1859 and served three terms of five years each, when he declined the office. In 1884 he was again chosen to fill this office, which he now holds, in 1886. Although not identified as a member of any church, he is a liberal contributor to religious interests, and has ever sought to promote the best welfare of the community. He married, in 1845, Laura, eldest daughter of Luther Hoadley (died in 1872) and Sophia Sampson (who died in 1877, aged eighty-two years). She was born in Canaan township, where her parents resided, in November, 1823. Luther Hoadley was the son of Silas Hoadley, who also came from New Haven County, Conn., and were among the early settlers of old Canaan township. The other children of Luther and Sophia Hoadley were Ann (was the wife of Baldwin Lee, of Canaan township), James B. (a farmer in the same place) and Harriet (was the wife of Duncan Cameron, of Carbondale). The two sisters, Ann and Harriet, are both dead. John R. Hoadley and wife have no children.

PERRY A. CLARK.

His paternal grandfather, Clark, (after whom he was named) resided near Jewett City, New London County, Conn., and was a farmer. For a short time he resided in Dutchess County, N. Y., but returned to his old homestead where he died about 1825 at the age of seventy-five years.

He served in the Revolutionary war, and was in the Colonial army when the British took New London. His old gun or musket used when he was a soldier, fighting for the independence of the Colonies, is a relic of the past, and is owned by the subject of this sketch—his grandson. One daughter, Mrs. Reuben Brown, died in Cherry Ridge township; another, Mrs. Thomas J. Lindsey, died in Honesdale, and two sons served in the war of 1812. Another son—Eben Harris Clark, (1810—1879) a native of Dutchess County, N. Y., while a young man came to Greenfield, Pa., in 1832, and the same year married Maria E. Williams (1810—1862) who was born near Jewett City, Conn. She had come to Dundaff, Pa., to live with her sister Mrs. Thomas J. Read. Her father was Captain Williams who followed the sea and commanded a ship. He died on the sea. Shortly after his marriage he sold his farm and removed to Carbondale where he remained until September, 1842, when he settled in Cherry Ridge township, at what is now Clark's Corners. Here he rented the hotel for a few years and then purchased the property together with thirty acres of land. At this time this hotel, or inn as they were called in the early days, was a regular stopping place on the old stage turnpike from Milford, Pa., to Owego, N. Y., and where several stages changed every day, and replaced the weary steeds with a fresh relay of horses.

Mr. Clark enlarged his hotel, added one hundred and twenty acres of land to his first purchase, making one hundred and fifty in all and kept a public house until his hotel was burned in June, 1877. He was a man well read in public matters, a staunch member of the Democratic party, and for most of the time he was officially identified with Cherry Ridge township as its supervisor, school-director or held other official place. He was hospitable as a landlord, esteemed as a citizen, and conducted all his business upon the principle of integrity and justice. He married for his second wife Julia Cole, widow of the late Mr. Fanning, who survives him and resides at Worcester, Mass. His children are:—Maria J., born November 17, 1840, wife of Fred'k I. Keen, a liveryman at Honesdale; Perry A.; Susan S., born August 31, 1843, wife of John S. Eno, superintendent of the Borden Milk Condensing factory of Putnam County, N. Y.; Eben Harris, Jr., born November 6, 1845, elected sheriff of Wayne County in 1882, served one term, and deputy sheriff in 1885; Emily E., born July 4, 1850, wife of William M. Sandercock, in the lumber business at Honesdale.

Perry A. Clark, eldest son of Eben Harris and Maria E. Clark was born at Carbondale, Pa., April 2, 1842. He was educated in the district school at home, at the Normal school at Prompton, and at the Honesdale Academy, and for four winter terms was a teacher. While at school in Prompton he was drafted as a nine months man, in the first state draft, but being under age, did not leave home, but in the fall of 1864, being drafted for one year he obtained a substitute who went to the front in his place. Mr. Clark succeeded to the homestead property by purchase from his father, and built his present pleasant farm residence in 1878. For nine years in succession he was deputy under the following sheriffs: R. S. Dorin, John R. Ross, and E. M. Spencer, and in the fall of 1876 he was elected sheriff of Wayne County and served one term, when he returned to the homestead, and until 1886—the time of writing this sketch—has been engaged in improving his farm. He has been somewhat active in political matters, and besides being identified with the deputy and sheriff's office for twelve years, he has served his township as assessor, clerk and collector.

He married May 6, 1880, Annie Eliza, widow of the late Rev. Stephen T. Cramp, a Methodist clergyman. She was born at Rye, England, February 25, 1843, and was the daughter of James Oliver, a saddler and brush-maker. Her parents died when she was young. She came to this country in 1865, and was first married on October 2, of that year. She has one child, Stephanie L. Cramp, by her first husband, and by her second marriage, one daughter, Amy E. Clark.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE surface of this township is moderately uneven, divided into two valleys running north and south, the western being the one through which the old Belmont and Easton Turnpike used to run, now kept up simply as a township road. The Moosic range practically bounds the western portion or line of the township, though its extreme limit lies along what is now Lackawanna and Susquehanna Counties (formerly Luzerne, up to the line of Susquehanna County). The Moosic range is underlaid with deposits of coal of good quality.[2] The old "coal road" laid out by Thomas Meredith, who owned large tracts of coal land all along the western base of the Moosic, is still in existence. This road was built by "bees," the neighbors all turning out to assist. This is the road leading from where Henry B. Curtis now resides, and over to where the "city" now is.

[2] The writer places on record the prediction that coal will yet be found on the eastern slope, and mines be opened which will be worked as successfully as those on the western slope at "Forest City."

It was largely through the efforts of Mr. Meredith that the Oquaga road was built, running from Belmont to Laneboro', the underlying principle governing these operations being to develop the coal lands of Mr. Meredith and put a stop to the movements of the Delaware and Hudson Company, which began to assume, as he looked at it, the shape of monopolizing all the coal lands of that region. From causes not necessary to explain, it did not prove a success. This was in 1814. About two years previous a state road was laid out along the eastern base of the mountain, which was to connect Philadelphia with Owego, and is the one on which Chauncey Davenport, Uriah Colbath, William Ogden, Maurice Roche and others now reside. That part from where the road leaves, to intersect the old Belmont and Easton, was long ago abandoned.

The eastern or Lackawaxen Valley begins at the "divide" where the Moosic range separates the two valleys, in Mount Pleasant township, running thence southeasterly till it meets the West Branch at Prompton.

Clinton has a population of one thousand by the census of 1880, and holds its own very well, no material changes having occurred to lessen or increase it.

The township was formed from parts of Canaan, Mount Pleasant and Dyberry in 1825, by "order of court," the name being suggested by Judge Scott, Rufus Grenell, David S. West and Virgil Grenell being appointed, the first as assessor and the last two as assistant assessors.

Early Settlers.—The settlers were mainly from Connecticut. Prominent among them was Michael Grenell, a soldier of the Revolution, who died in Clinton February 12, 1858. He was born at Saybrook, Conn., March 20, 1752. He served under Putnam, and was a pensioner of the government at eight dollars per month. He was singularly methodical in his habits, devoting a portion of each day to its appropriate duties—labor, recreation, devotion, rest—permitting no one duty to interfere with another. When the statue of King George, which stood in Bowling Green, at the foot of Broadway, New York, was torn down in, 1776, and when the news of the Declaration of Independence was received there, Mr. Grenell took a hand in its destruction and assisted in making the occasion a "lively" one. He voted for Washington at each presidential election till the year of his death. His son, Deacon Rufus Grenell, resembled him in many ways, being systematic, temperate, scrupulously honest, deeply religious, living and dying a member of the Baptist Church. His active participation in everything to advance its spiritual and temporal interests made his death a great loss to the church and the community, of which he had been for half a century a valued member. In the direct line of descent was the deacon's son, Hon. Virgil Grenell, now a resident of Felton, Kent County, Del., who was also prominent in the settlement of the affairs of the township at its organization. He was elected a member of the convention to amend the constitution of the commonwealth in 1836. He was also commissioned by Governor Porter as associate judge for Wayne County to fill out an unexpired term, April 25, 1842; again July 5, 1842, for a regular term; and again by Governor Shunk, July 22, 1847. He was also a member of the Board of Revenue by appointment of Governor Bigler in 1852; was elected treasurer of the county in 1856, and was county auditor when elected to the convention. These appointments and elections came to Mr. Grenell unsolicited, evincing the regard in which he was held by the people among whom he had lived so long. The judge built the house where F. M. Gaylord now resides, and moved into it in 1824, residing there constantly till 1865 or 1866, when he removed, with his wife, son Miron and wife, daughter Ann and one or two grandchildren, to Felton, Kent County, Del., where he now resides at the age of eighty-seven, surviving his wife, who died in 1885. She was Miss Harriet Gaylord, sister of Mr. Giles Gaylord, father of Milo, F. M., Henry C., Remus M., Lewis, William A., Ella and Helen Gaylord, all married and at present living. Mrs. Davenport, the widow of Austin Davenport, who was, for a number of years, a justice of the peace of the township, and mother of Chauncy Davenport, is now living, in the eighty-fourth year of her age, is a sister of Judge Grenell and resides on the old homestead of her husband with her son. Mr. Gaylord's monument stands in the little church-yard of the Baptist Church, a short distance from the tannery built by Colonel Pratt. His widow, Mrs. Joanna Gaylord, survives him. She was a constituent member of the Baptist Church (which consisted of but sixteen members), and of the Mount Pleasant branch of the Peck family. To follow the genealogy of the Grenell family would require more space than can be given.

Some of the old settlers of course have a history, but, as it is not particularly identified with the township, beyond a simple residence, it hardly seems to require extended notice. "Uncle Sylvester" E. North, however, must not be left without a slight tribute to his memory. He was born in Connecticut, December 6, 1792, and died in this township March 3, 1883, his wife, Amanda, preceding him by six years and five months, having died October 3, 1856, at the age of sixty years, four months and fifteen days. "Uncle North" was an ardent Democrat of the old school, and it was his pride to refer to the fact of never having taken, or given, any of the government "shin-plasters," and about the last act of his life, before succumbing to his fatal sickness, was to present to Mrs. Haight, as a token of his regard, a silver dollar, which he had kept since the year he became "of age." When he settled on the land now owned by Virgil G. Gaylord, Esq., it was a wilderness. Here he pitched his tent, began to wrestle with the difficulties incident to that kind of life and when the messenger came he was ready. He had cleared up a beautiful and fertile farm and left it for his adopted son and daughter to enjoy. The fruit-trees, which had yielded in the years which had passed, so bountifully under his fostering care, had been matured from the seed. His memory is very precious with those who knew him best. What is said of "Uncle North" applies with equal force to Mrs. North. They left no children.

Ashbel Stearns sleeps in the little cemetery of the Baptist Church with his wife near, and at the left of the entrance. They were both among the early settlers and he was fond of relating incidents of life in the woods, when he had to "blaze" his way through the forest to Wilkesbarre some forty miles to have a grist ground, and how when an infant, cradled in a sap-trough, while his mother was boiling sap in the woods, a large bear began to make affectionate demonstrations on that sap-trough and contents, when a few gourdfuls of boiling sap gave a different aspect to the proceedings.

In a book now in the possession of Edward Norton, Esq., entitled "Annals and Family Record of Winchester, Conn., with Exercises of the Centennial Celebration on the 16th and 17th days of August, 1871," by John Boyd, the family record of all the settlers of Clinton, of the Grenell, Norton, Loomis and Griswold branches is given fully and completely, and any reference to them here is simply a resume of that record, except so far as they were identified directly with incidents of its development and subsequent history.

In the fall of 1812 a few small openings had been made and log houses built, scattered along the State road from Belmont to Colonel Stanton's, some twelve miles. In the summer of 1813 Levi Norton and a few others associated with him built a saw-mill on the stream between where now stands the Clinton Centre Baptist Church and the place where Aaron Wheeler's blacksmith shop now is, the sills of which are still visible in the bed of the stream, fairly well preserved. This was the first saw-mill built in the township. At this time, independent of the paths through the wilderness, there were few roads. What is now the "White Oak" road crosses the Lackawaxen river just above where the Baptist parsonage now is. This road was used till 1818, when Levi Norton built a saw-mill on the outlet of the White Oak Pond, just in front and a little to the right of the present residence of Mr. John Martwick, and over this road hauled his lumber to the Dyberry, near the Asa Kimble place, and rafted it to Philadelphia.

Previously, however, a road had been built which is the one beginning near the "Randall place," and on which now reside Orson Case, Esq. (who had held the office of justice of the peace for a number of years and is one of our most enterprising and substantial citizens), Mr. Joshua Stanton, Jonathan Dolph, Mr. Belden Buckland (another old-time Democrat, like "Uncle North," and one of the best citizens of the township, one who had never solicited a vote for himself, but had many times held positions of trust and responsibility through the partiality of his numerous friends), Patrick Coggins, "Squire" Jonathan Burns (who had met with more accidents and losses and come out of them safer and with better pluck than any man from Tipperary to Ballinasloe), and so on, by the way of the "old glass factory," (of which, by the way, in a few years at most, there will be not one stone to indicate where once was a large establishment, employing a great many hands,) to Bethany, the then county seat.

In 1820 a mail route was established from Easton to Mount Pleasant, and a post-office located where Francis F. Norton resides, then the residence of "Uncle Alva" W. Norton, who was made postmaster, and the office called Mount Republic. Mr. Norton held this position till 1851 or 1852, when the tannery was built, diverting the business from that part of the township, and through the influence of Colonel Pratt, who had been a member of Congress from Greene County, N. Y., the office was removed to where it now is, with Julius T. Alden as postmaster. Mr. John Storm, grandfather of Hon. Jonathan B. Storm, member of Congress from Monroe, then in this Congressional district, had the contract for carrying the mail once a week on horseback, but sometimes it was carried on foot. A young man by the name of Loosman was the next carrier. The Belmont and Easton turnpike was completed in 1821, and a few years afterwards a line of coaches was put on, and it became quite a thoroughfare. A hotel was kept in the building now occupied as a residence by Mr. Henry B. Curtis, and was a great resort of drovers on their way from Great Bend and all that region to Easton and Philadelphia, then the great objective points.

Uncle Alva, as he was familiarly called, was a man of fine abilities, and as civil engineer had surveyed a good share of the lands of Clinton and adjoining townships. He was the son of Levi Norton, who came to Clinton in 1812 and "foreclosed" on five thousand acres of land in Wayne County. He gathered an unmixed "Yankee" settlement around him and died January 21, 1823, aged sixty-four. The family of Levi (his wife was Olive Wheeler, born in Bethlehem, Conn., September 19, 1759, married to Mr. Norton January 21, 1783, and died May 25, 1838), were Warren W., who was the father of Hiram and Sidney M.; Alva W. (Uncle Alva), who was born August 10, 1791 and died in 1875; Sheldon, born November 26, 1793, died September 15, 1838; and the father of Edward K., familiarly known as "E. K."—K. for Kirby, after an old friend of the family. Sheldon was one of the first clerks of Wayne County, and married Harriet, daughter of Grenell Spencer, of Winchester, Conn., September 14, 1818. He died September 15, 1838. He was agent of the American Sunday School Union (headquarters in Philadelphia,) and the history of his life would fill a good-sized volume. As there were no railroads in those days he travelled through the southern and western states thousands of miles on horseback.

Uncle Alva was one of the old-time hard-shell Democrats till the Fremont campaign, when he made his home with the Republicans, and remained with them until his death. He died as he lived, a sincere Christian, respected by all who knew him and was a member of the Baptist Church for over fifty years. Uncle Alva always insisted that he organized the first Sunday-school in Clinton in 1813. Judge Grenell says, speaking of going to school, etc., "Three of us boys went three miles every day to school; this was in 1815. In 1816 Sheldon Norton taught school in our neighborhood; in the fall of 1817 I taught school in Mt. Pleasant township; in 1814 my father—that's Deacon Rufus —organized a Sunday-school in his house. Most of the children and young people in the neighborhood attended through the summer. The one 'Uncle Alva' speaks of as organized by him in 1813 I have no knowledge of." Of course there are no official records to harmonize dates, etc., but in either event it is highly creditable to Clinton that it had a Sunday-school in 1813 or 1814. Mrs. Davenport (the judge's sister) and himself are the only ones now living who attended the Sunday-school at their father's.

In the spring of 1822 Deacon Grenell bought two hundred acres of land, of which the site of the tannery, saw-mill and other buildings, now the church, parsonage, etc., occupy a part, and in the summer and fall of that year built the saw-mill, a portion of which still remains, near the county bridge, which is between it and the tannery. The judge took fifty acres of the purchase, also built a small house into which he and his wife moved. In 1824 he built the house which F. M. Gaylord now occupies, living there till they removed to Delaware in 1866. The next year after this mill was built, the road which crosses the Lackawaxen, near where is now the Baptist parsonage, was changed to where it now crosses over the county bridge.

The first settlers were succeeded largely by people who had emigrated from England, prominent among whom were Rev. Henry Curtis, a minister of the Baptist church, and his wife, who, immediately preceding his purchase of the farm on which he lived until his death, in August, 1867, lived in Bethany, and owned the mansion built by Mr. Jacob S. Davis, who was county treasurer when Bethany was the county-seat. Mr. Curtis was born at Ellston, Leicestershire, England, October 8, 1800. Mrs. Curtis (Eliza Banning) was born October 9, 1801, at Reading, Berkshire, England, and died May 26, 1879. Married March 13, 1824, in New York, Rev. John, father of the late Rev. Wm. R. Williams, officiating. She was of a family of five sisters and one brother, Alpheus Banning, all but her being residents of New York and Brooklyn, though but one at present survives her. Her sister married one Van Tassel, of an ancient family of Tarrytown, N. Y., mentioned in Diederich Knickerbocker's "History of New York." Sarah married Mr. John W. Avery, one of the old time merchants of New York, who still survives her and is vice-president of the old East River Bank. Mary, the wife of Mr. Jas. Lock, of the Brooklyn savings-bank; and Caroline, of New York—all deceased but Mrs. Lock.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis were the parents of Mr. Henry B., Euphemia P., John J., Dr. George R., Julia A., and Eugene K. The last named lives on and owns the old homestead at Edenvale, Clinton township, a "vale" of rare beauty and great fertility. Dr. George P. was a physician of superior ability, and his death, which occurred June 9, 1884, in the fifty-first year of his age, was a great loss, not alone for his scholarly attainments and skill, but his beautiful Christian life. John J. is a book-agent for the publishing house of A. S. Barnes & Co., of New York, and lives in Honesdale. Dr. Geo. B. died in Hawley.

Thomas and William Olver and their families, living at or near where they first located, in what was then Dyberry, but in the straightening of township lines Thomas was brought into Clinton; James and Wm. Giles, William Bates, Henry Gummoe, father and son and several others came from Cornwall, England,—all citizens of whom any community could be justly proud.

In the year 1849–50 Colonel Pratt, who had accumulated quite a fortune in tanning at Prattsville, Greene County, N. Y., furnished the means, and a large tannery was erected which used eight thousand cords of hemlock bark per year. The business was carried on with varying success till about 1882, when it was abandoned altogether and the timbers are being sold to work up into smaller buildings, barns, etc., and fire wood. The site, with quite a large tract of land, was purchased of Messrs. Grenell & Foster, who, in company with A. O. Hanford, since dead, had carried on the business of manufacturing shovel handles. Mr. E. K. Norton, of the firm, retired to conduct a large farm, since widely known as the "Ridge Farm." Judge Grenell also engaged subsequently in farming, and finally moved to Delaware and Mr. Hanford removed to Carbondale, entered into the employ of the Delaware & Hudson Canal Company and died there.

The sudden demand for bark induced the owners of bark land to slaughter the timber right and left, and millions of feet were left to rot where they fell; it proved a sad blow to the prosperity of the township—a waste of so much valuable timber which, if it could have been disposed of as fast as peeled, would have resulted in a vast accretion to the wealth of the township. However, the inhabitants, with indomitable enterprise and patience, have outlived this drain upon their prosperity, and it is a pleasant thing to note that they have recovered from it, and to-day it would be difficult to find a community more intelligent and prosperous than to be found in Clinton.

There are no records of any Indian tribes having made "Headquarters" here, though evidences of their having been here on their expeditions from the Delaware across the country to Great Bend, are quite numerous. Mrs. Louisa Curtis, daughter of the late Francis Griswold and wife of Mr. H. B. Curtis, has in her possession a number of Indian relics; stone pestles with which they pounded their corn; spears, arrow-heads, etc., all ploughed up on their farm.

Among the hardiest of the pioneers may be mentioned Francis and Horace Griswold. There were other members of the family; among them Sedato and Orrin. Francis cleared up the land which now includes the farms of Mr. H. B. Curtis; the old homestead, now occupied by Mr. Fred. Bucklisch, who married the widow of Mr. Griswold's son, Homer, who is the estimable daughter of Mr. Charles Van Meter, now of Susquehanna County. Mr. Loomis married the second daughter of Mr. Griswold, and built a very elegant house thereon, a striking peculiarity of which is, that the interior is finished of the wood grown on the farm; giving a finish equal to any of the finest imported, and the balusters are made of about the last material one would expect—Sumac. Nathan resides upon another farm, and has also erected an exceedingly tasteful house, finished in about the same manner and material, except the balusters. All these farms were cleared and made to increase an "hundredfold," through the indomitable will and faithful, steady and persistent labors of Mr. Griswold, whose memory is very gratefully cherished by the community in which he lived and by the people of the Baptist Church, of which he was a deacon for many years. He died September 8, 1869.

His brother, Horace, came from Massachusetts in 1810, to Butternuts, Otsego County, N. Y., and subsequently to Harmony, Susquehanna County, this State, and finally to Clinton, where he resided till the time of his death, which occurred March 3, 1880, aged seventy-nine years. He married a Miss Eliza McKnight, a Vermont girl. They had six children, Ashur, Robie, Malden, Mrs. V. G. Gaylord, John and one other. John enlisted under Captain James Ham, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, and was in the engagements at Winchester and Cedar Run. The entire Griswold family were remarkably hardy and active. Horace died a member of the Baptist Church. In the raising of the "bents" of the tannery frame, the strength manifested by him was simply marvelous, and was the means of preventing the death of about a dozen persons. When one of the "bents" had got to that point where it was impossible to raise it another inch, and it was almost certain death to let go, Horace appeared on the scene, took in the situation at a glance, jumped to the assistance of the men, and with his giant strength carried it over the centre of gravity, then, with a yell, "Set her up, boys," up it went to its place.

The old "Election House" was the schoolhouse of what now is the Independent district, and was such from the organization of the township in 1825, till the spring of 1853, when F. M. Crane, Esq., read a bill to change the location to its present. The original place was more central, but the present more populous.

Hotels in the township, as a rule, were not financially or morally a success, except the one on the old Belmont and Easton, which has only existed for more than fifty years; there have been but two. One was the tavern kept by Mr. John Belknap, and subsequently by a Mr. Hicks, and stood at the corner of the road opposite the "Ned Buntline" house. Afterwards the property passed into the hands of Mr. Jus-tus Sears, who occupied it as a residence, and finally exchanged properties with Mr. Alexander Conyne, of Prompton. Mr. Conyne then opened it again as a public house, under the name of the Clinton Hotel. He was accidentally killed by a tree falling on him in the winter of 1879. Shortly afterwards it was closed as a hotel. Mrs. Conyne and her sons carried on the farm till 1884, when about noon one day the building was discovered to be on fire, and burned to the ground. The property passed into other hands, and Mrs. Conyne, with her children, went west. The other hotel was kept by a Mr. Rhodes, in the building now occupied by Mr. George Moore as a private residence. He also carries on a blacksmith shop, and has been fairly successful in his business.

There has been but one grist-mill in the township. This was built in about 1853, now run by Mr. J. W. Bunnell, the immediate supervision being in the hands of Mr. Adna Clark, whose reputation as a superior miller has been established a great many years.

A small tannery was built on the "Perrine" property at the bend of the Lackawaxen, near the residence of Mrs. Grace Giles, which is directly opposite the Baruch B. Bunting property. This tannery was carried on as an "upper leather" tannery for several years, from about 1826 when it burned down. Part of the foundation is in existence yet, beneath the surface. Mr. William Giles purchased this property, on which his widow now lives, of Mr. John Torrey, and lived there from that time till his death, except a short period immediately preceding, when he lived in the house on an adjoining property, which he owned, and which was burned to the ground one day about noon. The little house immediately south of the creek and raceway of the grist-mill, and about seven acres of land, now owned by Mrs. George Wilmarth, was offered for sale for two hundred and fifty dollars, and stood there several years waiting for a purchaser. No one seemed willing to invest at that price, when it was withdrawn from sale for about a year and again offered at seven hundred dollars, and found a purchaser in a short time. This seemed to stimulate prices of real estate in this vicinity for a while.

The old tannery property of Colonel Pratt, that is, the farm property and buildings, have been sold to different parties. The grist-mill to Mr. I. W. Bunnell, who has added to it a cider-mill; some to Mr. George Moore and Andrew Daark.

The farm and mansion formerly occupied by Mr. Henry J. Alden were purchased in 1884, by the Messrs. Fleming, for about four thousand five hundred dollars; this includes, besides the farm buildings, the building erected and used for many years as the "tannery store," in which the post-office is kept, and has been, ever since its establishment, except a very short time when Mr. Ralph Case was post-master. He had it removed to the old "Dr. Strong store," then occupied as a general store, but now used as a barn and stable by Mr. George Moore. Mr. J. T. Alden was the first post-master. When he left and removed to Little Falls, N. Y., he was succeeded by his brother, who retained the office till Mr. H. J. Alden took an interest in the business (except about a year, when Mr. Ralph Case was post-master). He died about 1862, when H. P. Haight was appointed, and has held it till the present, with the exception of a couple of years, when Mr. H. J. Alden was appointed, but he having purchased an interest in a tannery at Herrick Center, Susquehanna County, it was again handed over to Mr. Haight, who is the present post-master.

The office originally was a "special" office, receiving its mail from Prompton in a "saddle-bag" under contract with H. P. Haight to carry it once a week for twenty-five dollars a year. It was practically a daily mail, as the teams hauling hides and leather to and from the tannery transported it free.

The compensation was subsequently increased to fifty dollars a year, till finally Mr. Bass, of Mt. Pleasant, carrying the mail via Bethany, daily made a detour, taking the Aldenville office in for the compensation allowed, and, after a time, it was made a daily route as it now is.

In the line of manufacturing establishments, those mentioned were the only ones, with a few minor exceptions. A saw-mill owned by "Boss" Thomas, a steam-mill, was run for a few years; one built by Mr. Augustus Loomis is now in existence; one owned and run by Orson Case, Esq., purchased from the estate of Mr. Amos Denslow, is still running quite extensively; there was another on "The Flats" below the grist-mill, owned by Stone & Graves, of Honesdale, and run by Robert Taylor. Nothing but a few stones of the foundation are now visible. Still another, owned by James and Amzi Burns, and subsequently by Mr. H. C. Gaylord, has been abandoned.

There is one now in active operation owned by J. L. Keene & Co. A cider-mill run by a small stream from the base of the Moosic, built by Mr. H. B. Curtis, has been, within a year, converted to other use by Mr. Curtis' son, George, quite an ingenious lad, who got from different persons the parts of an engine, boiler, etc., put them together, guided only by his own natural mechanical love of machinery, and now having learned the trade, has made a success in grinding meal, feed, etc., largely interfering with more pretentious establishments.

There have been no lodges or secret societies except one of "Sons of Temperance," which existed about a year, and was started in the house of B. B. Bunting, subsequently transferred to the upper room of Mr. Stephen L. Bunting's old "Curiosity Shop;" and one held in the hall of the upper story of Mr. Anson Wheeler's house, in 1863 or 1864.

The old curiosity shop of Mr. Bunting was an "institution" sui generis. Himself one of the most ingenious beings, he had accumulated a stock of material, including musical instruments, parts of clocks, watches, buz-saws, jig-saws, band-saws, wheels, cranks, parts of ploughs and all farming implements, wagons, sleighs, stoves, wind-mills, etc., etc.

Stephen L. Bunting was born in 1841, and died where his widow still resides, September 4, 1877. The old house where his father lived, stands in the lot on the path to the Maple Ford, about a hundred rods away, since torn down. He was the son of John Bunting, and both lie in the little church yard near the Baptist parsonage, near the northeast corner. "Milo John" has no monument to mark his grave, but his memory is treasured by his old neighbors and friends as having bestowed on him that too rare gem, an honest heart. Of the family of John, there were five brothers. John Baruch Bunting, who, in his late years, became a preacher in the Baptist Church, who had a natural shrewdness and ready wit which he used as occasion offered, with considerable tact, in his travels over the country, sometimes in his own conveyance, but quite as often on foot, carrying Bibles, religious works and tracts.

He is buried, and a neat monument marks his resting-place (erected by the Central Baptist Church, of Clinton), in the little cemetery there. Of the remaining brothers and sisters, there were Daniel D., who owned the farm now owned by the present justice of the peace, David Hopkins (since succeeded by the election of A. R. Peck, Esq., February, 1886). He died there March 9, 1872, sixty-one years old. Children: —Apollos, who with his brother John, built the little tannery on the Perrine place; Abija, a carpenter; Patience, who married David Saunders; Eunice, who married Squire W. June and moved West; Sally, who married Pierce Sloan, who owned the property now owned by Mr. George Moore; and Sylvah, who married Norman Weaver, who owned the farm now owned by Mr. William Monaton, and lived near the site of Mr. Monaton's present residence. They now are all dead.

Of the Olver family, independent of their descendants, Thomas, born in Cornwall, England, died December 6, 1875, and with his wife, who died January 22, 1885 (sixty-one years), rests in the graveyard near the parsonage. He was a sturdy, conscientious, upright citizen; William still lives a prosperous and highly esteemed member of the community, just across the line in Dyberry.

Heman Arnold, a brother of Hon. Phineas Arnold, associate judge of Wayne County, owned the farm which Michael Dwyer now owns, and died there about the seventieth year of his age, in 1858.

William Weaver owned the farm now in the possession of Patrick Low of Tanners Falls, but not occupied by him (Mr. Low). On the road leading from the "White Oak" past the

"G" house, used to be a log cabin occupied by one McLaughlin, widely, if not pleasantly known, as the "Dog's Nest," and along in 1848 to 1852, standing in the woods, now cleared away. After the tannery had got fairly at work this was a great resort for the hands. Whiskey could be had there which made the wilderness howl nights and Sundays, and with the barking and yelping of a dozen big dogs, more or less, made it necessary, even if it was back in the woods, to abolish it.

Mr. James Giles, born in Cornwall, England, came to this country in 1842, and after a few removals, located where he now resides on the White Oak road overlooking the White Oak Pond. His old house was partially destroyed in the great whirlwind in 1851, which uprooted large trees, blew down fences and leveled the Baptist Church. He subsequently built a new and larger residence to meet the requirements of an increasing family, and made a comfortable home, clearing up with great labor and patience, a large farm. Mr. Giles possessed, to a large degree, the esteem of the people among whom he located.

In March, 1865 (the 6th), his family was most grievously afflicted, four children were taken down with the "black" fever, John C., aged fifteen; Albert M., thirteen; Lavina E., twelve; and Ocena, five years old; all were buried the same day. Another son, William L., ten years old, died from the same disease, April 6, his father and step-mother, Mrs. Mary, who resided with them, soon followed, on the 11th day of May, 1865, and Thomas, the father, October 21, 1865, leaving to the family only three persons, Mr. James Giles and one son, Ralph, all of these are still living.

Silas McMullen, who formerly owned the farm now owned by Mr. John Martwick, was the father of a bright family of children. William, who resides in Carbondale; Charles, who lives in Waymart; and two or three others. He died September 29, 1860, aged fifty-one years; the result of an accident from being caught in some of the machinery of one of the stationary engines on the Delaware and Hudson Gravity road.

Henry Gummoe, Sr., the head of a family, died December 2, 1875, aged seventy years. He built the house and owned about twelve acres of land, now occupied by Daniel Rutaw, and was from Cornwall, England. He was methodical in every thing he undertook; his services were in constant demand as a wall-layer. Those fortunate enough to employ him knew that if he laid the wall it was good for a century. His son, Henry, still lives, a prosperous farmer, with hand and heart open to Christian charity and kindly feelings to all. He married Miss Elizabeth Crago, whose mother died in the fall of 1884, in the eighty-fifth year of her age, a woman of sterling worth and an humble Christian all her life.

The Crago family were residents in Dyberry, but it may not be improper to here mention the affliction which overtook the family, inasmuch as so many of them sleep in Clinton, "the sleep that knows no waking." This is the record. In 1885, December 5th, Mary, eleven years; December 12th, Ella, nine years; December 17th, Nettie, four years; December 18th, Sara, eighteen years; December 22d, Thomas, forty-eight years, the father. In 1874, February 9th, Catharine, thirty-seven years, the mother.

Levi H. Alden, Sr., who was the partner of Colonel Pratt in building the tannery, died at the residence of his brother-in-law, George L. Morss—since dead—near Carbondale, August 5, 1850, aged sixty-seven. Amanda (Tuttle) Alden, his wife, survived him till March 7, 1854, and died in Clinton in the house where Mr. Fleming now lives, sixty-one years old. H. P. Haight has the clock now which was part of the furniture of their beginning at housekeeping in Greene County, N. Y. Colonel Pratt's history, as a whole, does not properly belong in Wayne, Pike and Monroe, yet part of it does. The colonel invested some of his money here, and if he had made his residence here it would have stimulated enterprises in this county that have been slumbering for years and years, and even now await the hand of a Colonel Pratt, or one of that kind to bring them to light. He was generous as sunlight, systematic as Governor Marcy, and gentle as a child. The colonel subsequently sold his interest in the Clinton property to his son-in-law, Hon. Colin M. Ingersoll, of Hartford, Conn., but Mr. Ingersoll finding the practice of law was more congenial to his taste sold his interest to the remaining partners, and never visited Clinton again. After J. P. Alden withdrew Hon. James Dickson, of Honesdale, was taken in as a partner.

Simon J., the father of David and Willis W. Hopkins, died September 9, 1870, aged forty-one years. He was practically a self-educated man, with remarkable native talent, which was largely improved by observation. Of that family Samuel went West; David, a brother, who now resides in Parkridge, N. J., was prominent in many of the interests of the New York and Erie Railroad during the time when Fisk and Gould were its leading spirits, and afterwards began the publication of the American Sentry, a Greenback organ of considerable snap in New York. William, another brother, is a farmer, now living near the old homestead of the late Thomas Olver.

Fisher Case, and his son, Ralph, both lie in the Baptist burying-ground. Ralph was for many years in the employ of the Delaware and Hudson Company, having charge of the company's reservoirs in the township and vicinity. Ralph was singular in his way, a keen observer of men and things, and was postmaster under the administration of Marshal Jewell, and kept the office in the store of Sidney Norton. Mr. Case died in the "Perrine" House. He owned the farm and built the house now owned by Mr. Edward Moran.

In the line of dealers in general merchandise, now retired, Edward Gaylord was the first, keeping store, in what is now the "Mill-house," from 1849 to 1851; afterwards the "Tannery-store" was started, D. W. Emmons and William Gilmore being the principal dealers; this store has been kept by Judge Dickson, Jr., and L. H. Alden, and is now kept by C. H. Wilmarth, though the building is owned by the Messrs. Fleming.

The grist-mill has been under the management of Mr. James W. Fowler (father), James (the son), George and Aaron, belonging to a family of seven or eight sons, all millers, and good ones too. (James, the son, married Celia, daughter of William Bates, Sr.; George, married Eva, daughter of William Olver; and Aaron, married Maria, daughter of Rev. J. R. Remsen, pastor of the Baptist Church.) Subsequent occupants of the mill were Mr. Gabriel Howell and Mr. Adam C. Clark. Mr. Howell was from South Canaan, and Mr. Clark from New York.

Luther Ledyard, "Uncle Lute," owned and lived on the farm now owned and occupied by Mr. George Genther, and was quite prominent in the politics of the township. He was born in Brooklyn, Conn., in 1794. His remains were interred on the farm where he died. His wife, Roby, rests by his side. She died April 4, 1880, aged seventy-eight years and sixteen days.

Daniel Arnold, father of Henry and Charles, and of Milo Gaylord's wife, owned and lived on the farm now owned and occupied by Milo. From the elevation at the north of his residence a couple of hundred yards, a view is obtained, which, in extent and beauty, is hardly equaled from any point on the Catskills or the blue ridge of the Alleghanies. Mr. Arnold died in 1873, aged eighty-three, and was buried in the cemetery of the Central Baptist Church, Clinton.

Asa Stanton, who killed, in Warren County, the elk whose antlers have been in possession of the family for half a century, died July 7, 1883, aged ninety-three. William Giles was fifty-four at the time of his death, June 14, 1872. William Bates, Sr., lies beside his wife, Mrs. Betsey Bates, by the side of the main avenue, about midway of the cemetery. They were the parents of Samuel, William, Stephen, John, Robert, Thomas, and besides, the daughter heretofore named, Emma, wife of William Turner, of Clinton.

Mr. Philip Kennedy now owns and occupies the old homestead. John, the grandfather of John, killed the first elk that was killed in Wayne County.

Reuben Peck, the father of Albert Peck, Esq., who resides on the old homestead, and is one of the most estimable citizens of the township, and of E. M. Peck, now a resident of Carbondale, holding a very responsible position with the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, died January 13, 1870, seventy-one years old. His wife, Sally Ann, died October 29, 1875, aged seventy-four. She was the daughter of Benjamin King, of Mount Pleasant township, one of the old settlers there.

Julius T. Alden, of the firm of Pratt & Alden, and the oldest of a family of three brothers, also head of the firm of Alden & Cummings, leather dealers in New York, was born in Windham, Greene County, N. Y., February 18, 1821, and died at Little Falls, Herkimer County, N. Y.

He married Miss Roxy, the daughter of Carleton Emmons, of Oneonta, N. Y., and the sister of D. M. Emmons, now of Huntington City, W. V., who built the house now occupied by C. H. Wilmarth, and which has been occupied successively by Francis Olver.

The township has within its bounds several artificial reservoirs,—the "White Oak," "Long," "Elk," "Mud" and "Swamp," collectively holding a vast amount of water, utilized in periods of low water in the Delaware and Hudson Canal, to keep up the supply for floating the company's boats to tide water at Rondout, N. Y. In the purchase of privileges for these reservoirs,—dams having to be built, considerable management had to be attended to,—parties in the interest of the company, assuming that small dams only would be erected, and, in consequence, privileges for flowing would be purchased for a mere nominal sum. Notably was this the case in the leasing of the White Oak Pond, which it was said would be set back by a dam only twelve feet high, securing thus the privilege, and if required, the right to flood lands which it was deemed impossible to cover. The dam now measures twenty-six feet, making quite a difference in the amount of water.

Samuel T. Saunders purchased what is known as "the Island," a high point of land which the "White Oak" surrounded when shut back. When he died it came into possession of his son George, who, with his mother, wife and children, now occupy it. These reservoirs, or lakes, afford some very fine fishing, having been "stocked" by some of the lovers of that sport. McKnown introduced the black bass, while others, as George S. Purdy, Esq., supplied the streams with trout.

Mr. Erastus Loomis formerly owned the farm now occupied by Mr. Rude. He married Miss Mehitabel, sister of John Bradshaw and James Muzzey, she died several years since, and he still survives her, and is living with his brother, Hiram, at his tasteful mansion, about a mile north of the church, well preserved, and with a remarkably retentive memory, a moving encyclopædia of incidents connected with the early history of the township.

Newel Callander, once pastor of the Baptist Church, lived in the house now nearly adjoining the mansion of Mr. Loomis (H. P). Sidney Norton before he built where his son Myron and his mother reside, lived on the northeast corner of the road leading past Howard Buntings, and where it intersects the old Belmont and Easton turnpike. George Kingsbury lives on the farm where his father, Joseph Kingsbury, lived so many years and where he died. George was a great hunter in his day, and it is necessary only to mention bear or fox in his presence to awaken reminiscences of Clinton in its primitive days both instructive and entertaining. He married Mrs. Mary, the widow of James E. Belknap, whose sons, John and Harry, made an honorable record in the late Civil War, both losing their lives in the service. James was the brother of John, a relative by marriage of Hon. Nathaniel B. Eldred.

Henry Greiner, who was a soldier, lives on the farm adjoining the one occupied by Mr. John Belknap, and is the son of William Greiner, who formerly owned the farm now occupied by Mr. John P. Pithick. William subsequently moved to Seelyville, and died there. Henry's brother, Frank, who married a daughter of Mr. William Giles, died several years ago.

Mr. S. Benedict, late proprietor and editor of the Carbondale Advance, bought a part of what is now the farm occupied by the widow of Michael Moran, and built a house on it which was burned. He then went to Carbondale, and subsequently sold his property in Clinton to Mr. Moran, who occupied it till his death which occurred in 1886.

Samuel Walker, a great hunter, lived in a house standing nearly opposite the carriage house of Mr. E. H. Curtis. He went West, became quite a prominent personage, and died there in July, 1886. His wife was Maria, daughter of Mr. Jacob Faatz, largely engaged in the erection and conducting the business of the "Old Glass Factory" in Dyberry. Westwardly from thence over the high lands and off to the left, south from the "G." House lives Moses, the son of William Cole, one of Clinton's best farmers and citizens, at present an honored member of the Board of School Directors, which has given to Clinton a system of Common Schools second to none in the county outside the graded schools.

The Lackawaxen Turnpike was chartered by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, July 16, 1828, and an election of officers was held at Belmont, September 28th of that year, with Rufus Grenell, president; Jacob S. Davis, treasurer; and L. C. Judson, secretary. The latter was the father of "Ned Buntline." The following were elected as managers: Harry Mumford, Luther Stark, Thomas Slayton, John Crater, Levi C. Judson, Fisher Case, Virgil Grenell, Daniel Bunting, Seth Hayden, Benjamin Jenkins, Richard L. Seely, father of Hon. H. M. Seely (President Judge) and late president of the (now National) Honesdale Bank.

Governor David R. Porter, November 28, 1839, appointed Austin Davenport, Francis Griswold and David S. West commissioners to examine said turnpike road; and on the recommendation of the commissioners licensed the president, managers, etc., to erect gates for the collection of tolls from all persons traveling on the turnpike with horses, cattle, carts and carriages. This turnpike began at the Cochecton and Great Bend Turnpike near the village of Belmont, ran along the west branch of the Lackawaxen River, past what is now Aldenville, and intersected the Honesdale and Clarkstown Turnpike at Prompton, a distance of fourteen miles and two hundred and fourteen rods. After an existence of twenty-six years, it was surrendered to the several townships through which it passed in 1866.

Churches.—There have been four church buildings erected in the township, the oldest being the Central Baptist, organized November 10, 1831, though the members living in the vicinity who had withdrawn from surrounding churches, met to consider the propriety of organizing themselves into a separate church October 23d of that year. Their first church building was completed and opened for public worship in the autumn of 1846. This house being destroyed by a cyclone July 25, 1851, a new one was erected on the same site and dedicated January 24, 1855. This made two that were built up to that time. For a number of years previous to the constitution of the Baptist Church at Aldenville, the place had been occupied as an out station by pastors of the Baptist Churches of Bethany, Clinton and Honesdale. The labors of Rev. Henry Curtis had been abundant and continuous. A flourishing Sabbath-school had been organized and sustained by the Baptists. Prayer-meetings were held and March 1, 1855, a "Council of Recognition" was held in the school-house at which Rev. Zelotes Grenell was moderator and E. L. Baily, clerk, and with sixteen members was constituted the regular Baptist Church of Aldenville. In February, 1856, Mr. Curtis became pastor, and on the 9th of July of that year, the church building costing fifteen hundred dollars was dedicated. Its present pastor, Rev. James R. Remsen, was installed in May, 1871. In 1880, the 25th year of its existence was celebrated with appropriate services. This made the third church building erected in the township. The plot of ground immediately in front of the church was deeded to the trustees of the Aldenville Baptist Church and their successors in office The lot on which the church stands was purchased from the tannery firm for one hundred dollars.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was commenced later than the Baptist, but owing to the burden placed upon the latter in erecting two churches so soon and thus delaying the completion of their house, the Methodist Episcopal opened their house first, the Baptists, meanwhile, worshipping in the school-house. To the labors of Messrs. Thomas and William Olver and Mr. Charles Manaton are mainly due the erection of the neat and roomy church building. It is supplied with an Estey organ. It has had some able ministers. The lot on which it stands was donated to it by the tannery firm, and is of the same dimensions as the Baptists' lot adjoining, seventy-five by one hundred and fifty feet. It was repainted in the autumn of 1885. This was the fourth church edifice erected in the township since 1845.

SCHOOLS.—In the spring of the present year the question of discontinuing the Independent school district began to be agitated,—W. C. Norton, of the "Ridge Farm," and his brother-in-law, Mr. E. H. Ledyard, being actively engaged in favor of its being discontinued, while Mr. Harrison, on whose land the school-house still stands, William Rude, L. F. Norton, W. W. Davidson,—son of J. K. Davidson, Esq.,—Mr. A. R. Squires, and a few others, opposed. After considerable argument and examining of witnesses, his Honor decided that it must "go," and the future historian will not have to incorporate in his legends the existence of an Independent school district in Clinton township. The spring term of court decided that,—and now the directors have entered into contract with parties to erect an additional school-house on lands of Mr. Rude, near the Central Baptist church.

The officers of the Independent school at the time of its dissolution were: Perry Saunders, president; Charles E. Howell, secretary; and Chauncey Davenport, treasurer.

The township board of school directors consists of Henry Greiner, president; C. H. Wilmarth, secretary; John Dolph, treasurer; H. B. Curtis, James R. Pethick, and Moses Cole.

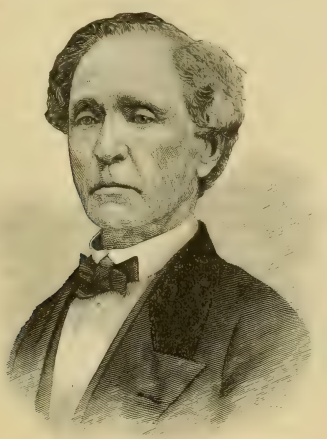
George Curtis is now engaged in the erection of a steam flour and feed mill at Forest City. Other operations of the present are the erection of a hotel there by James Fleming, who was also made postmaster there, vice William Pentecost, and the erection of a steam saw mill by Theron and Earl (sons of H. P.) Loomis.

Forest City being a new mining town on the western border of Clinton, the township is represented quite extensively in its enterprises; and, independent of its mining interests, the township has contributed largely to its general prosperity, which, if it shall be permanent, will be a source of pride to the people.

ALDENVILLE.—With a population of one hundred, is situated in Clinton township, Wayne County, nine miles northwest of Honesdale, the county seat and shipping point.

Following is the directory of the village:

Irwin Bunnell, flour mill; H. P. Haight, dealer in stocks and postmaster; Albert R. Peck, justice of the peace; J. L. Keene & Co., saw mill; George Moore, blacksmith; E. K. Norton, live stock; W. C. Norton, live stock; C. H. Wilmarth, general store.



BIOGRAPHICAL.

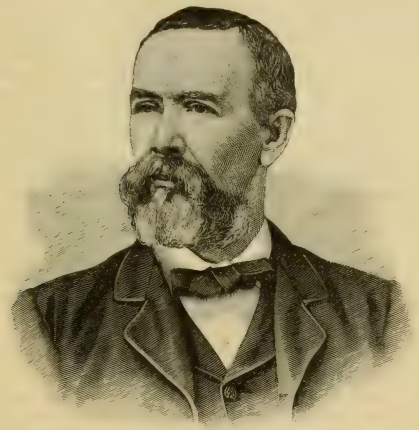
ERASTUS W. LOOMIS.

The Loomis family is of English origin, the paternal ancestor, Joseph Loomis, having emigrated from Braintree, Essex County, England, in the ship "Susan and Ellen," which sailed from London April 11, 1638, and arrived in Boston July 17th of the same year. In the following year he moved with his family, consisting of his wife and five sons and three daughters to Windsor, Litchfield County, Conn. Of his sons, Nathaniel was born in England, and married Elizabeth, daughter of John Moore, November 24, 1653. He died August 19, 1688. His children were Elizabeth, Nathaniel, Abigail, Josiah, Jonathan, David, Hezekiah, Moses, Mindwell, Ebenezer, Mary and Rebecca. Of these David was born January 11, 1667; married, December 8, 1692, Lydia Marsh. He died January 9, 1751. His children were Lydia, David, Aaron, Hephzibah, Eliakim, Elizabeth, Richard and Hannah. Aaron was born September 5, 1686; married, February 5, 1718, Elizabeth Horman, who died April 15, 1783. He died September 13, 1773. Their children were Deborah, Grace, Aaron, Mindwell, Moses, Abner, Esther, Ephraim, Richard, Eli, Issachar, Naomi, Abiah and Lemuel.

Ephraim was born April 1, 1731; married, October 31, 1756, Ruth Hifford; for his second wife he married, October 18, 1764, Jane

Campbell. He died April 4, 1812. His children were Ephraim Ruth, Amy, Aaron, Solomon, Jane, Silas, Bildad, Rebecca and Elias. Of these Ephraim, Jr., was born July 12, 1758; married, October 30, 1784, Jane Fyler, who died March 30, 1789; married, second, July 20, 1789, Zervia Hill. He died in 1824. His children were Reuben, Oliver, Ephraim, Asahel, Zerviah, Ruth, Ephraim, Charles G., Roman and Caroline. Reuben

E. W. Loomis



Loomis, or the father of our subject, was born in Torrington, Litchfield County, Conn., October 9, 1785. At the age of seventeen he became a member of his uncle Stephen Fyler's family, with whom he resided until he reached his majority. He then spent some time in New Hampshire, working on a turnpike. After his marriage, in 1807, to Miss Sarah Westland, who was born in Windsor, Hartford County, Conn., November 25, 1787, he worked at farming or anything which offered until January 18, 1817, when he loaded all his household goods, his wife and three sons (the eldest but six years old) into a large covered wagon, and, with two yoke of oxen as motive power, started for Mt. Pleasant, in Wayne County, Pa., one hundred and fifty miles away. At Mt. Pleasant they had a distant relative, whom they called uncle Ichabod Demens, and at whose door the two yoke of oxen and wagon, with its cold and weary occupants, came to a halt in the night of January 27th, just nine days after starting. Erastus W., though but six years old at the time, well remembers that long ride in mid-winter, and the joy they experienced when, crying with cold and hunger, they reached Uncle Demens' door. Mr. Loomis bought fifty-seven acres of wild land adjoining Uncle Demens' farm, and at once commenced the work of building a small log house and cutting away the timber around the same. During the winter the family lived with Daniel Roberts, who was a widower and was glad to have Mrs. Loomis look after his house and little ones.

On the 1st of June following their arrival the family moved into their own house, which was of the most primitive make. The fire-place was but a few feet high, and, for want of a chimney, the smoke was allowed to escape the best way possible. To his farm there was only a lumberman's road, and the country for miles around was new and wild. Deer, wolves, panthers and bear were plenty, and Mr. Loomis kept his table well supplied with venison and other game. Erastus W., the eldest son, remembers well going to sleep many a night with the howling of wolves sounding in his ears, and that his father's and their neighbors' sheep were often killed by them. The family for years saw hard times and always hard work. One winter the steady cold weather froze the dams, and the mills stopped running, and the whole neighborhood was out of flour, and, with only potatoes to eat, the settlers saw hunger staring them in the face. Finally Uncle Demens, with oxen and an old sled, started for Mr. Keen's mill in Canaan township, and, with flour for the whole neighborhood, returned just at night of a winter's day. Mr. and Mrs. Loomis lived to see the wilderness changed into farms and the log houses replaced with more pretentious ones, and with prosperity came schools, churches and a better civilization. They cleared their farm, built farm-houses and barns, reared a family of children, and passed away mourned and regretted by those who knew them best. Mr. Loomis was for many years in the militia service, and was a lieutenant both in Connecticut and in Wayne County. He was a Democrat, but not an active politician. Mr. Loomis died November 10, 1849; his wife, August 4, 1866. To them were born children as follows: Erastus W., Oliver H., born in 1812, February 20; Daniel D., born November 27, 1814; Reuben F., born June 18, 1817; Hiram P., born December 9, 1819; Marietta, born January 2, 1821, and Lucretia J., born December 25, 1823. Hiram P. married, May 20, 1846, Laura Griswold, who was born July 7, 1826. Their children are Theron O., born February 25, 1848; Oliver G., born August 16, 1857, died April 21, 1851; Helen A., born February 21, 1860, died November 17, 1860; and Francis E., born December 17, 1862. Erastus W., the subject of this sketch, was born in Torrington, Conn., April 9, 1810. Until seventeen years of age he remained with his father, laboring as soon as old enough for the common good. He then went to live with Francis Griswold, with whom he remained, working by the year, until he was thirty-one years old. Part of the time he received ten dollars per month, and paid his wages until he was of age to his father. On the 20th day of May, 1841, he led to the altar Miss Mehitabel Muzzey, who was born February 22, 1819, and was daughter of Pliny and Mary (Draper) Muzzey. They were Massachusetts people and from a prominent family. They moved into Wayne County about 1825, and bought the farm now owned by Hiram Loomis. In August, 1841, Mr. Loomis bought of W. W. Norton the farm now owned by William Rood, and the newly-married couple commenced life thereon. It was in a bad condition, and Mr. Loomis at once commenced the work of improvement. The house and barns were repaired, fences built and fields cleared, thus doubling its value and making it a pleasant home. Mr. and Mrs. Loomis were for nearly half a century members of the Baptist Church, and for many years both sung in the choir, she as leading soprano, he as tenor. The land on which the church stands was donated by Mr. Loomis. For several years before her death Mrs. Loomis was an invalid and a great sufferer, which she bore with Christian fortitude. She passed away October 18, 1863, leaving a void in Mr. Loomis' home that could never be filled, and four years after he sold the farm, since which time he has lived with his relatives. Mr. Loomis is one of the few who has seen Wayne County a wilderness and now sees it a thickly settled country. The howl of the wolf he hears no more, but, instead, the whistle of the engine and the whir of the mowing machine and reaper; and now, at a ripe old age, he is awaiting calmly and without fear the end of a long and well-spent life.

ORSON CASE.

Among the self-made men of Wayne County, men who commenced in life without a dollar, and by energy, integrity and industry have made for themselves a position among their fellow men and a competency, we find the name of Orson Case, of Clinton township, Wayne County, Pa. He was born at what is now known as Hop Bottom Station, Susquehanna County, Pa., on the 11th day of March, 1836. Bela Case, the grandfather of our subject, was born in Lyme, Conn., where his ancestors settled when they came to this country. He, Bela, was among the early settlers of Susquehanna County, Pa., coming to it when it was an almost unbroken wilderness, when panthers, bear and deer were to be found in great numbers. Orson Case, Sr., son of Bela Case, was also born in Connecticut, and came when small to Susquehanna County with his father. He learned the mill-wright trade, and became very skillful, and was sent for from far and near to repair old mills and build new ones. He built many of the mills still to be seen in Susquehanna and Wayne Counties, Pa., and in adjoining counties in New York. When the War of the Rebellion broke out he enlisted in Company A, One Hundred and Seventh Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; mustered October 6, 1862, and discharged February 26, 1863. He participated in several battles, the most important one being the battle of Fredericksburg. He was discharged by a surgeon's certificate of disability, and came home sick with throat and lung troubles from which he never recovered. He died March 31, 1876. He married Miss Ann Eliza Smith, who came from Connecticut where her ancestors had resided for many years engaged in tilling the soil. To Orson Case, Sr., were born children as follows,—James G., Marcus now deceased, (who served in the Union army and was in many skirmishes and battles), Jane E., George W. (who served three years in the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Calvary, and saw and took part in many a hard fought battle), Orson, Jr., Malvina, Louisa, Jerome (who also served in the Union army a year and saw active service), Henry and Sarah.

Orson Case, Jr., of whom this sketch is written, commenced working with his father for wages when but fourteen years old, which may be said to have been his start in life. He learned the mill-wright trade and followed it several years. We next find him running saw-mills at different points in Pennsylvania and New York. When twenty-two years old, with the money he had saved he purchased forty acres of his father's farm near Hop Bottom which he kept until 1864, when he sold out, and with his family came to Wayne County and bought of Amos Denslo, the saw-mill and farm he now owns. He has rebuilt the house, built out-buildings and many rods of stone wall. The fine fruit his family now enjoy is the result of his skill and perseverance in budding, pruning and planting trees. When a small boy he many times escaped well-deserved punishment at his mother's hands by hiding under the bee-hives. He then learned that they would not sting him, and formed an attachment for the little workers which has grown stronger with advancing years. In 1866 he purchased a few swarms of bees in the old style hive and began raising them. For eight years he kept on in the old way of bee culture, and then commenced to make them and their habits and culture a study. He bought and studied works on bee culture, and found that the successful handling of bees was a science, and that the more he watched and studied, the more he admired them. He built a bee-house, and changed his old hives for the most improved make until he now has a hundred of the best pattern of hives, no two of which are painted alike. In addition to deriving a vast amount of pleasure from the culture of honey bees, he has made it a financial success, and intends to keep his swarms up to an even hundred. Mr. Case has always been a Democrat, and has taken an active interest in his party in Wayne County. He has been a delegate to the county conventions at different times, and has held minor township offices. He is now holding his second term as justice of the peace. He is and has been for eight years a member of the Masonic Fraternity, and has taken two degrees of the Star Lodge Chapter and Knights Templar. Mr. Case, his wife and daughters are members of the Baptist Church of which he is now trustee. On the 13th day of July, 1864, he was joined in marriage to Miss Orpha A. Alden, who was born in Windsor township, Broome County, N. Y., January 13, 1842. Mrs. Case is of English origin. Her grandfather, Benjamin F. Alden, came from Great Barrington, Mass., and settled in the wilderness in Windsor township. Benjamin F. married Hannah Graham, who bore him the following children,—Barnabas, Timothy, Benjamin F., Jr., Sophronia, Naomi, Saloma (twins) and Almida. Barnabas married Margaret Snyder, and their children were Eliza, Jane, Timothy P., Philip H., John C., Almaretta, Sophronia J., Hannah P., Lydia A. and Orpha A.

Mr. and Mrs Orson Case's children are Effie E. (born March 30, 1867), Sherman A. (November 13, 1869, died March 30, 1873) and Bessie O. (September 1, 1873, died October 30, 1873).

was born in Dyberry township, Wayne County, Pa., on the 28th day of October, 1833. His ancestors came from Germany about 1820 and settled in Lackawanna County, Pa., at a place called Newton. The first to settle as above set forth was Paul Greiner, Henry's grandfather. He lived for a time in Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, then emigrated to St. Clair County, Michigan, where he passed the remainder of his days. His children were Henry, William, Jackson, Christian, Hannah and Sophia. Of the sons Henry moved to Holmes County, Ohio, in 1845, where he died, leaving a family of children. Jackson and Christian went with their father to Michigan where their descendants still reside. William, the father of our subject, was born in Germany and came with his father to this country when but eight years of age. He learned the glass-blower's trade and worked in the Bethany Glass-Factory. He finally left the glass-works and moved on to a farm he purchased in Clinton township, in Wayne County. He lost a thousand dollars by the failure of the glass-works, which made paying for his farm a difficult task, and a task his children were, as soon as old enough, called upon to assist in. He died in Seelyville, Wayne County, in November, 1881. He married Miss Charlotte Greiner, who bore him children as follows: Henry, William F., Abram, Jackson, Mary E. and Julia E. Henry grew to man's estate in Clinton township, receiving only such education as could be obtained by a few months' attendance at the winter schools of his neighborhood. The quiet life of a farmer which was being led by young Henry was ended, when, in 1861 the slaveholders' rebellion broke out. He was an ardent Republican as were all his brothers, though the father was a Democrat. Fired with patriotism, Henry early in the summer of 1861 joined with others in the attempt to raise a company in their vicinity, but failing in so doing and feeling that his country needed the services of her young men he enlisted about, October 15, 1861, in Company H, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

Henry Greiner.

The regiment was soon sent to the front and saw hard service. Among the many battles and skirmishes participated in by our subject were Lee's Mills, in April, 1862; Williamsburg, May 5, 1862; Chickahominy, May 19, 1862; Seven Pines, May 24 to 26 (inclusive), 1862; Fair Oaks, May 31, 1862; Bottom Bridge, June 27 and 28, 1862; White Oaks Swamp, June 30, 1862; Carter's Hill, July 2, 1862. Becoming completely disabled by sickness while at Yorktown, he was discharged December 6, 1862, and returned to his home in Wayne County where he remained till February 15, 1864, when, feeling that more men were needed to crush the rebellion, he enlisted in the Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, afterwards called a Provisional Regiment, and nearly cut to pieces in the Wilderness Campaign. In this campaign Henry took part in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Coal Harbor and in the long and arduous siege of Petersburg, Va. In making a charge at Petersburg his company lost all its commissioned officers and all its non-commissioned officers but one, and out of one hundred and fifteen men only forty were left for duty. His regiment was on the picket line the night Lee's army retreated from Petersburg and Henry and his comrades were the first to learn of the retreat. The regiment was one of those which took possession of the city, and here he remained until December 6, 1865, when to save his life he was honorably discharged and reached his home a physical wreck. He has partly recovered his health but will never be a strong man again. In 1867 he purchased the farm on which he now resides. The house and part of the outbuildings he has built, and here he intends to spend his days. In politics he is an ardent Republican and one of whose Republicanism there is never any doubt. He has never cared for office and has held only minor township offices. In the month of February, 1867, he was joined in marriage to Miss Elizabeth A. Giles, who was born in Clinton, March 21, 1846. She is the daughter of William and Grace (Matthews) Giles, both of whom were born in England. Mr. Giles came to this country in 1841 and worked on a farm near Honesdale by the month and thus obtained a start in life. He, in partnership with his brother James, bought the farm now owned by the latter, his part of which he sold to his brother and then bought one on his own account. He died on the farm now owned by his wife, near Aldenville. His father and mother, Thomas and Elizabeth Giles, came from England after William did and settled in Wayne County, where they passed the remainder of their days. To Henry Greiner and wife have been born the following children: Lottie I. (born March 15, 1869), Gracie M. (born May 1, 1870) and Charles F. (born December 9, 1871).

CHAPTER XX.

DYBERRY TOWNSHIP.

THERE is nothing in the county records to show the exact time at which Dyberry was erected as a separate township, and the proceedings of the court, the names of the viewers and other details have been lost. It was probably erected in the spring or summer of 1804, since the first assessment was valued at a joint meeting of the assessors from the townships of Buckingham, Damascus, Dyberry and Mount Pleasant, held at the house of Elijah Dix, in the latter township, December 7, 1804.

Dyberry was the first township taken from those erected in the excision of Wayne from Northampton County, and there has always been some dispute as to the origin of its name. Tradition, as handed down through Mrs. Isaac Brush, has it that a man named Dyberry was one of the early settlers, and built a cabin on the east branch of the creek. His was the first death in the new township, and it was named in his honor. Another version of the story is that in Dey's clearing there grew some rare berries, of much the same variety as "the Bunting Strawberry" mentioned in the chapter on Bethany Dey's berry patch, soon became a noted place, and when the township was erected, the name Dyberry was given to it. Both traditions have their supporters, and to one may be given as much credence as to the other.

Dyberry drew its original territory from the townships of Damascus, Palmyra and Canaan, but has been much reduced in area by the subsequent erection of Berlin and Texas from portions of it. It is at present bounded by Mount Pleasant and Lebanon on the north, eastwardly by Oregon, on the south by Texas and on the west by Canaan and Clinton. Its soil is varied and of good quality, and its beautiful hills roll gently to the northward, broken by many brooklets and several ponds. It combines scenery to be found in few townships, with a wonderfully salubrious atmosphere, and is traversed by good roads. The main streams are the Dyberry and its tributaries, which drain the eastern portion, and Jennings' Brook, that lies in the western section. In the northwest the hills slope away to Long Pond, and Third, Second and First, or Jennings' Ponds are in the western portion. From the latter most of the Honesdale water supply is derived.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.—Those who first settled in the present limits of the township were doubtless led there by the fertility of the soil and beauty of the country, but after Bethany had been selected as the county-seat, the settlement became, in a measure, perripheral and progressed rapidly. Hence it is that there seems to have been a constant and unceasing tide of immigration during the first two decades of the present century. After that, Honesdale at first divided and then usurped the new comers.

A man named John Kizer seems to have been the first settler, but where he came, or whither he went is not now known. In 1797 he completed a hut on the place where John Nelson now lives, and into this Thomas Spangenburg moved in 1798. He had moved from Sussex County, New Jersey, bringing his wife and household goods in a rude vehicle, to which he had a single ox harnessed like a horse. He had made two trips to this section before, the first being in 1794. His memory of the early days was very vigorous, and a short time before his death, in 1864, he dictated his history to Phineas G. Goodrich, Esq., through whose courtesy the original manuscript has been placed in the writer's hands. As portions of it have never been used, the narrative is given almost entire :

"I was born in Sussex County, New Jersey. When I came into Wayne County—or what is now Wayne County—for the first time, in 1794, I crossed at Monroe ferry, two miles below Milford. At the latter place there were but two or three houses. The first house west of Milford was an old stone tavern, built by Andrew Bray; next the old Lot tavern, then seven miles to Shohola farms; next Blooming Grove, there Uriah Chapman, Esq., lived; there I stopped a week to hunt; then I came to the Narrows, where Ephraim Kimble, Sr., the father of Asa Kimble, lived. There I found William Schoonover, the father of Daniel, Levi, Jacob and Simon Schoonover. Levi Schoonover, born that year, was the first white child born on the Dyberry. I then came on to Wilsonville. Several men lived there who were at work on a factory at the mouth of Paupack. The next place was Paupack Eddy; there lived Ruben Jones, an enormously large tall white man, and his brother, Alpheus, and their sister, Widow Cook. Elisha Ames lived on the David Bishop farm. I next came to the Benjamin Haines place, since known as the Jonathan Brink place; then to the Walter Kimble farm, now owned by Bulkley Beardslee; from there I came to Tracyville. There was an old tub mill to grind corn, built by Israel Kelley, which had been deserted. Any one who had anything to grind went and ground it. Then I followed a path over the east side of Irving Cliff and came down to where Daniel Schoonover lives.

"This, as I said, was in 1794, and in October of 1795, Walter Kimble sent for me to score square timber. I came up and worked till about Christmas, when I went back to New Jersey. I came back again in 1706, and helped to get out the timber for the saw mill, in which Jacob Kimble was the principal owner, remaining until they put up the peat-stack. The water wheel was made by a Mr. Manning. We had a hard job to raise the mill, which was the first built above Wilsonville. At this we had no courts, and the nearest justice was John Brink, Esq., afterwards Associate Judge. The next winter I went back to New Jersey. In the spring of 1797 I came back and worked for Walter and Benjamin Kimble for twelve dollars a month, doing all kinds of work, and returned again in the fall to New Jersey. I was married to Susan Headley, January 2, 1798, and on the 9th of February, the same year, came up with an ox team and moved into a hut that one Keizer had built in 1797, on the place now occupied by John Nelson. Samuel Smith built on the other side of the Van Dusen Place, and Conrad Pulis built on the old Pulis place. Richard Nelson built against the Big Eddy. They came the same night I did. That was the year Wayne County was set off, and the first court was held at Milford. The sheriff took for jurors whom he pleased, and they received no pay. That year the county was organized into eight militia companies, and an election was held at Watsonville to choose officers. John H. Schenck was elected Lieut.-Colonel; Ephraim Killam, major of the first batalion; Samuel Stanton, major of the second batalion; William Chapman, captain of Palmyra; Ephraim Kimble, captain of Lackawaxen; Jesse Drabe, captain of Buckingham; John Tiffany, captain of Mount Pleasant; Asa Stanton, captain of Canaan; Edward Doyle, of Buckingham; Silas Woodward, of Dyberry; I was elected ensign under Woodward. There was another election in 1800, at which I was elected captain of the Dyberry Company. I was re-elected several times.

"In 1798 there was only one election district in Wayne County, and that was at Elijah Dix's, in Mount Pleasant. There was no road at this time except by a trail marked by topped bushes and barked trees. I went there in 1799 to vote for governor. Two went from Cherry Ridge and three from Dyberry. Only forty-five votes were cast in the whole county. The next election district was at Wilsonville.

"I killed in Bethany one elk, two wolves, four bears and thirty-seven deer, and I killed all but the deer before 1800. My oldest daughter, Betsy, was born on the Nelson place in 1799, and is the wife of John Raymond, Esq., of Scranton, Pa. In 1800 I moved upon and bought the land which is now the farm of widow Mary Stephens. My daughter, Catharine, was born in 1803; my son, John S., in August, 1812; and Esther, in December, 1820. My second daughter, Phœbe, was burned to death by the accidental and sudden destruction of my house by fire; she was thirteen years old at the time. I moved to Bethany in 1817, and kept a boarding house for many years."

Esquire Spangenburg was born in Sussex County, N. J., June 17, 1775. His father was a near relative of the Moravian minister Spangenburg, who came from Germany with his flock on the same ship which brought John and Charles Wesley, on the first visit. He had been educated for the law, and gave his son the best education he could afford. It was this that made the latter a prominent figure in the early history of the county. In 1806 he was elected a supervisor of the township, and served with John Woodward. He was also a constable for four years. In 1811 Governor Snyder appointed him a justice of the peace, and he held this office for, with the exception of one year, up to the day of his death—fifty-two years; during this time he married one hundred and sixty couples. He was also county auditor, county commissioner and county treasurer. He died April 8, 1863, having had thirteen children, nineteen grandchildren and twenty great-grandchildren.

Conrad Pulis, who is mentioned in the above narrative, was a thrifty German, who had come from the sunny Rhineland but a short time before. He had married a sister of Richard Nelson, and the two settled on adjacent tracts and cleared up fine farms. Mr. Pulis' sons were Abraham, Peter, Henry, William, Ephraim, Aaron and John, and his farm was below Day's bridge, on the Dyberry.

Just below him, and on the Big Eddy, Richard Nelson settled. He had five sons,—Peter, John a bachelor and an expert lumberman, who inherited the homestead; Charles, for many years a well-known steersman on the Delaware River; Stephen, who located in Lebanon township and died there in 1872, and James, an early settler at Girdland, who afterwards moved to Nebraska. The daughters of Nelson were Elizabeth, who married Henry Brown; Eleanor, the wife of William Balkcom; Emily, wife of Osborn Mitchell; Catharine, wife of Robbins Douglass; Rhoda, wife of James Harvey. The latter-named moved to Warsaw, Indiana.

One of the early settlements on the west side of the Dyberry was that of Jonathan Jennings, who commenced near the mouth of Thomas Creek, about 1799. Here he resided for some years, and then removed to the farm now occupied by Hiram G. Chase. Mr. Jennings was for many years crier of the courts, and held a number of township offices. His son, Henry Jennings, was a justice of the peace, and it was he who exchanged the homestead with Mr. Chase. The place is now owned by the daughters who survived him.

Among the pioneers who came into this portion of Wayne County when it was an unbroken wilderness, and wrested from the head of the forest a living and a home, was William Schoonover. He emigrated from New Jersey about 1791–92, and settled on Dyberry flats, about a mile above the junction of the West Branch and the Dyberry Creek. Here he built a log house and in course of time cleared a small farm. It was a work of much labor, and in 1804 he had ploughed but eight acres. At this time he had two horses and two cows, and the valuation of his property was but four hundred and eleven dollars. His occupancy of the place was undisturbed for about ten years, when other parties obtained warrants from the commonwealth and began to make their surveys. Finally an attempt was made to eject Mr. Schoonover, on the ground that he was a trespasser on the property of other patentees. Jason Torrey, who was the surveyor of all this section at the time, has avowed that such was not the case, and that Mr. Schoonover's settlement far antedated the titles of the rival claimants. For this reason he urged Mr. Schoonover to take out a patent and have his property secured and the boundary lines definitely settled. It was finally agreed that Mr. Torrey should do this for him, in consideration of one-half of the tract so secured. The survey was made May 24, 1803, and a patent was issued on the 27th of January following. In April next a division of the tract came up, and Mr. Schoonover decided to retain the portion on which his dwelling was located. As the lower portion was rocky, and a portion of it low and marshy, the line was run so as to allow Mr. Torrey forty acres more than the warrantee. Mr. Torrey had charged five hundred dollars for his services in obtaining the patent, and this became the consideration for the lower portion of the tract, which was conveyed to him by a deed dated April 23, 1804, executed by William Schoonover, and Susannah his wife

The resident taxables of Dyberry at the time it was set off were,—

Jacob Hole, or, according to the modern orthography, Hoel, was born in New Jersey, and moved to Dyberry township in 1813, settling on the place now occupied by Henry Borcher. He was a man of ingenuity, and, from the common blue stone of a ledge near his cabin, fashioned the first grindstone in that portion of the township. It is still preserved on the farm of Henry Borcher. Mr. Hoel married Phœbe Leonard, and had seven children. The eldest, Lewis, now lives with Miss Bates, and is referred to in the history of Oregon township. Charles, the second son, was also a resident of that township until 1846. Seely died in youth. Daniel, located in Mount Pleasant. Betsy M. married William Adams, and Phœbe A. is the wife of Peter Pulis. The Hoels built a number of mills, and were closely identified with the early history of the town.

Philip Thomas was one of the early settlers, who commenced on the road leading from Bethany to Seelyville, prior to 1804, on the farm afterward occupied by Albert Butler. He was a carpenter, and had a fifty-acre tract, of which only ten acres were ploughed in 1804. He had several children, but none of his family are now living.

Gideon Langdon moved into Dyberry about 1815, settling on the farm where Thomas Hocker afterward lived. He was soon followed by his son Solomon, and later, Jonathan T., another son, located in Bethany. He had a number of children, and one of his daughters was the first wife of Lewis Day. The family removed to Montrose, Susquehanna County, many years ago.

Philemon Ross was one of the Connecticut settlers, who arrived in 1815, and made a clearing on the farm where his son David now lives. He married a daughter of Pliny Muzzey, of Clinton, and had a number of children, most of whom have removed to other States. In 1817 he was one of the freeholders of the town, and as such presented a bill of twelve dollars for warning twelve indigent persons to remove, with their families, lest they become a charge on the town. "Although there was no law to justify such inhuman ostracism," says a chronicler,"[1] "it had become a custom in some places, and it was claimed that custom made law."

[1] P. G. Goodrich, in "History of Wayne County."

The bill and the usage were alike denounced in very vigorous language by Pope Bushnell, who at that time had just come into the township, and the bill was not paid, while thereafter the custom fell into desuetude.

Eliphalet Wood came from Duchess County, N. Y., in 1816, and located on the farm afterward owned by Michael Moran, on the West Branch. He bought out Oliver White, who had settled there some years before. The place is in Clinton, though it is said to have been reckoned Dyberry in the early days. Mr. Wood had a number of children, among whom were Jesse, Enos, Luman, Charles, Eliphalet, John N., Ezekiel G., William F., Jane, wife of Hon. Phineas Arnold; Abigail, wife of Elias B. Stanton; and Mary, who died young.

About 1816 Captain Homer Brooks moved from Vermont and settled near Hon. Pope Bushnell. He was there married and had a large family. The eldest son, Ezra Brooks, lives west of the homestead, and carries on a large farm. Virgil Brooks, of Lebanon; Major E. Brooks, deceased; Horace D. Brooks, of Susquehanna County; and William Brooks are all his sons. Lephe, the wife of Lyman Gleason, Esq., is the only daughter, now a resident of the county. Lucy, another daughter, married Barney Bunnell, and survived him. She lives in Newark, N. J.

Hiram K. Mumford, a son of Thomas Mumford, of Mount Pleasant, bought the old glass works property in January, 1856. He had married Maria, a daughter of Royal Wheeler, of Hancock, Delaware County, and his children were Duane H. (who died during the war at Chattanooga), James R. (who died in youth), Lucinda M., Lucian O. and Mary S. (who resides at the homestead). Hiram K. Mumford died in January, 1884, aged seventy-four years.

Christian Faatz came from Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1802, and after residing at Philadelphia a few years, located near Bethany in 1816. His children were Christian, Stephen, Jacob, Charles, Christopher, Nicholas, Christine (wife of Nicholas Greiner), Caroline (wife of Joseph Bodie) and some others who died in their youth. Christian settled in Bethany, and died there. Jacob had eight children, most of whom are scattered. H. G. Faatz, the eldest, is now a resident of Honesdale; Charles moved to Weedsport, Cayuga County, N. Y., where he now resides; Christopher is a resident of Bethany; Stephen lives in Honesdale; Nicholas died in Michigan in 1814, and the daughters live near the glass works.

The exact date at which Eli and his brother Increase Henshaw came to this township is uncertain; but they both appear on record in 1816, and it is probable that they came from Connecticut about that time. Both were men of much ingenuity, and Increase was a painter who was employed on some of the early buildings of Bethany, of which village he was at times a resident. His brother lived on the farm afterwards occupied by Joseph Arthur, and had a son, Dwight Henshaw, now living in Bethany.

Judge Isaac Dimmick moved to Bethany from Orange County, N. Y., about 1816, and bought the farm afterwards owned by Edwin Webb. He was a man of much ability, and was for four years an associate judge of the county. He married a daughter of Hon. Abisha Woodward.

Phineas Coleman and Daniel Bunting were early settlers on the West Branch, and were probably the first. They located in the township during the second decade of the present century and left numerous descendants, most of whom have scattered. Moses and Seth Haydn came soon afterwards; both were men of mature years and brought their families with them. Seth Haydn died in 1845, aged sixty-four years.

Stephen Day came from Chatham, Norris County, New Jersey, and in 1816 settled on a farm that had been started by Isaac Brink. Day arrived during the "cold summer" that was so memorable to the early settlers. He bought three hundred acres from Colonel Sylvanus Seely, on the east side of the Dyberry, where his son, Lewis, now lives. Stephen Day married Polly, a daughter of Benjamin Bunnell, and their children were Jane, who married Moses Ward, the father of Rev Elias O. Ward, of Bethany; Elias, who moved to Ohio, and from thence to California, where he died; Barney, who married Emeline, daughter of Sheriff Solomon Jones, and settled on the Dyberry; Mary, wife of Levi Ketchem, of Bethany; Benjamin, who moved to Ohio; Damaris, the widow of Hon. E. W. Hamlin, of Bethany; Edwin who died near the homestead, and Lewis who at an advanced age still keeps up the place. The latter is an expert taxidermist and has a fine collection of birds and animals which he shot himself. His specimens include a number of rare, and some species that are now nearly extinct in Wayne County. He has been twice married; the first time to Nancy Langdon, of Mt. Pleasant, and afterwards to Maria Dabron. No children were born of either union. Captain John Bunnell, a soldier in the Revolution, and for many years a pensioner, because of wounds received during his gallant conduct at the battle of Princeton, was led to emigrate from New Jersey in 1816, and joined his relative, Stephen Day, in Wayne County. He had married Nancy, a sister of Stephen Day, while the latter had wedded Polly Bunnell, a sister of the Captain. Bunnell's Pond, now in Texas township, was named for him, and at its outlet he erected a saw-mill at an early date. His children were Julia, wife of Rev. Mr. Babbett, a Presbyterian minister at Binghamton, N. Y.; Barny, who settled in Dyberry township and afterward died at Orange, N. J.; Polly, who married a Wood, and died in Dyberry; Joan, the second wife of Captain Brooks, and Elijah, who never married.

Pope Bushnell, son of Gideon Bushnell, was born in Salisbury, Litchfield County, Conn., February 11, 1789. In June 1812 he married Miss Sally Hurlbert, one of the noted triplet daughters of Gideon Hurlbert of Goshen, Conn., and on the 12th day of the same month was drafted to serve against Great Britain, and mustered into the ranks upon the following day. He came to Wayne County in 1817 and purchased a contract which had been made the year previous by Joseph Daw, (father of Mrs. Tallman, wife of C. P. Tallman, of Preston Township) for the sale of an hundred acre tract, lying one mile north of Bethany.

For more than sixty years Mr. Bushnell was one of the most prominent and influential citizens of the county. He was elected Captain of a company of militia in 1820, commissioned by Governor Hiester as Major of the First Battalion of the Seventieth Regiment of Pennsylvania militia in 1821, and appointed Justice of the Peace by Governor Finley in 1824. Besides holding various town and municipal offices he was once elected treasurer of the county, once county-commissioner, and twice chosen to represent the legislative district composed of the counties of Wayne and Pike in the State Legislature.

In boyhood he attended the common schools of his native town, and studied for a short time at an academy at Granville, N. Y., conducted by the celebrated Professor Salen Town. A student by nature, he supplimented the meager education of youth by a long and laborious course of reading and study. He had a strong and rugged intellect; was unyielding in his position, and a ready and forcible speaker and writer. His contributions to the local and metropolitan press upon agricultural, political and historical subjects were characterized by a clearness of thought and felicity of diction seldom found in the writings of men engaged in the marts of trade.

Mr. Bushnell was ever, during the period of his activity, a conspicuous character in every movement, and an advocate of every measure, which promised to aid the inhabitants, or develop the resources of his adopted county. It was largely due to his efforts that the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company secured a right of way through a portion of the county, and he was no less zealous in the attempt to obtain a like privilege for the New York and Erie (New York, Lake Erie and Western) Railroad Company. For the efforts which he made in behalf of the latter company, he was publicly mobbed. But he lived to see the hostility and prejudice which he engendered among the people he sought to serve, turned to regret and enlarged confidence and respect.

He died on the 19th day of January, 1881, in the ninety-second year of his age. His wife Sally Bushnell survived him nearly two years, and died on the 11th day of January, 1883, at the advanced age of ninety-four years and nine months.

His family consisted of three sons and three daughters, the only survivor of whom is Sidney Norton Bushnell.

William Miller, a native of Pittston, Luzerne County, came into Wayne in 1821, and settled upon the Esquire Thomas Spangenburg farm, where he lived for three years. He then bought of Cabel Hoel, the farm adjoining that of Jacob Hoel, and Homer Brooks, where he still resides, in his eighty-sixth year. He married Evelyn, a daughter of Daniel Schoonover, and had a number of children, among whom were Elizabeth, wife of Henry Palmer; Jacob Miller of Honesdale; the late Simon S. Miller; Benj. F. Miller of Prompton; Jane, wife of Wm. Kint; John W. Miller; and Evelyn, wife of Wm. Williams.

William Bryant was the first Englishman who came from Cornwall County, England, and settled in Wayne County, Pa. He left England when a young man, in the spring of 1819, and landed in the City of Philadelphia the latter part of May. By accident he got acquainted within a few days after his arrival in Philadelphia with a Mr. Salter, who lived in that city and owned large tracts of wild land in Wayne County. After listening to Mr. Salter's description of the fertility of the soil, the healthfulness of the climate and the easy acquirement of sufficient land for a farm and home, Mr. Bryant left Philadelphia and arrived in Bethany in June of the same year.

A few days after his arrival here he was employed by Major Torrey, who lived in Bethany, as a common laborer on a farm. He was well pleased with the country, and wrote home to his brother in England to come and join him as soon as possible. Thomas, his oldest brother, left England the next spring, paid his passage to New York, but by some miscalculation of the officers of the ship and the adversity of the wind they were compelled to land at Baltimore. He walked most of the way from that city to Bethany, arriving at the latter place early in the summer of 1820. Thomas was immediately employed by Faatz & Greely, who were manufacturing window-glass near the First Pond, in Dyberry township. Thus they labored for a few years until they had acquired sufficient to buy each a good farm. Thomas's situated one and a half miles and William's half a mile from the borough of Bethany, in the township of Dyberry. Then followed Walter Bryant in 1827, Joseph in 1828, and Jonathan and wife in 1831, all of whom bought land in Dyberry township for future homes. In 1829 Mr. William Olver, who married Ann Hill Bryant, in England, a sister of the Bryant brothers, came to this country and settled in Berlin township, near Beach Pond. Thus was the road opened for the emigration of other Cornwall Englishmen, until Wayne County hills are dotted with the best English farms in the State.

Joseph A. Hubbard, of Salisbury, Conn., settled in Dyberry in 1826, and was a prosperous farmer for many years, bringing up a large family. In 1859 he moved to Seelyville, and died there in 1878.

Hon. A. B. Gammell came from Caledonia County, Vt., in 1839, and settled on the Captain Prescott farm, on the Bethany and Mount Pleasant turnpike. In 1865 he bought the old Torrey property, a portion of Charles Torrey's estate, where he now resides. Mr. Gammell was elected a representative in 1878. He married Catherine Bryant and has three children.

Hiram K. Mumford, a son of Thomas Mumford, of Mount Pleasant, bought the old glass-works property, in 1856. He had married Maria, a daughter of Royal Wheeler, of Hancock, Delaware County, and had five children,—Duane H., the oldest of whom, died at Chattanooga while serving in the Federal army. The others were James R., who died in youth; Lucinda M., Lucian O., and Mary S. The latter lives at the homestead. H. K. Mumford died in 1884, aged seventy-four.

The Gleason family was commenced by Joseph, who located near where his son, Lyman, now lives about 1830. His other children were Almis, killed in the Civil War; Willard, Henry and several daughters. His widow is now a resident of Honesdale.

Schools.—The earliest school in Dyberry township was in the village of Bethany, and is mentioned in the chapter devoted to that place. After 1804, several schools were maintained at private expense in different parts of the township, but little or no record of them remains. At first there were no school-houses, and the sessions were held at private residences; later, better provision for education was made. Elijah Bunnell taught a school in Captain Bunnell's old log house in 1820. It was attended by the Pulis, Nelson, Caleb Hoel, and Day families. Others of a similar character were maintained in adjacent neighborhoods, the teachers being hired by several families, who shared the expense pro rata. After the passage of the school law of 1834, which was immediately ratified by Wayne County, the erection of public school buildings took place rapidly. Most of them were built by generous contributions of labor and material from the people living near, and the township now boasts of eight buildings that will compare favorably with those of adjacent portions of the county. The school tax for the current year is about twelve hundred and fifty-eight dollars, which includes the pay of seven teachers and incidentals. The present Board of Directors consists of D. M. Kimble, president; William T. Butler, secretary; C. P. Bunnell, treasurer; W. E. Pethick, John P. Hacker, and J. I. Bates.

The First Glass Works.—In 1816 Christopher Faatz, Sr., Adam Greiner, Jacob Hines, Christopher Hines, Nicholas Greiner, and Christian Faatz, all Germans, who had been employed in the glass works of Frankfort-on-the-Main, decided to start a window-glass manufactory near the residence of Charles Faatz, about a mile and a half west of Bethany. Christian Faatz had emigrated from Germany in 1802, and located a small factory at Philadelphia, but his capital was too limited to make it a success. He was then joined by the others, most of whom were connected by marriage and otherwise, and decided to carry the enterprise into the wilderness. The spot selected was entirely surrounded by woods. The building of the works occupied some time, and was only accomplished by hard labor, most of which was performed by the members of the firm. The stones with which the arches of the furnace were fashioned were obtained in the Moosic Mountain, and the clay for the melting pots was brought from Philadelphia by wagons and sleighs. The plant was a small affair, with a capacity for but a few of "metal" per day, and the material was drawn chiefly from localities near at hand. The product was good, however, and compared favorably with that produced elsewhere in those days. It was marketed in Wilkesbarre, Newburg and Philadelphia, from which points the goods exchanged by the firm for labor performed at their works were obtained. Lack of sufficient capital and the heavy cost of transportation at last brought about failure, and the place passed into the hands of James Manning and Jacob Faatz. This firm was also unsuccessful, and after a short time gave up business. The works then stood idle for some time, during which the employees, which had numbered between twenty and thirty, devoted their energies to clearing up farms adjacent. In this way the enterprise proved very beneficial to the township. In 1829 Jacob Faatz and William Greeley again put the plant in operation, the capital being furnished by Augustus, a brother of William Greeley. This firm ran for thirteen years, and was then succeeded by Stebbins, Smith & Sloan. This firm lasted a few years, and was succeeded by J. Sloan, Jr., who in 1845 announced that he was making glass that "did not rust nor decompose," and was equal to the product of any American factory. Three years later, in another advertisement in the same paper—the Democrat—he states that he has not sufficient capital to make glass unless there is a demand for it, and offers to "supply merchants and others by barter, in order to keep the works running."

On December 18th of the same year one of the ovens in the drying house took fire between four and five o'clock in the morning, and ten ovens filled with dry wood added to the blaze, which consumed the entire building, and was with difficulty prevented from spreading to the rest of the plant. The loss was small, but it necessitated the stoppage of the works for the season. The proprietor never recovered from this suspension, and as the works at Traceyville had been completed, the enterprise near Bethany was abandoned. The property remained in the hands of William Greeley until 1856, when it was bought by Hiram K. Mumford, of Mount Pleasant.

INDUSTRIES.—The present territory of Dyberry contains the sites of but few of the township's early industries. They with one or two exceptions were located in what has since become portions of other townships, and are referred to in the chapters devoted to them.

The mill at the outlet of the first pond was built by Abraham Brink, who came from Monroe County, Pa., at an early date, probably about 1800. It was on the premises afterward owned by Thomas O'Neill, and in the assessment of 1807 was valued at four hundred and sixty dollars. The mill was a very primitive structure, with a single run of stones brought from the hard quartz rocks of the Moosic Mountains. This comprised the entire plant, and the pioneers were glad to take their coarse meal without bolting. The story goes that when one day, a visitor from the city asked the miller why he did not put in bolting machinery, and with sly humor the latter replied, "Our people don't want it, most of the meal is bolted after it has been cooked." This was the mill of which Pope Bushnell used facetiously to say that "it ground wheat so that it was almost as good as rye." A saw-mill was afterwards erected below the grist-mill, and a large amont of lumber was prepared there. Afterward, the property was sold to Colonel William Greeley, who ran both mills, until he sold out to Mr. O'Neill, the present owner.

At an early day August Collins had a saw-mill near the present fair grounds, and soon after, a Mr. Jacques had a wagon-shop and a water-wheel which ran a small saw for making churns and doing light jig work. In 1821 Stephen Day built a saw-mill where Bates' grist-mill now stands, and for many years it was kept in active operation. Elias Day ran it for a time and then sold to James Boland and Edwin Day. The mill was abandoned about 1845. During that year, Ezra Brooks built what was afterwards known as the "Blinn Mill," taking its name from a subsequent owner, James Blinn. The latter afterwards sold it to Hand & Kirtland, and they, in turn, disposed of it to Coe F. Young. The latter, in company with William Kimble, rebuilt it in 1863. It ran for four years after that, and was abandoned on account of the scarcity of lumber in the vicinity.

An up and down mill was built on the Dyberry by John Bates, in 1849, and in 1854 was bought by William, a son of Asa Kimble, who improved it by putting in Emerson patent saws. His business increased rapidly, and in 1878 he again increased the capacity of the plant by erecting a steam-mill near by. It is driven by a forty horse power engine and has a capacity of fifteeen thousand feet per day, while the water-mill with recent improvements can produce nearly as much. Both these mills have passed out of Mr. Kimble's hands, and are now owned by Elias B. Stanton, of Honesdale, though the former proprietor manages them.

In 1869 and 1870 R. S. and J. I. Bates erected a grist-mill on the site of the old Day saw-mill above referred to. It has two run of stone and is employed entirely on custom work, doing a thriving business. The firm became J. and J. I. Bates in 1867, and still retains that style.

What is known as "the Gleason Mill" was built by Elias B. Stanton and William Kimble in 1871, on the site of a saw-mill erected by a man named Gleason, many years ago. The saws in the new mill were kept busy for ten years, but are not now used. The mill is owned at present by Mr. Stanton.

TANNER'S FALLS.—The foundation of the extensive tannery and lumbering business now carried on at Tanner's Falls by Coe F. Young, of Honesdale, was laid in 1851, by Barnet Richtmyer, who then purchased a large tract of land and rebuilt upon the site of the saw-mill that Jason Torrey erected about 1830. As soon as the mill was in running order, lumber for the construction of the tannery was sawed, and in 1853 the first hides were "slipped." An enlargement of the plant followed the successful business of the first year, and the tannery soon had one hundred and seventy vats and a capacity of fifty-two thousand hides annually. Mr. W. N. Alberty, of Albany County, N. Y., became associated with Mr.

Richtmyer, as his general manager in 1855, and since that time has held the position under the other proprietors, displaying much executive ability. In 1862, Thomas Watson & Co., of New York, bought out Mr. Richtmyer and ran the business for a year, at the expiration of which they sold to Coe F. Young, the present owner. At this date, 1863, the real prosperity of the place began. Mr. Young brought into the business not only plenty of capital but broad, liberal ideas and much enterprise. The tannery plant was at once much improved, and the method of conducting the business made more systematic. Up to this date a large proportion of the wages of employees had been paid in goods, at a store started by Richtmyer soon after he commenced. The plan had proved here, as has it elsewhere, unsatisfactory to employer and employed alike. Mr. Young rented the store and paid cash wages, and the credit system, which had injured the business, was abolished.

In 1864 the saw-mill was converted into a circular mill, and had its capacity materially increased. Lath-making machinery was also added. It has since turned out as much as three million feet of hemlock per annum, but at present is doing comparatively little.

On March 1, 1881, a fire broke out in the bark mill and the entire building was destroyed, entailing a loss of nearly fifty thousand dollars, ten thousand dollars of which was not covered by insurance. The tannery was at once rebuilt, and has since been running full capacity. The property includes a number of dwellings for the employees.

The hamlet of Tanner's Falls comprises a post-office, and a school-house, where religious services are occasionally held, besides a smithy and the general store, run by R. J. Menner & Co., of Honesdale. The post-office was established in 1856, Henry Richtmyer being the first postmaster, and having the office in his store. In 1859 he was succeeded by his brother, Lewis Richtmyer. The latter was succeeded by J. R. Mitchell, in 1863, and he in turn gave place to Theodore A. Corby, in 1869. The present incumbent, Mr. W. N. Alberty, succeeded Mr. Corby in 1875.

William Nelson Alberty, superintendent and paymaster of the tannery and mill works at Tanner's Falls, Dyberry township, Wayne County, was born in Albany County, N. Y., November 26, 1831. He learned the trade of a blacksmith with his father and worked with him until 1856, when he engaged as book-keeper for Barnt Richtmyer, then owner of the large tannery at Tanner's Falls. He continued in this position until 1858, when, by his good judgment in matters of business relating to the concern, having won the confidence of his employer, he was made general superintendent, and put in sole charge of the business. His fidelity to his trust, his ability in the management of the business, and his honorable and proficient methods of dealing with employees, have made him the almost indispensable man of this large business, and the successive firms who have come into possession of the concern,—Thorn, Watson & Co., Young & Cornell, and later Coe F. Young as sole owner, have retained him as their superintendent in full charge. Thus Mr. Alberty has been identified with this business for thirty years, and for twenty-eight years sole manager. He has served as school-director, but has always refused all other official honor, although often tendered it by his townspeople.

He married, in August, 1854, Hester A., daughter of Joseph and Catherine (Keator) Corby, of Binghamton, N. Y., by whom he has four children, viz: Kate, Frank E., May and Maud Alberty.

His father, Peter S., born January, 1804, married Maria Groom (1805–1877), by whom he had six children,—Edgar, of Dyberry, a blacksmith; William Nelson, Frank, a blacksmith at the Falls; Amanda, wife of Nelson Bloodgood, of Sullivan County, N. Y., a farmer and lumberman; Mary, wife of Nelson Miles, a mill-wright, of Wilkesbarre, and Alida M., wife of Lewis Wynkoop, a carpenter, of Binghampton. Peter S. Alberty followed his trade as a blacksmith at Potter's Hollow, Green County, N. Y., until 1862, and removed to Tanner's Falls, where he continued the same business until 1879, when he retired from active labor. His grandfather, Frederick Alberty, also resides at Potter's Hollow, and his father was the emigrant of the family from Germany.

The first religious services held at Tanner's Falls were under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church at Bethany, and were conducted by Rev. Elias Ward, of that village, about 1859. In 1870 the Methodist Church began to hold services, and Rev. Mr. Prichard supplied the charge. It is now on his circuit, but service is not regularly conducted.

DYBERRY POST OFFICE.—One of the earliest residents here was Ephraim B. Kimble. He was the second child of Asa and Abigail Kimble, who lived near the Fair Grounds, and were pioneers of the township. He married Miss Amelia Schoonover, and, in 1849, moved into the house now occupied by Robert Bates. Here he resided for five years, building the hotel property meanwhile, and erecting the wagon-shop in which he wrought during the rest of his life.

In 1854 he received an appointment as postmaster from President Pierce, and held the office up to the time of his death, in 1880. His son, A. K. Kimble, succeeded him, and is the present incumbent. Beside the shop, the village has a hotel, store and the grist-mill of Jared J. I. Bates, and is a thriving place.

HAINES POST-OFFICE, which was named in honor of Benjamin F. Haines, editor of the Wayne Independent, was established in the western part of Dyberry township, May 18, 1886, with C. W. Bodie as post-master.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

ZEBULON MONTGOMERY PIKE BUNNELL,

Third son of David Bunnell, was born at Bethany, July 6, 1813, and obtained his education from books in the schools of his native place. He was engaged at home on the farm, and worked for others in the vicinity of his home, until June 27, 1839, when he married Clarinda, a daughter of John Bonham (1790–1853) and Sarah Hamlin (1790–1882), of Mount Pleasant township. Her father was a native of New Jersey, and came with his parents to that township when the country was new and quite unsettled. He was a member of the Methodist Church and a class-leader. Her paternal grandfather was Zedekiah Bonham, one of the early settlers of Mount Pleasant township. Her mother was the eldest child of Harris Hamlin and Rue Easton, natives of Connecticut, who settled in Salem township in 1801, a sketch of whose lives may be found in this volume, and of the timbered part of it. He was an intelligent and representative farmer, and erected commodious buildings on his farm. He never sought political preferment, but with the family of his father and brothers, belonged to the old Whig party, and he was identified with the Baptist Church at Honesdale. He was firmly fixed in the principles of justice and right to all, and while by his industry and energy he carved out a fair competence for himself, he was always ready to lend a helping hand to a sister of the late Butler Hamlin, of Salem, and of the late Hon. Ephraim W. Hamlin, of Bethany. Mrs. Bunnell was born March 7, 1816. The same year of his marriage he purchased, with his father and brothers, some seven hundred and fifty acres of land, a part of which is in Dyberry township, alluded to before in the Bunnell sketch. Mr. Bunnell made his homestead on this part of the tract thus purchased, and in due time brought it under a good state of cultivation, and made large clearings those in need. He was a man of correct habits and of sterling integrity. The homestead was occupied for a time by his son Oliver, but in 1886 his son Oscar farms it. He died at the premature age of forty-four years, and his widow survives, in 1886, and resides mostly on the homestead. His children are: Oliver, a retired merchant of Honesdale; Elory, enlisted in Company G, One Hundred and Forty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was killed at the battle of Gettysburg in 1863, aged twenty-one years; Amelia, wife of Ulysses Beers, a mason of Honesdale; Martha J., wife of Alva S. Keyes, a merchant at Gravity, Lake township, whose father, Danforth Keyes, settled in Wayne County from Connecticut; Helen M., deceased, was the wife of Thomas Bines, of Warren, Pa.; Oscar, assessor of Dyberry township, resides on the homestead, and Almira, wife of Charles E. Mills, a machinist, residing at Ariel, Wayne County; Eugene P., died an infant. A sketch of David Bunnell and other members of the family may be found in the History of Texas Township.

WILLIAM MILLER.

William Miller, born at Pittston, Luzerne County, Pa., February 8, 1800, is one of the oldest living residents of Wayne County, in 1886, and well preserved in mind and able to give much of the early history of the locality where he resides, in Dyberry Township, as well as many interesting incidents of a personal nature. His parents, Peter and Elizabeth (Ward) Miller, natives of Plainfield, Pa., both died and were buried at Pittston, where his father carried on blacksmithing. His maternal grandfather was of American birth, but his maternal great-grandfather was a native of Germany. His paternal grandfather was also born in Germany. He was the eldest child and the only one who settled in Wayne County. The other children were, Elizabeth, Margaret Ann, Margaret, Sarah, and Benjamin, all of whom died in Pittston.

William learned the trade of a blacksmith with his father, and remained at home until he reached his majority. Leaving his native place at the age of twenty-one, he worked for one year on the public turnpike, near Honesdale, and in the lumber business, but unfortunately for him, his employer was sold out of everything he had, and consequently young Miller lost his year's wages, leaving him as he had started out in life, without money. He engaged for the next year with William Schoonover, of Dyberry Township, to work his farm on shares, and at the close of the year, not only had a part of the produce raised on the farm, but had formed the acquaintance of his daughter Evalena, whom he married March 11, 1823. She was born May 5, 1808, was a devoted member of the Methodist Church, a kind and affectionate wife and mother, and died February 26, 1884. Her parents, William and Susannah Schoonover, came from New Jersey and took up government land in the township, and were among its early settlers.

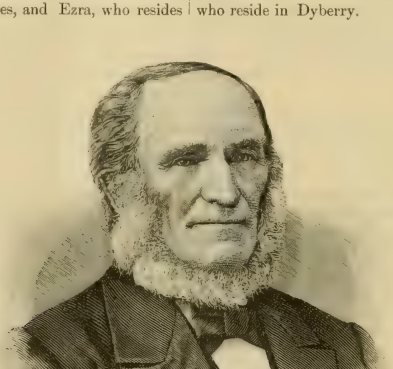
For two years after his marriage he farmed Thomas Spangenberg, Esq.'s farm, and in 1826 engaged with Halsey Lotrop, at Bethany, in his furnace in the manufacture of plows, where he remained for two years, followed by one year working at his trade, at that place. In 1829 he bought seventy-five acres of land, where he has since resided in Dyberry Township, to which he has since added as much more. This land he has mostly cleared of its original forest, has brought under a good state of cultivation, and has erected suitable farm buildings thereon. For over forty years Mr. Miller has been a member of the Methodist Church, and a supporter of church interests. He was supervisor of the township for three years, and school director for nine years.

During his early manhood he was noted for his physical strength and his swiftness of foot, and his vigor, even at the age of eighty-six years, outside of his bodily infirmity, bespeaks a well-developed body and complete organization in his earlier years. He is cared for in his declining years by his grand-daughter (Nettie M., wife of Thomas J. Edsall), who takes care of his farm.



His children are,—Elizabeth M. (1824–82), was the wife of Henry Palmer of Dyberry; Susannah S., died young; Jacob S., born 1828, a farmer and superintendent of the cemetery at Honesdale; Simon S. S. (1830–64), was a farmer in Oregon Township; Benjamin F., born 1832, a farmer, resides in Prompton; Julia S., died young; John W., born in 1836, is a farmer in Dyberry; Andrew Jackson, born in 1839, a farmer in Oregon Township; Mary Jane (1841–66); George W. (1844–73), resided at home, and was accidentally killed by a falling tree; Evaline S., born in 1847, wife of William Williams, a merchant of Honesdale.

EZRA BROOKS.

Captain Homer Brooks (1782–1864), one of the first permanent settlers of Dyberry township, a native of Connecticut, came from Mulberry, Vt., in 1818, and bought of Mayor Jason Torry, agent for William Drinker, one hundred acres of land, about two miles north of Bethany, on which he erected a log house. Returning to Mulberry the next year he removed to his new home with his wife, Freelove (1783–1845), daughter of Esop Thayer, and six children, and at once began clearing off the forest and fitting his land for cultivation. He brought with him a yoke of oxen, a span of horses, one cow and his faithful dog. A resolute disposition and a will to carve out a home in this new country, together with the above-mentioned stock, made up his possessions. He agreed to pay seven hundred dollars for this wilderness tract of land, which in time, after many years hard labor, was paid. He was one of the men who early engaged in the lumber business in Dyberry, and, with his older sons, carried it on in connection with their farming for fifty years. He was a man of strong characteristics, and highly esteemed by his townsmen, was supervisor of the township and held other positions of trust in the gift of the people. He was captain of a company of militia during the days of general training, prior to 1850. The minutes of the Fifty-Seventh Anniversary of the Abington Baptist Association, contain the following: "Deacon Homer Brooks served the church in Bethany faithfully, was endowed with sterling excellencies of character, very much esteemed by the whole community, and a steady and useful member of the church. He was baptized by Elder H. Curtis. The feelings of his heart were most tender and affectionate, his judgment clear and his adhesion to the church and to the principles of the doctrine of Christ remained unchanging. Bethany Church and congregation are deeply indebted to him for the erection of their meeting-house, and for saving it from subsequent liabilities." His second wife was Joanna Bunnell, now deceased. His children by his first wife are: Lucy, wife of Barney Bunnell, of Dyberry, died in Newark, N. J., in 1885; Alvira, wife of Gordon Graves, of Bethany, died in Chicago in 1877; Flavilla, wife of Rockwell Bunnell, died in Prompton in 1870; Virgil, settled in Lebanon township where he now resides, and Ezra, who resides one mile west of the old homestead; Major E. resided on the homestead until his death, in 1876; William Drinker is a mechanic of Homer, N. Y.; Lepha S., wife of Lyman Gleason, a farmer and lumberman in Dyberry, died in 1882; Horace resides at New Milford, and Ortenca Maria is the wife of Mathew Watt, of Wilkesbarre Pa.

(Dayton) Barnes, who was born in Connecticut, October 22, 1813. Her parents were natives of Connecticut, removed to Coventry, Chenango Co., N. Y., in 1818, where they resided until their death. Her father died in 1875, aged eighty-nine; her mother in 1845, aged sixty-one. Their children are Hannah, deceased; Nancy L. Sabra, the first and third of whom reside in New York State, and two sons, Edward and Gilbert, who reside in Dyberry.

Ezra Brooks

Ezra Brooks, second son of Deacon Homer Brooks was born in Mulberry, Vt., September 11, 1812, and married on Christmas eve, 1836, Nancy L., daughter of Daniel and Mehitabel

Ezra Brooks resided at home until twenty-three years of age. After two years he purchased fifty acres adjoining the homestead for five hundred dollars, upon which was a small frame house with one room. He cleared the greater part of his land, and has added to it, by purchase, ninety acres more. In 1847 he built his present residence, and he erected his commodious barns and planted most of his orchard. In 1842 he built, in connection with his father, a saw-mill near Dyberry Falls, and ran it for sixteen years. In all Mr. Brooks has been engaged in the lumber business for fifty-three years, which he began as early as 1828, with his father. His first work was scoring and hewing wharf timber, which he run in single rafts, called a "colt" down the Dyberry and Lackawaxen, thence down the Delaware by putting four single rafts together, called a "double Delaware," to Philadelphia. This great raft was manned by four men, and averaged to reach its destination in three days.

Mr. Brooks and wife are closely identified with the Baptist Church at Bethany. He has sung in the choir of that church for fifty-four years, has served as chorister for forty years, been a member since seventeen years of age and trustee since his father's death. He has served as supervisor, and in other official relations, of Dyberry, and is known as one of its sterling citizens. Ever since he has been a resident of Dyberry he has taken pastime in hunting, and in the early days was rewarded almost invariably with the game that then abounded in the forest, such as deer, foxes and wolves.

The children of Ezra and Nancy L. Brooks are Lucy M., wife of Augustus A. Ballou, a farmer of Dyberry, and Frederick N. Brooks who married Mary L., daughter of Milo Bedell, and farms the homestead.

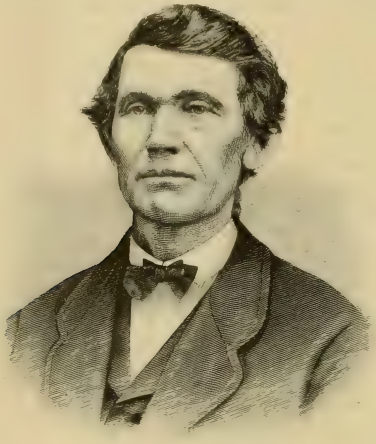
LEWIS DAY.

Lewis Day, the only surviving son of Stephen and Mary (Bonnel) Day, was born in Chatham, Morris County, N. J., June 25, 1813, and resides on Dyberry Creek, in Dyberry township, on the farm upon which his parents settled, with their family of nine children, in 1816.

Stephen Day (1769–1865) purchased three hundred acres of land for his homestead, and, with his sons, began clearing off the forest; but, before he had much passed his fiftieth birthday, he became afflicted with rheumatism, and for about forty years prior to his death was unable to do much manual labor. He was a man of strong Christian sentiment, and both himself and wife were members of the Presbyterian Church at Bethany, at which place they were buried. He spent much time during his later years in the study of the Bible, and read it through many times. His wife (1772–1842), a woman devoted to her family and to the church, was of German extraction. He was of English origin, was a man of correct habits, and reached the remarkably great age of nearly ninety-six years.

The eldest son, Elias, settled on one hundred acres of this land, and, with his father, built a saw-mill, about 1823, on the present site of the Bates grist-mill. He afterward settled in Ohio, and subsequently in California.

The youngest son, subject of this sketch, farmed the balance of the original purchase, and with his own hands cleared nearly all of the present improved land. On account of his father's affliction the care of the farm and all business matters devolved upon him, and, with that perseverance and resolution characteristic of his whole life, he so managed affairs as to close out all indebtedness on the place and make it the permanent homestead of the family.



Lewis Day is a man of modest and unassuming ways, industrious and judicious, and it may well be said of him "that he ranks among the intelligent and thrifty farmers of Wayne County."

Mr. Day's sketch would not be complete without referring to his hunting proclivities. He is known throughout the county and this part of the State as a great hunter and a good shot, and whenever he has had leisure during the proper season he has been on many hunting excursions, and successfully made bear, deer, and other wild game acknowledge man's supremacy over all other animals. He has a rifle, purchased in 1840, with which he has killed one hundred and thirteen deer, and the one hundredth one he presented to Rev. E. O. Ward, of Bethany. He has frequently killed three deer in one day and wounded a fourth, but never laid four at his feet as the result of one day's sport.

He is a supporter of the church at Bethany, and interested in the progress and development of all enterprises tending to foster good citizenship and educate the rising generation. His first wife, Nancy J., a daughter of Gideon Langdon, of Dyberry, whom he married November 6, 1838; died September 3, 1866, aged fifty-five years. His present wife, whom he married April 7, 1870, is Margaret Maria, a daughter of John and Martha Dabron, who settled in Damascus township from Sullivan County in 1863.

The children of Stephen and Mary Day, in the order of their birth, are,—Jane (1790–1871), was the wife of Moses Ward, of Bethany, and mother of Rev. Elias O. Ward, of the same place; Elias, born 1792; Barney (1794–1856) settled in Ohio, where he died; Harriet (1796–1804); Benjamin B., born in 1798, resided in Ohio and reared a family, but died in New Orleans. He had one son, who was shot by the Indians; another son, Benjamin B. Day, Jr., is president of the Washington Territory Senatorial Council, in 1886. Mary J. (1801–1862) was the wife of Levi Ketcham, of Bethany. Damaris, born in 1804, is the widow of the late Hon. Ephraim W. Hamlin, and resides in Bethany, in 1886; Edwin S. (1810–1866), and Lewis Day.

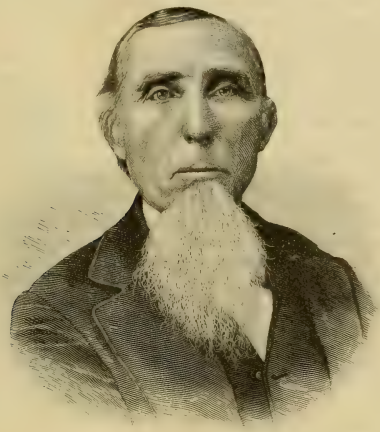
CHARLES FAATZ.

Charles Faatz, son of Christian, and grandson of Christopher Faatz, was born October 7, 1829, on the place where he now resides, and where the family first settled soon after they came from Saxony. Christopher Faatz and Jacob Hinds, natives of Saxony, emigrated to Philadelphia in 1808, and, being unable to pay their passage money, served two years after their landing to repay the amount due. Fortunately for Christopher Faatz, he was bound to a glass manufacturer of the city, a business he had learned in his native country, and he soon showed his master that he was a proficient glass-blower. At the end of his service, he rented the glass manufactory, and in due time saved money enough to send for his wife,—Elizabeth Hinds, sister of his companion, and his two children, Christiana and Christian, and bring them to Philadelphia.



Soon after the arrival of his family, he became manager of the glass-works at Rockville, on the Delaware, and afterwards at Woodstock, N. Y., where he remained until 1816, when he and Jacob Hinds removed to the western part of Dyberry township, Wayne County, purchased some six hundred acres of woodland, and erected a glass manufactory, which was carried on by Faatz & Hinds and other firms until the glass interest was transferred to Honesdale.

Christopher Faatz and wife were Lutherans in religious persuasion, and traveling ministers held their meetings in their house, until many years afterwards, when a school-house was erected, and served for a place of worship. He died in 1828, aged sixty years. His wife survived him, and died about 1850. Their other children, born in this country were: Charles, a glass-blower, of Weedsport, N. Y.; Jacob, a glass-maker, died near Prompton, in 1856; Christopher, a glass-cutter and farmer, resides in Dyberry township; Stephen S., a glass-blower, resides in Honesdale; Nicholas died in Michigan, and was a farmer; Caroline is the wife of Joseph Bodie, one of the old residents of Dyberry township.

The eldest daughter, Christiana, was the first wife of Nicholas Greiner, and after his death the wife of Henry Downing, a land agent, and died in Dyberry.

The eldest son, Christian (1798–1868), was some twelve years old when he came with his mother to Philadelphia, and at once began to learn the business of a glass-blower, and continued with his father in this business as long as he carried it on, and was manager for other firms afterwards, in that place and at Dundaff. He succeeded to one hundred acres of the original purchase of land, most of which he cleared and prepared for crops, and erected buildings thereon. He was a man of correct habits, led an honorable and useful life, possessed sterling characteristics and sought to fulfil the full duties of a father and good citizen. He was a strict adherent of the Lutheran doctrines, and had all his children baptized in his own house. He was self-sacrificing, tenacious of principle and right, and labored for the good of others. He was frequently selected to fill the highest offices in the township, and every trust confided to his charge, whether of a public or private nature, found in him a noble exponent of honesty and integrity. His first wife was Matilda (1799–1844), daughter of Abraham and Sally Brink. His second wife, whom he married in 1845, was Catherine, widow of George Hopkins, of Clinton township, by whom he had one daughter, Hattie, wife of William Varcoe, of Damascus. His third wife, was Sarah Tripp, whom he married in 1852, who bore him one child—Sarah, wife of William Griffis, of Car bondale. The children by his first marriage are: Lucinda, widow of George Payne, of Sandusky, Ohio; Jacob, of Wood County, Ohio; Betsy, wife of Sumner Isham, of Dyberry township; Nancy deceased, was the wife of John Shirmer, of Seelyville; Mary deceased, was the wife of William Stiles, and resided in Clinton township; Charles; George, a farmer of Oregon township; Andrew, a farmer in South Canaan; Adeline, widow of Simon Hopkins, of Clinton, and Edward, who resides on a part of the original purchase.

Of this large family of children, Charles Faatz succeeded to the homestead of his father, and has spent his life as a farmer. He has served his township as supervisor, school director and assessor, and is its treasurer in 1886. He has been identified with the Bethany Methodist Church since 1853, was steward of the church during that time, class leader for many years, and for the past fifteen years superintendent of the Sunday-school. His wife, Clarissa, born August 27, 1831, married May 6, 1851, is the daughter of George and Catherine (Bunting) Hopkins, before named. Her father was a native of Winfield, Conn., and settled in Clinton township, Wayne County, while a young man. He was a silk weaver by trade, but followed farming in this county. He died in 1833, aged sixty-four years. Her mother died at the age of fifty-six, in 1851. Their children are: Samuel, died in Kansas, in 1885, aged sixty-four; David, an inventor, resides in New York; Simon, died in 1870; George, a builder in Philadelphia; Ann Elizabeth, wife of William Olver, of Dyberry, Clarissa, and Julia M., wife of William Box, of Dyberry.

ALBERT BUTLER

came from New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn., in 1840 and settled on eighty-five acres of land one mile south of Bethany, in Dyberry township, upon which he resided and which he farmed until a few years since, when he retired and settled in Bethany, where he now resides, in 1886. He is a carpenter by trade, and has worked at this business, as well as farming, since his removal here. He has been identified with Dyberry township as school director, assessor and clerk, taken an active interest in local matters, and as a member of the Methodist Church he has served as trustee and recording steward. He was born March 9, 1814; married, in 1838, Harriet (1816–66), a daughter of Orin and Harriett (Pettibone) Cadwell, who for a time resided at Simsbury, Hartford County, Conn., until he was married and then, in New Hartford, whence she left with her husband for Wayne County, Pa. Her father died in the West; her mother is living, in 1886, at Bristol, Conn., at nearly ninety years of age. The children of Mr. Butler by this marriage are Susan Jane (wife of Henry O. Hurlburt, a jeweler in Philadelphia), Celia Augusta (wife of William A. Gaylord, prothonotary of Wayne County) and William T. Butler, residing on the homestead farm and a teacher. By his second marriage, in 1870, to S. Melissa, a daughter of Jonathan D. and Mary (Cramer) Simpson, he has one son, Albert S. Butler. She was born May 5, 1843.

Mr. Butler's father, Jared, was a farmer and resided in Litchfield County, where he died about 1860. His mother, Eunice, a daughter of Thomas Couch, of Norfolk, Conn., died in 1837. Their children are Timothy (died at Colebrooke, Conn.), Almon (died at his brother Albert's), Albert (subject of this sketch), William (died in Iowa), Merriman M. (died at Colebrooke), Jared Sullivan (resides at Norfolk, Conn.), Alia (married a Mr. Allyn) and Laura (the wife of Nathan Starr Corrington, of Cook County, Ill.

His grandfather, Jared Butler and wife, Elizabeth Doggester, were farmers and reared their family at Norfolk. He died there in 1822, aged seventy-five years. The paternal great-grandfather of Albert Butler was Nathaniel, and the family is of English origin.

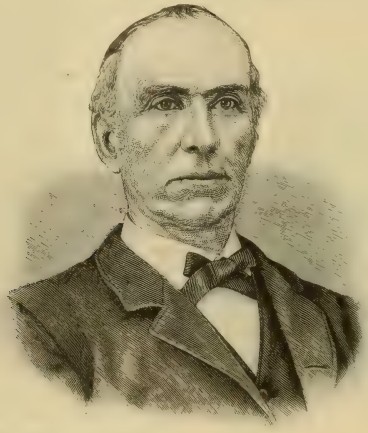
Jonathan Drake Simpson (1792–1860), a native of Chatham, N. J., was the son of Isaac Simpson, a native of Holland, who served in the Revolutionary War. His mother's family name was Drake and their church relation Presbyterian, of which he was a member in his younger days. At the age of eighteen he enlisted and served as a drummer in the War of 1812, at Sandy Hook, and after his discharge he served in the New Jersey State militia as first lieutenant. He learned how to carry on a grist-mill and was well practiced in Mahogany veneering sawing, at which business he worked until about 1822, when he was asked to locate at Seely's Mills (now Seelyville), Wayne County, Pa., and take charge of the newly erected grist-mill at that place, which he attended for many years. Soon after settling at Seelyville he bought a large tract of land, comprising most of the hill-sides in view of that promising mill site, but entering largely into the lumbering business, the spring's floods swept his stored logs and lumber suddenly away and left him deeply in debt. He was a man highly esteemed by all who knew him. In 1827 he married, at Seelyville, Mary Cramer (1809–67), a Christian woman and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for over forty years. Their children are Ann Eliza, Helen Amanda, Mary Emily, Susan Beach (died in Iowa) Carolina Elizabeth and S. Melissa Simpson. One son, Jonathan Drake Simpson, loyal to the Union cause during the late Civil War, served with the Northern troops, was taken prisoner and confined in a rebel prison where he is supposed to have died. He left a widow and one child—Lotta Simpson.



HENRY VAN DEUSEN.

Henry Van Deusen (1794–1868) and his wife, Louisa Dobel (1798–1879), daughter of John Dobel, both natives of Great Barrington, Mass., came from that State in 1833, with their three children, and settled in Dyberry township, Wayne County. There they spent the remainder of their lives. They were interred in the cemetery at Honesdale. The Van Deusens resided for a time on the place now owned by Mr. Bullock. The father gave it to his sons, and subsequently bought the farm of one hundred and twenty acres on the Dyberry, upon which he erected the present residence, the property being owned in 1886 by his daughter, Mrs. George E. Baker. Henry Van Deusen was one of the most esteemed and substantial citizens of the township, a man of temperate and correct habits, of strong mind and good judgment, and of sterling integrity in all his business relations.

He had a good English education, and his written papers drawn by himself, together with his methodical and business-like way of keeping his accounts, attest not only his general intelligence but somewhat of his scholarship. He was an attendant of the Episcopal Church before coming to Wayne County, and interested in matters of church afterwards, but there being no church here then, he never united with any religious denomination, although he represented the highest type of morality and was a contributor to religious work.

His father, Isaac I. Van Deusen (1767–1831), was a farmer and tanner, at Great Barrington, and married Christina Spoor (1765–1830), by whom he had the following children: Nicholas, died in Illinois; Henry, Catherine (1791–1874), was the wife of Isaac Wheeler, of Victor, N. Y., and left a family of children at her death. The children of Henry and Louisa Van Deusen are Mark, born May 4, 1823, married Sarah E., eldest daughter of George E. Baker, mentioned in this sketch, and resides in Oregon township, where he is closely identified with its interests, and has served as school-director and supervisor; George H. (1829–1883), served his township as supervisor, was a good citizen, resided on the homestead with his sister, and there died, unmarried, and Carrie E. Van Deusen, wife of George E. Baker, residing on and owning the Van Deusen homestead. Mrs. Louisa (Gobel) Van Deusen's mother was Elizabeth Griswold. Mark Van Deusen's children, the only persons of the third generation in Wayne representing the Van Deusen family are Frank, Carrie E., Hattie, George and Leslie Van Deusen.

GEORGE E. BAKER.

George E. Baker, born May 22, 1822, in Rhode Island, on the line between that State and Connecticut, came with his parents, Ezra Baker (1790–1881) and Elizabeth (Bennett) Baker (1792–1879), in 1831, and settled near Rileysville, in Lebanon township, Wayne County, where Virgil Brooks now resides. The parents resided in that locality the remainder of their lives, were much esteemed citizens, zealous supporters of the Free Will Baptist Church, and raised their children under religious instruction and influence. They were interred at Rileysville. Their other children were Elmira, died at the age of thirteen years and Stephen, a twin brother with George E., resides in Oregon township; George, grandfather of George E. Baker, resided in Rhode Island, and married Phebe Taylor, a sister of William Taylor, father of Mrs. Jehiel Justin, of Lebanon. He was a well-read man, and although a farmer by occupation, was a somewhat public man, and represented his constituency in the State Legislature. He died about the year 1840, aged sixty-eight years.

George E. Baker early learned what hard work meant, but had the usual opportunities of the district school, which he improved. His life-work has been that of a farmer. He first married in 1846, on New Year's day, Emily E. (1825–1873), daughter of John and Millany (Huntington) Lincoln, of Lebanon township, formerly from Connecticut. By this marriage he had children, viz: Sarah E., wife of Mark Van Deusen, before mentioned; Harriet A. (1848–1885), was the wife of George W. Kimble, now of Dyberry township; Lydia J., wife of George A. Kimble, of Oregon township; Marcia M. and Lucy E. (twins), the former, wife of Nicholas Humbley, and the latter, wife of Frank Kimble, both of Oregon township. For his second wife Mr. Baker married, December 20, 1883, Carrie E., only daughter of Henry and Louisa (Dobel) Van Deusen, heretofore mentioned. She was born June 20, 1831, and was, therefore, two years old when her parents came to Wayne County. They reside upon the Van Deusen homestead, on the Dyberry Creek. Mrs. Baker regrets that she has no picture of her father to insert in this work, but has furnished his autograph for engraving herein.

CHAPTER XXI.

LEBANON TOWNSHIP.[1]

LEBANON is bounded on the east by Damascus, south by Oregon and Dyberry, west by Mount Pleasant, north by Buckingham and Manchester. It contains about thirty-seven square miles. A large portion of it is covered with woods; the hemlock, ash and basswood is mostly gone. The principal timber is hard and soft maple, beech, birch, black and white ash, basswood and hemlock with pine and spruce in swamps. Some butternut, chestnut, hickory and elm.

The surface of the township is generally uneven; some parts are very rough, ledges and detached rocks covering a considerable portion of the hillsides, especially along the larger streams. The general course of the streams is south. Near the northern part of the township, a ridge called Laurel Ridge runs nearly east and west, dividing the waters of the Delaware and Dyberry. The soil produces good crops of corn, oats, buckwheat and potatoes. Some good crops of wheat and rye have been raised, but the soil is better adapted to grazing than tillage. In the northeast corner is a lofty hill called "Big Hickory." In a ledge of rocks on lands of James Gethin, some beautiful specimens of quartz have been found and in a cultivated field near by, Mr. Gethin frequently plows up small quartz. Upper Woods Pond is a noted resort for fishermen. At the Lower Woods Pond the Delaware & Hudson Company have a reservoir for feeding the canal. These with Duck Harbor comprise all the ponds of much size in the township.

EARLY SETTLERS.—Commencing at the west line of the township on the Newburgh turnpike one finds the old Stevens place. Silas Stevens from Vermont took up lands on both sides of the turnpike about 1810 and commenced keeping tavern in 1812, which business he continued most of his life. He was succeeded by his son William, who some years ago disposed of his real estate to Robbins Douglass. Silas Stevens appears to have been of an inventive turn of mind. At one time he constructed a churning machine to run by water. He also built a threshing machine setting up a perpendicular post in the barn so that it would turn around. In this he placed a horizontal shaft which would also revolve; this he filled with pegs reaching the floor; he then spread the grain in a circle around the upright, hitched a horse to the outer end of the shaft and started, but how much grain he threshed is not known. He married Esther Merrill. Their children were Alfred, Merrill, William, Malby and Palina, (Mrs. Benajah Carr).

The next farm on the east, on the south side of the road was that of John Douglass, also of Vermont and a brother-in-law of Stevens. His wife was Sybil Merrill. He died many years ago and was succeeded by his only son Robbins, who died 1876. There are two of his daughters still living, Mrs. Seth Yale of this town and Mrs. John Rutledge of Damascus. Robbins Douglass was succeeded by his son Gates H., who resides on the old homestead.

The next farm on the north side of the road was that of Joseph Bass, who came from Windham County, Conn., in 1815. His wife was Lucy Gager. He died in 1843, leaving four sons: Thomas H., Jason G., John W. and Gilbert P. Bass. The latter who lives upon and owns the old homestead is the only living member of the family.

The next settler on the east was David Gager, who came from the same place and with Joseph Bass, whose wife was a sister of Gager's. Gager cleared up his farm. There are two of his sons still living in Wayne County, Horace W., of Lebanon and Edwin B., of Dyberry.

On the south side of the turnpike, opposite the Bass farm, Elisha Lincoln settled in 1817. He lived upon the farm until 1837 when he moved west. P. S. Bass, the only son of G. P. Bass, owns the front of the farm and Francis Halligan the rest.

The next farm on the east and opposite the Gager farm, John Lincoln, a brother of Elisha, settled in 1817. In 1823 he settled on the farm now owned by his son-in-law, Hiram Wright; he kept a hotel for many years, and was postmaster at Rileysville a long time. He had three sons,—John, Steadman and Giles; and two daughters,—Mrs. H. Wright and Mrs. George Baker. Mrs. Wright is the one living in this township at present. Mr. Lincoln died at the residence of H. Wright in 1867; the Lincolns were from Connecticut. P. S. Bass lives upon the front of the old farm of John Lincoln, C. H. Scudder owning the rear.

The next farm on the north side of the road was settled by George Parkinson early in the present century. He was probably the first settler in West Lebanon, as his old house was the only one upon the old road, which at this point ran half a mile north of the turnpike. The old place has passed through many hands; the Robinsons, Stephen Hoyt, P. G. Goodrich, Esq., J. Stacy and others being its owners. It is now owned by C. H. Scudder and William Murphy.

Opposite the Parkinson place Benajah Carr settled about the year 1814; the land was given him by his father. Carr cleared up his farm, sold out to C. H Scudder and went West in 1849. None of the family remain in the township.

Passing on, the next place on the south side of the road is the Wheatcraft farm, settled by Edward Wheatcraft, of Frederick, Md., about 1803. The farm is now owned by G. H. Douglass and Charles Bennett. Opposite the Wheatcraft farm Willet Carr, a brother of Benajah Carr, located. He sold out to Walker Harrison and moved to Preston township, on the farm now owned by J. L. Sherwood.

Turning to the north, between the Parkinson and W. Carr farms, and passing on we find William Murphy on the west side of the road owning a part of the old Parkinson farm. Beyond him on the east side of the road lives Matthew Lestrange, owning a part of the Harrison farm, which was cleared by Jesse Harrison, a son of Walker Harrison. Galen Wilmarth and Michael Moran owned and lived upon it previous to Lestrange. Off the road, east of Lestrange, Edward Moran settled about forty years ago. In 1884 he sold to James B. Megivern and bought the Ralph Case farm in Clinton. On the west side of the road lives Michael Lestrange, on a farm cleared by his father, Patrick Lestrange, who now resides in Mount Pleasant. Passing on north we come to the farm cleared by Thomas Moran, now deceased. It is now occupied by his son and widow. Moran and Lestrange came here about forty years ago. The next place is one settled on by Patrick Rogers about thirty years ago. Rogers and his wife have been dead some years. His sons remain upon the farm. Passing on we find P. O'Neill, Peter Hughes and Thomas McKenna, who have recently settled here. Going south from the turnpike, on the road between the B. Carr and Wheatcraft farms, and south along the road leading to Honesdale, we find Samuel Latourette, for many years a resident on the farm originally taken up by Seymour Spafford; still passing on south we find on the east side of the road a farm taken up by Lester and John Spafford, owned more recently by John Latourette, and at present by Francis Cunningham, of Herrick Centre, Susquehanna County. Farther south on the west side of the road is Benjamin E. Gager, and on the east side is Nelson Latourette. Still farther on, and on the west side of the road is James Gethin. The three last named have cleared up their farms within the last few years.

On the east side of the road is an old place first taken up by John W. Bass, who chopped down twenty-five acres of timber. He sold his interest in the place to one Perkins, who left it about 1837, when Peter Latourette became the owner. It is now owned by his grandson, George Latourette. South of this to the south line of the township is an unbroken wilderness. David Spafford made a commencement off the road west of S. Latourette, on the land now owned by the latter. Seymour Spafford was a cousin of the other three. John and David married daughters of Joseph Bass. Lester married an Arnold, of Prompton. John Spafford left one son, Joseph B., now an engineer at Carter's factory, Providence, Luzerne County; and three daughters,—Mrs. M. Silsby, Mrs. William Love and Mrs. John Fordham. John Spafford died at Mount Pleasant some years ago, David went to Michigan, where he died, and Lester died near Stockport, N. Y.

Returning to the turnpike and passing on east beyond the W. Carr place, on the north of road, we come to the farm first settled by one Simons, who built a house on it and was burned out. He removed to Susquehanna County, where some of his descendants still reside. This farm is owned by heirs of John Wilmarth, son of Galen Wilmarth. Benjamin Wheeler and Philo Spencer, of Mount Pleasant, married Simons' daughters. East of Simons place, on the north side of the road, lives Horace W. Gager on a farm owned by Elijah Gillett. Joining this on the east are lands taken up by Hugh Gammell, of Vermont, who for his second wife married a sister of Gillett's. Gammell must have been here as early as 1810, for in 1813 he had an orchard set out, now owned by E. E. Yale, son of J. E. Yale. Opposite Gammell's a man named Duncan commenced and put up a house of hewn logs, but never finished it. Peter Latourette before named settled on it next, and he sold to Joseph Bennett, who died there. Charles Bennett, his son, now owns the farm. James F. Yale married a daughter of J. Bennett, and Ezra E. Yale another. Below the Bennett farm, on the south side, is a farm formerly known as the Quinett place, from Francis Quinett, who once lived there, but at present occupied by the widow and son of John E. Yale. Nearly opposite this place, but a little farther east, the father of John and David Howell, late of Mount Pleasant, was located before 1813.

The next farm on the east, lying on both sides of the turnpike, was cleared up by Seth Yale, who came from Connecticut to Mount Pleasant in 1806. In 1813 he settled here. He was once county commissioner and for many years justice of the peace, and as such he never had an appeal taken from his decision. He always counseled settlement rather than law. He had more hair-breadth escapes than any hunter in the vicinity. At one time having shot an otter on the ice at "Lower Woods Pond," in going after it the ice broke with him and he went into the pond. The ice kept breaking with him until nearly exhausted, he put his wet mittens on the ice as far as he could reach, and when they froze fast he drew himself out, then getting some poles and brush he constructed a bridge and thus secured his otter. His wife was a daughter of James Bigelow, of Mount Pleasant. He died at Honesdale in 1858, leaving the following children,—Seth, James F. (since deceased), Norman, John E., Ezra E., Clayton, Eliza, Tryphena and Mary. John E. Tryphena and Mary have since died. Philo Sherwood married Tryphena; G. P. Bass, Eliza; Mary died unmarried. Ezra E. owns the lands south of the road, and Clayton the north part of the old homestead.

East and adjoining the Seth Yale farm on the north side of the road live Edward Kernan and P. Coffey, on land originally settled by Captain Asa Yale, a Revolutionary soldier and uncle of Seth Yale. He came about 1817–18, went back to Connecticut on a visit and was drowned on his way back to Pennsylvania.

Going on east about a mile and a quarter we find Shieldsboro, so-called from Robert Shields, a son of Thomas Shields, the great land-holder; having built a saw-mill here in 1828, he placed two of his sons in charge of the property, but after a short time they left for a (to them) more congenial clime. The property is now owned by John H. Cassidy, of Damascus, brother of Lewis C., attorney-general of Pennsylvania, but the mill is operated by E. Stanton, of Honesdale. Opposite, on the south side of the road lives S. Wilmarth, a blacksmith. East of this on the south side of the road, is Seth Yale, son of Esquire Yale. He settled on this place about fifty years ago. His wife is a daughter of John Douglass.

Passing on east and turning south on the middle Lebanon road we first find Albert Belknap, a son of Josiah Belknap, who cleared up the farm. Belknap married a daughter of J. Douglass for his first wife, and Alice Green as his second. South of this is the farm of Abial Brown, which was first taken by Josiah Bennett, and south of this latter is Jehiel Justin also on Bennett land. Justin is an eastern man, settled here in 1839. Passing along the road south we find on the west side of the road a farm belonging to the heirs of Lewis Kreitner, first settled by Bailey Hendricks. Pierce Handell lived there at one time. Farther south on both sides of the road is the farm of Jackson Latourette, a son of John Latourette. This place was taken up by James Balkcom, (2) who cut the timber on twenty-five or thirty acres, when he sold out to one Hezekiah French, who built the house and barn. He was succeeded by Matthewson, and he by G. & T. Mitchell. The next farm south of the Latourettes is that of Frank Robinson, who succeeded his father, James Robinson, who settled there about forty years ago. This farm was formerly owned by Rev. Curtis Stoddard. The next farm south is one formerly owned by Calvin R. Niles, but at present by E. E. Avery, who married a daughter of Niles. Below this we find John Robinson on the farm settled upon by John Pulis, who went west. The next farm is owned by heirs of Ezra Brown, a son of Henry Brown, a soldier of 1812, and the next was settled upon by Henry Brown aforesaid and is, at present, occupied by W. H. Palmer. Henry Brown married Betsy Nelson. He died in 1877 and left one daughter—Mrs. Fred. Hubbard. Passing the Brown farm a short distance and turning to the left the old farm of Ephraim Pulis, now owned by his son Spencer M., comes in view. E. Pulis was once county commissioner, and for some years a justice of the peace. The next farm going east is owned by Richard Arthur and was formerly owned by Aaron Pulis. The next is Wm. Ridd's and the next is the Henry Avery farm. The two last named farms were taken up by one Lewis Payne in 1825. Returning to the turnpike and turning east we come to a farm commenced by Nathan Yerkes, but cleared up and improved by Wm. Adams, formerly of Delaware County, N. Y. He was a natural accountant and penman, many years assessor and secretary of the school board. His wife was Matilda Stark. He and his wife have been dead some years. They left two sons, George and Henry. The old farm is now owned by Lucy Belknap, daughter of Josiah Belknap. The next farm east and on the south side of the road is where John Lincoln, before mentioned, settled in 1823. It was formerly occupied by a Mr. Forbes, and before that by a Mr. Losey. It is at present owned by Hiram Wright. Lincoln's wife was Millany Hutchinson. Nearly opposite is Homer Brooks, a son of Virgil Brooks, on a farm formerly owned by A. B. Lacey, now of Oneonta, N. Y. Just east of Brooks is the Presbyterian Church and Rileysville school-house.

The farm east of H. Brooks, and lying on both sides of the turnpike, is the old John C. Riley place. Riley commenced here about sixty-five years ago. He kept hotel and store. The farm has passed through many hands, and is now owned by H. C. Stevenson.

Opposite Stevenson's is Dr. S. A. Kelley, and east of Kelley is Owen Gilroy. Below him, on the east side, is John Taylor, a blacksmith. The next building is the Methodist Episcopal Church; the next the store and dwelling of S. H. & N. W. Vail, sons of S. K. Vail, deceased. East of Vail's store, on the north side of the road, is Stephen Hopkins, a son of Judah B. Hopkins, of Rhode Island, who settled on the south side of the road about fifty years ago. The farm is now owned by Clarence, a son of S. Hopkins. Avery and Wilcox were on the place before Hopkins. East of Hopkins is George Blair, on the south side of the road, Mrs. C. Rice and E. Rice, on north side; W. S. Vail owns a farm formerly owned by Adam Kniver. East of this is a farm owned by heirs of the Samuel K. Vail, who came from Orange County, N. Y., about twenty-eight years ago. This farm was first settled by Joseph Thomas, afterward by J. C. Riley, who kept tavern, and later by Abraham Mitchell. East of the Vail farm, on north side of turnpike, lives Linus N. Goodnough, and on the south side is William Atkins. At this point a road leads south to the Girdland. On this road we find the farms of George Atkins, Henry Dennis, Christian Blokberger, in the Girdland we find Peter Knorr, August Schweighofer, B. Gredlein, Neville Holgate (P.M.), C. Erhardt and others, who have settled in this vicinity within twenty-five or thirty years. Near the Hamlin Mill place are John Erwin, John Tamblyn, Osborn Mitchell and his two sons, John J. and Monroe. Osborn Mitchell is a son of Abraham Mitchell, before mentioned. Near this point the road through the Girdland intersects the road leading from Rileysville to Honesdale. Turning north, the first farm that is passed was formerly owned by Arthur G. Niles, who moved to Nebraska. It is now owned by the widow of S. M. Keesler. North of this is A. R. Bishop, on a farm formerly owned by Aner Treat. Farther north is a farm formerly owned by Stephen Nelson, deceased, and north of this, on the west side of the road, is George Bishop. This farm was taken up by John Wilmarth, the father of Galen and Seba Wilmarth. Nearly opposite is the farm of Stephen Pulis, originally taken up by William Balkcom. Balkcom left one son, D. W. M. Balkcom and two daughters, Mrs. Stephen Pulis and Mrs. S. O. Lincoln. Next, on west side of the road, is a farm once the property of James Balkcom (2), subsequently owned by Elijah Budd, but now by the heirs of D. W. M. Balkcom. Adjoining this on the north is the farm cleared up by Daniel Balkcom, who died in 1873, and left one son, D. W. The farm is now occupied by Charles Balkcom, son of D. W. North of this, and on the east side of the road is the farm taken up by James Balkcom (1), who came from Massachusetts with his three sons,—James, Daniel and William. The farm is now owned by Daniel W., only son of Daniel Balkcom. James Balkcom (2), married for his first wife Sabra Davidson (2), Widow Bicknell (3), Vashti Gleason. He left two sons,—James, living in Oregon township; Lafayette, living in Nebraska, and one daughter, Mrs. W. S. Vail.

North of the two last named farms is the farm of Virgil Brooks, being on both sides of the road. This place was formerly occupied by Jacob Mitchell, none of whose family are left in the township. North of this place was Ezra Baker, an Eastern man, who left two sons, George and Stephen. The farm is now owned by Virgil Brooks. At this point a road leads east; the first farm upon it was taken by Abraham Bennett, of Orange County, N. Y., who married a Ross. He left three sons,—Abraham, Alva and Joseph R., and three daughters. Milton Balkcom now owns the farm. East of this, on south side of road, is Joseph Bennett, on a farm taken up by Jason G. Bass, son of Joseph Bass. He died in Kansas City, Mo. His family are all in the West. He married (1), Marcia Spafford, and his second wife was Harriet Purdy, a sister of Abbott Purdy, Esq. On the north side of the road is a farm once occupied by J. Baird, afterwards by Israel Owens, later by James Blair, and at present by Herbert E. Gager, son of Horace W. Gager, deceased. Beyond this is the farm of Brice Blair. The road here turns to the north and leads to the turnpike near W. S. Vail's.

Returning to the Balkcom road, and going north on west side of the road, we find the farm of Libbie Tomlinson, daughter of Michael Tomlinson, who formerly owned it. On the east side of the road is a farm taken up by Stephen Tyler, now owned by S. O. Lincoln. North of this, on the west side of the road, is a farm once owned by Charles Colborn, more recently by William W. Mamy, and at present by J. Dawson Askins. North of this, on the west side of the road, Joseph Wilmot, from Rhode Island, settled. It is now a part of H. Stevenson's farm. William J. Stoutenberg once occupied the eastern part of the Stevenson farm. Crossing the turnpike, going north, we find O. C. Sears on the farm owned by his father, Miles Sears. Beyond is a farm cleared up by Sidney Coons, now occupied by Henry Hartman. At Vail's store a road leads north, on which are located the farms of Philip Marfing and R. Henderson.

We believe that we have given the names and location of the old settlers as correctly as can be ascertained at the present time. The original settlers have passed away, their descendants were young when they came here, and so in some cases it is difficult to correctly locate some of the pioneers of this township, but the foregoing it is thought is substantially correct.

First Events—The first birth in the township was that of John Wheatcraft, son of Edward and Rebecca Wheatcraft.

The first marriage in which both parties lived in the township, was that of Benajah Carr and Palina, a daughter of Silas Stevens, E. Wheatcraft and Gibson Parkinson were married previous, but their wives were natives of Mt. Pleasant, being daughters of John Rogers.

The first death was that of the mother of Gibson Parkinson.

The first frame house was either upon the Yale or S. K. Vail farm, but supposed to be the latter. They were both built before 1810, which is as early as we have good authority for statements.

Roads.—The road from Rileysville to Jacob Welch's, in Manchester, and thence to Equinunk was laid out in 1823—viewers, David Gager, Elisha Lincoln, Seth Yale and John Kellam. The Justin road was laid out in 1836—E. Lincoln, Seth Yale, D. Gager, William Adams and William Balkcom, viewers. The road starting on the turnpike at the corner of lands of Walter Harrison and George Parkinson, thence to the Delaware River at the mouth of Big Equinunk Creek, was opened in 1838—Warner Preston, Sr., D. Gager, John W. Bass, Seth Yale and William Dillon, viewers. The turnpike was for a long time the mail route. The mail was carried in the four-horse coaches which ran each way daily. To name the different drivers would be impossible, but a few will suffice,—Job Cox, Joe Coit, Nick Daw and last but not least Hiram Wright, commonly called "The Judge," now a resident of this township. To him belongs the honor of driving the last four-horse coach over the route.

Religious Matters.—The first preaching was at the house of Joseph Bass, and according to the best information, was by Rev. Mr. Burroughs, a Methodist, of Connecticut, and father of Hon. Urbane Burroughs, of Susquehanna County. At what time a class was organized is unknown, but a society was formed with Joseph Bass as class leader and licensed exhorter. The class, as far as can be learned, consisted of J. Bass and wife, E. Wheatcraft, Sr. and Jr., and wives, David Spafford and wife and five or six members of the Harrison family. Among the different Methodist Episcopal ministers who have labored here were the following: Joseph Castle, Stocking, Rodgers, Ellis, William Reddy, Charles Perkins, R. S. Rose, Peck, C. V. Arnold, Brownecom, N. Warren Everett, G. W. Leach, J. Durham, Blake, Thomas Warnock. B. F. Larrabee, of Jackson, is the present incumbent.

The first church building erected was the Presbyterian Church, at Rileysville, in 1850. It is a neat wooden building of sufficient size to accommodate about three hundred persons and cost about two thousand dollars. Rev. Mr. Worthington was the first minister in charge. In 1853 Rev. E. O. Ward, of Bethany, assumed pastorship and continued to fill the position until about 1875, since which time there has been no regular minister. Messrs. Foster, Haymaker, Phipps and Martin, students of Princeton Theological Seminary, have each spent one summer's vacation here. Revs. E. O. Ward and S. Torrey have held occasional services. The membership at one time amounted to twenty-five, but deaths and removals have reduced the number to about ten or twelve. In 1872 the Methodist Episcopal Church at Rileysville was built at a cost of twenty-eight hundred dollars.

Schools.—The first building erected for school purposes was at Rileysville, on land of J. C. Riley, about the year 1828. At West Lebanon, a house was built about two years later. Previous to that time unoccupied houses or parts of those that were occupied had been used for school purposes in the winter, and sometimes barns were utilized in the summer season. Sarah Bass, daughter of Joseph Bass, was the first teacher at West Lebanon, and Fanny Huntington, a sister of Mrs. John Lincoln, was at Rileysville about the same time.

Action of Township on the School Law of 1834.—The following occurs in the minutes of the proceedings of the board of school directors of Lebanon school district, Wayne County, Pa. "Agreeably to the requisitions of the acts of Assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed the 1st day of April, 1834, to establish a general system of education by common schools, an election being held at the house of John C. Riley on the 19th day of September, in the year aforesaid, for the purpose of electing six directors of common schools, when, after counting the votes, it appeared that the following persons were duly elected: for one year, S. K. Dodge, Robbins Douglass; two years, W. Adams, E. Lincoln; three years, Samuel Wenzell, Daniel Balkcom. William Adams was chosen president, S. Wenzell secretary, Daniel Balkcom treasurer and E. Lincoln delegate." There were only two districts at first, known as the east and west districts. We find the following entry: "Aug. 27th, 1835, Directors Wm. Adams, Elisha Lincoln, Jesse Harrison & S. Wenzell, visited the school in the west division, kept by Miss Keziah Day, and found the same to be conducted under a strict discipline and good moral principles, and contains 38 Scholars from 3 to 14 years of age, 30 of which are in reading and writing, the remainder in Spelling, &c., the Said School having been kept open 4 months at 5 dollars per month," also, August 30th, directors Adams, Lincoln, W. J. Stantenberg and Wenzell "visited School in Eastern division kept by Miss Louisa Smith, and found it to be conducted as the one above Stated, to contain 30 Scholars from 3 to 14 years of age, 25 of whom are in reading and writing, the remainder in Spelling &c., the School having been taught 5½ months at 4 dollars per month."

The school-houses at this time were owned by stockholders. On October 28, 1836, a committee reported that they were unable to have the property turned over to the directors upon reasonable terms, and the committee were discharged. On October 2, 1839, a committee consisting of Robbins Douglass, Silas M. Stevens and David Gager, were appointed to attend to the local affairs of the west school. When a candidate for the school presented himself for examination Douglass and Stevens commenced the examination, then turned him over to Gager, who commenced at the alphabet, having him read "b-a, ba," etc., until he came to "ci" which he read c i "ki." "Yes," said Gager, "c-i, ki der, kider you can go."

The district has at various times been subdivided to accommodate the school population, but at present contains four districts and a joint school with Oregon. At the close of the school year, 1885, there were one hundred and twenty-two different names on the list; average daily attendance, seventy. The school-houses are all frame buildings and cost about three hundred dollars on an average.

PHYSICIANS.—Dr. Sanford A. Kelly located at Rileysville in 1876. Although comparatively a young man he has built up a large practice in this and other towns. He came here from Hopbottom, Susquehanna County.

About 1878 Dr. Howard Noble, from Damascus, located at Rileysville. He soon removed to Clyde, O., but is now at Mount Pleasant, Pa., where he has a good practice.

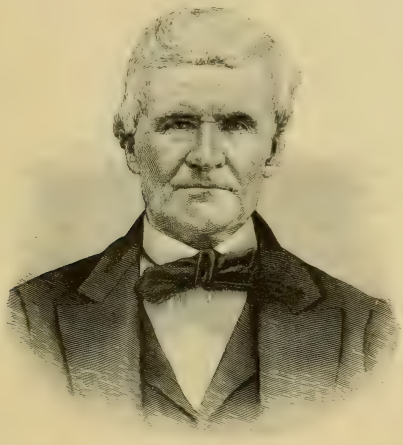
POST-OFFICES.—The office at Rileysville is an old office. J. C. Riley, Thomas Anderson, Giles H. Lincoln, John Lincoln, D. W. Balkcom have severally held the office. S. H. Vail, is the present incumbent. The office at Cold Spring was established in 1858. J. R. Mitchell, Thomas Fulton and P. S. Bass have had the title of postmaster, and E. C. Douglass at present holds the office.

J. C. Riley and Charles Colborn at different times in the earlier days of the township kept a store at Rileysville. S. H. & N. W. Vail keep a general store at Rileysville now, and R. Douglass, a son of Robbins Douglass (deceased), keeps a grocery store on the old David Gager farm.

MILLS, MANUFACTORIES, ETC.—The first mills built in this township were a saw-mill and grist-mill built by George Parkinson; it is probable they were built about the year 1810, as Seth Yale removed from Mount Pleasant to Lebanon, in order to be nearer a grist-mill; but he had only one grist ground before the mill was destroyed by fire. No grist-mill has been built in the town since. The mills were located about a quarter of a mile below the outlet of the Lower Woods pond. In the year 1828, Robert Shields built a saw-mill at what is now known as Shieldsboro. The property has passed through different hands and is now owned by John H. Cassidy, of Damascus, but operated by Elias Stanton, of Honesdale. Some thirty-five years ago Stearns, Brothers & Dart ran a shop for the manufacture of shovel-handles, in connection with the mill. About the year 1845, Barker & Page, a New York firm, built a steam mill on the west line of the town on the Newburg turnpike for manufacturing oars for ship boats. Their works burned down twice and were rebuilt and run until the ash timber within reach was used. Notwithstanding their fires they were successful in a financial point of view. The next saw-mill was built by George N. Hamlin upon Big Brook, where he did a large, but not a very paying business, as he failed, and took the advice of Horace Greeley.

After the mill built by Parkinson was burned a man named Gibbon put up a factory for turning wooden-ware, but not meeting with success, left between the going down of the sun and the rising thereof.

BIOGRAPHICAL.



G. H. AND ROBBINS DOUGLASS.

John Douglass (1773–1842), a native of Vermont, and Silas Stevens, his brother-in-law, a native of the same place, settled near Cold Spring in Lebanon township, and across the line in Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, in 1811. Stevens preceded Douglass, and bought quite a large tract of land, and upon Douglass' arrival let him have one hundred acres of this tract—the part in Lebanon township, located on the Great Bend and Newburgh turnpike, reserving to himself the land in Mount Pleasant township adjoining. John Douglass began clearing off his land, and made what improvements he could before his death. He also engaged largely in teaming to Newburgh on the Hudson, as that was the only route in those early days to convey goods, and the products of this new country to New York. Before leaving Vermont he had married Sybil Merrill (1774–1863), and had a small family of children. She was an exemplary Christian woman—a Methodist in religious persuasion—and reared her large family of children to guard carefully the principles of morality, virtue and right in all the relations of life. Both were interred at Rileysville. Their children are Robbins Douglass (1801–1876); Electa married Jacob Stocker; Nancy was the wife of John Rutledge, of Damascus; Clarissa is the wife of Seth Yale, of Lebanon township; Julia married Josiah Belknap, of Lebanon; Eliza wife of Jesse Belknap, of Tompkins County, N. Y.; Marilla, wife of David Belknap, of the same place; and Fanny, wife of William Balkcom, of Lebanon. Of this large family of children only Nancy and Clarissa survive in 1886.

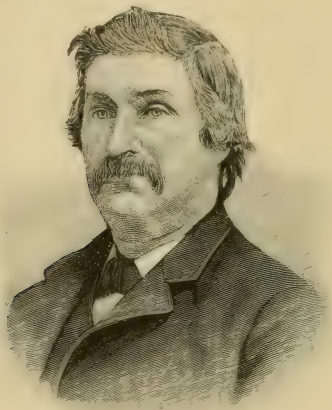
men. He gave his active life to the improvement of his property, except as he was called upon to fill official place in the township of Lebanon as supervisor, school director and other places of trust in the interest of the people. He adhered to the principles of the old Whig party, and allied himself to the Republican party at its birth in 1855, ardently supporting its nominees for place.



His first wife, Hannah Balkcom (1805–1833),

ROBBINS DOUGLASS.

Robbins Douglass, only son of John and Sybil Douglass, inherited one hundred acres of his father's real estate—the original homestead—and in 1833 built the present residence, now occupied and owned by his son, Gates H. Douglass, together with most of the out-buildings. He added by purchase during his life some three hundred and fifty acres of land, a part of which is situate in Mount Pleasant township, which at his death was divided among his children. He was a man of firm convictions, of unblemished character, good judgment and esteemed by his fellow townsbore him children—Hannah S., born in 1824, is the widow of the late John E. Yale, a farmer in Lebanon; Fanny M. (1826–1862), was the wife of Edwin Gager, of Damascus; Sally R., born in 1828, is the widow of Benjamin Holgate, of Damascus; John was a farmer on a part of the homestead, was married and left one son; Robbins born in 1833, is a merchant and farmer at Cold Spring, near the old homestead. By his second wife, Catherine Nelson, he had the following children: Gates Horatio, born February 18, 1839; Emily Eliza, born in 1842, wife of Henry Stevenson, a farmer of Rileysville ; Martha Jane (1845–1883), was the wife of Lowell Goodenough, of West Lebanon ; Rhoda Samantha, born in 1846, is the wife of Jacob Welch, of Mount Pleasant ; and Clark Hanil (1849–1868), unmarried, resided on the homestead. The mother of these children was born in Dyberry township in 1808, and since the death of her husband, has resided mostly with her brother, John Nelson, now deceased, but now resides with her only surviving brother, Charles Nelson, on a part of the old Nelson homestead on the Dyberry, in the township of the same name. Her mother was a sister of Conrad Pulis, a native of Germany, and an early settler in Wayne County. Catharine Nelson's father was Richard Nelson (1770–1826), settled on the Dyberry in Dyberry township, opposite the "Big Eddy," in 1798, where he owned some two hundred acres of land, most of which he cleared and made improvements thereon. His wife, Bridget Wheeler (1776–1825), bore him the following children : Elizabeth was the wife of Henry Brown, a farmer of Lebanon, where both died ; John (1800–1884) never married and resided on the homestead ; Rhoda was the wife of James C. Harvey, of Indiana, where both died ; Eleanor was the wife of William Balkcom, of Lebanon, where both died and are buried in the Rileysville cemetery ; Catherine the wife of the late Robbins Douglass, noticed herein ; Peter resided on the homestead and never married ; Stephen married and settled in Lebanon where he died ; James, a farmer in Nebraska ; Emily, wife of Osborn Mitchell, a farmer of Lebanon ; and Charles, born November 5, 1819, unmarried, and resides on a part of the old homestead.

Gates Horatio Douglass succeeded to three hundred and fifty acres of the homestead property upon his father's death, a part of which is one hundred acres of the original Stevens purchase in Mount Pleasant township, to which he has added other real estate. Besides carrying on his farm, he has engaged largely in lumbering and marketing bark for the past twenty years, reaching annually some five hundred cords of bark, which he markets at Tanner's Falls at a price ranging from five to six dollars and a half per cord. He is a thorough-going and thrifty farmer and business man, and has served his township as supervisor and school director. He married, in 1861, Catherine Rutledge, who was born September 7, 1841. Their children are, Cora Edith (wife of Fletcher Coons, of Mount Pleasant), Warren Edmund, Alonzo R. (died young), Mary Catherine and Stella Blanche, who also died in infancy. Alexander Rutledge, the grandfather of Catherine Rutledge, came from Ireland in 1803, and first settled near Cochecton, and soon after settled in Damascus, where he reared a family of five sons and four daughters, and then died. Her parents, Alexander Rutledge (1799–1865) and Mary Ann Latourette (born in 1809) resided in Damascus, where her mother now survives in 1886. Mary Ann Latourette, was the daughter of Peter and Rebecca (Moore) Latourette, the former a blacksmith by trade, who came from New York, where he was born, to Orange County, and thence, in 1822, to Lebanon, where he was a farmer and where both himself and wife died at the age of eighty-five years, and were buried at Rileysville. The Douglasses are of Scotch origin and the Latourettes of French extraction.

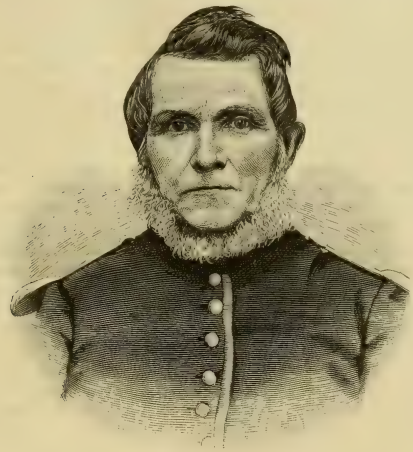
SETH YALE.



Seth Yale (1786–1856), a native of Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn., and his brother Norman, sons of Lieutenant Ezra Yale, of the Revolutionary war, came from that State on foot to Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, Pa., in 1806, where they remained several years. Another brother, Elijah, came to Pennsylvania in 1811, and both himself and Norman enlisted for seven years to serve in the war of 1812, and both died in the service soon after its close. Their only sister, Lydia, married John Bigelow. Seth made the acquaintance of Betsy Bigelow (1787–1862), a daughter of James and Mary Bigelow, of that township, whom he married in 1808, and in 1812 bought some two hundred and sixty acres of land in Lebanon township, situate on the Great Bend and Newburgh turnpike, about one mile east of Cold Spring, for which he agreed to pay five dollars per acre, upon which was a two-story frame house and two acres of cleared land. This place was their future home, and is, in 1866, the property of their sons, Clayton and Ezra E., it having remained in the family since Seth Yale and his wife met the obstacles incident to pioneer life with resolution and patient industry, and carved out a pleasant home for themselves from this wilderness tract of land. In due time the original forest gave way to the relentless woodman's axe. Broad fields of grain and grass showed the result of their well-merited efforts, and they were known by all who formed their acquaintance and enjoyed their society as a couple well calculated to fight the battle of life together. In 1832 he erected the present residence of Clayton Yale, which, for the time it was built, will vie with any homestead residence in the township; and as his crops demanded, and his means were sufficiently adequate, he erected also from time to time commodious barns and outbuildings. Seth Yale grew into good favor with his fellow-townsmen for his integrity of purpose in life's pursuits, and he was accounted a man of sterling qualities, who honored only justice and right. He possessed a mild disposition, a fixed purpose, and a discriminating intellect. He was conservative in his opinions, and guarded carefully the principles of morality and paternal affection. For thirty years he served as justice of the peace in Lebanon township, was a Whig in politics, and died about the time of the birth of the Republican party. Both himself and wife were buried in the Presbyterian cemetery at Pleasant Mount. She was a devoted Christian mother and wife, and did her part well in rearing their large family of children. James and Mary Bigelow were natives of the town of Spencer, Worcester, Mass., the latter born on the 6th and the former born on the 7th of June, 1762.

They lived together fifty-nine years, and were separated by death only a few hours, reaching the age of a little upwards of four-score years, and being buried together at Pleasant Mount, Wayne County, to which township they removed in 1808, where they spent their lives as farmers. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and entering the army at the age of fifteen, he served in a regiment of Massachusetts militia, under Colonel Michael Jackson, until its close. One son, John Bigelow, a farmer, died in Mount Pleasant township in 1884. Another son, James H., married Mary Ann Muzzey, and died only a few years since. His daughters were:—Sally was the wife of John Tiffany, of the same place; Tryphena was the wife of Jonathan Miller, a blacksmith, of the same place; Tryphosa was the wife of Clayton Rogers, who resided in the same township until his children grew up, and then removed to Wisconsin; Patty was the wife of Benjamin Fletcher, a farmer near by; and Thursa was the wife of Richard Delong, of Bradford County, Pa. The children of Seth and Betsey (Bigelow) Yale are:—Seth, born in 1811, a farmer in Lebanon township, has two children; James F., born in 1812, a farmer in Susquehanna County, Pa., has three children; Eliza J., born in 1815, is the wife of Gilbert P. Bass, of Lebanon, and has two children; Lydia T. (1816–1856) was the wife of Philo Sherwood, a miller on the Wyalusing, and at her death left nine children; Norman, born May 3, 1818, never married; John E. (1819–1885) was a farmer in Lebanon, and died, leaving five children; Patty J. (1822–1828); Mary M. (1824–1873) never married; Ezra E., born in 1827, and Clayton Yale, born in 1832, both farmers, and each owning a part of the homestead property. Ezra has no children, and Clayton has five children.

Norman Yale

All these sons and daughters in early life learned the useful lessons of industry and economy, and themselves and families may be safely ranked among the substantial and highly respected families of Wayne County. The sons have borne their share of the public burdens of their township, and several of them have held the highest places of trust within the gift of their fellow-townsmen. Norman, third son, herein noticed, has always resided on the homestead, although he has owned real estate adjoining. He has served two terms as justice of the peace, and held other official places in the township. The family has not departed from the political faith of their father, and have been members of the Whig and Republican parties.

Jehiel Justin

JEHIEL JUSTIN.

Jehiel Justin was born in Canterbury, Windsor County, Conn., March 3, 1803. Through reverses in business his father met with loss, and his family was obliged to meet the obstacles incident to straitened circumstances, and get a livelihood as best they could. Thus at the tender age of thirteen years, Jehiel began learning the trade of a blacksmith, which not suiting his taste, he at the age of fourteen years abandoned to learn shoemaking, which formed his main business for many years thereafter, especially during the winter months. With a view to better wages and a more active employment, he learned the trade of a mason with his brother-in-law, Havilah Taylor, and following three years service, worked one year as a journeyman, and one year afterwards on the Hudson, in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. On November 27, 1828, he married Caroline Jane, a daughter of William Taylor (1774–1811) and Berthier Handell (1776–1840), of Brooklyn, in the same county in which he was born. She was born October 8, 1809. After his marriage he bought two hundred and thirty-six acres of land in Oregon township, Wayne County, Pa., for three hundred and fourteen dollars; built a log house for himself, and one also for Ezra Baker, father of George E. Baker, of Dyberry township. The next year, February 14, 1830, he settled on this property with his wife, and thus transported from New England to this wilderness, the new couple were really settled to carve out a home and competency for themselves. It may here be said to the credit of Mrs. Justin, that from that day until the writing of this sketch—fifty-six years afterwards, she has been a help-meet indeed, and done her part well in rearing her family and staying up the hands of her husband when dark days and depression hovered around their early home, and in after years when she saw her husband, four sons and son-in-law, all leave their homes to fight for the preservation of the Union in the late Civil War. After two years residence on this land, he sold it to his brother, Nathan, and bought a tract at Seelyville, which, however, he did not move on to. About this time he purchased from the State and obtained a patent deed through the late Hon. E. W. Hamlin, some four hundred acres of land at twenty-eight cents per acre, in Dyberry township, a part of which he sold to Captain Homer Brooks and a part to Joseph A. Hubbard, and another part to Harry Brown. Mr. Justin only owned this land some four years, and during this time carried on the lumber business. After a residence in Honesdale for some three years, where he worked at his trade as a mason, he, in 1840, bought his present farm of one hundred and thirty-six acres in Lebanon township, then a wilderness tract. This land he mostly cleared many years ago, planted apple orchards, and in 1853 completed his present residence, which supplanted the old log house. During his entire business life, he has in connection with his farming, worked at his trade—extending through a period of nearly half a century. He was one of the early members of the Masonic fraternity in Wayne County, and connected with the lodge at Honesdale, of which he is still a member. Filled with that loyalty and love of country, for which his New England forefathers shed their blood to save and make independent, Mr. Justin, upon the breaking out of the late Civil War, was ready to give his services to restore the Union, although then nearly sixty years of age. He enlisted in the fall of 1861 in the Second Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery, and served as cook for nine months, when he was honorably discharged and advised to return home on account of his age. His eldest son, William E. Justin, enlisted in 1862, and served in the Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Company M, under Captain Ham, who was killed at Dinwiddie Court-House. He afterwards served under General Sheridan, and was in the battles of Beverly Ford, Chancellorsville and Cedar Creek. During their skirmishes with guerrillas he was taken prisoner near Lovettsville, but after two days released and rejoined the ranks, but never did active service in battle again. He remained until honorably discharged at Clouds Mills, at the close of the war. A second son, Howard Tracy Justin, enlisted in 1862, and served in the Sixth Pennsylvania Reserves, Company C. He was wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg in the leg, which destroyed his foot, and was the cause of his death in 1886, at the age of forty-seven years. Havilah T. Justin, another son, served throughout the war in the Fiftieth New York Engineer Corps, and in 1886 resides at Lake Como, Wayne County. A fourth son, Edwin G. Justin, enlisted toward the close of the war for one year, was at the battle of Petersburg and saw the surrender of General Lee to General Grant. He resides at Warren, Pa. Other children are,—Charles Ferdinand, George Emmons, Susan (1830–1856) married David Lacey; Phebe Taylor is the wife of Abial Brown, of Rileysville; Hannah Delilah, wife of George Hamlin, of Indiana; Emily T. married Professor Bruce Jones, of Jamestown, N. Y., who served throughout the late war in the One Hundred and Forty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, was wounded at Chancellorsville. William and Berthier Taylor's other children are,—Havilah, who married ————, a sister of Jehiel Justin, subject of this sketch; Oliver Putnam, of Scituate, R. I.; Phebe, Lydia, wife of Leonard Cady; Mary, wife of Moses Waldo ; Olive, wife of Amasa Steer, of Brooklyn ; one son, William, died in the army ; Hannah, wife of William Carver, of the same place, who lost a son in the late war.

His father, Nathan Justin, a native of Canterbury, Conn., married Susan Brainard (1781–1844), and resided on Sterling Hill, Conn., until Jehiel came to Pennsylvania, where the mother removed with him and resided here until her death. She was buried at Rileysville. The father followed the family after many years, and died in Lebanon, October 16, 1856, aged eighty-five years, and was buried by the side of his wife. Their other children were,—Lura Louisa was married to Stephen Piper, and died in Tompkins County, N. Y.; Nathan took up his home in Kansas, and Lydia died young. Mr. Justin's paternal grandfather was of French origin, and his paternal grandmother of English birth. For nearly three-score years, Jehiel Justin and wife have lived together, and are in 1886 numbered among the esteemed old people of Wayne County. She has been a very active woman, and spent much of her spare time from household duties at the arduous work of weaving different kinds of wearing material. She has some years woven some eight hundred yards of cloth, and averaged six hundred yards annually, and even at her advanced age, during the past five months she has woven by hand three hundred and twenty-five yards of flannel and one hundred and four yards of carpet.

CHAPTER XXII.

MANCHESTER.[1]

This township, originally a portion of Buckingham, was created a separate township in 1826. Its boundaries on the north and east, are the State of New York. On the south and west, Damascus and Lebanon townships. Its extreme length on the Delaware River (which divides it from the State of New York), is fourteen miles, with an average width of six miles. The Equinunk Creek divides it from Buckingham, to Crooked Creek, that stream then dividing to Lebanon. On the south a small stream known as Rock Run divides it from Damascus for a short distance, then arbitrary lines from Damascus and Lebanon. Its streams are the Equinunk and Little Equinunk Creeks, and Cooley Brook with their tributaries, one of which is Salt River. The description of the surface of Buckingham will apply without change to this township. It has a like stretch of forbidding river hill, with somewhat less bottom lands. It contains more of what may be termed barrens ; noticeably in the southern part, and on Cooley Brook. Like Buckingham, its hills and valleys were originally densely covered with timber. It has, however, been more thoroughly stripped of its hemlock, and hence has a greater area of valueless lands. The qualities of the land are much the same.

The first white man of whom we have authentic records as dwelling in the township was Josiah Parks, of whom particular mention is made in the sketch of Equinunk. A tradition exists to the effect, that a man named Cooley dwelt on the Delaware at the mouth of the little stream known as "Cooley Brook," prior to and during the Revolution, and that he was a malignant tory. At the close of the war some of the Whigs in the vicinity, to whom Cooley was especially obnoxious, made him a neighborly call, reminded him of his villainies, and with swift retributive justice and swifter bullet took his life, and buried him upon a small island in the Delaware, known since as "Cooley." This comes down though the families of the Mitchells and Tylers who dwelt on the Delaware contemporaneously with Cooley.

The Union Sugar Company.—It is certain that an abortive attempt to settle upon and improve a portion of the lands of Manchester, was made not later than 1793, under the auspices of the "Union Sugar Company," an association composed of prominent citizens of Philadelphia. The objects and aims of the association are best set forth in the "Plan," or document drawn up for the purpose of procuring subscribers to the enterprise. This "Plan" (a copy of which made by Judge Samuel Preston in 1792 is before the writer), very specifically gives the objects of the association, and the motives influencing the originators of the scheme. The substance of the "Plan," is as follows: First, "To establish the credit, and profit of certain lands in Pennsylvania, so as to render them beneficial to the State and inhabitants." Second, "These lands are of a rich quality, and abound in that species of maple which affords sugar, and with many others which afford potash in large quantities." Third, It is hinted that there are already "settlers on these lands, who are either ignorant, or destitute of the means of cultivating them, or of extracting sugar from the maple, or salt (potash) from other trees, to the best advantage." Fourth, "To spread the necessary knowledge on these important articles of agriculture and manufactures through the State, subscribers agree to purchase three thousand one hundred and twenty acres of land of superior quality, situate on the waters of the Little Equinunk Creek, about three miles from the Delaware, and one hundred and sixty miles from Philadelphia. The capital to be divided into sixty shares, the price of each share to be fifty pounds, one-half to be paid within one month after the subscription is full, and a treasurer appointed, and the remainder within one year. The lands thus purchased to be known as the Union Farm." Fifth, "The improvement of it by clearing fields and meadow grounds, planting orchards, purchasing and raising stock, and erecting suitable buildings, as also the manufacturing of sugar[1] and potash, are to be committed to an agent to be appointed by the managers, who are to be chosen by the stockholders." Lastly, "The profits which arise from the cultivation of the soil, as well as from the manufacture of sugar and potash, are to be divided among the stockholders." The instrument bears date "Phila., 8 mouth (Aug.) 23, 1792." Among the stockholders, the heaviest subscribers were Henry Drinker and Samuel Simpson, eight shares; Jeremiah Warder, Parker & Co., six shares; John Fields, Thomas Stewardson, Samuel Pleasants and Samuel M. Fox, each four shares. Then follow the names of twenty-six gentlemen, who are subscribers for one and two shares each. Among them appear names which Americans hold in reverent regard. Notably Samuel Meredith, Robert Morris, Benjamin Rush and others. The total subscribed was three thousand pounds (computed by Pennsylvania currency, eight thousand dollars). The first board of managers consisted of Timothy Pickering, Henry Drinker, Samuel Pleasants, Samuel Hogdon and Samuel M. Fox. Henry Drinker was made treasurer. The lands the association arranged to purchase consisted of eight tracts and contained collectively three thousand one hundred and thirty-three acres. They lie on both sides of the Little Equinunk Creek.

It appears, from papers found, that one John Kinsey was appointed agent and that he resided on the property, but there is no data to establish the exact time when the improvements were commenced, nor by what route the first supplies and implements were brought to the land.

An Act of Assembly, passed April 10, 1792, had appropriated one thousand pounds sterling to open a road from Fort Penn (Stroudsburg) to the Narrows of Lackawaxen, and thence between the Delaware and Lackawaxen to the "Portage" (road from Stockport to Harmony). At the next session a further appropriation of four hundred pounds sterling was made to improve the road. No doubt the road was opened in 1792, thus affording, when there was snow, a route by which the supplies could have been transported. Another, and much used route was by nature's highway, the Delaware River. It is certain that at an early day considerable quantities of merchandise, machinery, implements, etc., to meet the wants of the people who were dropping into forest homes on the upper Delaware, was brought up the river in "Durham Boats." Mr. Goodrich, in his "History of Wayne County," says the kettles, etc., for use of the "Union Sugar Company," were brought in this way. This is by no means unlikely. It would have been no formidable undertaking to have made a passable road from the mouth of the Little Equinunk Creek, for a distance of three or four miles, to where improvements were begun. No memoranda exists to show what success attended the manufacture of sugar and potash in 1793 and 1794. But on the first of January, 1795, the agent, Kinsey, made an inventory which shows the following improvements made on the land, viz.: twenty-eight to thirty acres cleared, eight acres ready to log, seven acres girdled, and that fifty-six apple trees had been set out. Also, that a saw-mill had been erected, with dam and race complete; further, three dwellings, two stables, a smith shop, corn-crib and other out-buildings. Of personal property, the inventory gives one horse, four pair of oxen, one cow, tools, farming implements. It also mentions forty sugar kettles, stone-troughs, casks, sap-troughs, etc., for sugar making. In May, of 1795, Kinsey as "present agent, by and with the consent of Samuel Preston for the owners," entered into contract for the clearing of from ten to twenty-five acres of land during the ensuing summer at thirteen dollars and thirty-three and one-third cents per acre. This seems to end Kinsey's agency. Benjamin Willets seems to have had temporary charge, under Samuel Preston, after Kinsey. In November, 1795, the managers laid before the stockholders a paper declaring "it inexpedient to further prosecute the work," and stating that the amount already expended exceeded the capital by about fourteen hundred pounds sterling, which sum had been advanced by the treasurer, Henry Drinker, and they recommended a sale of the property and a dissolution of the association. In March, of 1796, Willets notified Mr. Preston that he must soon leave unless supplied with food. Two months later the personal property (except the kettles) were sold by vendue, there being some thirty purchasers. The sum realized from the sale was two hundred and eight pounds seven shillings and six pence. The premises were soon left without any responsible person in charge. The improvements rapidly depreciated. The buildings rotted away, and nature asserted her sovereignty, covering the fields again with forest. The early settlers in that portion of Manchester lying near, long knew the place as the "Union Meadows." But meadow, orchard and buildings finally altogether disappeared, and at this writing scarcely a person in the region could tell where the buildings were. The site of the fields was indicated by the dense growth of young and thrifty timber covering them. To resume, since writing the sketch of the Union Sugar Company, the writer has been over a portion of the site on which the improvements were made. There are a few acres of alluvial on the creek which was cleared by the company, now owned and worked by John G. Bloom, an honest German. On this land stands two or three patriarchal apple trees. A little further up the stream indications of the dam built, and of the race-way which brought the water to the mill, are easily traced. The stockholders lost the entire eight thousand dollars of capital paid in, the assets not being sufficient to pay one-third of the liabilities in excess of the capital.

[1] Judging from the prominence given to "sugar" making, the founders of the association no doubt had views similar to those held by a canny Scot, who settled in the State of New York. "If," said he, "I find it profitable, I shall follow it the year round."

Henry Drinker held the title for the lands in trust for the Union Company, but could not sell them without consent of the stockholders. After Mr. Drinker's death, an act of Assembly, passed March 8, 1833, authorized the sale of the land by the executors of Henry Drinker, the proceeds of such sale to be applied first, to pay the debt due the Drinker estate, and the balance, if any, to be distributed among the shareholders. The lands were sold at auction in November, 1833, and were bid in by James L. Biddle for eleven hundred and twenty-five dollars. Mr. Biddle at once reconveyed the property to the executors of Henry Drinker. The lands were afterwards sold by the heirs of Mr. Drinker for a much larger sum, yet the proceeds would not cover one-third of the balance due from the Company to him (Drinker), including taxes and interest to time of sale. Thus it will be seen that the experiment was unprofitable to all concerned. The stockholders lost all invested. Mr. Henry Drinker and his heirs more heavily than any other. Nor can it be claimed that the experiment tended to the advantage of this region by directing emigration thereto. No doubt the stockholders looked to their own personal advantage and profit, yet the motives actuating them were certainly laudable, and it is to be regretted that less attended their enterprise.

EARLY SETTLERS.—Other people were certainly living on the Delaware within the present limits of Manchester as early as 1800. Nathan Mitchell built a saw-mill at Rock Run but little later than this. Before the writer is a list (found among the papers of Judge Samuel Preston) of names of families living on the Delaware, between Cochecton Falls and the forks of the river, at Shehawken, eighty-nine in all, as early as 1807. The list comprises those living on both sides of the river. Among the names appear those of James Lord, Jonathan Adams, Joseph and William White, Abner Lane, Simon Peter Cole, Adam Niven and John Simmons, all of whom, careful inquiry has satisfied the writer, lived within what is now Manchester. John Kellam settled at Pine Flat in 1816. Between this and 1820 he was followed by his brothers Jacob, Peter, Jeptha, George and William. Jacob, George and Jeptha settled within the present limits of Manchester, William in Damascus, Peter on the Lackawaxen. The family were from near Milford. They were all men of energy and push—men who believed in keeping well up to the front in the race of life. Jacob settled on the Delaware above the mouth of the Little Equinunk Creek, where he cleared a large farm. In 1827 he was assessed for sixty acres of improved and five hundred and sixty of unimproved land. The large farm he cleared, with the necessary buildings, orchards and miles of stone wall attests his energy. The lack of common prudence, however, left his fine estate somewhat encumbered, and dying intestate, litigation followed, and most of the property passed to lawyers and courts, little remaining to his heirs. Nine of his eleven children, are yet living in the vicinity. Most of the farm is owned and occupied by Warner P. Adams. John Kellam, in 1827, was assessed for ninety acres of improved land. He died at the advanced age of ninety years. The large real estate owned and improved by him passed entirely out of the family. George Kellam settled at Pine Flat, where he engaged extensively in farming, lumbering and mercantile business. He was very eccentric; he left a large and, for the times, a fine mansion; never married, but dwelt in solitary state. He died at an advanced age the victim of a maniacal melancholy. The mansion and farm are now owned and occupied by Joseph Ross. Jeptha reared quite a family, most of whom yet live in Manchester.

Nathaniel Tyler settled at the extreme lower end of Pine Flat, at an early period. He appears in the first assessment as a farmer; he died within the last decade.

From the best data obtainable it appears that Simon Peter Cole settled at the Cole Flat as early as 1805. Two of his sons, Isaac and Emanuel, appear in the first assessment as farmers. Through want of attention to titles, they lost their improvements and land and left the township. Emanuel settled in Sullivan County, N. Y., and was there killed in an affray by one Adams. Two of his sons reside now in Manchester. Harrison, a farmer, and Amon W., a blacksmith and respected resident of Equinunk.

James Lord settled on the Delaware about two miles below Equinunk, as early as 1807. Here we may mention that the progenitor of the numerous families of Lords living in this vicinity was an Englishman who came to this section at an early date. But little concerning him is obtainable. In 1836 James sold his property on the Delaware to W. Weston, Esq., and removed to the pond bearing his name, where he cleared a large farm and where he died at an extreme old age. Some of his family still own the farm.

About three miles from Equinunk is the neighborhood long and widely known as the "Union." Some of the farmers are on the highest lands in the township. Settlement here was made about the year 1813. The first settlers were from Manchester, in England, hence the name of the township. Among these, and probably the first, was Samuel R. Mogridge, who left England in 1812. He landed at Quebec, and, after considerable difficulty (England and the United States being at war), reached Philadelphia and thence came to Manchester in 1813. Before us lies a letter written by John Warder, of Philadelphia, in 1813, addressed to Samuel R. and Alexander Mogridge. From the tenor of the writing it appears that Warder owned twenty-seven tracts of land in what is now Manchester. These lands had been surveyed in 1809 by Jason Torrey. The Mogridges were to have general supervision of the lands and in the western portion were to select compact tracts for which he (Warder) was to give them a lease, rent free, for fourteen years. The other of the twelve tracts in the western division was to be sold, if possible, by the Mogridges, and the proceeds arising from such sale to be used in the improvement of the land leased to them. On these lands Samuel R. settled. We find no further trace of Alexander. That Mr. Mogridge unflinchingly met the difficulties attending a settlement in the wilderness, far from roads or any of the conveniences of civilized life, is shown by the assessment of 1827, which gives him thirty acres of improved and seventy of unimproved land. Those who remember him speak of him as an honest man and good citizen. Long since he passed to his rest, and the grass has long been green over him, very near to where his toil brought smiling fields from wild forbidding forest. His only living descendant in this section is Miss Ann Preston, of Stockport, daughter of the late Paul S. Preston; his mother having been a daughter of Mr. Mogridge.

Near Mr. Mogridge's settled very soon a number of his countrymen. Jacob W. Welch came in 1813. He was a very intelligent and industrious man. He was assessed in 1827 for seventy-five acres of improved land. He left, at his death, a fair property to his sons, Henry and George. The latter is dead. Henry is an attorney at Hancock, N. Y. Mr. William Parks owns and occupies the old farm.

Samuel Price, James Carter and Thomas Todd were among those who settled in that neighborhood, forming what was first known as the "Union English settlement," afterwards abbreviated to "The Union."

In 1820 there dropped in upon Mr. Samuel Mogridge his nephew, Mathias Mogridge, then a youth aged about eighteen. He was talking when he walked into his surprised uncle's house, and he kept right on talking, except when sleeping, until the universal silencer, Death, stopped him on the 17th of September, 1885. He is entitled to more than a passing notice. Born in London in 1802, when very young he was taken on board an English man-of-war. The vessel on which the young Briton served was one of the fleet which carried Englishmen to disaster and defeat at New Orleans. Returning to England, he went next in the "Northumberland," when it carried the Corsican Attila, Bonaparte, to St. Helena. Being discharged from the navy he came, in 1817, to America, and, in 1820, to Manchester. Here he located in the wilderness. By his industry he cleared up a farm. Here he reared a family of six children, and here, very near the scene of his labors, he rests. He was a good citizen, an honest, upright man. He was remarkable for his conversational powers. He never wearied of talking. He possessed a wonderfully retentive memory and an inexhaustible fund of anecdote and reminiscence. He would start off on an anecdote, to illustrate which he would commence another; this, in turn, needed supplementing. Thus, when the first was completed, a dozen or so had been told, and the end seemed further off than ever. On the occasion of the first World's Fair in London, he returned for a visit to his native country, and astounded the people there by his unceasing talk. He was celebrated there as the "talking Yankee. His son, Mathias, Jr., lives on the old homestead.

At an early date two brothers, named Smeed, built a mill on the Little Equinunk Creek, at what is now as "Braman's." The mill subsequently came into the possession of Mr. George Kellam, who also erected a gristmill at the same place. After many changes, the property came into the hands of Mr. Hamilton Braman, the present proprietor. A saw-mill and a factory for turning is still maintained there.

Many of the other early settlers of the township are worthy of especial mention. Christopher Teeple, who came from the vicinity of the Delaware Water-Gap, in 1822, and located first near the mouth of Equinunk Creek, from whence, after a few years, he removed to the Union, where he cleared a large farm, which is now in possession of his sons, Christopher, Jr., and Abraham. The eldest, William F., yet lives in the township, and is widely known as "Finn Teeple, the Deer-Slayer." It is safe to assume that there is not a man now living in Northeastern Pennsylvania who has made the havoc among the wild beasts of the forest that Finn has. He has hunted over almost the entire county. Pike County, as well as Delaware County, N. Y., has heard the crack of his rifle, and to some denizen of the forest it was the crack of doom. He has kept no record of deer, bear and wolves he has killed, but it is safe to declare that the number of deer would reach into the thousands. Many a time has he driven Bruin from his lair, and followed him like a remorseless fate. The howl of the wolf was music to Finn, yet he tells the writer that he never met that terror of our forests, the panther. Had he done so, we may be sure the panther's fate would have been like that of Roderick Dhu at the hand of Fitz-James. His whole life has been given to hunting. He has sold thousands of dollars' worth of game and peltries, but is something poorer to-day than though he had never owned a rifle or a trap. Occasionally we meet him yet, stalking over the country, trap or rifle in hand, lamenting, like "Leather Stocking," over the destruction of the forest and the disappearance of the game.

Another noted character was William Tyler, familiarly known as "Rock Run Tyler." He was born in the adjoining county of Sullivan, N. Y., his immediate progenitors being among the earliest settlers on the Delaware. As a farmer and lumberman he was noted for his energy. He cleared a large farm in that portion of the township known as the "Tyler Woods," and was celebrated for the large rafts which he got out, and ran down the Delaware. He was unfortunate in business, and with age came the loss of his property, but he retained great physical vigor till past four-score, and piloted large rafts down the Delaware when past seventy-four. He was a member of St. Tammany Lodge, of F. & A. M. which was instituted at Damascus in ante-Morgan days. The craft kindly cared for him in his last days. Two sons and three daughters yet live in the township. He died in 1876, aged eighty-six.

In 1840, Thomas, Robert and Nesbitt Gregg, settled in the forest in the extreme southern part of the township. They were natives of Ireland and have proved excellent citizens. Large fine farms attest their industry and immense families of sons and daughters their value as settlers in a new country. The writer's feelings would induce us to treat individually of many who have been, and are yet residents of the township; who have by their industry subdued the forests, and shaped the interests of the community, but the limits of a work of this nature will not allow it. Anthony H. Lloyd, Gideon B. Chase, John and Peter Lord, Patrick and Richard Osborne, Moses and Oliver Billings, David Layton, the Dennys, Giffords, and many others have passed the best years of their lives in the township, and have given to it years of toil. Many of them yet reside amid the scene of their labors, while others have been called "from labor to refreshment."

The first birth of a white child in the township was no doubt that of a daughter born to Josiah Parks and wife, in the rude shelter of a cave in the rocks at Equinunk, some time between 1776 and 1782. Doubtless in our country's history many like events occurred.

The road mentioned in the sketch of the "Union Sugar Company," as having been built from Fort Penn through to the "Portage," evidently passed through a corner of the township; hence was the first road laid out in the township. In 1830 a road was laid out along the Delaware from Damascus to Little Equinunk. Name of surveyer not obtainable. Other roads were laid out from time to time as the needs of the people made them necessary.

Religious Matters.—In the early settlement of the township the people were too widely scattered to be able to do or effect any organized religious work. We judge, too, that the people, either from lack of inclination or want of time, gave little attention to spiritual matters. As the population increased, the gospel came fitfully to the people. No date can be given for the first religious services. About 1827 the Methodist Episcopal Church manifested its usual zeal and enterprise by sending itinerants into this section. Later it was made a part of the Hancock, N. Y., charge. Who the early ministers were who labored in this uninviting field, we cannot learn. No regular church organization was ever effected in the township. A society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was formed about 1840 at the "Union." It belonged to the Hancock charge until a separate charge was created at Equinunk, when it became a part of that charge. A church building was erected there in 1854—a plain but substantial building, sufficiently commodious for the wants of the community. Probably as much attention is given to religious matters as in any similarly situated community. In the township there are probably two hundred nominal members of Protestant churches, the majority Methodists, and forty or fifty Catholics.

SCHOOLS. — A state of ignorance exists through the township as to when, where and by whom the first school was established. A school was certainly established in the "Union" as early as 1827, but it is impossible to ascertain how it was established or maintained. No doubt it was at first altogether at the cost of the community. A school was established in like manner at about the same time in the vicinity of Little Equinunk. The township cannot be said to be divided into districts. School-houses have been built where needed, and are designated by name of locality. There are ten schools, with two hundred and sixty scholars, and two passably respectable school-houses. The other eight are a disgrace to a civilized community. In building them the time-honored custom of building school-houses where they would be most out of the way, and where the land on which they were built could not possibly be put to any other use, has been carefully followed.

MILLS, TANNERIES, ETC.—The credit of building the first saw-mill may be divided between Samuel Preston, of Stockport, and Nathan Mitchell.[1] Each built at the extreme limits of the township—Preston on the big Equinunk, near its mouth; Mitchell at Rock Run, both as early as 1805. The first grist-mill in the township was built by George Kellam at what is now known as Bramans.

The first tannery was built in 1848 by Isaiah and Daniel C. Scudder, under the firm name of I. & D. C. Scudder. Sole leather only was manufactured. It had a capacity of about two thousand five hundred sides a year. After many changes of owners, it finally became the property of William Holbert. It was burned down in 1875. Another was built at Little Equinunk in 1857 by S. D. Wood and Aaron and Calvin Van Benschoten; firm known as Wood & Van Benschoten. Capacity, two thousand eight hundred sides a year. After several changes it became the property of Hoyt Brothers, of New York. It was burned down in 1879, was rebuilt at once, and ran until 1881, when work in it was discontinued, bark being no longer obtainable.

There have been as many as fifteen saw-mills in the township. There is a factory for turning wood at Bramans, owned by Rothchilds, of New York.

A POST-OFFICE was established in the "Union," and called Priceville. Matthias Mogridge was the first postmaster. Mail reached it from Equinunk. It was discontinued in 1871. A post-office was established at Bramans in 1882; Hamilton Braman, postmaster. Mail reaches it from Hankins, N. Y. Bee-keeping has lately become one of the industries of the township. Several quite extensive apiaries are maintained.

The population of the township in 1870 was 1269; in 1880, 1326. Manchester deserves especial mention for the prompt and ready response it made to every call for men during the Rebellion, and that matter is dwelt upon at length in the military history of the county.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JOSEPH G. HOLBERT.

Joseph G. Holbert was born at Lackawaxen,

[1] The writer considers it strange that when writing of the first saw-mill that he should have ignored the one built by the "Union Sugar Company," certainly as early as 1794.

Pike County, Pa., December 14, 1850, eldest son of William and Emma (Poole) Holbert.

William Holbert, who was born in the Connecticut Valley in 1755, came to Pennsylvania about 1770, and located on the Delaware River in Montague township, Sussex County, N. J., also owning land on the Pennylvania side at the point since called Holbert's Bend. Shortly after making a home he and his wife, Mary, were captured by Indians at Indian Orchard, near Honesdale, and kept in captivity near Cochecton, N. Y. After a somewhat protracted confinement they escaped from their savage captors and went down the Delaware to Minisink, where they stayed until the close of the conflict enabled them to return to their home. William Holbert died April 30, 1819, his wife surviving him until June 27, 1834. Both very small in stature, their sons, Joseph and Benjamin, were the reverse, being tall and bony men. Benjamin, born December 15, 1781, and Mary Rider, his wife, born July, 1783, settled on the river opposite, and had thirteen children, of whom Joseph G. was the third, born March 2, 1803. Lumbering has always been a large interest with the family, each succeeding generation following the steps of the parent, and very frequently enlarging the field of operations.

J. G. Holbert

Joseph G. married Sabra Brown, December 24, 1824, who bore him nine children, five sons and four daughters. William was the eldest son, and on the death of his father, May 14, 1848, when but eighteen years of age was placed by the will in charge of the entire family affairs.

About 1862, in company with John D. Branning, of Damascus township, Wayne County, he purchased some seven or eight thousand acres of land, part now called Duck Harbor and the other part Equinunk. He commenced at once active operations, and is undoubtedly entitled to be called the father of the immense lumber interest which has since become so important an item for the county.

Joseph G. Holbert was placed in the district school, and after imbibing the instructions there presented, was sent to Lowell Commercial College, from which institution he was graduated with honors December 7, 1866. Still dissatisfied, he went to Monticello, N. Y., Academy some time, from whence he entered a practical business career with his father, July 3, 1869, who had in the meantime removed his home to Equinunk. Under such valuable training he rapidly acquired full acquaintance with the details and necessities of business. In 1876 he removed to Camden, N. J., and erected large lumber mills under style of Holbert's & Branning, still in operation as Stanton & Branning, change being effected by the retirement of our subject, in 1878, at which time he bought the Equinunk tannery property and launched out upon an active and aggressive business career.

For several years he spent his winters in Equinunk and summers in Philadelphia, looking after lumber interests, and in 1882 erected the Excelsior factory and grist-mill, and on April 1, 1883, commenced to build the Hub factory. Misfortune overtook the enterprise, a fire on October 13, 1885, cleaning out the grist-mill and Excelsior factory, which had been enlarged some few months previously to more than double the former capacity. With strong faith and energy he set to work to rebuild, and to-day, December 2, 1885, the works are ready to be started again.

Strictly a business man, and entertaining the belief that a business man's attention should be devoted to such matters, he has declined political preferment, although in 1876 his name received a highly complimentary vote at the Republican caucus of Wayne County for nomination for sheriff. Desirous of protecting the interests of his township he consented to serve as auditor for some years, and his co-operation has been of great value.

On June 11, 1873, he was united to Miss Maria, daughter of the late Munson Sherwood, and their union has been blessed with three children,—Lue Verne, born July 25, 1874; Claude, born May, 1876, died March, 1877; Edith, born January, 1879.

CHAPTER XXIII.

MOUNT PLEASANT.[1]

This township is the second in size in Wayne County. It is situated in the western part of the county, and is bounded on the north by Preston, on the east by Buckingham and Lebanon, on the south by Dyberry and Clinton, and on the west by the Susquehanna County line. A part of the original township was taken in 1828 to form a part of Preston, and a portion taken in 1834 to form a part of Clinton. The surface is uneven and broken up into hills and valleys, while the scenery is unsurpassed for beauty and variety. It has, by some, been aptly termed the Switzerland of Northern Pennsylvania. The highest elevation is the Moosic Mountain, which rises to a height of from twenty-one hundred to twenty-two hundred feet above tide. Most of the land is fertile, the hills being cultivated to their tops. The Lackawaxen and Dyberry are the principal streams. They flow southward, and, with the Johnson, a tributary of the Lackawaxen, drain nearly all of the township, the water finding its way to the Delaware. The water of a small portion of the western part flows into the Lackawanna, and thence into the Susquehanna Valley. The natural ponds are Rock Lake, Bigelow Lake, and Howe's Pond. Near the sources of several of the streams were originally located wide level stretches of marsh and pond; occupied by beaver. These have been dammed and the water stored for the use of the Delaware and Hudson Canal. Belmont Lake, Hankins Pond, and Miller Pond have been thus formed. The rocks belong to the Catskill series, except along the plateau of the Moosic range, in the western part of the township, where the lower section, the carboniferous formation, occupies the summits of the highest peaks. A striking geological feature of this section is a curious conglomerate which is found in large blocks in different parts of the township, and which occurs in situ in one locality only, near the public schoolhouse in Pleasant Mount, where it covers about one half of an acre. This has been named by Prof. White, of the State Geological Survey, the Mount Pleasant Conglomerate and is identical with the great cliff rock at Prospect View, on Elk Mountain in Susquehanna County. The matrix is a dark coarse sand and is filled with numerous angular, white and reddish quartz pebbles about the size of a chestnut. The soil is chiefly a sandy loam, but red shale prevails in various places. The whole partakes of the gritty character of the Catskill group. The surface was originally covered with a heavy growth of timber. The trees were mostly beech, maple and hemlock, with some ash, basswood, cherry and elm, interspersed. This timber is nearly exhausted, and, in consequence, the supply of water from living springs is measurably diminished.

INDIANS.—There are no evidences that this was the home of any Indian tribe. No trace of battle-ground or permanent village is found, still there are abundant indications that it was once occupied by them as a hunting-ground. The deer and beaver made this region a rich field for the red hunter. Large numbers of arrow-heads made of flint, and mortars and pestles, for grinding corn have been found. Traces of Indian encampments have been noted near the head waters of the Dyberry. An Indian trail or path ran through this place, which connected the Delaware and Susquehanna rivers. It is said to have presented the appearance of being much traveled, and traces of it were distinctly seen and followed by the early settlers. The femur, or thigh bone, of a man who must have been of gigantic stature, was some years since, ploughed up, on the farm of J. J. Fulkerson, two miles north of the village of Pleasant Mount. Near by was also found a light hatchet made of stone, which, from its delicate structure, could not have been used as a weapon, but rather must have been designed as the insignia of rank. The inference is, that here some native chieftain, alone in the solitude of the darkening forest, paid the last debt of nature.

SETTLEMENT.—The land comprising this township was bought of the "Six Nations," in their "General Council" at Fort Stanwix, now Rome, N. Y., on the 5th of November, 1768, by the heirs of William Penn. In 1774 a lot of land, comprising three hundred and twenty-two acres, upon which a part of Pleasant Mount village now stands, was bought of the proprietaries by Christopher Hager. This lot passed through several hands, when in June, 1789, it was purchased by Mr. Samuel Stanton, who became the first actual settler. He was from Preston, New London County, Conn., and came here as a surveyor in the employ of William Cooper, agent for Thomas, Franklin, William and Andrew Craig; landholders. In addition to the above-mentioned lot, he bought of the agent on June 30, 1789, three thousand acres, and in 1790, according to a note in the township records in his own handwriting, "built a house and cleared some land." The cabin was situated a few rods east of the old Belmont and Easton turnpike, near the present residence of Henry W. Mumford. It was made of small logs and poles, covered with bark, without windows. The door and floor were made of slabs split from logs. It was twelve by fourteen feet on the ground, and had but one room.[1] The furniture consisted of a white-pine table, a chest of drawers with legs, two bedsteads, four splint-bottom chairs, a trammel for the fireplace, a looking-glass, a few dishes, some pewter plates and basins; also some trenchers.

On the 10th of April, 1791, Mr. Stanton brought his family, a wife and two children, from Harmony, on the Susquehanna River, through the woods to this place. During the following summer he succeeded in raising a scanty supply of provisions, which he hoped with proper care would last through the winter. He cut a supply of hay for a yoke of oxen and two cows, on a beaver meadow, two miles away. This he intended to draw home during the winter. A daughter, Polly Stanton, was born on the 26th day of August, 1791. She was the first white child born in the township. The Stantons enjoyed the company of a few settlers, to be mentioned hereafter, who had come on without their families to make improvements, preparatory to moving in the following year. They all left in the autumn, however, and the Stanton family were alone in the wilderness. Their nearest neighbor was fourteen miles away, and the road liable to be blocked by snow. Much has been written regarding the sufferings and privations of this heroic family during the rigorous winter which followed, but want of space compels us to abridge the narrative. Exposure and a fractured ankle confined his wife to her bed; soon she was tossing in the delirium of fever. Her infant child, five months old, also sickened. The mother's fever had destroyed its natural food. The cows afforded no substitute. It rapidly declined under sickness and hunger. The stock of provisions was nearly exhausted. The potatoes had been frozen by the unexpected severity of the winter. Stanton denied himself in order to eke out the scanty supply. His children were placed on short allowance. Finally they were reduced to the last meal. He divided the last morsel of food between the two little children, the mother did not realize their condition, and then kneeling before God, prayed for deliverance. He arose from his knees and, going to the door, heard a dog chasing an animal down the opposite hill, from where the village of Pleasant Mount now stands, to the Lackawaxen. Seizing an old musket, which had long been useless, he ran down to the stream, where he found an elk at bay. So intense were his emotions that he repeatedly snapped the old musket, but of course without effect. A hunter soon came down the hill and shot the elk. On learning the condition of Mr. Stanton and his family the hunter, Mr. Frederick Coates, and his companion, a Mr. Church, emptied their knapsacks of palatable food for them. A part of the elk was roasted, but before the flesh was fully cooked Mr. Stanton, as a starving man, devoured it. To the kindness and frequent visits of these hunters, and also of Mr. Asa Stanton, a cousin who had recently settled near Waymart, he was indebted for many comforts, and the restoration of his wife and infant child to health. Mr. Stanton preserved the horns of this elk as a memento of God's mercy to him and his family while in a sick and starving condition. Afterward, when he kept a public-house, he had them nailed upon the top of his sign-post, and frequently related to visitors and travellers the story of his suffering and deliverance.

In a few years he began to prosper. He built a frame house and barn near where the residence of George Mumford now stands, where he kept a hotel until the Cochecton and Great Bend Turnpike was constructed. This drew the travel away from him. He then built on the turnpike opposite Thomas Mumford's, where he kept a public-house until he sold his property and removed from this section. He took a prominent part in public affairs, and was instrumental in securing the act for the Cochecton and Great Bend Turnpike. The building of such a road was then considered a greater achievement than is now the construction of a railroad. He received the appointment of justice of the peace in 1796, while this region was a part of Northampton County. When Wayne County was organized he was appointed one of the commissioners to locate the county-seat and erect the court-house and jail. In October, 1814, he was appointed associate judge, which office he held while he remained in this part of the State. Toward the close of his life he removed with his family, except one daughter who was married to Thomas Lillibridge, Esq., to the headwaters of the Allegheny River, in the western part of the State. He had been appointed a commissioner of a State road in that section. Business growing out of this office called him to Harrisburg. On his return he stopped at Bellefonte, Centre County, to visit his friend, Judge Burnside. Here he was taken sick, and though every effort was made to restore him to health, he rapidly declined, and after a few days' illness died, April 15, 1816.

None of his descendants are now found in this township.

Judge Samuel Stanton was tall, broad-shouldered, but rather sparely built. His complexion was light, eyes blue, hair and whiskers light brown. He was of the nervous temperament, and very sanguine and earnest in whatever enterprise he was engaged. He was for the times in which he lived a man of the highest culture. His memory was remarkably good, and he grasped and retained whatever he read; which is said to have been more than two thousand volumes. His address was easy, and his nature sociable. He was a devout Christian, and was a member of the Free Communion Baptist Church, but was in fellowship with Christians of all denominations. The members of his own church held their meetings in his barn. In 1797 the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time in this township, at his house, by the Rev. Daniel Thatcher, a Presbyterian Missionary, to nine professed Christians of different denominations. He wrote poetry, both secular and religious, and some rhymes which are recorded upon the town-book are so intimately connected with the early history of the township that they are here given.

"The Golden Age of Mount Pleasant, from 1791 to 1796, while eighty-two miles from Easton, the seat of justice; there was no law put in force but the law of forbearance, having no law, the people were a law unto themselves."

"Secluded here from noise and strife,
We lead a quiet, peaceful life.
No loungers here with poisonous breath,
Nor doctors here to deal out death.

"No trainings here nor such like trash,
To waste our time and spend our cash;
Nor town-meetings to choose our masters,
To make us slaves and breed disasters.

"No priest sends round his man for pay,
Because that he did preach and pray;
For we believe that grace is free
To all who wish to taste and see.

"No jockey merchants here prevail,
To trust their goods, then send to jail;
Nor fiddling strolling players dare
Infest the place, our youth to snare.

"Some slaves to forms may now require,
Have you no court-house, jail, or squire?
While all are honest and sincere,
What need of court or prison here!

"Have we a cause to settle? then,
We leave it to judicious men,
To search the matter well, and we
To their just judgments do agree.

"The noise of war, or the excise,
Does neither vex our ears nor eyes;
For we are free from every tax,
And stay at home and swing the ax.

"Our corn we pound, our wheat we boil,
Thus eat the product of our soil.
Sweet independence here does reign,
And we've no reason to complain.

"Yet we, like others, still look on Till we shall get our mill to run;
Then we'll not pound nor boil again,
But live in style like other men.

"From sheep we make our clothing warm,
In which we face the wintry storm;
They likewise give us meat and light,
To feast by day and see by night,

"Do we want meat? then we kill
Elk, deer, or bear, and eat our fill.
Sometimes we've fowl, and sometimes fish,
But rarely meet an empty dish.

"Here healing herbs and roots do grow,
And sugar-juice from maple flow.
Molasses, vinegar, and beer,
Are made from sugar orchards here.

"Sometimes we live on pork and peas,
Then milk and honey, butter, cheese—
Plain food and exercise agree
To make us happy while we're free."

His religious poetry was of a more elevated character. He wrote about fifty hymns which breathe the spirit of true devotion. One entitled "The Complainer Reformed" is written as though it were his own experience, and was considered worthy of place in a collection of religious hymns used by the Free Communion Baptist Church. The hymn consists of twelve stanzas. The following are the second and ninth and are sufficient to give the character of the production; and the sentiments of the author.

"Of ev'ry preacher I'd complain
One spoke through pride, and one for gain,
Another's learning small.

This spoke too fast and that too slow
One prayed too loud, and one too low,
The others had no call.

"Now I can hear a child proclaim
The joyful news, and praise the name
Of Jesus Christ my King.
I know no sect, Christians are one.
With my complaints I now have done,
And God's free grace I sing."

Mr. Stanton commenced actual work as a settler in June, 1790. When he moved in with his family the following spring as before related he was accompanied by Mr. Silas Kellogg, who, with two hired men, was to commence on a tract of three thousand acres, which he had bought in the south part of the township. He was from Ballston, Saratoga County, N. Y., and had intended to settle in Otsego County but was induced to come here by the flattering description of the country given by agent William Cooper. He made his first clearing in that pleasant valley on the Lackawaxen, east of the present residence of Mr. Richard Mills. During the season he and his men cleared and sowed to wheat fourteen acres of land. Mr. Kellogg was obliged to go with his ox-team to Harmony, then a distance of twenty-eight miles, and thence down the Susquehanna to Great Bend to procure the seed. He carried provisions for himself and two men from Great Bend upon his back, and says that in climbing the hills beneath his heavy burden his vision became double, so that he was obliged to sit down till his regular sight was restored.[1] This season Elijah Dix and his son Elijah, a boy of eleven years came from Williamstown, Mass., into the township and made improvements which will be noticed hereafter. In an address to citizens of Mount Pleasant, March 5, 1849, Mr. Kellogg says,—

"All the inhabitants of Mount Pleasant in 1791 were Mr. Stanton, his wife, and two children, Mr. Dix and boy, myself and two hired men. The perplexities we met with in making a beginning were more than I dare undertake to describe; for in these days of cultivated farms and good roads, the stories of the sufferings of those who remember the times when the farms were a forest, and the roads were unmarked may perhaps be regarded by some as merely the offspring of the imagination."

[1] Whaley, History of Mt. Pleasant.

Concerning this year, Mr. Stanton wrote in the town book as follows:

"This summer at any heavy work, such as raising log houses, we were able to raise six hands. And considering ourselves so strong, we undertook opening a road toward the Great Bend, some south of where the turnpike was made afterward."

At the close of the summer all but Mr. Stanton and his family left for the winter. Their sufferings have already been related.

The next spring, 1792, Mr. Kellogg returned. He was at this time but twenty-four years of age and unmarried. He was an enthusiast upon the subject of western emigration. He possessed a strong constitution and an active, intelligent mind. He was ambitious of success and confident in this his first great enterprise. His plans were extensive, and he entered upon their execution with firm expectations of carrying them to a successful issue. On January 1, 1795, he was married to Mary, daughter of Mr. Jirah Mumford. This was the first wedding in this township. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Ezekial Sampson, of Delaware County, N. Y. It is said that every man, woman and child in the town was present and all accommodated in one room. Mr. Kellogg was elected Sheriff in 1813, serving one term. He was not successful in his business enterprises at first. He was obliged to sell most of his land at a sacrifice, and in consequence about 1830 he removed with his family to Preston township. On the 5th of March, 1849, he was presented with an easy chair by the citizens of Mount Pleasant, as a token of remembrance of his sufferings and privations as one of the first settlers, and a mark of respect for his virtuous old age. The venerable Col. Rodney Harmes, then a young man of thirty-six years, made the presentation speech, which was replied to by the "old pioneer." He grew very decrepid the last part of his life, and was confined to the house for a year or two before his death, which occurred August 15, 1853, at the residence of his son, the late Mr. Jirah Kellogg, in Preston. He was eighty-six years of age when he died. He was the father of nine children, viz.: Azor, Mary, Sally, Deborah, Esther, Julia, Jirah, Caroline, Harriet. Their descendants are among the leading business men of the county. His eldest daughter, Mary, was the mother of the late Judge Warren J. Woodward and of the late Jackson J. Woodward, Esq., of Honesdale, and also of Dency, wife of Dr. Olmsted, of Dundaff. Azor is living in Valparaiso, Indiana, at an advanced age. Deborah married a man named Bostwick, and is now living in Walton, N. Y. His son Jirah died at the old place about a year ago. His grandsons, Azor and Edward, occupy the old Kellogg homestead.

ELIJAH DIX, one of the early settlers of Mount Pleasant, came from Williamstown, Mass., in 1791. He bought a few hundred acres of land and built a log house a few rods south of the present residence of Henry Spencer, Esq. This house served as a residence, a school-house, a meeting-house and also for an election-house. It stood a few feet west of an old well, which is yet in use; but a few traces of the site remain.

In 1798, when Wayne County was set off from Northampton, the polls for the third election district of Wayne, which included all of the present Wayne and about one-half of Pike, were opened in this township at this house. Voters came here from the Wallenpaupack and north of Shohola Creek. They came up the Lackawaxen to where Honesdale now stands and which was then a dense wilderness, thence by marked trees through Bethany, and so found their way to Mount Pleasant. Citizens on the Delaware came by bridle paths. Here for the first time the scattered inhabitants of this extensive district met to choose the State and county officers. After building and clearing some land Mr. Dix and his son returned to Massachusetts to spend the winter. The following spring he moved in with his family, wife and eight children, and occupied the house. Here he lived until 1802, when he built the house which yet stands on the farm now owned by Miss Jennie Moase. He had been a man of some wealth but lost most of it through the depreciation of Continental money. He came here to provide a future home for his family. He was an honest, industrious and worthy man. He died at his home, April 27, 1826. His wife died June 18, 1819. He had nine children, viz.: Benjamin, Elijah, David, Hannah, Margaret, Joseph, John, Jesse, Ursula.

Benjamin married Lucy Stearns, and cleared land and built upon the farm now owned by William Wright, Esq. He had five children, most of whom died young. He died suddenly March 22, 1805. Elijah began upon the farm and built the house now owned and occupied by Mr. Austin Crater. David moved to Ohio where he married, grew rich and died. Margaret married Major Luther Stark. Joseph lived and died upon the farm now owned by Mr. Dewitt Denio. John cleared and lived upon the farm now owned by his grandson, F. M. Dix, one mile north of Pleasant Mount Village. B. F. Dix, of Mount Pleasant, is also a grandson of John Dix.

About the last of February, 1792, Captain John Tiffany, of Attlebury, Mass., a soldier of the Revolution, with his wife and three children stopped here on his way to the Nine Partners, now Harford. (The Nine Partners was so named because nine of the Tiffany family were in partnership there.) Pleased with the locality he concluded to settle here. He purchased the farm now owned by Mr. Milton Spencer, and built first, a log house, and then the house now in use on the farm, which is the oldest building now in use in the township. His wife was a descendant of the Douglas family, of Scotland. He died in 1825. He had six children, viz.: Chandler, John, Fanny, Gardner, Leonard and Ruth. The last three were born in Mount Pleasant. All married and removed from the township except John, who married Sally, daughter of James Bigelow, and cleared the farm now owned by his grandson, Winfield Tiffany. He died in 1854. He was deacon of the Baptist Church, of Mount Pleasant. He had eight children, viz.: Mary, Sally, Hiram, Sally, Minerva, John S., Thirza and Oliver. The many descendants of Captain John Tiffany are among the most wealthy and enterprising citizens of the township.

On the 5th day of March, 1792, Mr. Jirah Mumford and son, Thomas, in company with Mr. Joseph Stearns and two sons, James and Otis, all from Tolland County, Conn., arrived at Stantonville, as this settlement was then called, on their way to the Nine Partners. Pleased with the locality, they concluded to settle here. Mr. Mumford built a log house about three rods southwest of the present residence of his grandson, Henry Mumford. Near the close of the season he returned to Connecticut, while Mr. Stearns moved in his family, wife and eight children, and occupied the cabin built by Mr. Mumford. The next spring he moved his family into Mr. Dix's house, and during the summer following cleared some land and built a log house on the farm now owned by Mr. Noah Chittenden. This cabin was situated a few rods west of the present residence of Mr. J. N. Monroe. On this farm he spent the remainder of his life. John Stearns, a son of Joseph Stearns, settled on the farm now known as the James Partridge farm on the Stockport road. Here Jabez Stearns, the first male child born in the township, was born June 18, 1793. He lived to be over eighty years of age and died in Damascus township. The late Ashbel Stearns, of Clinton, and the late E. I. Stearns, of Honesdale, were sons of Joseph Stearns. Few, if any, of his descendants now live in this township.

As the spring of 1793 opened Jirah Mumford returned from Connecticut with his family, wife and four children, and occupied the house which he had built the previous summer. He was a tanner by trade and erected a small tannery near his house. In 1795 he completed the first saw-mill and grist-mill in the township. They were located where Mr. J. W. Fowler's saw-mill now stands. The grist-mill was about twenty feet square, and contained one run of stones about three feet in diameter, and one bolt about seven feet long

The meal was taken by hand and poured into the bolt, which the miller turned with a crank. The saw-mill would, under favorable conditions saw about seven hundred feet per day. Mr. Jirah Mumford built the Mumford hotel at Belmont. Mr. Mumford, who was one of the most enterprising of the early settlers died January 22, 1826.

He reared a family of twelve children, viz: Mary, Jirah Jr., Thomas, John, Deborah, Sally, Harry, Lillibridge, Roxy, Thankful, Minor and Amelia. Mary, as before stated married Silas Kellogg; Jirah, Jr., married Polly Baker; Judge James Mumford, the progenitor of the Mumford family of Starrucca, was a son of Jirah Mumford, Jr.; Thomas married Theodosia Carr, he was president of the Ochquaga Turnpike Company and kept the Mumford hotel at Belmont. The late Thos. L. Mumford was his son. John married Thomosia Rogers and settled upon the farm now owned by Mr. Francis James; Deborah married John Clough of Boston; Sally married Samuel Rogers; Harry married Sarah Tanner and settled on the farm now owned and occupied by his son Alonzo; Lillibridge married Deborah Sherwood and moved to Susquehanna County; Roxy married Eber Dimock of Susquehanna County; Thankful married Amos Rogers and went West; Minor married Ada Lyon and lived on the old homestead. He died in 1867. George Mumford and Henry Mumford are sons of Minor Mumford. Amelia married Elias Lillibridge (her cousin).

Joseph Tanner, from Preston, Conn., brother-in-law of Samuel Stanton moved into the settlement this spring. He had but one child. His purchase included most of the present village of Pleasant Mount, but lying mostly north of it. He built about one half a mile north of the village on land now owned by Dr. Rodney Harmes and where the main road, east and west, now running through this village was originally constructed. An old well marks the site. In 1795 he built the first frame house, one half mile north of the village by a cluster of apple trees, on land now owned by Mrs. David Lake. The apple trees and an old well mark the site. Here the first store was opened under the firm of "Tanner and Granger" in 1806. In 1808 he built the first house in the Village of Pleasant Mount. This he used as a dwelling, a store, and an office. He also built a two story hotel near it. These buildings stood where the Episcopal parsonage now stands. They were burned in 1811. He then built the house now owned and occupied by Hosmer T. Wright. Joseph Tanner was the first Justice of the Peace after Wayne County was organized. Before his death he lost most of his property.

This year Amasa Geer built a log-house by the large spring on the side-hill west of the village on land now owned by Ira Nichols. Jacobus Barrager also moved in. These remained but a few years.

During the last week in May of this year the late Major Jason Torrey, then a young man of twenty years, came here from Williamstown, Mass. He commenced clearing some land four miles east of this village on the farm of the late James O'Neill. Soon after he was employed by Mr. Baird of Philadelphia to survey some land on the Lackawaxen. He continued in this employment during the summer seasons, spending his winters in Philadelphia or Williamstown, until 1797. In June of this year he built a log-house on land cleared four years before. During this summer his brother Samuel was with him. In December he went to Williamstown after his wife, whom he had married the preceding January. They arrived and occupied the log house February 11, 1780. Here he resided until 1801, when he removed to Bethany. Jason Torrey was closely identified with all the public enterprises of the township during his residence in it.

In 1794, David Kennedy, Sen.,[1] from Tolland County, Conn., moved into the settlement. He built a log house where the house of Rupert Tiffany now stands On this farm he lived until his death, July 28, 1827. His wife, Eunice Lester, died August 26, 1826. They had seven children each of whom lived to an advanced age, cleared and owned a large farm and died in the township, viz:

(1). Robert married Elizabeth King and lived on the farm now occupied by his son, Robert M. Kennedy, Esq. (2). Eunice married Benjamin King, Esq. (3). Sally married Andrew Lester and lived on the place now occupied by Frank Lester. (4). Nathan married Pamelia, daughter of Stephen King, and lived on the farm now owned by his son, Robert H. Kennedy. (5). David, Jr., married Rhoda Stearns, and lived with his father on the Kennedy homestead, lately owned by his son, David L. Kennedy, and now the property of Mr. J. S. Tiffany. (6). Nancy married Jonathan Wilber, and lived on the farm now owned by Orrin Lester, Esq. (7). Charles married Sarah Bass, and lived where his son, Porter Kennedy now resides. The descendants of the Kennedy family are very numerous in the township.

Mr. Jacob Van Meter came here on his way from Salem County, N. J., to Western New York. He decided to settle here and purchased the farm, and built the house where his son, the late Charles Van Meter lived, and which is now owned and occupied by James O'Neill. Jacob Van Meter, Jr., was the first adult person who died in the township. He died in the fall of 1796. John Conrad Ewaldt moved in with his family this year, but did not remain long. Samuel Rogers and family also came this year, but remained but a short time. In 1795 Mr. John S. Rogers, from New Jersey, a Quaker, purchased and settled with his family, consisting of eight children. He built upon the farm since known as the Paul O'Neill place, where he kept a tavern during his life. His sons settled near him; Samuel a little way east of his father, where William O'Neill now lives; Amos west, on the hill, where the late Paul O'Neill, Jr., resided; Clayton lived on the farm now owned by the family of the late Godfrey Stevenson, where he kept a tavern.

This year Mr. Joseph Stevenson, also from New Jersey, bought and built near the octagon stone school-house, on land now owned by Mr. Frank W. Gager. He had six children, the oldest of whom was over twenty-one years of age. Three of his sons,—James, Isaiah and Daniel lived and died in the township. James lived on the place now owned by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, known as Stevenson's Mills. Oliver Stevenson, son of James Stevenson, formerly sheriff of Wayne County, owned a grist-mill here, which was burned a few years since. On this farm the Delaware and Hudson Company have since built the large reservoir known as Hankins' Pond.

Isaiah Stevenson lived east of his father, on the place now owned by Albert Miller. The late Godfrey Stevenson, formerly treasurer of the county, was his son, also the venerable Arthur Stevenson, now living in the township. Daniel Stevenson lived on part of the place now owned by Malden Bennett, in the south part of the township. Harvey Stevenson and Joseph Stevenson, of Waymart, were his sons.

[1] The writer is a great grandson of David Kennedy, Sen.

Seymour Allen came this year and bought Amasa Geer's farm and improvement. He sold in 1800 to Rev. Epaphras Thompson, a Baptist clergyman from Bristol, Conn., who, in 1801, sold the same to Ichabod Stark, from Bristol, Conn., who lived on it until his death, which occurred in 1820.[1] Luther Stark, his son, sold part of the place to the late Thomas Brown, and years after the remainder to Samuel Chittenden, of New York, who still owns it. The late David Stark was a son of William Luther Stark. His descendants are living in the township. This same year Abram Cramer came here from the south part of the county. He bought a place and built his house of hewn logs, south of the present residence of Orlando Kelly, on land now owned by Henry McAvoy. A part of the house is still standing (the oldest in the township.) David Cramer, who owned the farm known as the "Cramer Place," on the Bethany turnpike, was a grandson of Abram Cramer. Some of the Cramers still reside in the township.

Elijah Peck, from Connecticut, moved his family into the settlement this year. He built a log house on an old road which was constructed north of the present Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike, on the farm now owned by his son, Hiram Peck. He became a Baptist clergyman, and was known as an ornament to his profession. He died here in 1835. He had thirteen children, eight of whom were sons. Elijah, Jr., lived north of his father's place, where his son Solomon now lives, died in 1875. William lived where N. R. Kennedy now lives. Reuben owned what is now known as the "Peck farm," in Clinton. Joseph lived on the farm now owned and occupied by Thomas O'Neill. Lewis lived about one-half mile south of the Cochecton turnpike, on place owned by Henry Kennedy; died in Clinton. Of his daughters, Sallie married James Tanner. Mira married Jesse Dix. Betsy married Jerome Case. Joanna W., widow of the late Giles Gaylord, of Clinton, is still living; W. A. Gaylord, the present prothonotary, is her son.

1796. Benjamin King, originally from Rhode Island, came from the Paupack settlement. He purchased the farm now owned by Wellington Moase, on which he lived for about twenty years. He married Eunice Kennedy. He was county commissioner,[2] and for many years justice of the peace. He died June 15, 1860, aged eighty-three years. He had seven children, viz.: Cynthia married Peter Sherman. Sally Ann married Reuben Peck. Hawkins married Mary White. Lucinda married Parmer Tallman. Durinda married David Clough. Robert married Minerva Tallman. Benjaman, Jr., married Juliaette Dix. Pamelia married Squire Crater. All of these reared large families, and were conspicuous in the early history of this and adjacent townships. Robert and Benjamin live in Starrucca borough.

Charles King, a carpenter, brother of Benjamin, Sr., settled east of his brother, on land now owned by William P. Kennedy. Stephen King, another brother, located further east, on the same road, and later built the house and cleared the farm now known as the "Demming place," at the corner below W. P. Kennedy's residence. The house in which he died is still standing, but unoccupied.

This year Samuel Meredith commenced to make improvements here. He was of an illustrious family, and traced his ancestry to the blood royal of Wales. His father, Reese Meredith, came to Philadelphia in 1730. He devoted his time to business, and it is not known that he held any public office, choosing rather to serve his country as a private citizen. In the year 1755 he formed the acquaintance of Washington, then a Virginia colonel, which lasted through his life and that of his son. He was a signer of the celebrated "Non-Importation Resolutions," and contributed twenty-five thousand dollars to feed and clothe the American army at Valley Forge. He died November 17, 1778. He had four children: 1, John died in infancy; 2, Samuel; 3, Anne, wife of Colonel Henry Hill; 4, Elizabeth, wife of George Clymer, a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

[2] At the time Pike County was set off.

General Samuel Meredith was born in Philadelphia in 1741, was educated at Chester. He engaged in business in Philadelphia under several firm names, the last being Meredith & Clymer; it was dissolved in 1781. Mr. Meredith was an active Whig, and took a deep interest in the leading questions of the day. In November, 1765, he attended the meeting of the merchants and citizens of Philadelphia, to protest against the importation of teas and goods which were stamped. He and Mr. Clymer signed the resolutions adopted November 7, 1765, as his father had done. On the 19th of May, 1772, he married Margaret, daughter of Dr. Thomas Cadwalader, of Philadelphia, Chief Medical Director of Pennsylvania Hospital. He was chairman of the committee of safety in 1775. When the "Silk Stocking Company" was organized, in 1775, Mr. Meredith was made major, and in that capacity took part in the battles of Trenton and Princeton. In October, 1777, he was commissioned general of the Fourth Brigade, Pennsylvania Militia, and took part in the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. General Meredith resigned in 1778, in consequence of his father's ill health and the continued absence of his partner and brother-in-law, George Clymer. He was twice elected from Philadelphia County to the Pennsylvania Colonial Assembly, and from 1787 to 1788 was a delegate to the Continental Congress. In the spring of 1780 he and George Clymer each contributed twenty-five thousand dollars to the support of the army. He was a director of the Bank of North America, organized by Robert Morris in 1781.

On the 1st of August, 1789, he was appointed by President Washington surveyor of the port of Philadelphia, holding the office until September 30, 1789, when he received still further proof of Washington's friendship in the appointment of treasurer of the United States, which office he held until October 31, 1801, serving under three administrations, i. e., Washington's, Adams' and Jefferson's. From October, 1789, to December, 1790, his office was in New York, and then was removed with the seat of government to Philadelphia, where it remained until 1800, when it was removed to Washington.

During his long administration as treasurer, not a single discrepancy marred the entire correctness of his accounts. The estimation in which he was held is evinced by the following:

"TREASURY OFFICE, New York.
"September 13, 1789.

"Sir:—Permit me to congratulate you on your appointment as Treasurer of the United States, and to assure you of the pleasure I feel in anticipating your co-operation with me in a station in which a character like yours is so truly valuable.

"I need not observe to you how important it is that you should be on the ground as soon as possible. The call for your presence, you will be sensible, is urgent. Mr. Duer, my assistant, goes to Philadelphia to procure a loan from the bank there. He will communicate with you, and, I am persuaded, will meet with your concurrence in whatever may facilitate the object of his mission.

"With sincere esteem
"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
"Secretary of the Treasury.

"SAMUEL MEREDITH, ESQ.,
"Treasurer of the United States."

His resignation and retirement were due to ill health and financial embarrassment; his private affairs having become sadly neglected during his official life: Upon it he received the following complimentary letter from Jefferson:

"MONTICELLO, September 4, 1801.

"Dear Sir:—I received yesterday your favor of August 29th, resigning your office as Treasurer of the United States after the last of October next. I am sorry for the circumstances which dictate the measure to you; but from their nature, and the deliberate consideration of which it seems to be the result; I presume that dissuasives on my part would be without effect. My time in office has not been such as to bring me into intimate insight into the proceedings of the several departments, but I am sure I hazard nothing when I testify in your favor, that you have conducted yourself with perfect integrity and propriety in the duties of the office you have filled and pray you to be assured of my highest consideration.

"THOMAS JEFFERSON.

"MR. MEREDITH."

In 1774 Meredith and Clymer commenced the purchase of large tracts of wild land in West Virginia, East Kentucky, in Delaware and Sullivan Counties, N. Y., and in the following Pennsylvania Counties, viz.: Schuylkill, Pike, Monroe, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Wyoming, Bradford, Sullivan and Susquehanna, and between 1790 and 1796, about fifty thousand acres in Wayne County. In the latter year General Meredith commenced making improvements at a place in this township, which he afterward named Belmont. In 1802 he was assessed as having sixty acres of improved land, but as a non-resident soon after he moved in with his family and resided in a plain Goodenrich structure situated about fifty rods north of Cochecton and Great Bend Turnpike, until 1812, when he completed his residence known as Belmont, at a cost of six thousand dollars. This is situated about one mile west of the village of Pleasant Mount, and is now owned and occupied by Mr. James Fowler. Here he spent the remainder of his life superintending the settlement and development of his vast estate.

What was known as "Belmont Manor," commenced on the Moosic Mountain, west of Waymart, and extended north along the range to Hine's Corners, in Preston township. It was about twenty miles long and two miles wide and contained about twenty-six thousand acres. All that remains of the old manor is between three and four hundred acres, situated in Mount Pleasant and Preston townships, known as the "Dickinson Tract,"[1] and which belongs to the heirs of Anne Dickinson, General Meredith's daughter and Sarah Maria Graham, daughter of Thomas Meredith, Esq.

General Meredith was visited in his retirement by many of his old political associates. In person he is described as tall and commanding, with a light blue eye; graceful and pleasing in manner. He died at Belmont, February 10, 1817, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. On the gentle declivity of the Moosic, overlooking the beautiful valley of the Lackawaxen, lie the remains of the friend of Washington, and the first treasurer of the United States; by his side sleeps his accomplished wife, who died September 20, 1820. A plain marble slab marks each grave. His wealthy children strangely neglected to erect a suitable monument to the memory of their illustrious father. A movement was set on foot by citizens of Mount Pleasant, on the 4th of July, 1877, to erect a monument to mark the site. Appropriations were asked from the State of Pennsylvania and from the General Government, but were refused. The project was then abandoned.

General Meredith had seven children,—first, Martha, mother of the late John M. Read, chief justice of Pennsylvania; second, Elizabeth, died unmarried in 1824; third, Anne, mother of Hon. Philemon Dickinson, late president of the Trenton Banking Company, and also of the late Colonel Samuel Dickinson of the New Jersey Militia, and captain of Company E., Tenth United States Infantry; fourth, Thomas, died in infancy; fifth, Thomas (2); sixth, Margaret, died unmarried in 1826; seventh, Maria, died unmarried in 1854.

Thomas Meredith was born in Philadelphia, in 1779, and educated at the Pennsylvania University, after which he traveled abroad for many years; was in India and China in 1800 and 1801. Upon his return he studied law, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1805; to the Wayne County bar in 1812; Luzerne County bar in 1816; justice of the peace for Mount Pleasant in 1808. During the war of 1812 he was major in the First Philadelphia Cavalry.

He opened the first coal mines below Carbondale in 1824, and in the same year obtained a charter for a railroad from the mouth of Legget's Creek on the Lackawanna to Great Bend on the Susquehanna. The road was surveyed in 1828, but failed for want of funds. The route surveyed is nearly that taken by the northern division of the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Rail Road. Mr. Meredith was secretary of the Belmont and Ochquaga Turnpike Company, and of the Stockport Coal and Stone Road Company. His wife was Sarah Gibson, daughter of a New York merchant. She died in 1834. Esquire Meredith, as the settlers called him, removed his family to Carbondale in 1830. He died at Trenton, N. J., in October, 1855, and was buried in the old Quaker burying ground in that city, near his uncle, George Clymer, the signer. He left one son, Samuel Reese Meredith, who was born in [1] This tract has recently been purchased of the heirs by J. J. Fulkerson, Esq., of this place.

Wayne County in 1823. Of this unfortunate but warm-hearted man nothing but mishaps could be related. About the year 1855 he was active in the formation of the Lackawanna Coal and Iron Company. This and various other enterprises in which his fortune was embarked failed, and he lost all his property. He died in poverty in the Pennsylvania Hospital at Philadelphia, in 1865. Not a single descendant of the family is found in this township.

Eliphalet Kellogg in 1796 settled on what is known as the David Sherwood place, now owned by Christopher Giles. He removed to Bethany in 1810. He was commissioner's clerk for some years, and prothonotary from 1808 to 1817.

A list of the taxables in Mount Pleasant township in 1799, found in the township records, numbers thirty-four. There are found in this list, that have not already been mentioned, the following: Denman Coe, Enos Cramer, Jacob Crater, Joseph Cromwell, Isaac Cromwell, William Cromwell, Daniel McMullen and Nathan Rude.

Jacob Crater came from Wyoming and purchased the farm now owned by his grandson, Austin Crater. He was a German. He purchased the saw-mill and grist-mill built by Jirah Mumford. His son, John, built a saw-mill above the one owned by his father, Abram Crater, another son, cleared the farm now owned by Thomas Johns.

Daniel McMullen lived on the farm since known as the Peter Ryder place. James McMullen and George McMullen were his sons. They were great hunters.

Nathan Rude was from Connecticut, and lived east of Captain John Tiffany on the old road running east and west. The farm is now the property of Philo Spencer. He is remembered as a man of quick wit and brilliant at repartee. Nathan, Simeon and Reuben were his sons. His descendants are in the township.

About 1800, Elihu Tallman, from New Bedford, Mass., moved in and cleared a lot on the old road east of where Joseph Tanner lived. A few years after he bought and cleared a farm north of Joseph Dix. In 1813 he sold this to a man by the name of Hall, and bought the Godfrey Stevenson place, and also a carding-machine of Jacob Plum, who had run it one year on the stream below where "Kennedy's Mills" now stand. He also built a saw-mill. About 1818, he sold out to Heaton Atwater and the next year moved to Preston township. The venerable C. P. Tallman, still living at Tallmansville, is his son.

Caleb Carr is mentioned in the township record in 1801. Reuben Carr married Lydia, daughter of Joseph Tanner. She died in 1811, leaving two children. Solomon West and Benjamin Newton are noticed in 1803. They lived on the old road, before mentioned, west of Nathan Rude, as did Silas Tanner and Henry Newton.

In 1803 Andrew Lester came to Mount Pleasant from Wallenpaupack settlement. The year previous he married Sally, daughter of David Kennedy, Sr. He purchased one hundred acres of land on which he built a log house and barn and cleared up about forty acres, and planted a small orchard. This farm, now owned by Porter Kennedy, he exchanged with his brother-in-law, Charles Kennedy, for one now owned by his son, Orrin Lester, Esq., situated two miles east of Mount Pleasant village, and occupied by his grandson, Frank Lester. Here he lived until over ninety-one years of age. He died September 29, 1869. His wife died the same year. They had eight children, viz: Eunice, Betsy, Anna, Asa, David, Sarah, Orrin and Emeline. The last two are living in the township. Emeline is the wife of Dr. Rodney Harmes. Andrew Lester was a noted hunter. Many thrilling hunting stories are told of him.

Ezra Bartholomew came into the township in or about 1804. He settled in the south part of the township, on the farm long owned by his son Ralzamon, and now owned by Charles H. Bartholomew. His oldest daughter was the wife of Baxter Bicknell. After the death of Bicknell she married Elder Chase, a Baptist preacher.

Wooster Bartholomew was a brother of Ezra, but his name does not appear in the town records until 1816.

About 1807 Moses Miller, from the State of New York, purchased of Silas Kellogg two hundred acres of land, since known as the "George Miller place," about four miles east of the village of Pleasant Mount, and now owned by Barney Megivern. Here he resided until his death, in 1855. He was for many years a justice of the peace. He reared a family of eight children, of whom all but one remained in the township, viz.,—Ephraim, Marlin, George W., James W., Wesley, Laura, Betsy and Mary. Marlin still lives on the Bethany turnpike, east of the Red School-house. James lives east of Marlin, on the opposite side of the road. Laura married Joseph Terrell, who was for many years a merchant at White's Valley. Mary married Abram Bonham and lived on the side of the "Big Hill," east of White's Valley." Betsy married Bonham Vastbinder, and lived in the stone house where Jehiel Vastbinder now lives.

In 1807 Amasa Goodsell came into the township. He lived where Nathan Sherwood now resides. The same year Truman Wheeler settled on the north and south road, where George Allen now lives. He was educated, and for many years a justice of the peace. He removed to the West.

In 1808 Jonathan Wibber settled on a farm east of the Phœnix Baptist Church, and now occupied by Orrin Lester, Esq. He was a blacksmith. About this time Clark Tanner settled in the township.

In 1808 James Bigelow, from Spencer, Mass., moved in, with his wife and family of eight children. He purchased the farms on which his grandsons, James E. and Frank M., now live. He built his house in what is now an old orchard, north of the present residence of F. M. Bigelow. A stone chimney marks the site. James Bigelow was one day older than Mary, his wife, and lived four days after she died. They nearly reached eighty years, and died in 1842. Their children reared families, whose descendants are numerous in this vicinity. Their names are as follows: Sally, who married Deacon John Tiffany; Betsy, who married Esquire Yale; John, who married Lydia Yale, and lived on the Bigelow homestead; Polly, who married Stephen Partridge; Patty, who married Benjamin Fletcher; Tryphena, who married Jonathan Miller; Tryphosa, who married Clayton Rogers; James Howe, who married Rachel Muzzey, and cleared the farm now owned by his son, Lorenzo; Thirsa, who married Richard Delong.

About this time (1808) William Burcher, from London, settled south of John S. Rogers, on what is now the Megivern place. He moved to the place now owned by John White, on the Bethany turnpike. In 1819 he lost his property, through a defective title, and removed to Damascus and purchased the farm now owned by his son, the venerable John Burcher, where he died in 1839.

James Miller purchased seventy acres of land, east of his brother, Moses Miller, Esq. This place is now occupied by his son, Addison Miller. Albert Miller and James Miller, Jr., are sons of James Miller. Adam Niver settled on the Bethany road, at the top of what is known as the "Niver Hill." Daniel Roberts settled on Belmont and Easton turnpike, where Ferdinand Bartholomew now resides. Levi Geer, from Windham, Conn., cleared the farm since owned by William R. Stone, and now occupied by Harvey Ferguson. Harvey, Marvin, Darius, Perry and Lavina were children of Levi Geer. Joshua Geer lived on the farm of the late James Clift, of White's Valley. Erasmus, Erastus and Gurdew were his sons.

Thomas Lillibridge married Polly Stanton, the first child born in the township. He settled on the place since known as the "Abbot Farm," on the Cochecton turnpike. He removed to the West.

In the fall of 1809 Robert Ledyard, from Windham, Conn., came into the township. He occupied a house at the foot of the hill, near a noted spring, about fifty rods southwest of where the Vastbinder school-house now stands. Part of the house was used as a residence by the family of John Wrighter. Here he lived until the spring of 1811, when he went on the farm now known as the Ledyard farm, on the north and south road. He died in 1835, aged eighty. His wife, Mary Cady, died in 1843.

Of their children, John was killed in the war of 1812; Samuel and David went West; Gurdew was killed by a falling tree; Luther lived and died in Clinton; Mary married Peter Ryder: and Hiram is now living on the old place, at the age of eighty-three years. Hiram married Lucinda, daughter of Reuben Rude, and is one of the largest real-estate holders in the township.

1809. About this time Zedekiah Bonham located on the farm now known as the Hauser place, west of White's Valley. Many of his descendants now live in the township. The following are some of his children: Andrew, who lived on the Samuel Martin farm; Amos, who lived where Joseph Allen now resides; John, who lived on what is known as the Heth Bonham place and married Sarah Hamlin, who died in 1882, aged ninety-two years; Abram, who lived on the side of the hill east of White's Valley; Mary, who married Wm. Chumard, of Canaan; and Harriet, who married Abram Houser, and lives on the old Bonham farm. Zedekiah Bonham built a saw-mill on the Johnson Creek. In 1809 or 1810 Eli Howell, a shoemaker, located here. He is the progenitor of the Howell family in the township. His sons were John, a shoemaker, who at one time owned the David Doyle farms; David, whose place was on the road south of Lewis Peck's farm, and now owned by G. W. Kennedy; and Eli, jr., now living in the south part of the township. Elisha Howell and John W. Howell are sons of John Howell.

About 1809 John Cox settled on the farm now owned by his son Alonzo. He died in 1857. His son Jonathan died on the old place. Dovey, one of his daughters, married Levi Horton; another married Benjamin Dix. About this time or before Oliver Granger purchased, of Joseph Tanner, nearly all his land including that on which most of Pleasant Mount Village stands. He built the Upper Hotel, which is the oldest building now standing in the village. His store was near where John Riley's barn now stands.

Silas Freeman settled where Henry McAvoy now lives. He died in 1845. The following are his children: Col. Calvely Freeman, surveyor, in 1850 represented the county in the State Legislature. He married a daughter of Ezra Bartholomew; Sally, wife of the late Alvah W. Norton, Esq.; Silas, Jr., who married Lucretia Spencer; Sidney, who married Talitha Doty; Palina, wife of Warren Norton; Pamelia, wife of Franklin Wheeler; Fanny, wife of Earl Wheeler, Esq.; Rodney, who moved to Connecticut: and Margaret, wife of John B. Taylor.

About 1811 William Fletcher, from Sullivan County, N. Y., originally from Connecticut, purchased and cleared the farm now owned by Hugh Lestrange, on the Stockport road. His sons were Charles and Chauncy. One of his daughters married William Haines, and another Joseph Simpson. About seven years later, John Fletcher, brother of William, settled further south on the same road on the farm now owned by James Cooley. He was killed by the kick of a horse. His sons are Philander, prominent as a fruit grower; Solon and Joseph. One of his daughters is the wife of B. M. Wilcox, and another married Benjamin Wilcox. Benjamin Fletcher, brother of William, settled on the corner south of the present residence of N. A. Monroe. Daniel and James are sons of Benjamin Fletcher. His daughter, Silvina, married Baruch Bunting, a Baptist minister.

In the fall of 1812, Anson Chittenden, from Clinton, Connecticut, bought of Joseph Tanner, the farm now owned by Salvator O'Neill, about one and one-half miles north of this village. He died in 1849. His children are Josiah, who lived in Connecticut; William Harvey, who married Belinda, daughter of Benjamin Wheeler, and settled north of his father on the same road; Abel, who married Eliza, daughter of Noah Hiscock, and settled on the place now owned by his son Noah Chittenden. He removed to Connecticut in 1837, where he resided until within a few years when he returned to this town. He is now living, at an advanced age, with his daughter, Mrs. Henry Spencer; Zenas married Elmira Roberts and settled west of the village on the place now owned by his son Samuel, of New York; Marietta, wife of Herman Wheeler; Rachel, wife of Joseph Peck; Anson, Jr., now living in Peckville, Pa.; Anna, wife of Henry Bass, Esq.; and Aaron Dutton, who married Eliza Abbott, and lived south of the present residence of B. M. Dix. His widow still occupies the place.

About this time William Bigelow, brother of James Bigelow, settled north of the lake, which now bears his name, on the farm now owned by his son Alonzo. Chauncy and Briggs were also his sons. His daughter Dolly married Spencer Niles, and lived on the place lately owned by their son, Stephen V. Niles. William, Betsy, Jane and Julia were children of Spencer and Dolly Niles.

In 1813 or 1814 Jonathan Miller came from Clifford, Susquehanna County. He was a blacksmith and for some years worked for Joseph Tanner. He married Tryphena Bigelow, and lived in the house now owned and occupied by George Soper. He died in 1863. He was a justice of the peace. Of his children, Mary T. was the first wife of Colonel Rodney Harmes; Hervey, an engineer, was killed on the railroad; James, photographer, lives in Pittston; and Jonathan, Jr., blacksmith, married Polly Stone and lives in this village.

About 1812 Ichabod Demming settled on the place since known as the Chauncy Demming farm. His sons were Jonathan, Chauncy and Frederick. Of his daughters, Lois married Orrin Griswold; Adelia married Captain Levi Bennett; Sevilla was the first wife of Abram Bonham; and Mary married Andrew Williams. Many of Ichabod Demming's descendants live in the township.

About this time Wakeman Hull settled north of the Red School House, on the farm since owned by his son, William Hull, and now owned and occupied by his grandson, Wesley Hull. John B. Sherwood's wife is a daughter of William Hull.

In 1812 Peter Spencer, a soldier of the Revolution, came from Guilford, Conn., and located on the Stockport road, where N. A. Monroe now resides. He was a blacksmith, and had built for the Government the second lamp of the first lighthouse on Faulkner's Island. He died in 1842. About 1819 Russell Spencer, his son, came to Pleasant Mount, and located where "Spencer and Sons" now carry on the business of blacksmithing. He married Lucy, daughter of Benjamin Wheeler, and died in 1864. Among his children are Henry Spencer, Esq., Charles W. Spencer, of Honesdale, and E. Mallory Spencer, ex-sheriff of Wayne County. The Spencers are a race of blacksmiths, and among the most enterprising people of the country.

David Horton bought the place originally owned by Eliphalet Kellogg. He married a daughter of Solomon Sherwood. Gilbert Horton, his son, lived on the Bethany turnpike, where John W. Howell now resides. He was accidentally shot while hunting. His widow, Cornelia Horton, kept a public house.

Benjamin Pallett occupied the farm known as the Chalker Farm, in the south part of the township. Christian Bennett located at an early date, north of James Bigelow's residence. Henry Lemon lived north of White's Valley. Solomon Sherwood lived on the farm now owned by David E. Peck. Ebenezer Slayton lived on the farm well known as the "Slayton Place," where his son Thomas Slayton afterward kept a public house. The farm is now owned and occupied by Orlando Kelly. Asa Smith, shoemaker, lived east of the village. He built a tannery and for many years carried on the business of tanning. About 1814 John Fulkerson came into the township. Silas Stevens and Nathan Stevens were taxed in the township in 1813. John Sherwood located where his son John B. Sherwood now resides. There were one hundred and forty-four taxables in the township in 1813. Benjamin Wheeler, a soldier of the Revolution, from Winstead, Conn., located where Wm P. Kennedy now resides. He came about 1815. He died in 1830. His children were Benjamin Jr., who lived on the old farm; Nathan, now living in Clinton; Heman, whose place was where Richard Mills now lives; Loly, Ambrose, who lived in Honesdale; and Lucy wife of Russell Spencer. About 1814 Aaron Loomis bought the property known as the Loomis Place of Zalmon Rouse. He married Sophia, daughter of Daniel Roberts, and died in 1875. About 1816 Ezra Spencer settled on a farm now owned by his son Ezra. All the Spencers in Mount Pleasant or Preston are descendants of either Peter or Ezra Spencer. Philo and Orson are sons of Ezra Spencer.

Captain Levi Bennett located on the place now owned by his son, Malden Bennett. He was a prominent man. Samuel Bennett, brother of Levi, settled on the mountain in the southwestern part of the township. In 1815 Aaron G. Perham bought and located on sixty acres of land where his son, Sylvanus Perham, now resides. This land is the nucleus around which the "Perham property" has been gathered. (An extended sketch of the Perham family has been furnished). About the same time Sylvanus Gates settled north of Ezra Spencer, on the farm long owned by his son, Alpheus W. Gates. Nelson Gates, Esq., of Brooklyn, and Rev. David Gates are grandsons of Sylvanus Gates.

Eldad Atwater, a prominent business man of the township, came here from New Haven in 1815. He kept a store in the house now owned by Franklin Dix until 1818, when he and his brother, Heaton Atwater, purchased the property known as the Godfrey Stevenson place, and built a saw-mill and grist-mill where "Kennedy's Mills" now stand. He built the house now standing on the place and near it a woolen factory and distillery. In 1837 he sold out and engaged in business on Long Island. In 1839 he returned and bought of Henry Stone and Abel Chittenden the "Fowler Mill Site." Here he built a saw-mill, grist-mill and foundry, at the same time had a store where H. T. Wright now does business, until he sold to his son, E. M. Atwater, and bought what is now the "Lake Store," where he kept until 1857, when he went back to the old place where he kept until 1867, when he again sold to his son and engaged in business in Peckville, Pa. He now lives here with his son, E. M. Atwater, at the advanced age of ninety-three years.

Ezekiel White, from Massachusetts, a lineal descendant of Peregrine White, who was the first white child born at Plymouth Rock, came to Damascus township in 1819, and to Mount Pleasant in 1820. He lived in the village three years, kept a hotel part of the time. In 1837 he removed to the valley which now bears his name. He made the first axes in Pleasant Mount. The whole family of Whites were noted for their skill in working iron and steel. Ezekiel White had eight sons—Horace White, gunsmith; Ephraim V. White, axe-maker; Malthy White, farmer; Leonard White, mill-wright; Philip White, mechanic; Gerrison White, axe-manufacturer; Ezekiel B. White, mechanic and farmer. Of his daughters Clarinda married William Wilder, Mary married Hawkins King, Caroline married Calvin Tracey, Malintha married Samuel Hawkins. Philip White & Son now run a saw-mill, stick-factory, grist-mill and bed-spring-factory at White's Valley.

Buckley Beardslee at one time owned the "Torrey place" in the east part of the township. Hon. H. B. Beardslee was born here.

In 1815 the taxables numbered one hundred and thirty-nine. In 1820 two hundred and nine. In 1825 two hundred and thirty-one. In 1830 two hundred and fifty-two.

About 1819 Paul McAvoy settled in the eastern part of the township, on the farm now owned by his son Richard McAvoy. His brother William came soon afterward and located further north, on property now owned by his son William McAvoy, Jr. Many descendants of Paul and William McAvoy are found in the county. Patrick Connor came soon after Paul McAvoy, and cleared the farm now owned by his son, Arthur Connor. A few years later John and Paul O'Neill located in the vicinity. John northeast of Paul McAvoy. He died recently at an advanced age. Paul O'Neill later bought the John I. Rodgers place on the Cochecton and the Great Bend turnpike. All of the above were worthy citizens, and their many descendants are among the most enterprising and prosperous farmers of the township. John Miller cleared the farm now owned by Hugh McGranaghan. James Murray was also one of the early settlers in this part of the township. It is said that Joseph Bass, in admiring the thrift and progress of these settlers, said, "They bang all," whence the name Bangall. Andrew McDermott was one of the early Irish settlers. Later the Megiverns settled south of the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike. The Fiveses, Haggertys and others settled in what is called Egypt, and have now a flourishing settlement. The Hanenstiens, Wildenstines, Keglars, Schusters and other Germans settled along the Clinton line and are among our best citizens. At different times within the last fifty years the Pages, Abbotts, Fitzes, Jays, Brookings, Moases and many other English emigrants settled in different places and have, by their industry, become the owners of some of the best farms in the township.

Joseph Monroe settled near where the Stockport road crosses the Johnson Creek where Mrs. Jay now lives. N. A. Monroe, Miller Monroe and Joseph Monroe, Jr., were his sons. Joseph Monroe, Sr., died in 1862.

About 1816 Deacon Esaias Wilcox and Abner Stone settled on or near the Preston line. Mr. Stone settled where his son H. K. Stone, now resides, and Deacon Wilcox settled west of him, on land now owned by his son, B. M. Wilcox. Deacon Wilcox came from Killingworth, Middlesex County, Conn. His children were Ambrose W., who lived on the Stockport road; B. M. Wilcox, who owns the Wilcox homestead; Achsah M., who married Joseph Stout; Lucy Jane, who married Stephen Clemo; Benjamin E., who married Amanda Fletcher. Abner Stone's family: Albert, harness-maker, lives at Equinunk; Polly, wife of Jonathan Miller; Betsy, married Daniel Fletcher; Sybil, wife of Thomas Tyner, of Equinunk; Osmer lives in Illinois; Clarissa married John Shaw; Henry K. lives on the old homestead; Lucy married Byron Freeman.

Thomas H. Brown came to Mount Pleasant from Stonington, Conn., in 1821, and commenced business as a saddler and harness-maker. In 1822 he married Lucy Howe. They reared a family of three sons, viz.: Henry W., born September 14, 1824; William Wallace, born July 21, 1830; and Samuel Leroy, born February 5, 1833. Mr. Brown eventually purchased one hundred and seventy acres of land, and during the latter part of his life was engaged in farming. He died March 23, 1878, aged seventy-nine years. His widow died January 23, 1886, at the age of eighty-three years.

Mrs. Sarah Benjamin was born in Goshen, Orange County, N. Y., November 17, 1745, and died at Pleasant Mount, in the year 1859, aged over one hundred and thirteen years. On account of the remarkable age to which she lived and the stirring scenes in which a part of her youth was spent, she deserves more than a passing notice. Her maiden name was Sarah Mathews, and she was married three times. Her first husband, William Read, was a soldier of the Revolution and died of a wound which he received while serving in Virginia. Her second husband, Aaron Osborne, of Goshen, N. Y., was also a soldier in the same war, and was accompanied a part of the time by his wife. Once when he was standing on guard she took a gun and an overcoat and stood sentinel at his post, that he might help load the heavy artillery into boats. Washington inspecting the outposts observed her; "Who placed you here," he asked. She promptly replied in her characteristic way, "Them that had a right to, Sir." He understood the situation and passed on. She was at the siege of Yorktown passing to and fro like an angel of mercy, carrying water to the thirsty and relieving the suffering. While passing where the bullets of the enemy were flying she met Washington, who said, "Young woman, are you not afraid of the bullets?" She promptly and pleasantly replied, "The bullets will never cheat the gallows." The general smiled and passed on. Some time after the war her second husband died, and she was married to her third husband, John Benjamin, who came with her to Mount Pleasant in 1822, and died in 1826. She was the mother of five children, all of whom are dead. Some of her descendants are living in various parts of the country. She was amply pensioned by the government, but nevertheless was very industrious, carding, spinning and making the finest of triple threaded yarn and knitting it into hose.

Some of her work was on exhibition at the World's Fair in New York, and a specimen of work done when she was one hundred years old was on exhibition at the Crystal Palace in London. She is said to have possessed many amiable traits of character and to have been especially brilliant as a conversationalist, and noted for her untiring industry, doing her "day's work" at spinning even after her locks had been silvered by the frosts of one hundred and ten winters.

PRIVATIONS OF THE SETTLERS.—A just description of the privations of the early settlers can never be written. Those, only, who saw them were fully qualified to relate the story of their sufferings. All of these are gone, and the greater part of the history of that conflict which they waged so nobly with the terrors of the wilderness has gone with them. It required their strongest endeavors to procure the necessaries of life. Shelter, food and raiment must be had, and to procure these, they overcame obstacles almost insurmountable, and forced the untamed forests to yield them a subsistence. As another has well said, "There were no pigmies among them. The taper fingers of modern effeminacy could not perform the wonders which they wrought."[1] We, who in pleasant homes, enjoy the fruits of their labors, should cherish the most profound respect for their memory.

The present number of taxables in this township is four hundred and thirty-five.

MURDER OF COLONEL BROOKS BY MARTHERS—EXECUTION OF THE MURDERER.[2]—Colonel Jonathan Brooks, who was murdered by Freeman Marthers on the 24th day of June A. D. 1828, in the town of Mt. Pleasant, was a resident of Blooming Grove (now Washingtonville), Orange County, N. Y., where worthy relatives now live. By Thomas L. Brooks, of Washingtonville, we are informed that he was a colonel in the United States army, having been commissioned by President Thomas Jefferson on the 23d day of February, A. D. 1809, and served (his relative says fought) during the war of 1812 and 1814, and after the war had command at Governor's Island, in New York harbor, and at the time of his death, which occurred in the fifty-seventh year of his age, was on an extended furlough on account of poor health. He was known by many in the northern part of Wayne County a few years previous to his death as a drover. We have learned from the wife of John Page, Mrs. Eliza Page (now deceased), who was living in Orange County at the time of his death, that it was a common report in the neighborhood where she resided, immediately after Colonel Brooks was murdered, that before he left home, being in the store of Samuel Moffatt, merchant, and in conversation with him, he said he should go in a few days through Wayne County, Pa., as that would be his most direct route to Broome County, N. Y.

Upon being asked if he intended to buy cattle, his answer was that he did not know; that it depended upon circumstances. A roving stranger (Marthers) was present and listening to the conversation, whom it was believed Brooks did not notice at the time. The next knowledge obtained about this wandering sharper was at Rileysville, in this county, where he was spending his time in the style of a small pack peddler, selling cheap jewelry, trying to win small sums by juggling and petty gambling. Judging by events which soon after occurred, he was, as some people believed, and some still believe, staying at Rileysville, waiting for the arrival of Brooks, and had disposed of all of his trinkets and spent nearly all of his money when Colonel Brooks arrived there. The Rileysville tavern, nine miles west of the Delaware River, was a stage-house, and consequently at least two or more of the stage drivers, having the opportunity, learned and knew the condition and habits of Marthers and something of his character.

On the 24th day of June, 1828, Brooks had probably driven from the Delaware River to Rileysville, where, or a little west of that place, Marthers was invited to ride with him. Mr. Eldad Atwater (still living) has, years ago, repeatedly said that not far from the middle of the day, which was a very hot day, he noticed a horse and wagon before his brother Heaton Atwater's tavern, where the family of Godfrey Stevenson (deceased) now lives, and where he and his brother then lived. He asserts that the traveler tarried a long time, at least two or three hours (and here he probably dined and had his horse fed), and when he came out and started away Atwater readily recognized him as Colonel Brooks. He likewise noticed that there was a stranger with him.

From Atwater's tavern Brooks drove to Belmont, a distance of four miles. From Belmont he was going to travel north on the Belmont and Ochquaga (now Lanesborough) road, this being his most direct route through Broome County to Norwich, Cayuga County, where he expected to get money, it is said, from the bank at that place. Thomas L. Mumford, then a young man, who was hoeing in a garden on the south side of the road, saw the two men, and heard one of them, who was sitting in the wagon, ask the other, who was on the ground, if he was going any farther with him. The reply was, "I do not know; I will go in and inquire." He went into the bar room, and soon came out and said, "Yes, about a mile or two." The two men went on north and Mr. Mumford continued his labor.

About one mile from Belmont, at the edge of, at that time, heavily-timbered land, it was four miles to the next clearing and a tavern. At this place Marthers got out, ostensibly to look for a path leading west over the mountain. He looked under the wagon and named some injury or defect of it which induced Brooks to get out, and when he stooped down to examine Marthers struck him on his head with a stone, and repeated his blows, and finally finished his diabolical job by cutting his throat with a pocket-knife; and then, by some strange fatality, turned the horse suddenly around, and in less than one hour from the time of leaving was back again in Belmont. When Mr. Mumford saw him hitching the horse, not realizing that it was a man, horse and wagon which he had previously seen going north, he left the garden and went into the bar room. The tavern was owned by Thomas Mumford, the father of Thomas L. The traveler remarked that it was a very hot day, and proceeded to wash himself, and while using the towel said, "I have dirtied your towel." Mumford replied by saying, "It was made for that purpose." Marthers then called for brandy, which was produced, and of which he took a liberal drink.

He asked Mumford if there were any fast horses in the place, and if there were, to tell them (the owners) to bring them out. He said he had a fast horse which he had bought in Virginia.

From Belmont he drove rapidly west, and soon arrived at the next stage-house (now Herrick Centre, Susquehanna County), which was kept by Sylvanus Mott. When he drove up opposite to the tavern he was recognized by a stage-driver who had learned what kind of a man he was while he was at Rileysville.

The driver (whose name is forgotten), seeing him in his new and unexpected guise, hailed him, and invited him to go in and take a drink. Marthers, after a little hesitation, went in, and the two indulged themselves with their potations. After drinking, Marthers took his watch from his pocket to ascertain the time. The driver noticed that it was a gold watch, and asked him how he had obtained it. Marthers replied by saying that it was not his watch, but that the watch, horse and wagon belonged to Colonel Brooks, who was to come in the stage the next day, or take some other route west, and that Brooks had given him the watch to time his speed so as not to overdrive the horse. He seemed to be in a hurry, and went out, mounted into the wagon, and drove rapidly west. As soon as he had started the driver told the landlord, Mott, that he believed the man had obtained possession of the horse, wagon and watch by some criminal transaction. Mott being of the same opinion, they led out two horses and immediately mounted and rode in pursuit of him and overtook him beyond Low Lake, about one mile and a half beyond Mott's. They rode rapidly up to, and Mott passed by him, when he leaped from the wagon and ran into the woods, but immediately returned and accused them of robbery. Both Mott and the driver were now on the ground, and while Mott was holding the stolen horse, it has been asserted by some, the driver and Marthers had a clinch, and for a brief time were maintaining their claims to the disputed property by the rude logic of muscular power, in which contest the driver resolutely maintained his claim, but told Marthers that if he would go back to the tavern and stay until they were satisfied that he had obtained the property honestly, he could then go, and do so without paying anything. To this offer Marthers turned a deaf ear and sought for safety in the wilderness.

Mott and the driver not being certain that they were right, and not certain but that Marthers might yet return to the turnpike, concluded that Mott should go on with the horse and wagon about one half of a mile further to the tavern at Dimock Corners, while the driver, with all the speed he could make, should ride to Belmont and inform Mr. Mumford of the suspicions of Mott and himself, and of what they had done. When he arrived there the towel was examined and found to be bloody. Mr. Mumford said they could soon settle all doubts, for a slight shower had moistened the dust before the horse and wagon went north, which would make the wagon track plainly appear. They soon passed over the road and just at the edge of the woods, at which place the wagon had been turned shortly around, they found the body of Colonel Brooks lying in the bushes on the east side of the road where Marthers had dragged it. A pile of stones still marks the place.

Then speedily followed the mustering of forces, and spreading the news for the purpose of arresting the criminal. Samuel Roberts, of Mount Pleasant, started off on his way to Orange County, to communicate the sad news to the relatives of the deceased. The body of Brooks was removed to the Belmont hotel, and Jonathan Miller, Esq., the coroner of the county, summoned twenty-four men as a jury of inquest.

Mr. Minor Mumford, who lived within sight of, and but a short distance from the tavern, had heard nothing about the matter during the evening, and had retired to his bed when he was called up to mount his horse and ride to Eho, now Thompson, a distance of over ten miles. A few men watched at different places along the road during the night, and two lads, Lemuel Ogden and Saben Tucker, kept their vigils, with loaded guns, where the felon ran into the woods. A messenger went through Canaan putting up notices of the murder. But they were not needed, for the wretch had already been arrested.

From the west side of Low Lake, Marthers had wandered on northerly, in the dense forest, and finally, aided by the tinkling of a cow-bell, found his way to the rude habitation of Mr. James Dunn, by the side of a pond bearing his name; six miles from the turnpike, and about nine o'clock in the evening, and without any hat, having lost it when he first ran into the woods. The account which he gave of himself was that he had been chased by robbers, and had left his property and ran to save his life.

While sitting and talking he asked Dunn how far it was to Belmont or to Mott's tavern, and upon being told that it was about six miles, he sprang up from the chair, evidently, with some alarm, supposing that he had traveled double that distance from either place. This was noticed by the canny old Scotchman, and convinced him that his guest was a suspicious character. Mr. Dunn had five sons, three of them able young men; they retired to the chamber. Marthers was accommodated with a bed in the same room where Dunn, Sr., usually slept, but he could not sleep that night. Marthers was restless and tumbled about for awhile, but finally lay quiet and (at least apparently) slept. About midnight Mr. Dunn heard his dog barking very furiously; he went quietly to a window which he raised and saw two horsemen, John Lyon and Alexander Burns. They had started from Dimock Corners, intending to make their first, which proved to be their only, call at Dunn's. They asked Dunn if a man had been, or was there. Dunn beckoned to them to go to the door, when one of them said, "Do not talk so loud, he is here." Dunn let them in at the door, and at the same time his sons rushed down from the chamber. And now the atrocious homicide, in about eight or nine hours after he had perpetrated his crime, was surrounded by six able and resolute men. Resistance would have been useless. Escape was impossible. His pockets were searched, and it was found that he had obtained by his crime, a gold watch and a pocket-book containing various small bank-bills amounting to twenty-nine dollars, and specie to the amount of fifteen cents.

He confessed that he had murdered Colonel Brooks, and invited all then present to come, as he termed it, to his hanging bee.

They all stayed with their prisoner until morning, and then mounted and bound him upon a horse, and guarded by Lyon, Burns, John Dunn and one of his brothers, with loaded guns, he was taken to Belmont, and conducted into the room where the dead man lay, and said it was a very handsome corpse. With his hands and arms bound, and a rope around one of his legs, he was marched one mile to Pleasant Mount, where he was presented with a cheap hat, and the coroner, with a sufficient number of assistants, accommodated him with a ride to Bethany and to the county jail.

The next day (June 26th) the people from several miles around assembled at Belmont to attend the funeral of Colonel Brooks, which was conducted by the Presbyterian clergyman of Mount Pleasant.

The services were awhile delayed because no relative or friend of the deceased had yet arrived from Orange County, and the clergyman was about to commence his duties when John J. Brooks, a brother of the deceased, and a friend, Hon. Robert Denniston, were seen riding down the hill from Pleasant Mount. They had finally arrived in time to attend the sad ceremony, which then proceeded, and was ended by depositing the body of the deceased in the family cemetery of General Samuel Meredith (a Revolutionary hero). Let them both be remembered on decoration days.

I have always been informed, by various individuals, that Colonel Brooks was, in every respect, an accomplished gentleman; uniformly clad in the finest and neatest style, and, inasmuch as those who became acquainted with him esteemed him so highly, it is evident that he must have been not only courteous, but fascinating.

The recognizance of witnesses for the commonwealth was returned by Justice Benjamin King during the month of July, and at the August term of court, Judges Scott, Woodward and Thomas presiding, on the 26th day of the month Marthers was indicted for murder, and his trial commenced the same day and lasted four days. The lawyers engaged in the case being Benjamin A. Bidlock and N. B. Eldred for the prisoner, and Mr. Amzi Fuller for the commonwealth. On the 30th day of the month the jury rendered their verdict of guilty, and the court sentenced the prisoner to be executed on the 24th day of October following.

On the day of his execution he was taken from the jail to the front of the court-house, where brief religious services were conducted, according to the best recollection of Rev. Stephen Torrey, by Rev. Joseph Castle, the Methodist preacher at Bethany.

Robed with his shroud and cap, with the rope used on that occasion around his neck, with firm step he marched with the sheriff and his assistants to the gallows and there kneeled over his coffin while a final prayer in his behalf was made by the officiating clergyman.

From the scaffold he addressed the assemblage of people, comprised of both sexes and all ages, attributing his vicious conduct and depravity to the manner in which he had been trained when young; charging his parents with having neglected to give him a proper moral education, but, on the contrary, as having encouraged him to practice dishonesty and theft; and that in the beginning of his vile career he had stolen pins and given them to his mother, who, instead of reproving and punishing him, seemed to be well pleased.

He earnestly exhorted the young people to shun the sinful life which he had led, and thereby escape the unhappy and ignominious death which he was doomed to suffer. Mr. Page says that while Marthers was talking an uncouth babbler said that before sundown his soul would be in hell. Marthers replied saying that before sundown his soul would be where no one in this world would know, or could tell anything about it. The sheriff, Joseph Miller, asked him if he had any complaint to make for unkind treatment. He replied, "No. You have treated me like a gentleman, do your duty, for I have shed innocent blood." The cap was then drawn over his face, then the drop, a few convulsive movements, and all was over.

Freeman Marthers has uniformly been described as not repulsive, but, on the contrary, as rather of prepossessing appearance. He was described by the coroner as a man about five feet and six inches in height, of florid complexion and stoutly built; dressed with a new superfine broad-cloth coat, of a brown or plum color, striped vest, drab colored cashmere pantaloons, and his shoes pumps. It may readily be believed that the hat which he had lost was, of a fashion and quality, suitable to make him a well dressed man.

RELIGIOUS MATTERS.—As has already been stated the gospel was early preached in this town. The first minister who preached here was Elder David Jayne, who lived on the Tunkhannock. This was in July, 1795, and June 28, 1796, a Free Communion Baptist Church was organized. It was constituted of six members, viz.: Samuel Stanton, Joseph Tanner, Margaret Dix, Martha Stanton, Lydia Tanner, Tamer and Rhoda Stearns. Since the spring of 1793 the regular and public worship of God has been sustained. As has already been noticed, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was first administered in 1797. Epaphras Thompson, from Bristol, Conn., was the first settled minister. He was a Close Communion Baptist, but united with the Free Communion Church and preached to them several years. In 1806 Elijah Peck was ordained by this church as gospel minister. In 1807 Elders Thompson and Peck formed a Close Communion Baptist Church, which became very numerous. Both of the above-mentioned churches disbanded many years since.

The first Methodist Society in the township was organized in 1806 in the house of Abram Cramer. (This house is yet standing—the oldest in the township.) The first Methodist minister was the Rev. Amon Owen, whose circuit extended from Wilkesbarre to the Delaware River. The first house of public worship was built in 1822. All denominations cordially united in its construction. It stood on the first road, running north and south, east of this village, on land now owned by George E. Moase. It was forty-eight by twenty-four feet and was formed by building an addition twenty-four feet square to a log school-house of the same size. It was common for people to walk seven or eight miles to attend services here. In 1830–32 the Methodist Society erected a plain and commodious house two miles east of the village, on the Bethany turnpike, on ground now included in the Methodist burying-ground. It was dedicated on the 4th of July of that year. This building was greatly improved in 1851. This church first belonged to the Salem and Canaan Circuit, and later to the Bethany and Mount Pleasant Circuit. In 1851 it was separated from Bethany, and in 1865 the present edifice was erected at Pleasant Mount village, and worship in the old church was discontinued during L. C. Floyd's pastorate. In 1867 a part of the congregation withdrew and built the Methodist Episcopal Church at White's Valley. One pastor, residing in Pleasant Mount, has always supplied both societies. The first Methodist minister who resided in the village of Pleasant Mount was Rev. J. D. Safford. He occupied the house now owned by J. H. Kennedy (the writer). Rev. R. S. Rose was first to occupy the parsonage now standing. In 1855 the society consisted of one hundred and forty-three members, and in 1885 one hundred and twenty-five members. Reliable information in regard to pastors cannot be found previously to 1843, in consequence of the loss of the old record. In that year a man by the name of Phillips was in charge; 1844, Wm. Dean; 1845–46, Charles Perkins; 1847–48, Henry Brownscomb; 1849–50, J. D. Safford and C. L. Rice; 1850, G. M. Peck and Charles Perkins; 1851, G. M. Peck; 1852, Thomas Wilcox; 1853–54, Rodney S. Rose; 1855–56, C. V. Arnold; 1857–58, N. W. Everett; 1859–60, Francis Spencer; 1861–62, A. Brigham; 1863–64, N. S. Dewitt; 1865, L. C. Floyd; 1866–67, C. V. Arnold; 1868, J. Underwood; 1869–70, J. V. Newell; 1871–72, Wm. M. Cooley; 1873–75, G. T. Price; 1876–78, S. H. Wright; 1879–81, S. H. Jay; 1882–84, J. B. Sweet; 1885–86, Joseph Madison.

A CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH was organized in Mount Pleasant, January 26, 1814, by Rev. Ebenezer Kingsbury and Rev. Worthington Wright, who were laboring as missionaries of the Connecticut Home Missionary Society, the former being located at Harford, in Susquehanna County, and the latter at Bethany, in Wayne County. The church was organized in the house of the late John Tiffany, sixteen members uniting in the organization, viz.: Anson Chittenden and Submit, his wife, James Bigelow and Mary, his wife, Polly Tanner, Mary Freeman, Lydia Tiffany, Edward Dimmick and Esther, his wife, Ransford Smith and Chloe, his wife, Abijah Hubbell and Sally, his wife, Blackleach Burrit and Sally, his wife, and Ruth Buckingham. Nine united by profession and seven by letter. In 1831 the church changed its form of government and became Presbyterian. The reason of this change does not appear in the records, but it was probably for the purpose of connecting themselves with Presbytery and thus be in sympathy with the Presbyterian Churches about them. It was at first connected with the Presbytery of Hudson, afterwards with Susquehanna, then with Montrose, and since the reunion of the two branches of the church and the reconstruction of the Presbyteries it has been connected with the Presbytery of Lackawanna. The church was chartered in 1831 with the following charter members:

Anson Chittenden.	Henry W. Stone.
James Begee.	Jonathan Miller.
Zenas Chittenden.	Abel Chittenden.
Urial Wright.	Heaton Atwater.
William R. Stone.	Noah Hiscock.
Asa Smith.	Jacob Eaton.
John Bigelow.	Wm. H. Chittenden.

Anson Chittenden, Jr.

The first session of the church was elected September 5, 1831, and was composed of the following members, viz.: Anson Chittenden, Esaias Wilcox, Jacob Eaton, Urial Wright, Henry W. Stone, Marshall Dimmick and Asa Smith. They were ordained by Rev. Lyman Richardson, assisted by Rev. Messrs. Joel Campbell, of Bethany; Adam Miller, of Harford; and Isaac F. Adams, of Dundaff.

The church has never failed to sustain public worship on the Sabbath, and when without a minister, the services were conducted by the members, one of whom read a printed sermon. During the most powerful revival of religion ever known in Mount Pleasant, that of 1831–32, the meetings were conducted by the lay members. About forty persons were added to the communion as the fruit of this work.

For some years the church was dependent upon missionary and transient supplies, and then stated supplies; sometimes in connection with the Bethany, and at other times with Gibson, in Susquehanna County. Among those who preached occasionally, administering the communion, receiving members and baptizing children, we find the names of Rev. Messrs. Ebenezer Kingsbury, Worthington Wright, Gershom Williams, E. W. Goodman, Mr. Thompson, Joel Campbell and Lyman Richardson. The labors of the last-named individual, who supplied the church for some two or three years, were greatly blessed.

In 1833 a colony of thirty-one members went out from this to form what is now called the Uniondale Church, but the two have ever since been united in the support of the gospel. Rev. Henry A. Boyce was the first pastor installed over these two churches. He was installed July 8, 1835, and labored but a little over a year, when he was removed by death. He was succeeded by Rev. Anthony McReynolds, who was installed September 27, 1837, and remained about two years. The Rev. Daniel Higbie was the next pastor. He was installed September 23, 1841, and remained about six years, his pastorate being a very useful one. Fifty-two were received by the church during the time, the largest number in one year being in 1842, when twenty-three were added. Rev. Samuel Whaley succeeded Mr. Higbie, commencing his labors in March, 1846. He was installed July 7th of the same year, and labored faithfully with the church eleven years. There were four revivals of religion during his pastorate, and sixty-three were added to the church.

Since the resignation of Mr. Whaley there have been frequent changes of ministers. The next after him was Rev. Israel Bryant Smith, who commenced his labors in September, 1857, and remained about two years and a half. He was not installed. After him came Rev. Albert G. Beebee, who commenced his labors June 24, 1860, and was installed in August of the same year, and remained a little over two years.

Rev. Raphael Kessler commenced his labors October 19, 1862, and was installed November 15, 1865. He remained a little over four years, when he was compelled to resign on account of failing health. Forty-four persons were received to the church during his ministry, all but two upon profession.

Rev. James B. Fisher commenced his labors in May, 1867, and remained a little more than a year and a half. He was not installed. He was succeeded by Rev. Yates Hickey, who was installed October 13, 1869, but remained only nine months, and was succeeded by Rev. James W. Raynor, who commenced his labors July 17, 1870, and remained two years. He was not installed. On the Sabbath after Mr. Raynor closed his labors, the pulpit was supplied by Rev. Adelbert J. Schlager, who was installed November 20th of the same year, and remained nearly three years. He was followed by Rev. Arthur Folsom, who labored one year, closing July 2, 1876. Rev. Joseph A. Rossell commenced his labors February 17, 1878, and closed May 22, 1881. He was not installed. He was followed by Rev. John Ludlow Kendall, who commenced January 1, 1882, was installed May 16th of the same year, and is the present pastor of the church.

In 1830 the congregation built their first house of worship in the village. In 1848 it was furnished with a beautifully toned bell weighing nearly one thousand pounds, and in 1850 was refitted and improved. It was occupied until June 5, 1867, when the present edifice was completed at a cost of five thousand dollars, and was dedicated on that day.

Roman Catholic.—Since 1830 Irish settlers have made large accessions, and now comprise at least one-third of the inhabitants of the township. In 1835 there was a Roman Catholic Church built near where the present edifice (St. Juliana) now stands. St. Juliana Roman Catholic Church was built at Rock Lake in 1866. St. Cecelia Roman Catholic Church had been built at Hill Top the year previous, and is attended once a month from Rock Lake. Both of these churches are in a flourishing condition, with a membership of at least twelve hundred persons. The following is a list of pastors since 1842: 1842 to 1844, Rev. H. Fitzsimmons; 1845–47, Rev. P. Pendergast; 1848–52, Rev. J. Forbes; 1852–53, Rev. William O'Hara, Rev. H. P. Kennedy, Rev. James Power; 1853, Very Rev. Moses Whitty; 1854, Rev. James Power, Rev. Daniel Kelly; 1855–56, Rev. James Shields; 1857–64, Rev. C. A. Della Nave, first resident pastor; 1864–71, Rev. Thomas Brehony. From January 12, 1871, to the present, Rev. J. J. Judge.

Episcopal.—St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Society was organized February 11, 1862. The following were elected members of vestry: George Moase, Rodney Harmes, Isaac N. Chalker, R. W. Wheeler, William Widger, Henry F. Smith, George T. Spencer, Martin Prentiss, John Dennis, John Fitz, S. B. Page, William W. Brown. The corner-stone of the church edifice in this village was laid July 15, 1862, by Rev. Dalrymple, of Honesdale, assisted by Rev. R. R. Duane, of Providence. The building was completed in 1863, at a cost of one thousand six hundred and twenty-five dollars, and services were first held in it on December 25th of that year by Rev. L. M. Day, of Dundaff. The following is a list of the pastors who have been in charge of this church society: Rev. L. M. Day, Rev. Thomas Burrows, Rev. J. Copeland, Rev. H. C. Howard and Rev. John Scott.

Baptist.—The Phœnix Close Communion Baptist Church was organized in 1864, and in 1865 the congregation bought the property on which the present church edifice stands, situated two miles east of Pleasant Mount village, on the old Cochecton turnpike. A building, which stood on the lot and had been used as a store, was remodeled and occupied as a church until the present church building was erected, in 1884. The Maple Grove Church, in the south part of the township, a branch of the Phœnix, was built 1874–77.

Lutheran.—In the south part of the township, along the Clinton line, there is a settlement of Germans. They are among the most prosperous and worthy people of the township. They have a German Lutheran Church, which was built upwards of twenty years ago.

Schools.—The people of this township were the first in the county to rally to the support of education. Without aid from the State, they erected school-houses and supported schools even in the infancy of their existence. The first school in Wayne County was taught by Miss Lucy Stearnes in the log house of Elijah Dix in the summer of 1794. She had twelve scholars and received six shillings per week as her wages. The first male teacher who taught in the township was John Tyler, who taught in the winter of 1799 and 1800, in a log building which had been erected and occupied by Mr. Geer, and which, being vacant at that time, was utilized for school purposes.

Richard Perkins taught a school on the old road north of the village in 1801. The first log school-house was built near the present residence of Philo Spencer in 1798, but who first taught in it is not known. The first framed school-house was built in 1804, and was the first house eastward of Joseph Tanner's residence. The first term in it was taught by Truman Wheeler. In 1834 the first Board of School Directors was elected under the school law of that year. The officers of that board were Truman Wheeler, president; and Wm. R. Stone, secretary. There are now sixteen districts in the township, containing fourteen houses of wood, one of brick and one of stone. The average school term in 1885 was six and one-fifth months, with an attendance of four hundred and forty-two scholars, who were schooled at a cost of $2017.39. Previously to 1869 no permanent provisions had been made in this town for a higher education than that obtained in the common schools; but in that year E. M. Atwater, Esq., opened the school since known as the Pleasant Mount Academy, which he sustained until the spring of 1881, when it was purchased by a joint-stock company composed of citizens of this and adjoining townships. The first board of trustees, elected July 23, 1881, were Frank Spencer, president; John D. Brennan, secretary; Geo. E. Moase, treasurer; E. K. Norton, S. G. Perham, R. H. Patterson and E. M. Atwater. In 1876 a three years' course of study was instituted, which comprised, in addition to the common branches, the natural sciences, higher mathematics, physics, language, etc. Since that time ten classes, numbering in the aggregate forty-eight members, have been graduated from this institution. The academy has acquired a high celebrity and is deserving of a liberal share of public patronage. The following are its principals since its foundation: L. G. Dimmick, Edwin Francis, Leroy Baker, Frank Tuthill, H. B. Larrabee, Geo. W. Phillips, J. H. Kennedy and J. E. Tiffney.

Prof. James H. Kennedy, son of Wilbur Kennedy, was born in Mount Pleasant, October 7, 1851, and lived with his parents on the farm until he was seventeen years old, when his mother died, during which time he attended the district school in the winter, and worked on the farm in summer. He attended the Normal School at Prompton during the fall term of 1869, and during the following winter taught school in Dyberry. In the fall of 1870 he attended the school at Prompton again. He then taught in the district schools of Wayne and Susquehanna Counties during six winters, laboring in summer by the month on farms, or laying stone wall to receive pay by the rod, and serving as brakeman one summer on the Central Railroad of New Jersey.

He then studied one year and a half under Prof. H. B. Larrabee, at the Mount Pleasant Academy, where he graduated in the spring of 1878.

From the fall of 1878 until the spring of 1881 he served in that institution as assistant and teacher of mathematics, under Prof. Geo. W. Phillips, A.M., and was then chosen principal of that academy, which position he held for three years. On the 6th day of May, 1884, he was elected superintendent of the public schools of his native county of Wayne.

He was married to Lizzie Belknap, July 21, 1872, who died in less than one year after that time. On the 19th day of August, 1879, he married Minnie Gaylord, and by her he has two daughters.

Roads.—The first road in this township was built by private enterprise aided by State appropriation. It extended from Pocono Point, near Stroudsburg, north to the State line. It was cut through in 1788–89. It followed the route of the old "Belmont and Easton turnpike," and was called the "North and South" road. In 1791 the settlers in this town began to open a road to Great Bend, a half-mile to a mile and a half south of the road now known as the "Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike." There was another road early made and still in use, which left the North and South road on the east side and came up by Silas Kellogg's to Captain John Tiffany's place, now owned by Milton Spencer. From this point a road was constructed westward, running north of the village to the brow of the hill, near the present residence of William Wright; then, passing down by Mr. Geer's log house, near the large spring, previously mentioned, crossed the Lackawaxen a few rods above the residence of K. P. Winner. Another road came up in the direction of the present Bethany road, and united with the road above mentioned just before it crossed the Lackawaxen; after crossing they separated to accommodate two taverns at the top of the hill on the North and South road, one kept by Samuel Stanton and the other by Jirah Mumford.

It was the custom of the proprietaries, and afterwards of the State, to allow all purchasers six acres for every one hundred purchased, as a compensation for roads. The Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike was incorporated in 1804, but was not completed until 1811. A large proportion of the houses on the road were taverns. The Bethany and Dingman's Choice turnpike was incorporated in 1811. It was kept in repair by moneys received for tolls. The Belmont and Easton turnpike was chartered in 1812. It opened up a direct route to Easton and Philadelphia. The State gave ten thousand dollars to aid in its construction. The Belmont and Oghquaga turnpike was chartered in 1817; the Lackawaxen turnpike in 1828. The road from Mount Pleasant to Stockport is an old one, and was laid out about 1799.

Manufacturing. — As has already been stated, Jirah Mumford built a saw-mill and grist-mill in 1795, where Fowler's mill lately stood. Benjamin King, Sr., had a saw-mill on Saw-Mill Creek, southwest of the present residence of J. W. Moase. The second grist-mill was built at what is now Stevenson's Mills. The first run of burr stones used in the township were put in by Noah Hiscock and Abel Chittenden about 1820. Elijah Dix, in speaking of the quality of work done at his mill, said: "Why, they make wheat flour out of rye down there."

About this time Eldad and Heaton Atwater erected a grist-mill, saw-mill and woolen-factory where Kennedy's Mills now stand, and later Eldad Atwater put up a factory and distillery near the home of the late Godfrey Stevenson. Erastus Baker built a woolen-factory on the Lackawaxen about 1830, which he continued to run until his death, which occurred in 1872. Shortly after it was bought by K. P. Winner, formerly of Dundaff, who has greatly enlarged it, and who continues to operate it.

Seth Kennedy built the saw-mill and grist-mill now known as Kennedy's Mills. He was caught in the machinery, while oiling, and killed, May 13, 1865. He had also built a carding-machine, which was taken down soon after his death. The saw-mill and grist-mill are now owned and operated by his son, Alexander Kennedy.

Eldad Atwater, about 1840, built the mill on the Lackawaxen known as Fowler's Mill, which he operated for some time and then sold to E. M. Atwater, who later sold out to James Fowler. This mill was burned a few years since and has not been rebuilt.

The industry of tanning has been carried on to a greater or less extent from the early settlement of the township until within a very few years, but has now nearly, if not entirely, ceased, on account of the exhaustion of hemlock bark. Jirah Mumford was the pioneer tanner, having built a small tannery soon after he settled in the township. His son, Col. Harry Mumford, built a tannery on the Lackawaxen, in which he and his son, Milo Mumford, carried on the business for years. About 1865 or 1866 this was bought and greatly enlarged and improved by H. W. & S. L. Brown, who commenced doing business on a much larger scale. They failed in business in 1868, and shortly after the tannery was bought by Ira Nichols and operated by himself and son for some years, when, on account of the scarcity of bark, it was discontinued.

In or about 1820 Asa Smith built a tannery and shoe shop one mile east of Pleasant Mount, which he kept in operation until his death, which occurred in 1862. His sons some time after discontinued the business and removed to Factoryville, Pa. James Plunket also had a small tannery.

Geo. Warner for many years had an extensive wagon factory on the Lackawaxen below Baker's woolen-factory. About 1837 Ezekiel White commenced manufacturing at White's Valley, where Philip White & Son now have a grist-mill, saw-mill, stick and bed-spring factory.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

SYLVANUS G. PERHAM.

The family of which the subject of this sketch is a representative is descended from John Perham, who, at an early period in our colonial history, emigrated to this country from England, and settled in Chelmsford, Mass., in 1664, since which time the Perhams have been numerously represented in various parts of New England. The intervening generations down to the subject of this memoir, in his line, have been John, (2nd) Benjamin, Moses, his grandfather, and Aaron G. Perham, his father.

The latter was born January 18, 1792, in Worcester County, Mass., and in 1815 removed from his native State to Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, Pa., bringing with him his wife, Mary, daughter of Sylvanus Gates, of Worcester County, who also settled in Wayne County. He bought a small tract of land in Mount Pleasant, now included in the farm of his son Sylvanus, and went to work, with the other pioneer settlers of that locality, in clearing up land and subjecting to the uses of agriculture what was then a heavily-timbered, wild section of country. His primitive log house stood at the top of the hill, near the barn of Sylvanus G. Perham, and his later residence is still standing near by. He was an industrious and hard-working man; so much so, that he seriously impaired his health by the severity of his labors, and, during the latter years of his life was unable to do much work. He died October 10, 1830, leaving a wife and seven children, namely,—Sylvanus G.; Lucinda, who married Hiram Tiffany, of Mount Pleasant township; Philinda, who became the wife of George Tuttle, and now resides in Iowa; Elizabeth, who married Virgil Gaylord, of Clinton township; Maria, who became the wife of Hiram Peck, of Mount Pleasant; Chloe, who married Philip Cramer, of Carbondale, Pa.; and Horatio, a farmer in Clinton township, Wayne County.

Sylvanus G. Perham was the only son, save one, and oldest child of his parents. He was born in the original log house May 21, 1818, and his opportunities for securing an education were extremely meagre. Owing to the incapacity of his father, he was compelled to labor very hard when a mere boy, and at twelve years of age he found himself the chief support and assistant of his widowed mother. He remained upon the farm, working for her, until he arrived at his majority, when he took the place, encumbered by debt, and, by dint of hard work and the exercise of great persistency and economy, cleared off the incumbrances. Later, he purchased other parcels of land adjoining the original farm, and now owns about five hundred acres. He has erected all the buildings which are now on the place, and built his present tasteful and substantial residence in 1862. For several years he worked as a carpenter and joiner. He belongs to that class of old, representative farmers, who were identified with the first settlement and development of Wayne County, and who are now, one by one, passing away, leaving their families comfortably provided for, as the result of their own self-sacrifice and devotion to the principles of industry, economy, frugality, thrift and integrity. He has never aspired to public place or position, but has always led an upright and honorable life, contributed freely to the church and other evangelical agencies, and endeavored to perform the duties of a good citizen. On December 24, 1843, he married Lucinda H., daughter of Daniel and Eliza (Jacks) Schoonover, of Texas township, and a member of another of the pioneer families of Wayne County. The children were Aaron G., who carries on the wholesale coal business in New York City; Mary E., died in infancy; Annette O., wife of John Wesley Hull, of Mount Pleasant; Calvin P., engaged in the coal business in Hoboken; Daniel W., a physician practicing in New York, who died April 27, 1882; Adelia M., wife of William H. Cawrse, of Mount Pleasant; William H., a lawyer by profession, who died June 19, 1881; Carrie E.; Susan A., wife of G. Ellison Peck, of Mount Pleasant; Warren E., Hattie May and John Jacob Perham.

PAUL McAVOY.

Paul McAvoy was the first of the Irish settlers to locate in Mount Pleasant township. He was a native of County Down, Ireland, where he was born in the year 1799. His father was William McAvoy, a farmer and weaver by occupation, who never emigrated to this country. His children were Richard, who emigrated about 1812, and settled in Philadelphia; Elizabeth, who married and remained in Ireland; Sarah, who became the wife of a Mr. Lavery; and Nancy, who married Hugh McGraw, and who closed her days in Mount Pleasant; William, who also died in Mount Pleasant; and Paul, the subject of this memoir. Mrs. McAvoy, the mother, came to the United States after the death of her husband, and is buried in Mount Pleasant.

Paul McAvoy learned the trade of a weaver with his father, and followed that occupation for a number of years in Ireland. In April, 1819, he landed in this country at Penobscot, Maine, and having reached New York by steamer, walked from that city to Philadelphia.

In December, 1819, he came to Mount Pleasant township, and settled where his son Richard now resides. He erected a small house near the present residence of his son, and in a wild and desolate region. His nearest neighbors were three miles distant.

The original tract for which he contracted comprised one hundred acres, and he cleared up nearly the whole of it prior to his death. On February 9, 1847, he purchased of Paul O'Neill sixty-eight acres adjoining. He was a Protestant in religion, and a consistent and active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was an ardent supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, one of the hard-working and industrious pioneers of Mount Pleasant township, and very generally respected for his integrity and uprightness of character. He engaged in farming and lumbering throughout his life, and built the homestead residence in 1835. He married Susan, daughter of Alexander Rutledge, of Damascus township, and had six children, viz.: Richard, who occupies the home residence in Mount Pleasant; Alexander, who lives in Geneseo, Illinois; Christopher, who resides at Pleasant Mount, Pa.; Paul, who died in 1862; William Henry, a prosperous farmer in Mount Pleasant; and Fanny A., who died in infancy. Richard married Ellen, daughter of Andrew McDermott, of Mount Pleasant, and has had fifteen children, of whom eight are living, namely: Paul, Walter, Frederick, Thomas, Fanny, Kate, Emma and Mary. William Henry married Maria, daughter of Samuel B. Williams, of Buckingham township, and has had seven children, viz.: Susan (wife of Henry Ehlefeldt, of Mount Pleasant), Carrie, Hattie, Henry, Effie, Victoria and Cecil Vane McAvoy.

ORRIN LESTER.

Orrin Lester is a descendant of Phineas Lester, who settled in the year 1786 in the Wallenpaupack settlement, Pike County, Pa., and there passed his life engaged in arduous toil, and in the performance of those trying duties which fell to the lot of the early settlers of that wild region. Among his children who are best remembered are Andrew Lester, father of the subject of this sketch; Orrin, who resided in Susquehanna County, Pa., near Montrose; John, who removed to the West; and a daughter, who married Captain Arnold, an old resident of Wayne County, and father of the late Judge Phineas Arnold.

Orrin Lester

Andrew Lester was born at Canterbury, Conn., May 29, 1778. In January, 1803, he married Sallie, daughter of David Kennedy, and the following month removed to Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, Pa., where he purchased one hundred acres of land, on which he built a log house and barn. He cleared about forty acres of this tract and planted a small orchard. This farm, at the present time owned by Porter Kennedy, he exchanged for one now owned by his son, Orrin Lester, situate two miles east of Pleasant Mount village, and there, with his faithful wife, he lived and "begat sons and daughters" as follows: Eunice, who married Josiah Goodsell, of Connecticut, and left descendants there; Betsy, who became the wife of Elisha Tooker, and now resides in Iowa; Anna W., who married Rufus Tuttle, of Connecticut; Asa A.; David K., who resides in Crawford County, Wis.; Sarah M., who married Merrels Stephens, of Lebanon township, and has resided in Illinois for fifty years past; Orrin, the subject of this memoir; and Emeline, wife of Dr. Rodney Harmes, of Pleasant Mount.

To provide for so large a family, Andrew Lester and his wife were under the necessity of exercising industry and economy. It was necessary to clear and cultivate his land and to substitute a substantial farm-house and barn in the place of the original rude structures. But, while not neglecting these home duties, he paid much attention to hunting, fishing and trapping, and among the pioneers of his locality he was noted for the possession of great physical strength, unconquerable determination and for his prowess as a hunter. The forests and streams had an irresistible charm for him, and many are the stories of his adventures that have been handed down. Deer were plenty and he often supplied his family with venison, and his children can yet remember of his leading wolves home which had been caught in his traps, which he accomplished by tying their jaws together before releasing them.

From such hardy parentage sprang Orrin Lester, who was born in an old log house that stood on top of the hill near where his son, Franklin P. Lester, resides, October 13, 1817. He was early inured to a life of toil and hardship, and found little opportunity to derive an education at the neighboring district school. At the age of eighteen he learned the trade of axe manufacturing with David Starks, of Pleasant Mount, and followed that business for nearly ten years. On November 18, 1841, he married Czrena, daughter of John and Lydia (Yale) Bigelow, and soon after bought a tract of land comprising seventy acres, now owned by Thomas O'Neill, in the eastern part of Mount Pleasant township. Having erected a log house thereon, and cleared off a portion of the land, he exchanged it with his brother David for the old homestead property, upon which he located May 1, 1854, his father and mother living with him until their respective deaths. Upon this place Mr. Lester has spent the greater portion of his active life, engaged in farming and in the various speculations in wool and stock incident to his career. In 1877 he purchased the Jonathan Wilbur farm, adjoining his homestead farm, containing about one hundred and twenty-six acres, and he now resides in the mansion-house located thereon. He has always been active in politics, and ardently supported the principles and doctrines of the Democratic party. He has held all the important offices of his township, including supervisor, and in 1866 was elected treasurer of Wayne County by a majority of seven hundred and thirty-one votes over his opponent, Henry W. Igler. August 3, 1842, he was commissioned by Governor David R. Porter captain of the Tenth Company, Seventieth Regiment in the Third Brigade and Eighth Division of the State Militia, embracing the counties of Northumberland, Union, Columbia, Luzerne, Susquehanna and Wayne. He is one of the representative old residents of Mount Pleasant township, and, though now confined to a sedentary life by rheumatism, has been one of the most powerful and athletic men of his time, and, like his father, an ardent and successful hunter.

Of his four children, John died September 20, 1861, aged nineteen years; Catharine Emeline is the wife of Nathan R. Kennedy, of Pleasant Mount; Orrin P. died January 22, 1880, in his thirtieth year; and Franklin P. is farming on the old homestead.

CHAPTER XXIV.

OREGON TOWNSHIP.

In 1846 the inhabitants of the upper portion of Berlin township presented a petition to the Court of Quarter Sessions, setting forth that, because of the location of the election-house and the condition of the roads, they were subject to great inconvenience in the exercise of their rights of citizenship; they asked, therefore, that a new township be erected. The court constituted Zara W. Arnold, Abiram Winton and Thomas I. Hubbell a committee to examine the boundaries of the proposed township, and report at the next session. On February 10, 1847, this committee filed a report, which was finally confirmed on the 12th day of the succeeding May. It divided the townships by a line beginning at the line of Dyberry and Texas townships, and extending along the line of lots Nos. 58, 59, 60 and 61 on the warrantee map of the county. Oregon is bounded north by Lebanon, east by Damascus, south by Berlin and west by Dyberry.

The township thus erected is one of the smallest in the county, ranking in size with Palmyra, Texas and Cherry Ridge, and, compared with the others, its proportional increase in population has been small. The assessment list for 1847, the first taken after the erection of the township, contained seventy-seven taxables, while that for the year 1885 shows only one hundred and seventy-five.

The following were listed as taxables in Oregon in 1848 :

David Aigans.	Elijah Hooker.
Edward Aigans.	Zenas Hamlin.
James Arthur.	Charles Hole.
Daniel Brown.	Zenas Hole.
Cornelius Brünig.	Daniel Hole.
George Braning.	Jonas Kimbell.
John Bines.	James Lovelass.
Richard Brown.	Joseph May.
George W. Brown.	William Miller.
Lucis Brouton.	Stephen Marsh.
Edward Boucher.	Thomas Marsh.
Thomas Boucher.	Edward Murray.
Edward Budd.	Hugh McCrunnels.
Almernor Beard.	James McCrunnels.
William Bryant.	Benj'n. McCrunnels.
James Bryant.	Thomas Harris.
Thomas Bryant.	Charles Nelson.
Thomas Challacomb.	Samuel Oliver.
Walker Chubb.	William Oliver.
Cyrus Clark.	James Oliver.
Peter Davey.	John Pulis.
John Davey.	Peter Pulis.
Joseph Doney.	Henry Pulis.
Samuel Dodge.	James Piper.
John Elison.	John Pride.
Hartland Fuller.	George D. Smith.
Trooman Goodenough.	Simon Schoonover.
Andrew Hicks.	Isaac Smith.
Charles Hicks.	John Saire.
John Hicks.	Thomas Shuman.
Robert Hicks.	William Scambler.
John Hartman.	Henry Scambler.
Charles Hartman.	John Smith.
Ferris Hartman.	Frederick Smith.
Thomas Holt.	Charles Smith.
William Hoyl.	John Sharp.
Joseph Honey.	Thomas Woodley.
Jacob Hole.	Richard Woodley.
Pry Hole.	Henry Watts.

Immigration in Oregon has been very limited, and the present inhabitants are descended mainly from a few settlers who cleared homes for themselves before the excision from Berlin took place. The surface of the township is a succession of undulating hills that roll upward toward the highlands to the north, but are broken by the wood-crowned ridges which limit the water-sheds of several picturesque brooks. Very little of the first growth timber remains, and the soil, though quite stony, is fertile for a wide range of products. A number of ponds dot the hills, and good water is everywhere abundant, so that the farms are well adapted to cattle-raising and wool-growing; both occupations are succeeding the lumbering, which was a prominent feature of the township's early history.

Oregon is all within the drainage basin of the Lackawaxen, and its streams have their origin in the township limits. Carley Brook rises near the northern boundary, and flows southwest diagonally through to join the Lackawaxen at Traceyville, in Texas. Big Brook rises in the northwestern corner and flows into Dyberry, and Holbert Brook waters the southeastern corner before flowing into Texas. Day, Spruce, Huck, Mud, Lovelass, Smith, Upper and Lower Wilcox Ponds lie amid its hills.

Early Settlers.—The earliest settlers in what is now Oregon were pioneers from Dyberry and the mother township. Full of vigor and courage, they went into what was then a wilderness infested with bears and wolves, made little clearings, and attempted to wrest a living from the virgin soil. The absence of roads and the desolation of the country made the privations greater than those in the adjacent townships, and the earliest settlers returned from whence they came. The foremost pioneer of whom there remains a record was Lester Adams, who came from Berlin and made a clearing in what is known as Smith Hill. His log house stood near the road that passes the Smith Hill Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of his younger children was born there. After a few years he went back to what remained Berlin, and a further account of him will be found in the history of that township.

Hugh McCrunnels, accompanied by his wife, nee Mary Williams, came from Ten Mile Run, on the Delaware, and settled on what was known as the "Gate Road," where he cleared three farms. He had two sons—Benjamin, who lives at Forest City, Lackawanna County, and James. The latter lived on one of the farms for a number of years, and then removed with his family to Iowa, where he died a decade ago.

Louis Hoel was a near neighbor of Mr. McCrunnels, and settled near the line of Dyberry, from which township he came. His father had been a pioneer, and Mr. Hoel, though without wife or companions, went into the woods with his axe and gun to make himself a home. At that time deer were plenty, and an occasional elk lifted his spreading antlers over the laurel and rhododendron. Wolves barked through the forest and rain fell from the night clouds on his unsheltered head. He commenced his clearing late in the summer, but when the snow came he was ready for the tedious winter. His log hut bore testimony to the energy with which he had worked, though it lacked a chimney. On the clay floor of his cabin he improvised a fireplace of earth and stones, and the smoke from his primitive hearth passed out through a hole in the roof. During that and several succeeding winters he subsisted on game, until the fields he had wrested from the forest brought him ease and plenty. Mr. Hoel is the oldest of the surviving early settlers, and lives with Mr. William Bait, in Dyberry township.

The farm now occupied by Frank Pulis was settled by his father, Henry Pulis, in the spring of 1828. Henry was a son of Conrad Pulis, one of the founders of Bethany, and had secured a tract of one hundred and fifty acres. He had previously married Caroline Whitmore, of Scott. They had nine children,—Margaret, wife of Lucian Goodenough; Calvin, who went South and died; Harriet, wife of Frederick Smith; Sarah, wife of George Chase; Samantha, wife of S. E. Bryant; Olive, wife of Lucien Hauton; Amanda, wife of Herman Fautz; Frank and Nellie.

The "English settlement," as the territory along the southeastern part of the township is called, was made during the year 1832, when James Piper arrived from Devonshire, England, bringing a wife and three children. He located near the Berlin line, in the eastern corner of the township, and the next year a number of his countrymen followed his example. In a short time a small community, from which the descendants have gone out into the adjacent townships, was established in a radius of a mile or two. Mr. Piper left one son, Richard, who located on the road to Beach Pond, and afterward, in 1851, was drowned at White Mills. Mrs. Jonas Mills is a daughter of James Piper, and lives at the homestead, which is one of the oldest frame houses in the settlement.

Soon after this James Oliver, a Cornishman, came with his family and settled near the Piper place. He had several children, and two of his sons, George and William, reside on the tract which he cleared. Among those who were influenced to leave "Merrie England" by the success that attended Mr. Piper's enterprise were Samuel Penwarden, James Challacomb and Thomas Woodley. Mr. Challacomb was the first to arrive, and remained in the settlement for some time, but finally went West. Few of his descendants remain in this section. Thomas Woodley, accompanied by his wife, his parents, Richard and Ann, a brother Richard, William Wicks and Edmund Budd, left Cornwall, England, and landed in Quebec in 1832. The party came to Oregon via Lake Champlain and the canal from Rondout. Thomas went first to Seelyville, where he remained a few months, and then built a cabin near the site of his present residence at Smith Hill. He had six sons and daughters, most of whom are married and reside near the homestead.

Samuel Penwarden first settled near the Woodleys. Although the houses were but a few rods apart, dense forest intervened, and there was little companionship. The immigrants had little money and few possessions, and the winter was drawing near. By dint of much toil Mr. Penwarden succeeded in getting his cabin completed before his funds ran low, but his chimney remained unfinished and he went to work on a neighboring farm. While he was gone, in addition to attending to the duties of the household, Mrs. Penwarden collected the material for the fire-place, and, assisted by her younger children, laid the chimney with soft clay, so that on his return her husband might have still greater evidence of her sacrifice and devotion. Of such stuff were the pioneer women of Oregon made. Soon afterward Mr. Penwarden located on the place now occupied by Jonas Mills, and later moved to the farm recently owned by John Garret, near the Carley Brook saw-mill. Samuel Penwarden had eight sons,—William, who built the saw-mill on Carley Brook; Simon, a resident of Waymart; Walter, who died in the latter place in 1883; Samuel, who lives in Honesdale; John H., a resident of Berlin; George, paymaster for the Pratt Oil Company, of New York; and Richard, of Honesdale.

Walter Penwarden died at his residence near Prompton, Pa., Friday morning, October 20, 1882. He was born in Devonshire, England, December 31, 1826, and removed from thence with his father, Samuel Penwarden, Sr., to Oregon, Wayne County, Pa., May, 1832, when the surrounding country was a dense wilderness. He was reared amidst the many disadvantages attendant at that time. His educational advantages were very limited. He became an employee upon the Gravity Road of the D. & H. Company in the spring of 1848, and continued in their employ as a railroad carpenter most of the time, until he was disabled in consequence of his last illness, a period of about thirty-five years. After a lingering and painful illness for several months he died, from cancer of the stomach. He was a good, obedient son, a kind, loving brother, a dutiful, affectionate husband, a generous, indulgent father, and in neighborly kindnesses he could not be excelled. He was ever willing to render all possible aid to those in need. He was always ready to aid in every good cause. He was a quiet, unostentatious, sweet-spirited Christian man, always ready to do good when and where opportunity appeared. He was by nature a gentleman. His courtesy and politeness were but the natural expression of inward kind feeling and thoughtful consideration for others. In his goodness to others, he frequently was unmindful of his own physical requirements. His funeral was largely attended, which gave evidence of the high esteem with which he was looked upon by the community. True hearts and willing hands of a loving wife and affectionate children administered to his wants, and made his closing days as full of cheer and comfort as possible. His last days were full of hope and Christian peace. He was a faithful member of the Methodist Church for seven years. He left a wife, three sons and one daughter, together with a large circle of relatives and friends, to mourn their loss.

Thomas H. Dunn came from Cambridgeshire, England, in 1835, and moved into Dyberry in 1840. While there he married Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Doney, and located on the line of Oregon and Dyberry townships. In 1863 he moved on one of the farms cleared by Hugh McCrunnels, on the Rileysville road, where he now resides. He has five children living in the vicinity.

In 1842 Thomas B. Shuman came from Devonshire, and settled on a farm just opposite Thomas Woodley, near the Smith Hill Methodist Episcopal Church. He had eight children,—Nora J. (Mrs. Glone), Elizabeth (Mrs. Best), Mary (Mrs. Budd), Selina, John H. (of Honesdale), Arnold J., William A. and Frederick A. (of Honesdale). Henry Dodge came from the East and settled on the Big Brook, near the saw-mill now occupied by G. W. Kimble. Mr. Dodge had a number of children, some of whom now reside in Honesdale. The homestead has passed into other hands. The next year, William Watts and family came from Barnstable, Devonshire, and located near Smith Hill. His children are Henry, William and John. Mr. Watts lived for eight years on the Amburst Wheeler place. One of his sons is in business in Honesdale.

Daniel and Charles Hoel, of Dyberry, built a saw-mill on Big Brook, near the township line, in 1842, and in 1844 G. W. Kimble bought it, and moved from the homestead of Asa Kimble, near Honesdale. He had married Phœbe Schoonover, and has four children,—Daniel M., Abby (Mrs. Parsons), George A. and Ellie. The latter-named live at the homestead, which occupies a commanding site, and overlooks one of the finest farms in the township.

T. A. Goodenough moved from Bethany to the farm he now occupies, on the Carley Brook road, in 1847. He married Hannah W. Torrey in 1830, and has six children,—Lucian H.,

Lowell L.; Lynas N.; Emily, wife of James Davey; Eliza, wife of Franklin Carr, of Waymart; and Charlotte, who resides at the homestead.

James Oliver came from Devonshire in 1831, and located just over the Berlin line. His wife was Mary Hockady, and their children were, John; James, drowned in 1832; William; Samuel; Lewis; Gideon; Elizabeth (Mrs. Thomas Legg); Mary C., wife of Stephen Histed; Prudence, wife of John Oliver; Catherine (Mrs. Joseph May).

Soon after the settlement of Bethany, Jason Torrey bought a large tract of land, lying part in Oregon and part in Lebanon townships, under the warrantee name of Abner Skinner, and with a view to having it more easily cleared in the future, sent a party of men out to girdle all the large trees, that they might die. From this circumstance, the locality was known as "the Girdland." It embraces some of the best farming land in the township. Charles Torrey, a brother of Jason, was the first settler, and made a small clearing, and then abandoned the enterprise. The next settler was James Nelson, who took up a lot of excellent land near the Torrey place, and, after making a good clearing, erected a frame house, the first in Girdland, in 1848. The place was remote from society and schools, and the roads were only such in name; Nelson became discouraged, sold out and removed to Nebraska.

In 1851 Jonathan Bryant, a son of Thomas Bryant, went to Girdland, and settled on a place that had been commenced by A. B. Gammel, of Bethany. By his steadfastness of purpose and untiring energy, he overcame the obstacles that had discouraged his predecessors, and has since acquired a competency. He bought the Torrey farm, and afterwards sold it to George Croy, by whom it is at present occupied. Mr. Bryant has eight children,—Florence (wife of William Crocker); Mary, (wife of Theodore Wall), Burton, Albert, Fred, George, Sarah and Otis.

In 1850 Mark Cook came from Philadelphia, and was attracted by the fertility of the soil. He became a neighbor of Mr. Bryant, and remained with his family until 1870, when they returned to the Quaker City. Richard Maudsley was also one of the early settlers; he is dead, and his family have moved west.

William Scambler came from London in 1845, and after a six years' residence in Mount Pleasant, located on the Lebanon road, in the extreme northwestern corner of Oregon township. He had three children,—H. W. Scambler, who lives at the homestead; George, who was killed at the battle of Winchester; and Mary Ann, the wife of Jonathan Bryant.

James D. Bolcomb, a son of James Bolcomb, of Dyberry, took possession of a farm just opposite the Lewis Hoel place, on the Gate road, in 1857. He married Esther A. Stevens, of West Lebanon, who lived but a short time. In 1855 he led to the altar Lucy A., a daughter of Charles Hoel. No children were born of either union.

Roads.—Soon after the settlement of Bethany, in 1801, a road leading from Dyberry through to the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike was laid out, and was known as the "Gate Road." The exact date of its survey and the name of the engineer who conducted the work are not known, but it is probable that the route followed a trail blazed by some of the earliest settlers of Wayne County. There are also traces of a road that passed east and west through the township. Its termini are matters of conjecture to the present inhabitants; it fell into disuse many years ago. In 1823 a road was laid out from Genung settlement, through Smith's settlement, to the line of Pike County, traces of which still appear, although much of the original route has been vacated. The road from Smith's settlement to Parsons, Damascus township, was laid out in 1827, and is still used. The first viewers appointed after the erection of Oregon as a separate township were Stephen Torrey, Ezra Hulburt and Stephen G. Cory. They were directed to lay out a road through the lands of Walter Chubb, Thomas Challacomb and others. The highway commenced at Smith's settlement, and terminated on the lands of James Smith. During the same year roads were laid out from Henry Bunnell's blacksmith shop to Smith's mill, and adjacent to the Methodist chapel at Smith Hill. At present the township is threaded with fair roads, most of which are kept in good repair.

Religious Matters.—The first religious services that there is any record of were held at the residence of James Piper, soon after the English settlement was commenced. The meetings were conducted by a Rev. Mr. Davey, who was among the first emigrants to this section. At this time there was no church or class in the settlement, and the attendance was only half a dozen. In 1851 Rev. Mr. Frost held services at the residences of Jonathan Bryant, in Girdland, and in 1857 regular preaching at the school-house in the same place was commenced. Mrs. Bryant was the first member enrolled, and Mark Cook the second. The first class was established in 1858, with Mark Cook as leader. At the close of the first year only six members were enrolled.

The three churches are known as the "Oregon Charge" of the Honesdale District, Wyoming Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The first records obtainable show that Rev. L. C. Phillips was pastor in 1860–61. Since that time the pastors were as follows:

Fred. Illman	1862
Joseph Whitham	1863
Jonas Underwood	1864
Richard Vasca	1865–66
Stephen Cramp	1866
Gabriel Westfall	1867–68
F. Alexander	1869
G. C. Andrews	1870
George Fritchet	1871–72
C. W. Sastell	1873–74
J. C. Colson	1875
E. B. Scudder	1876
J. T. Burrell	1878–80
T. F. Doty	1880–82
Supply by T. J. Gates	1883–84
J. R. Allen	1885

The charge now contains one hundred and ten members, distributed as follows:

Carley Brook	18
Girdland	42
Oregon	25
Smith Hill	25

The records of the churches are very deficient, and the date at which the buildings were erected is not definitely known. None of them are over twenty-five years old.

For the past few years the German Lutherans have held occasional services in the Girdland School-house, but there is no organized congregation, and the members of the denomination are few in number.

Schools.—The rude, initial-carved desks behind which a dozen children sat to listen and learn of Miss Margaret Parmenter have long since crumbled to dust, and half a mile south of the tannery, crops ripen over the spot where the old log school-house stood. In 1820, when the path to the school was only a blazed trail through the woods, she opened the first school ever held in the territory that now constitutes Oregon. After teaching several years, she was succeeded by a Miss Stevens, who, in turn, gave place to Mrs. Agin.

The school law of 1834 was sustained by Wayne County, and, after that time, the teachers, who had been supported by private subscription, were regularly employed by the State. The township is now divided into four districts, and has for the secretary of directors, Captain John Kellow, the eldest son of Thomas Kellow, one of the early settlers of Honesdale. Captain Kellow was a valiant soldier in the Civil War, and in 1863 settled on Upper Wilcox Pond, and has since been secretary of the board. The first school-house erected by the township was in 1848, and is located half a mile above G. W. Kimble's saw-mill. Two years afterward No. 2, better known as the "Red School-House," was built. In 1854 the English settlement had grown large enough to require separate accommodations, and No. 4 was erected. The school at Girdland was built by private subscription a few years ago, and cost about four hundred dollars. All of the buildings are of frame, and are comfortably furnished.

Manufacturing Interests. — Frederick Smith, one of the oldest settlers of Berlin township, was the industrial pioneer of Oregon. About 1840 he erected the first saw-mill within what eight years later became the township limits. It was situated on Carley Brook, near the Texas line, and is still standing, though but little used, the timber being exhausted in its immediate vicinity. The same year that Oregon was erected as a separate township, Daniel M. Hard, E. E. Gilbert and J. K. Palmer bought a tract of a thousand acres lying on Carley Brook, and two years later erected a tannery a short distance from the township line. This gave an impetus to the prosperity of farmers in the immediate vicinity, as the hemlock bark, which before had been worthless, acquired a fair commercial value and stimulated rapid clearing. In 1856 the firm became Gilbert, Palmer & Reed, and so continued until 1860, when Reed withdrew, and Gilbert & Palmer carried on the business until they failed and the establishment passed into the hands of D. M. Hard. Under the firm-name of F. H. Rockwell & Co., the tannery ran until 1869, when Wefferling, Brunig & Co., the present owners, purchased it. In September of the same year the plant was burned, causing a loss of five thousand dollars, but the establishment was soon rebuilt. William Wefferling and Fred. Brunig had come from Hanover, Germany, a number of years before this, and had been employed in the tannery under its former owners. Both were men of parts, and of frugal habit; the industry of their early days has been rewarded by the ownership of a prosperous business.

In 1852, John Riefler, a native of Wurtemberg, came to Wayne County, bringing with him his wife, and a year later his son followed. Both went to work for Hard, Gilbert & Palmer, and for ten years Mr. Riefler was foreman of the establishment. The saw-mill which he now owns was built by his former employers, and was purchased by him and his son Henry in 1867. Two years after this Henry sold out his interest and bought a farm near by. John Riefler was elected county commissioner on the Republican ticket in 1878, and proved a valuable and efficient officer. He lives in a pleasant residence near the mills, and has thirteen children, some of whom are among the business men of New York, Brooklyn and Scranton. Henry Riefler resides near by, and has four children, who reside with him at the homestead.

William Penwarden built a saw-mill on Carley Brook, a short distance above that of Mr. Riefler, in 1856, and took possession on the 2d of July. His mill is well-improved with the latest machinery, and does a large business. He has five sons and one daughter, all living at or near his residence.

Post-Offices.—There are but two post-offices in Oregon township, and both have been established at a comparatively recent date. In 1876 John R. Budd, who located in Girdland in 1870, was appointed postmaster at that place, and retained the position until 1880, when he was elected justice of the peace, and resigned. His wife was made his successor, and has held office since that time. In connection with his office Mr. Budd carries on a general store and a blacksmith-shop. The post-office at Carley Brook was created in 1879, and Fred Brunig received the first and only commission. Both of these offices receive the mail three times a week.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

WILLIAM PENWARDEN.

Among those who came into Wayne County in the early part of the present century, to carve out for themselves and their descendants homes and fortunes, was Samuel Penwarden, Sr., who was born in Devonshire County, parish of Pyworthy, England, in August, 1800. He was one of a family of twelve children, (nine brothers and three sisters), all of whom lived to be men and women. In 1822 he married Johanna Chubb, whose parents resided in the same parish. Mr. Penwarden had relatives in America, and from them he received such glowing accounts of the New World that he determined to seek a home therein. With his wife and three sons he embarked at Liverpool in April, 1832, in the sailing-vessel "Fine Snow and Dromedary," Joseph Hayden, captain, and in May arrived in New York. From New York they came to Honesdale by canal, which was then the only public means of travel between those points. Honesdale then contained few inhabitants, having only two stores, and no churches. They first lived on what was afterwards known as the Bennett farm, about six miles from Honesdale. From the Bennett farm they moved to John Garrett's farm, and after two years again moved, this time to John Smith's farm. In 1840 he purchased of John Torrey one hundred and fifteen acres of land—a wilderness tract in Berlin township—where he resided many years, and where his children resided until they sought homes of their own. In 1868, worn out by care and hard work, they left the farm and made their home with their son William. Mr. Penwarden's example cannot but be a lesson to the coming generations. His was a life of toil and of hardships, and his success was proof that industry and honesty will always win. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church many years and contributed generously towards its support. Mr. Penwarden's brother Richard came to America after he did, and settled near Mount Pleasant village, where he died in 1857 without issue. They were the only members of the family that ever came to America; hence they have but few relatives in this country, and the name of Penwarden is seldom met with. Mr. Samuel Penwarden, Sr., died September 27, 1885; his wife passed away August 26, 1869. Their children were William, born in England, September 22, 1823. Simon, born in England, October 26, 1825. He married Mary Swingle, who bore him children as follows: Gertrude, married Wm. Aunger; Emma, married Charles Smith; Alice, married Arthur Williams; Frederick and Abel. Simon resides in Waymart and has followed railroading and farming. Walter, also born in England, December 31, 1826, married Martha Jones. His children are George W., married Louisa Jenkins (his children are William, Bell and Harry); Jane, married Leroy Wolf; Melissa and Emma died young; Walter, Jr., married Bridget Mahone, and had one child, Edwin. Walter, Sr., died in Prompton, October 20, 1882. He was a carpenter for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's Railroad, and worked for them many years. Samuel, Jr., was born in Berlin, Wayne County, December 19, 1832. He is a railroad employé and resides in Honesdale. He married Ann Sampson. His children were Fred, deceased; Elmer, deceased; Frank; Hattie, deceased; Adelia and Nettie. John H., born in Berlin, February 14, 1838, married Amanda Maloney, and had two children, who died in infancy. James Edward, born in Berlin, February 14, 1838, died 1842. George W., born in Berlin, April 14, 1840, now resides in New York and is cashier for Chas. Pratt's astral oil establishment. He married Hattie Wilt, of Brooklyn. Their children were Charles and Florence. Richard J., born in Berlin, June 16, 1844, married Jane Smith. His children were Delephene, who married Harvey Welch, and had one child, an infant; Maggie and Joanna, both deceased.

William Penwarden, the subject of this sketch, passed his early life on the new farm his father purchased in 1840, and did his share in clearing and improving the same. His education was such as could be gained by three months' attendance each winter at the district schools of his neighborhood until he was twenty. Before his majority was reached he worked out at eleven dollars per month, which was given to his father until he was of age. We next find him running a saw-mill for Henry Bunnell, at so much per thousand feet. In this slow way he obtained the means with which he began his successful business career. In 1851 he formed a partnership with Mr. Bunnell, and they purchased of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company and of Mr. Shields, of Philadelphia, one thousand acres of timber land, which included the water-power now known as the Penwarden saw-mill property. In 1856, with his own hands, he made the first clearing on what is now his home farm. The country in all directions, was an almost unbroken wilderness, with here and there a house and small clearing. A small piece cleared, he at once put up a house into which he moved his family. Mrs. Penwarden, then young and energetic, declares she was never happier in her life than in those days, though they were days of unceasing toil. The same season the saw-mill was built, and work commenced. It was what is known as an up-and-down saw-mill and was managed and worked by Mr. Penwarden. In 1858 the partners divided, Mr. Penwarden taking the mill and two hundred and fifty acres of land as his share. In 1870 he purchased Mr. Bunnell's share for twenty thousand dollars. Since then he has bought other tracts of woodland, which he has sold after cutting off the timber. He has cut the timber off from two thousand acres as people wanted to clear the land. He now owns one thousand acres of valuable land, two hundred and fifty acres of which he has cleared and on which he has built a good home and fine out-buildings. His mill was remodeled in 1867 and circular saws put in place of the old up-and-down saw. In 1880 it was rebuilt and made as good as new, only to be burned to the ground, with no insurance, in November of the following year. A new mill was at once built and work resumed. Mr. Penwarden employs from ten to twenty hands in and about his mill which has a capacity of twenty thousand feet of lumber daily. He is in every sense of the word a self-made man. He commenced life with only his indomitable energy and pluck for backers, and has, by industry, integrity and good management, placed himself in the front rank of the wealthy and successful business men of his county. Since the Rebellion he has been a Republican, though he intends to vote in township and county matters for the best man. He has been school director many years and has held other township offices. On the 26th day of February, 1852, he was joined in marriage to Miss Olive Depew, who was born in Madisonville, Luzerne County, Pa., December 4, 1832. Her father, Thomas Depew, was born in New Jersey, May 24, 1795, and was descended from the Holland Dutch. He married Abigail Rice whose ancestors were from Massachusetts. Miss Rice was born July 22, 1799, and died April 20, 1883; her husband died September 16, 1881. Their children were Lucinda, born April 23, 1817; Mahala, born February 1, 1819, married Lewis Schoonover, twelve children; Merritt, born February 17, 1821; Jennette, born June 8, 1823, married a Mr. Stalbird, thirteen children; Abram, born September 12, 1825, married Elizabeth Swartz, eight children (he served all through the Rebellion in the Union army); William, born June 14, 1827, married Ellen Reynolds, three children; Levi, born March 15, 1830, married Catharine Russell, two children. (Levi enlisted in Company "K," Ninth Regiment, New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, Capt. E. G. Drake, and was wounded in the battle of Roanoke, also in the battle of Newbern from the effects of which he died;) Olive, born October 4, 1832; Simeon, born May 9, 1836; Silas, born Nov. 11, 1839, married Eliza Dunston, six children. To Mr. and Mrs. William Penwarden has been born children as follows: Leroy D., born November 24, 1854, married Adabell Stevens, daughter of Francis and Lucretia (Bickwell) Stevens (children,— Nellie, born August 10, 1880; Leo, born in fall of 1884); Charles Lewis, born January 18, 1857, married Zaidee Bell Williams (she was born February 7, 1863), daughter of Joel B. and Lucinda (Ball) Williams, one child, Annetta V., born June 3, 1881; Levi W., born November 22, 1859, married November 20, 1880, Lizzie Rodgers, daughter of Henry and Harriet (Sargent) Rodgers (children,—Grace, born April 6, 1882, and May O., born June 6, 1883); Edvena born September 15, 1863, married June 6, 1882, F. J. Bryant (children,— Pearl, born fall of 1885; R. W., born March 25, 1867; and E. D., born June 7, 1869.)

WILLIAM WATTS.

William Watts was born in Barnstable borough, Devonshire County, England, July 2, 1802. His father, John Watts, was born in the same borough, and when old enough was put to the blacksmith trade, which he learned and followed for a livelihood. His wife was Miss Grace Gorman, who was also born in Barnstable. George Watts, William's grandfather, a native of the same place, was a gentleman's servant, and married Mary Barrow. She was an active and capable business women, and carried on blacksmithing, her brother being her head workman. It is said of her that while she did not work in the shop, she understood its every detail as well as her brother, and kept an eye on the business and made her shop a success. John Watts' children were William, John, Harriet, Mary, Elizabeth, Thomas, George, James and Ann. He (John Watts) died in England in 1864, his wife in 1858. William, our subject, passed the early part of his life on a farm as a common laborer.

In 1822 the manufacture of lace commenced in England, principally at Nottingham, and William learned the trade. He became an expert workman and earned good wages. Being industrious and saving, he laid by in the savings bank a small sum, and in 1843 (April 19th) embarked at Biddeford, on the schooner "Arab," for New York, where he landed with his wife and three children, after a voyage of six weeks. A few days after landing they came, by way of steamer, to Rondout; thence by canal to Honesdale, where he worked at whatever he could get to do until the following April, when he took the farm of William Hill and Thomas Hatton, to work on shares for one year. During the next eight years he worked Ambrose Wheeler's farm on shares, at the same time putting all his spare time on a piece of wild land of one hundred acres, which he purchased in 1846, which is now the home of his wife and sons. When he came in possession of the farm there was a road only to the tannery, and not a tree cut or a rock removed. He cleared, and improved and built a house and out-buildings, and lived to see a fine farm, the result of his patience and toil. In December, 1852, he brought his family to the new home, where they have since resided, and where he died, on the 1st day of September, 1883, mourned and regretted by his neighbors and friends, by whom he was held in high esteem as a man of sterling integrity and a friend in need. In England he was in politics a Liberal, and in this country identified himself with the Democratic party, by whom he was elected to different township offices. On the 25th day of March, 1825, he married Margaret Perry, daughter of Nicholas and Elizabeth (Tallin) Perry. She was born April 5, 1804, and bore him the following children: John, born December 26, 1825; Henry, born February 13, 1828, married Emily Hasken (their children were James W., Annie E., Frederick J., Perry, William G., Maurice and Archie H.); William G., born in 1831 (deceased); Ann, born December 26, 1835 (deceased); and William, born July 4, 1839, married Mary S. Varcoe.

GEORGE W. KIMBLE.

His father, Asa Kimble, was born and lived at the Narrows, in Pike County. He married Abigail Pellet, daughter of John Pellet, and soon afterward, about 1816, moved to Wayne County, where he bought two hundred and sixty acres of wild land in Dyberry township, the present location of the County Fair-Ground. His youngest son, Martin K. Kimble, now resides on the old homestead. The place then had a small house and barn on it and a small clearing. He erected new buildings, set out fruit-trees, and made himself and family a good home. He held different township offices. Both himself and wife were members of the Methodist Church for many years. He died February 11, 1847. His wife passed away February 4, 1879. Their children were Nancy, Ephraim B., George W., John P., Isaac R., William and Martin.

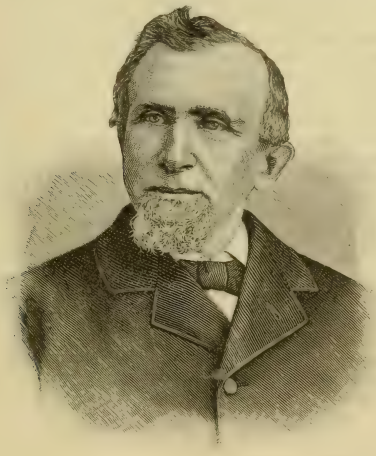
George W. Kimble was born March 2, 1821; married, November 20, 1843, Phebe Schoonover, who was born November 3, 1821. Their children were Asa, born March 12, 1845; Daniel M., born August 26, 1846; Abbie J., born February 5, 1848; and George A., born Jan. 14, 1849. Mrs. Kimble died Sept. 20, 1864. For his second wife, Mr. Kimble married Lusetta Schoonover, December 20, 1865. She was born in Lake township, Luzerne County, Pa., August 15, 1841. She has one child, Ella A., born October 11, 1868.

George W. Kimble was born in Dyberry township, Wayne County, and grew to man's estate on the home farm. He made his start in life by working an entire year and having sixty dollars in money at the end.

In the spring of 1843, in company with his brother Ephraim, he bought of Charles and Daniel Hoel the saw-mill built a year or two before on the Big Brook, in what is now Oregon township, and known as Kimble's saw-mill, and with it one hundred acres of all wild land, except about one acre cleared. For miles around there was only here and there a small clearing. The only building was a small house which stood near the mill, in the midst of a thicket of laurel. Into this house he moved with his family and commenced the work of clearing. Some of the first lumber they rafted and ran to Philadelphia market brought only six dollars a thousand feet, and sometimes they walked most of the way home.

They accumulated property, including large tracts of land, and worked together till 1858, when they divided their property. George W. Kimble had two hundred acres of land around the mill; but the mill, mill privilege and lumber belonged to both; while E. B. Kimble had the store, blacksmith shop, etc., where Dyberry post-office now is. Ephraim died in 1880, leaving his interest in the mill to his oldest son, Isaac, and G. W. Kimble bought it of him. He now owns four hundred and fifty acres of land, two hundred and thirty acres cleared, with good buildings and other improvements, the result of his energy and industry.

Mr. Kimble is a Democrat in politics and has held different township offices. He is liberal in his religious opinions, as he is in all his acts, and he is spoken of as one of Wayne County's most honored men, as have been the members of his family both now and in past generations.



JOHN REIFLER.

John Reifler was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, May 2, 1832. His father, Philip Henry Reifler, was born in 1808, in the same place, as had been his ancestors for many generations. He married Katherine Bauman, who was born September 15, 1811; she was daughter of Johannes and Barbara (Aukle) Bauman. Mr. Bauman was a mason, and worked at the trade in Gomaringen, Reutlangen County, Wurtemberg, where his ancestors had long resided. Philip Reifler died in 1852. His wife is still living and resides with her son. Their children were John, born May 2, 1832; Henry, born January 13, 1836; Margaret, born June, 1839; Jacob, born December 14, 1842; Dorothy, born in 1848. The children are all in this country but Jacob, who remained with his mother in Germany. Henry married Catherine Slach; children are Jane, Emma, Henry and George. Margaret married Charles Abbott; their children are Carrie, Henry, William and Flora. Jacob married Barbara Bauman; children are Jacob Jr., Kate, Barbara, Henry, John. Dorothy married George Younger; children,—George, Katherine, Amelia and Mary. John Reifler learned the weaver's trade and followed it until he was nineteen years old. On the 8th day of October, 1851, in company with his uncle, Michael Reifler, and family, he left home and embarked at Bremen in the sailing-vessel "Gustaf," and after forty-two days on the water landed in New York. The passage was a very rough as well as a long one, and their vessel came near going down.

His uncle, John M. Bauman, ex-county treasurer of Wayne County, had come over the spring before and had located in Honesdale, and to that place the new-comers made their way. John was entirely out of money and had to borrow of an acquaintance in New York the means to buy a railroad ticket to Honesdale. In January, 1852, John commenced work in the Hungarian tannery, and worked at whatever was to be done until 1860, when he became foreman, a position he held nine years.

In 1867, in company with his brother Henry, he bought of the tannery company the saw-mill property he now owns, and twenty-eight acres of land surrounding it. In 1869 he bought out his brother and moved into the property, where he has since resided. Mr. Reifler has also bought the Baird and Carbon farms, and now owns a large and valuable property. The first money he earned after getting work he sent to his father in return for money advanced for his passage. In 1882 Mr. Reifler made a two months' visit to his old home, and while there his barns and all their contents were destroyed by fire.

In politics Mr. Reifler was first a Democrat, but at the second election of Abraham Lincoln joined the Republican party, to which he has since belonged. He has been honored by his fellow-citizens with the office of county commissioner and different township offices. He was elected commissioner in 1878, during the exciting times caused by what was called the Anti-Court-House Campaign. He is a member of the German Lutheran Church and has been for many years. He married, July 24, 1853, Miss Catherine Follmer, who was born February 6, 1830, in Duslengen, Wurtemberg, Germany. Her father, David Follmer, married Dorothy Relling. Her grandfather, Martin Follmer, was a farmer and owned a large farm. To Mr. and Mrs. Reifler have been born Henry, born October 10, 1851; married Thirsa Lawton; children—Nellie and Vernon. John G., born July 13, 1854. Margaret, born March 4, 1856; married Henry Tamblyn, children are William, Emerson and Millie. Mary Catherine, born June 5, 1857. Caroline D., born November 3, 1858; married Edmond Lee. Matilda U., born January 29, 1860. Elizabeth, born May 15, 1861; married Joseph Taylor; children—Lester, Annie B. (died in infancy). Annie P., born May 18, 1864; married Eugene H. Gates. Dorothy S., born February 27, 1867. Lydia, born April 9, 1868. Charlotte F., born March 10, 1870. William F., born September 19, 1871. Annie B., born December 27, 1872. Mr. Reifler is in all that the name implies, a self-made man. Coming to this country a boy, with no one to help him to a dollar, he has by industry and good management accumulated a fine property and dwelling; and stands high as a neighbor and business man.

CHAPTER XXV.

PALMYRA TOWNSHIP.

ALTHOUGH one of the original townships, and, prior to the excision of Pike County including in its limits some of the early settlements of the Lackawaxen and Wallenpaupack region, Palmyra as it now exists has been shorn of much of its historical interest by the divisions of territory subsequent to its original formation, and the earliest events that took place in its limits will be found classified in the history of those portions that have since been constituted separate political divisions. Upon the excision of Pike from Wayne County, in 1814, Palmyra was divided into two parts, the Wallenpaupack being the dividing line, and the portion thus set off contained the old Paupack settlement. Again, in 1850, the erection of Paupack township still further limited the area, and Palmyra is now one of the smallest townships in the county. It is bounded on the north by Berlin, on the northwest by Cherry Ridge and Texas, on the southeast by Pike County and on the southwest by Paupack. The Lackawaxen, Middle Creek and the Wallenpaupack have their confluence in its southeastern portion, and the two former streams flow through it. In the western portion the drainage is by means of Swamp Brook, a rivulet that rises in Berlin. Much of the surface is too broken and hilly to be very available for agricultural purposes, though there is fertile soil of alluvial deposits along the valleys of Middle Creek and the Lackawaxen.

The first settlements in all this region were in Pike County, and Wilsonville, for a short time the seat of county government, seems to have been the first hamlet of the township. Occupying a position on what afterwards became the dividing line, its history is closely interwoven with that of both counties, and it is probable that the first houses built in the place were on the Pike County side. Judge James Wilson,[1] then one of the judges of the Supreme Court, was the owner of large tracts of land along the Wallenpaupack, and was led to believe that they were peculiarly adapted to the culture of flax and hemp, and that the manufacture of fabrics would be profitable. About 1792 he commenced the erection of a large factory for this purpose, at a point just above the old tannery site, at Hawley. While this was going up, several houses were built at Wilsonville, and it became a thriving settlement. Judge Wilson's factory was completed in due course of time, and was well built and equipped. Of its size and cost nothing definite is known now, but it has been estimated to have cost from eight to twelve thousand dollars, and to have been from thirty to forty feet square. It was put in operation, and did some work, but failed for want of material. Before he could realize his hopes of success the proprietor himself failed also, and the factory was sold to other parties. It was afterwards burned by Benjamin Kimble and some one else to get the iron used in its construction.

Prior to the building of the factory, Reuben, Alpheus and Alexander Jones and a sister, who was know as Widow Cook, settled below the mouth of Middle Creek. Reuben, as elsewhere related, was captured by the Indians shortly after the battle of Wyoming, and escaped by outrunning his captors in a friendly race. About the time of his settlement Elisba Ames made a clearing on what has since been known as the [1] James Wilson was one of the purchasers of Colonel Jonas Seely's interest in the Indian Orchard tract and, though he subsequently met with financial reverses, was a man of much wealth at this time. He was born in Scotland in 1742, and educated at Edinburgh and Glasgow. At the age of twenty-four he emigrated to America, coming to Philadelphia, where he obtained the position of usher in a college. He studied law, and soon acquired considerable celebrity. He was a member of the Provincial Convention of this State in 1774, and in May, 1775, was chosen a member of the Continental Congress. He was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and was repeatedly re-chosen to Congress. His colonel's commission was obtained at the commencement of hostilities, and, in 1779, he was appointed Advocate-General of France in the United States, an office which he held for three years. He was a member of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, and of the Pennsylvania Convention that adopted it. President George Washington appointed him one of the first judges of the United States Supreme Court, and he was the first Professor of Law in the College of Philadelphia. He died at Edenten, N. C., August 28, 1798.

David Bishop farm, and they were probably the first settlers in Palmyra, Wayne County.

Benjamin Haines (or Haynes, as it is spelled in some of the records) located on the place now occupied by George S. Atkinson soon after this. Haines was a friend, though a despised one, of Tom Quick, the famous Indian killer, whose exploits have been the text for many stories of adventure, and who, if legend is to be given credence, was the principal of a score of atrocious murders. It is stated in another chapter that Reuben Jones was accused of the murder of Canope; but there is another version of his death that makes Haines the guilty one. It is related that after the close of the Revolution, two Indians who had been friendly to the settlers in times gone by, appeared above the Cushutunk settlement on their way down the river to hunt and fish. They were Huycon, better known as Ben Shanks, by reason of his great height and disproportionate legs, and Canope. Canope was much esteemed by the whites, and was one of the best disposed of the Delawares. During the war both had been employed by the emissaries of George III., and when they stated that they were on their way to Minisink, Joseph Ross, of Callicoon, and Josiah Parks, of first raft fame, advised them to keep away from there, as there were a number of desperate men at Minisink, who would get into trouble with them on the slightest pretext. They particularly cautioned the Indians against Tom Quick, who was then at home. Thus advised, Canope and his companion changed their plans, and, cutting across the country, went to Handsome Eddy, where they felt they would be free from molestation. Soon after they arrived they met Ben Haines, who was seemingly very friendly, and at once invited them to stay at his house, which courtesy they accepted. The next morning Haines told them that he was going to Minisink to replenish his supplies of rum and ammunition, and bidding them take care of the family while he was gone, started down the river. He went directly to Tom Quick's house, where he found the Indian slayer, and asked him to come over to the eddy and kill them both, promising to lead the Indians into ambush so that it would be easy work. To this Quick readily assented, and after a plan had been decided on, Haines secured his supplies and returned home. It is said that he coveted the fine furs which the Indians had brought with them.

Among the friends of Tom Quick was one Cobe Chambees, or Shimer (pronounced Shamer), and as it was deemed better to have an accomplice, Tom selected him to assist in the murder. A day or two later they reached Haines' house, and dropped in on the family just as Haines and his guests were about to take breakfast. His crafty confederate did not greet Quick by his right name, but treated him like an entire stranger, though one who was welcome to the rude hospitalities of his cabin, and after the meal had been partaken of, Quick and Chambees passed on up the river toward White Mills, only to sneak back and wait their victims in ambush. Haines proposed to the Indians that they all go fishing, and offered to conduct them to a place where there was good sport, and they consented; though there must have been something in his manner which excited their suspicions, for Canope first required him to give a personal pledge of protection, which Haines did most emphatically. Near where Quick and Shimer were squatting in the bushes were some rocks that ran out into the stream, and thither Ben conducted his Indian guests. After they had fished a few minutes, Canope broke his hook, and as he had no other, reclined in a comfortable position to watch the sport of his companions. This gave Quick the opportunity he wanted, and directing Shimer to aim at Huycon, he drew a bead on Canope. Shimer, who was not accustomed to do such brutal murder, was so unsteady of hand that he missed his man, while Quick sent a bullet through Canope's arm and the back of his head, inflicting serious, though not fatal wounds. Huycon sprang into the bushes and fled, while Canope rushed to Haines and claimed the promised protection. The only reply Haines made was to push the wounded Indian into the water, and snatching a pine knot to beat his brains out with it, exclaiming as he did so, "Tink, tink how you ust to kill white folks! 'pent, 'pent." The broken faith and atrocity of the deed were too much even for so hardened a murderer as Tom Quick, who said as he emerged from his ambush, "Damn a man who will promise an Indian protection, and then knock him on the head." The murder caused the settlers much anxiety, and was loudly denounced on all sides; but its planner and perpetrator was never punished, and it is said that in his later years he often boasted of it.

Haines had several children, and Roger, one of them, afterwards lived in the upper part of the county. That Ben was a poor man is attested by the school records; for in 1811 his children were returned by the assessor as entitled to the benefit of the law of 1809, which made it the duty of the county commissioner to pay for the education of the children of indigent parents. Abraham, Albram and Roger Haines were the first to enjoy schooling at public expense.

In 1803 Jonathan Brink moved from Milford and bought the Haines place. He acquired about nine hundred acres of land, and after living there for some time sold to Joseph Atkinson. Mr. Brink had married Sabra Edwards, of Madison, and brought with him one child, Diana, who married Aaron Godfrey and afterwards Loyal Hutchings, with whom she went to Michigan. Henry, the second son of Jonathan Brink, married Zubie Ainsley, and moved to Binghamton, N. Y. Moses, the third son, married Ann Roberts, and lived at Lackawaxen. Lucinda Brink was the wife of Harvey Bishop, and, after his death, married Abisha Kimble. Janett was the wife of Asa Corwin, of Beech Pond; Amy married Caleb Simmons, of Watertown, N. Y.; Jonathan was united to Rosetta Dexter, and lives at Hawley; Sterry married Charlotte Dexter, and lives at Honesdale, and William died single.

One of the early saw-mills in the township was that erected by Jonathan Brink, on the west side of the Lackawaxen, just below White Mills. His descendants do not know the exact year when it was built, but records show that it was abandoned before 1816, and seem to point to 1805 or 1806 as the date when the first lumber was sawed there.

About 1815 Jason Torrey, Abisha Woodward and Moses Killam bought a tract of land a mile from Hawley, built a frame house and called it New Castle. Here they carried on an extensive lumbering business for several years and then sold the place to Joseph Atkinson, who afterward disposed of it to Russell Daniels. The latter came from Hartford, Conn., in 1824, and married Cynthia Killam. Eight children were born of this union—B. F. Daniels (who married Victoria Dexter), George W. (who married Louisa Beemer and lives at White Mills), Ira (the husband of Margaret Atkinson and a resident of Hawley), Elizabeth (wife of Dennis Slocum), Martin (who married Mary Compton), Electra (wife of John Bassett, of Honesdale), Edward (who married Mary Bailey) and Dighton (who married Fannie Snyder). The last two live in Hawley.

Among those who settled at Wilsonville in the early history of the place was Leonard Labar. Just when he came or from what place he moved is not known. When the courts of Wayne were sent to Wilsonville, in 1802, he was living in a small frame house on the Pike County side of the Wallenpaupack, and afterwards, in 1830, he sold the tavern which he had been keeping and moved to Stroudsburg. There was a grist-mill built on the Wayne County side of the creek, in 1810, which stood until 1850, when it was rebuilt by William Shouse. In 1827 or 1828 Henry Harmon built a small mill near the quarry, between Hawley and Wilsonville, the ruins of which are still standing. It afterwards became the property of John Roberts and Nathan Fuller and was operated by them until about 1850. These same gentlemen bought the Labar property, and it was sold in 1840 as the property of John Roberts. It was bought in by William Shouse, of Easton. John B. Cole rented the saw-mill for three years and then Shouse moved to Wilsonville. Mr. Shouse had four sons,—Jacob, John, Henry and Francis. Jacob located on the Susquehanna, not far from Williamsport, after operating a few years at Wilsonville, with James Mason as a partner. John returned to Easton, as did Henry, who was the victim of a tragedy in Honesdale in 1881. Francis died at Wilsonville.

The saw-mill at Wilsonville has proved to be a very valuable property and has been much increased in capacity during the past twenty years. In 1870 it was bought by William A. Collingwood and Hon. F. W. Farnham, and in 1877 Mr. Farnham sold his interest to G. W. Millard, the firm becoming Collingwood & Co. The present capacity of the mill is forty-five thousand feet per day and about seventy-five men are employed at the saws and log camps. The firm has a large store at Wilsonville.

John R. Compton moved from New Jersey in 1803 and settled on the place where Robert Dycher now lives. He was for many years a constable of the township and was a valued citizen. He had nine children—Robert (who married Caroline Wood, and settled on the old Bethany and Dingman's turnpike), David (who married Jane Evarts, of Pike County, and settled in Berlin township), Dunnin R. (who married Martha Dexter and located in Cherry Ridge), Gehial (who married Maria Smith and settled near Hawley), Mark (whose wife was Elizabeth Garrett, and who lived at Indian Orchard), Susan (the wife of Samuel Kimble, of Honesdale), Lucy (Mrs. Daniel Rattan, of Berlin), Eliza (wife of John Corryelle, of Texas) and Charlotte (now Mrs. Lorenzo Van Buren, of Fishkill, N. Y.)

David Compton lived on the farm just below John R., and was also the father of a large family. In 1846 he sold out his place to John M. Ball and John Decker. Mr. Ball was a Baptist minister from Orange County, N. Y., and was of English descent. He built or owned a saw-mill on Swamp Pond Creek, and was the father of three sons and two daughters, most of whom are living. Henry Ball, proprietor of the Wayne County Hotel, at Honesdale, is the only one of the descendants who lives in Wayne County.

Among the other early settlers of the township were many whose names will be found on the assessment list given below. It was made out in 1801 by Abisha Woodward, and is the oldest one preserved among the county archives.

jacent townships. The early settlers were chiefly lumbermen, and when the timber was cut off, few of them remained to improve the cleared lands. Portions of the hills are still sparsely settled, and the industries of the central town, the canal and the railroads drain the farms of the most energetic young men. Its facilities for manufacturing, its fine water-powers and the rail and water-ways that pass through it are so much superior to the adaptability of the land for agriculture that it must become a great industrial district in the near future.

ROADS.—Palmyra was benefited by roads at an early date. Soon after the Joneses located at the Eddy, a road was cut from the Wallenpaupack settlement by the way of Wilsonville, that crossed the Wallenpaupack Creek by a ford near Henry Harmon's mill, and passed across the flat. There were also a number of early trails leading from the settlement to various townships near by, which, though never laid out as regular public ways, were much used by the pioneers until, by the location of other settlers, they became private property. Most of these trails led into the Jones Eddy road and thus connected the scattered settlers with Bethany and Milford. In 1833 a road was laid out from Paupack Eddy, through what is now Hawley borough, to intersect the Jones Eddy road near Middle Creek. This touched the Little Manor, as the place where John Neldin settled was always called. The township was thoroughly opened up by the building of the Milford and Owego and Bethany and Dingman's Choice turnpikes, and later by the construction of the Delaware and Hudson Canal. It is now threaded by good county roads and several turnpikes.

SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES.—The school at Wilsonville was probably one of the first opened in the township, and was held in an old building that stood about two hundred feet from the saw-mill. Alexander Reed was one of its first teachers, and at that time he had about a dozen pupils. Here Esquire Ephraim Killam and others of the early settlers of the second generation went to school. Another old schoolhouse stands in Hawley, and is now occupied as a paint-shop by J. S. Fowler. It was built in 1823, and opened the following year. Courtland Chapman was one of the first teachers, though not the first. The building was at first merely a plank structure with a slab roof; but afterwards, when it had been abandoned as a school, it was occupied as a dwelling, and the clap-boarding and shingle roof were added. The school law of 1834 was promptly sustained by Wayne County, and in this, as in other townships, schools sprang up rapidly. The old buildings were all erected by private contributions of labor and material, and prior to 1854 there does not seem to have been any building tax levied, at least there is no record of any. Since that date almost all the schools in Palmyra have been rebuilt, and they will compare favorably with those of the other townships. There are four common schools in the township at present, —two on Shanty Hill, a suburb of Hawley, one at White Mills and one at Long Ridge. The value of the buildings is about one thousand dollars each, and four teachers are employed at an average salary of two hundred and twenty-five dollars. The amount of the school tax collected in 1884 was $909.84. The present directors of the township are Samuel Avery, president; Michael Corcoran, treasurer; John Flynn, secretary; William Case, John Manley and Alexander Barrett.

The only churches in the township are in the borough of Hawley, and their histories will be given in the chapter devoted to that locality.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE BOROUGH OF HAWLEY.

THE early history of Hawley is also the early history of Palmyra township, since the first settlements were made in or adjacent to the present borough limits of the town. Shortly after the battle of Wyoming, Reuben Jones, Jasper Parrish, Stephen Parrish and a son of Jacob Kimble, Sr., were taken prisoners by a band of Mohawk Indians, near the Paupack Eddy. Stephen Kimble died while a prisoner, and it was afterwards stated by Reuben Jones that the lad was unable to perform some tasks that his captors assigned, and was tomahawked for his failure. This was denied by Stephen Parrish, however, who said that young Kimble died a natural death, and this version of the story is generally accepted by the Kimble family. Stephen Parrish married an Indian wife, and remained with the tribe until after peace was declared, when he settled in Paupack, and practiced as an Indian doctor. Reuben Jones remained a prisoner for nearly a year, and at last effected his escape by outrunning his captors, with whom he was having a friendly contest of speed. He was a large, powerfully built man, and was considered a fine trophy, and the boastful young braves were in the habit of challenging him to race with them. He was shrewd enough to let them barely beat him many times, and they grew less suspicious of his escaping, after frequent experiences. One day he secretly filled his pockets with dried venison, and challenged one of the swiftest runners to a decisive race. The latter readily agreed, and Jones, who had carefully husbanded his strength, distanced his captor in the first mile, and escaped. He made for the head-waters of the Delaware, and then returned to Paupack Eddy, subsisting, meanwhile, on the venison he had secreted. It was said that Jones and his companion were captured by the treachery of an Indian named Canope, who had always pretended to be a friend of the settlers, and after peace was concluded, Canope was secretly murdered. His death was charged upon Benjamin Haines, the Indian fighter, but the latter always denied it, and Mr. Goodrich, who was personally acquainted with many of the early settlers, says that it was always thought at Paupack that Jones was the one who punished Canope for his duplicity.

So far as it is now known, Reuben Jones and his brothers, Alpheus and Alexander, and a sister, who was known as Widow Cook, were the first settlers at Hawley. They located at the Eddy, just below the mouth of Middle Creek, and were soon joined by Benjamin Haines, who settled not far from where Peter McHale now lives. This property, which has since passed into the hands of George S. Atkinson, was always known as "the Haines' possession."

Soon after this, Robert Hanna built a mill on what was known as the "Little Manor," a tract of eight hundred and ten acres, which, a few years later, became the property of George Neldin, by whom the mill was rebuilt about the beginning of the present century. In 1810, Joseph Atkinson came from the Narrows, and was employed in Neldin's mill. He was a native of New Jersey, and, when quite a young man, had gone to the Narrows to work in a mill built there by Robert L. Hooper, and operated by Esquire Snyder, young Atkinson's grandfather. Joseph Atkinson married Anna, a daughter of Ephraim Kimble, and his children were Eunice, Elizabeth, (wife of Daniel McFarlan;) Lucy, (wife of Charles Weiss,) John Ephraim, George, Asher and Ann (the wife of Joseph Soliday.) Mr. Atkinson was married a second time to Fannie, a daughter of Benjamin Kimble, and of this marriage Amelia, Margaret, Eunice, Marrilla, Elizabeth, Milesia, William, Joseph and Lot were born.

When Mr. Atkinson arrived at the Eddy, as it was then called, Hanna had gone away, and the only settlers were the Neldins, the Joneses and a colored man named Prince Rose, who lived in a hut across the Wallenpaupack. His wife had been a slave, belonging to Dr. Collins, of Cherry Ridge, and was enjoying the first years of her freedom. Rose afterwards went to Wisconsin, but his wife died in Paupack settlement.

In 1812 John Atkinson was born at Neldin's house, and was probably the first white child born in the settlement. In 1820 Neldin erected a large frame house, which was completed in the fall, and became the headquarters for travelers on their way to the Wallenpaupack settlement. This was the first public-house, and, though hardly a tavern in the usual adaptation of the term, answered all the purposes of such until a much later period. It was burned during the progress of an election, in February, 1827, after it had passed into the hands of Mr. Atkinson. Neldin moved to Sussex County, N. J., in 1821, leaving his property in the hands of some of his employees, and, three years later, Joseph Atkinson and David Bishot bought the mill and manor.

During the first two decades of the present century several families settled on the opposite side of the Lackawaxen, as noted in the preceding chapter, and, at the time Atkinson became a proprietor, most of the settlers were in what is now East Hawley, which is not included in the borough limits. Here were the early stores and schools, and Jonathan Brink's house was a general rendezvous for the lumbermen who rafted the output of the mills to Easton and Philadelphia. The first school was held in his log barn, and he supplied such few articles of foreign manufacture as the settlers needed from his cellar and store-house, without the formality of passing them over a counter.

The first matrimonial event was celebrated in the settlement in 1824, just after Atkinson bought the Neldin mill, and was the marriage of Elizabeth Atkinson to Daniel McFarland. It is not known who officiated, and whether it was a civil or religious ceremony, but it was a red-letter day at the mill-house, and guests came from many miles around to help celebrate the event.

The foundation of Hawley's prosperity was laid in 1826, when the first corps of engineers located there to run the line for the Delaware and Hudson Canal. They put up a tent on the hill where the company's office now is, and camped for a week, merrily driving stakes along the river, each one making more certain the growth and activity of the town. The work of construction commenced the next year and brought large accessions to the population. Engineers, contractors and laborers spent money freely, stores sprang up and business flourished. This sudden activity gave the town an impetus that was felt for several years after the canal was finished, and had hardly died away before it was renewed and increased by the construction of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Gravity road. Early in 1827 a large shanty for Irish laborers was built near where Mr. Barker's residence now stands, and its inhabitants were the terror of the settlers for several miles around. Whiskey was plenty, and on pay nights frequent, and sometimes very serious, rows occurred, which the local authorities were powerless to suppress. These are the first acts of lawlessness of which there is any record, and it is to the credit of the town that the citizens finally succeeded in putting a stop to the debauchery, and since that time have had as quiet and orderly a town as can be found in this region.

The first store in Hawley was opened by Jonathan Brink, at what is now the George Atkinson place, in the fall of 1827, and about the same time James Philips opened a store which he ran for two years, until he moved to Milford. With the building of the Milford and Owego pike a demand for hotel accommodations sprang up, and in 1838, Joseph Atkinson opened a tavern near the present lower depot, which became the principal hostelry, and remained so until 1850, when the Eddy House was built, and he took charge of that. A year later he died and the hotel passed into other hands, but its palmiest days were over when he left it. He was one of the most popular landlords in Wayne County, and no guest ever left his house without framing a wish that he might return at an early date.

From 1847, the year the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road was completed,[1] business passed across the river to what is now the borough of Hawley, and the town soon surpassed in population and enterprise the hamlet that had grown up after the opening of the canal.[2] The industries noted elsewhere brought fresh accessions of labor and capital, and labor assumed very respectable proportions. In 1865 the Hawley branch of the Erie was built, and the facilities for the trans-shipment of coal from the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road were much increased. Several miles of siding, the necessary repair-shops, depots and offices, gave employment to many hundred workmen, and many of them remained to become useful citizens. An increased passenger traffic made better hotel accommodations necessary, and the importance of the town was established.

The Keystone Hotel was built by William

[1] See Chapter IV., general history of Wayne County.

[2] In 1850, Francis Oppelt, deputy marshal for the lower part of the county reported, one thousand four hundred and fifty persons. "One year and a half ago it contained less than twenty souls!"—Honesdale Democrat.

Schardt in 1876, and run under his management until 1883, when he sold to Julius Scott, who soon transferred it to J. S. Perine, of Philadelphia, the present owner. Frey & Co. leased it in January, 1885, and in August sold out to C. W. Depew, the present manager. The hotel is a substantial brick building, located in the business portion of the town.

Hawley was incorporated as a borough on the 23d of January, 1884, and the first election was held on the 19th of the following month, the polls being located at the Keystone Hotel. Esquire Ephraim Kellam acted as judge and Gaston W. Ames and Isadore Kastner as inspectors. Hon. James Millham was elected burgess and George Schlager, A. Kimble, Fred. Meisenger, H. P. Woodward, Thomas Maugan and Morveldon Plum, Councilmen. The school directors were John Winess, S. R. Evans, Isadore Kastner, James H. Murphey, Joseph Atkinson and John E. Mandeville. These officers served for one year, and on February 17, 1885, the following was the result of the election: Burgess, Dr. A. C. Dingman; Councilmen, Daniel Jacobs and R. T. Ames, for full term, and E. V. Murray for one year; School Directors, Joseph Atkinson and Manley Oram. At the time the borough was set off from Palmyra township the joint indebtedness was $1088.61, which was divided by Hon. Henry Wilson, master in Chancery, who assigned to the township $319.19, and to the borough $769.42. The present secretary of the Councils is Esquire Ephraim Kellam, a descendant of the Kellams who located in the Wallenpaupack settlement in 1774, and are mentioned in the chapters devoted to Pike County. Esquire Kellam moved to Hawley in 1869, and has become closely identified with the interests of the town. He is one of the justices and is a civil engineer and surveyor by profession. For many years his duties in the latter trend have brought him into intimate relations with the past, and many valuable suggestions in the history of this region have been made by him.

The population of Hawley and its overflow into the territory just without its borough lines is about two thousand four hundred, and it is increasing in size rapidly. Its population is scattered over a considerable area, and the three streams that have their confluence there, divide it into a number of sections, each of which is a small business centre. These are connected by several fine bridges that add much to the picturesqueness of the town, and within a few minutes walk of the depot is the romantic Wallenpaupack, with its beautiful falls. For three miles the stream is a succession of cascades and rapids, and there is power enough undeveloped, if properly applied, to move more machinery than can be found in any manufacturing town in New England. Just below the bridge at Wilsonville, the first fall, which is some seventy feet, occurs, and it was below this that the old saw and grist-mill of the last century was erected by Judge Wilson. A short distance below this is the Sliding Fall, a series of wonderful rapids, broken by many smaller falls. Still farther down are two cascades of about thirty feet each, and below these again the main plunge of sixty-one feet, which is utilized to put in motion the machinery at the Belmont and Nelson mills. The falls of the Wallenpaupack have been a favorite objective point for tourists and excursionists for many years, and at the Belmont mill a lookout has been constructed above the bridge, from which a fine view of the stream is obtained.

Manufacturing Interests.—As has been before stated, the mill built by Robert Hanna was the first industry located at what is now Hawley. The date of its erection is not known, but it was several years before Judge Wilson made his venture with the hemp and flax-factory, in about 1792. This mill was rebuilt by George Neldin, and afterwards passed into the hands of Joseph Atkinson. Neldin owned another saw-mill on Middle Creek, above what is known as the Cold Spring, just outside the borough line. This mill was built about 1818, and operated for several years. Several small smithies were started about this time, but there were no other industries, and the monument of Judge Wilson's failure stood alone, crumbling among the hemlocks, for many years.

Alonzo H. Blish was the first person who attempted to utilize the water-power on the Wayne side of the Wallenpaupack. In 1847

he erected a paper-mill on the property where Taft & Pierson's mill now stands. Several attempts were made to put it in successful operation, and some coarse box paper was made, but the results were unsatisfactory; it was afterwards turned into a powder mill. This, too, proved a failure, and in 1849 the property passed into the hands of John F. Atkins, Joseph Ainsley and Charles T. Taft. Mr. Ainsley fitted it for a sash factory and planing-mill, and rented it for several years. In 1857, Atkinson, Ainsley & Taft erected a grist-mill, which was operated by Atkinson & Taft until 1862, when W. H. Crowley succeeded to the business. He continued for five years, and gave place to Atkinson, Taft & Co., who, in four years more, were succeeded by Pierson & Tuttle. This firm lasted a year, and then Taft & Pierson, the present owners, succeeded to the business. The mill is a substantial structure situated at the foot of Paupack Falls, and has dimensions of thirty-four by sixty-five feet, three and a half stories high, and is provided with all the improved machinery. It has three "run" of stone driven by an overshot wheel twenty feet in diameter. The mill does a general business in flour, feed and meal, and makes a specialty of patent process buckwheat flour, which has gained great popularity in this section.

After Judge Wilson's hemp factory had been burned, the property stood idle for a number of years, and was finally purchased by a Mr. White, who expected to erect a tannery there, but died before carrying out his plans. In 1848, James J. T. Cromwell came to Hawley, and bought the site from Robert Hogan, the executor of the White estate. The tract included thirty-six acres and the water-power.

The tannery was erected the same year, and as it did a good business the plant soon grew to a one hundred and ten vat establishment. In 1857, James Cromwell sold out his interest, and the firm became J. S. & William Cromwell. Under this style it ran for twenty-six years, and employed from twenty-five to thirty men. In 1865 it was burned, and all the stock destroyed, entailing a loss of about fifteen thousand dollars. It was rebuilt the following year, however, and operated until 1882, when Dexter, Lambert & Co. bought out the establishment and enlarged the mill property.

After Joseph Ainsley gave up the planing-mill it was run by Cornelius Buckingham for a while and then was converted into a hub and spoke-factory by John G. Diamond & Son. This firm gave place in turn to that of Cromwell & Diamond, which is at present occupying the place as a planing-mill.

The first boats used on the Delaware and Hudson Canal were built chiefly at Leonardsville and Honesdale, and it was not until 1849, when the increasing prosperity of Hawley made it an important hamlet on the line of the canal, that the boat-building industry developed here. During the summer of that year a contract for twenty boats, costing from fifteen to eighteen hundred dollars, was awarded to Levi Barker, then resident of Honesdale, and he believed that it would be more than profitable to fill it at Hawley. As soon as the water was drawn off the canal basin, in the latter place, he employed twenty men, and by the time navigation opened in the spring the boats were ready for launching. The employment of so many skilled mechanics during a season when most other business was at a standstill proved of much advantage to Hawley, and subsequently the enterprise became a potent factor in the prosperity of the place.

Mr. Barker has always occupied a prominent position in the industry and was also one of the early merchants of the town. Soon after he received the contract above referred to he opened the store now kept by his son-in-law, M. M. Treadwell, opposite the Canal Company's office, and the establishment proved to be a convenient depot of supplies for the boatmen, with whom he built up a large and profitable trade. Mr. Barker is a native of Morris County, N. J., from which place he went to Honesdale in 1848. He married Eliza Jacobus and had three daughters, one of whom died in infancy, the others were Mary, late wife of Gilbert Ludington, of New York City, and Josephine, wife of M. M. Treadwell. At the advanced age of seventy-five he is still hale and an authority on matters pertaining to the industry he established.

Boat-building steadily increased in importance until the construction of the Erie Branch road to Lackawaxen, at which time the Pennsylvania Coal Company ceased to use the canal, and the demand for boats fell off. Since that time the business has steadily declined.

The Hawley Glass-Works is an industry that has grown up within the last few years and become an important factor in the industrial prosperity of the town, employing about one hundred and sixty hands and paying out from sixty to seventy thousand dollars a year in wages. It was started in 1882 as a limited partnership, composed of Wm. F. Dorflinger, Samuel W. Weiss, Henry Z. Russell, F. C. White and Joseph Atkinson. These gentlemen bought a twenty-acre tract of land on Middle Creek and erected works at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars. From the first the business, which is the manufacture of green and amber glass now, proved successful, and subsequent improvements were made. The establishment has now two furnaces, one of five and one of six pots capacity, and melts about eleven tons of "metal" per day. Its store, packing and other buildings are of stone and very completely fitted up, and twenty cottages have been recently erected for the employees of the works. In 1885 the partnership was dissolved and the same members were incorporated under the State laws as the Hawley Glass-Works.

In 1869 J. S. Ames & Bros. erected a large frame mill at the corner of Fifteenth and Seventeenth Streets. The building has three stories and a basement, and is equipped with all modern machinery, driven by a sixty-four horse-power steam-engine. It has four "run" of stone, and a plant of the Brewster refining machinery, used chiefly in the production of the patent process buckwheat flour. In 1883 the firm was changed to J. S. Ames & Co., John H. Ames retiring, and G. W. Ames coming in. This firm has also started a private banking-house, the first in the town. The latter enterprise was put into operation in July, 1885.

The Belmont and Nelson Mills, of Dexter, Lambert & Co., comprise what is by far the most important industry of Hawley, the manufacture of silk goods, and give employment to many hundred women and girls. These mills were erected in 1881, at a cost of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, and occupy a romantic spot on the east side of the Wallenpaupack, just below the lower falls, where the water comes tumbling over the rocks a distance of sixty-one feet. On either side of the creek the banks are fringed with hemlock and laurels, and delicate ferns carpet the rough rocks, and the architecture of the mill is so in keeping with its surroundings that the picturesqueness of the place is increased by its presence. The building is a castellated structure of native stone, laid in ashler blocks, with cut-stone facings, and is built in the form of a Greek cross, so that it has a frontage of three hundred and sixty-four feet and a depth of forty-four feet in the arms, while that of the body is twenty. Just here the rocks that make its foundation slope rapidly down to the flat below, and its three stories at the upper end are increased to five at the lower.

The great natural fall of the stream bed does away with the necessity for a dam, and the water is conducted from one side of the falls to the centre of the mill, where it moves a forty-five-inch turbine wheel with a head of sixty-one feet. This drives all the machinery of the mill and is unfailing at all seasons.

The Nelson Mill, which is just above the Belmont, is part of the same "throwing" plant, and is eighty by forty-four feet and three stories high. Its machinery is driven by a thirty-one-inch turbine wheel. Both buildings are heated by steam and lighted by gas, electricity having been found unadapted to the diffused illumination required at the looms.

The work carried on here is what is technically known as "throwing," which includes all the processes through which hard silk passes after it has been reeled from the cocoon. The latter work is done in Italy and France, from whence the raw material comes. The mill has forty thousand spindles, representing the finest and most complete plant of "throwing" machinery in the world.

Five hundred women and girls, ranging from eight to thirty years, are employed, and the annual disbursement for wages is about eighty thousand dollars. In 1883, in order to more perfectly provide for its employees, the firm erected a large hotel, where the women and girls who have no homes in Hawley may board and be under the care and protection of a matron, who shields them from the temptations that have worked such disastrous results in other mill-towns. This hotel occupies a commanding position on the hill just above the town, and has accommodations for fifty girls. It is commodious, well-appointed and handsomely furnished.

The firm of Dexter, Lambert & Co. is a leading one in the silk business, and has, besides its mills at Hawley, similar establishments in New York and Paterson. Since the erection of the mill a large amount of adjacent property has been purchased, and it is probable that all the mills will be moved to Hawley in time. Mr. W. F. Suydam is the superintendent of both mills, and occupies a handsome residence adjoining the Belmont.

THE POST-OFFICE.—The post-office at Hawley has passed through many vicissitudes since it was first established as Paupack Eddy, in 1837, with James S. Bassett as the first postmaster. He was succeeded by Oren Hall and the office was then located on the west side of the Lackawaxen, in Mr. Hall's residence, and remained there until 1842, when Asher Atkinson received the appointment, and held it for one year, giving place to William C. Conkling, who served until 1847. In that year the office was moved to what is now East Hawley, and the name was changed to Fallsport. Mr. Conkling was reappointed and the new office was located in his store. Here it remained until 1849, when Henry B. Hayes was appointed, and the office went once more to the west side, to be known as Hawleysburgh. With the accession of Patrick Jordan to the postmastership, some years after, the final syllable of the name was dropped, and the office, which had been located in Mr. Hayes' dry-goods store, corner of Fifteenth and Twentieth Streets, was moved to the establishment of Mr. Jordan, on the corner of Fourteenth and Thirty-first Streets. In 1860 Hugh Cole was appointed, and moved the office to the Wayne County House, of which he was at that time proprietor. It remained there but three months, when his appointment was recalled and Joseph Hardenburg succeeded him. Once more the office was moved, this time to a store near the corner of Fourteenth and Eighteenth Streets, to remain until the spring of 1861, when E. Richardson, Jr., was appointed, and took it to Seventh Street, between First and Second. In 1865 it was again moved to the Pennsylvania Coal Company's station, now used as the Erie depot, where it remained for two years and was transferred to the freight depot opposite, Marcus Bishop having been appointed to succeed Mr. Richardson. Mr. Bishop's deputy was George Ammerman, and the latter took the office two years later, and is the present incumbent. In 1871 the Pennsylvania Coal Company built the present post-office, and it was refitted by the postmaster in 1883. Though small, it is conveniently located near the centre of the town, and is well appointed.

In 1851, after the office had been removed to the west side of the river, there was so much dissatisfaction that the government finally established a second office on the east side, and gave it the name of East Hawley. It was located in the Ewen House, and E. Richardson was the postmaster, serving until 1855, when the office was discontinued by Postmaster-General Campbell.

SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES.—In the fall of the year 1822, James Wheeling opened a private school in an old log house, which had been built nearly a score of years before by Jonathan Brink. Wheeling had a dozen pupils, of whom three were returned by the assessor as too poor to pay for their own schooling. The Brinks, the Atkinsons, the Comptons and one or two other families were the most prominent patrons, and employed James W. Barry to carry on the school a second year. It succeeded so well that its patronage continued until the school law was adopted, in 1834. In 1822–23 the school-house now used by J. S. Fowler as a paint shop was built, and the first teacher was either Jesse Goodwin or Courtland Chapman. The school was also kept in operation until the State took hold of educational matters, and the building was one of the first public schools in the township.

Until a very few years ago the common school afforded the only educational facilities in Hawley; but in 1879 an agitation that had been commenced some years before bore fruit in the establishment of a graded school, which now has eight departments. The building is of frame, sixty by ninety feet, with an "L" of the same size, and is two stories high. It is heated by furnaces and otherwise well appointed, and cost seventeen thousand dollars. In the higher department, Latin, science and higher mathematics are taught, and a diploma awarded to those who complete the regular course. The average attendance has been from seven to eight hundred ever since the school was established, and eight teachers are employed. The first principal was L. A. Freeman, who held the position two years, and was succeeded by A. S. Barnes, who remained one year. He was succeeded by E. H. Bottsford, the present principal, who has entered upon his duties for the third term. The present board of directors is as follows: E. Evans, president; Isadore Karstner, Secretary; John Winess,[1] treasurer; Joseph Atkinson, J. H. Murphey, Manley Oram. The tax of the borough for school purposes is about sixteen hundred dollars per annum.

The first religious meetings in Hawley were held in private houses, and probably by some of the early Christian workers whose names are given elsewhere as laborers in the field opened up by the settlement of Wayne County. It is probable that the Baptists were the first to establish regular worship at an appointed time, and this they conducted in the old school-house long before there was any congregation organized. The first religious society in what is now the borough of Hawley was the Paupack Eddy Baptist Church, now the Hawley Baptist Church, and Rev. Henry Curtis, pastor of the Bethany Church, was the first Baptist minister who preached in the town, in January, 1833.

The Paupack Eddy Baptist Church was recognized by a council of ministers from Bethany, Clinton, Damascus and Palmyra Churches convened for the purpose November, 1834. The society had eighteen members,—seven males and eleven females. The next year Mr. John Capron preached to the congregations, the meetings being held in a school-house. On July 9, 1835, delegates were appointed to attend an Association which was to convene in the September following, at Damascus, with a request for admission. Rev. Henry Curtis officiated occasionally from 1833 to 1838, and during this time the total membership, as reported to the Association, was twenty-four. In 1838 Mr. George V. Walling served the church for a part of the time, and in the autumn of 1840, Rev. D. F. Leach, pastor of the church at Ten-Mile Run, divided his labors there with those at Paupack Eddy. Under his care, the church prospered greatly. In the fall of 1843 the total membership was fifty-six, and in 1844 Rev. Mr. Leach resigned.

In 1845 the present church edifice was erected. Mr. Harvey H. Gray, a licentiate from Bridgewater Association, succeeded Mr. Leach. M. M. Everett followed in 1847, and Rev. J. P. Stalbird in 1848. Rev. L. L. Still served one year, from 1852. Rev. Sanford Leach followed Mr. Stalbird, Rev. J. B. Case laboring with him, both dividing their labors between three churches besides this at Paupack Eddy. At the close of the year J. B. Case was chosen pastor, and served until the close of the year 1853. From 1856 to 1861 the Paupack Eddy Church was supplied with preaching from the surrounding Baptist Churches. In May, 1861, Rev. H. Curtis was formally called to the pastorate and continued till the time of his death, in 1867. The first mention of trustees on the records of this church is on April 16, 1865; the trustees then were John Millham, M. W. Cole, George B. Curtis, William Cromwell and John Atkinson. In September, 1870, the name of this church was changed to Hawley Baptist Church. The names of ministers serving this church from 1867 are Elder B. Miller, Elder Earle and his son, I. N. Earle, Elder Bohan, Elder Metler, E. M. Jerold and the present pastor, A. J. Adams. Number of members at present, ninety.

The First Presbyterian Church of Hawley, Pa.—The First Presbyterian Church of Hawley was organized on November 25,

[1] Deceased.

1849, by the Rev. Burr Baldwin, who was laboring as a missionary within the bounds of the Presbytery of Montrose. Those who united with the new organization as members were Isaac Beardslee and Catharine, his wife, Joseph Brown and Laura, his wife, John Newman and Ann, his wife, who presented letters of membership from the Honesdale Presbyterian Church; Alfred Brown joining on profession of faith. On the same day and at the same service Joseph Brown was elected by the church and ordained by the missionary as a ruling elder. The names of the other elders who have served the church since its organization are John Decker, E. G. Coutant, Abraham Eade, John Nyce, S. Z. Lord, Joseph Solliday, Alyn Babcock and M. M. Treadwell, the last five being still in office.

The church has been ministered to by the following pastors and stated supplies: i.e., Rev. E. W. Stoddard, stated supply from December, 1852, to November, 1855; Rev. Henry Van Houton, pastor from January, 1857, to January, 1866; Rev. W. A. Dunning, stated supply for six months, beginning May, 1866; Rev. H. Van Houton then became stated supply and continued to serve in that capacity till 1871; Rev. Wright C. Galpin became stated supply in 1872, serving for five years; Rev. Arthur Folsom next supplied the church for about two years, when the Rev. Charles S. Dunning, D.D., late of Honesdale, accepted an invitation to supply them, discharging the duty for a year and a half.

Mr. W. C. Hawthorn, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Lackawanna, acted as stated supply for nearly two years, up to May, 1883. The present pastor, Rev. R. H. Craig, accepted a unanimous call from the church and congregation, and entered on his labors as a pastor on April 1, 1884. The number of members who have been at any time in connection with the church is one hundred and seventy-two, the present membership being about sixty.

The church property consists of a commodious house of worship free of debt, a fine parsonage standing on the adjoining lot, with garden, barn, etc.

The congregation is in a prosperous condition at the present time, with an active Sabbath-school, a ladies' missionary society, an energetic board of elders and trustees and a devoted pastor.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in November, 1849, by Rev. F. Morse, then pastor at Lackawaxen, Abraham Snyder being the first class leader.

The services were at first held in school-rooms, but later, until the erection and dedication of the present church edifice, during the pastorate of Rev. C. E. Taylor, the society occupied an unfinished brick store, the property of Mr. Bernstein, which, as a hall, was more convenient as a place of worship.

The following-named persons were duly appointed pastors of the Hawley Church, and served in the order in which their names occur: Revs. A. Brooks, J. B. Cooper, C. E. Taylor, C. L. Rice, B. B. Emory, George W. Giddings, L. Cole, N. S. DeWitt, D. A. Shepard, J. F. Wilbur, C. V. Arnold, W. W. Welsh, H. G. Harned, N. S. Reynolds, E. F. Roberts, J. B. Newell, J. F. Williams, P. R. Tower, W. B. Westlake and J. V. Newell for a second term.

The church edifice was erected and dedicated under the direction of Rev. C. E. Taylor; was repaired and enlarged during the pastoral term of N. S. Reynolds, and again repaired and otherwise beautified through the untiring efforts of W. B. Westlake. The repairs of the parsonage are still in progress.

The church grounds and parsonage now constitute a very convenient and really beautiful church property, occupying a quarter of a block in a pleasant locality nearly central in the town.

The society has enjoyed frequent and extensive revivals of religion, and has been usually prosperous and harmonious. The membership is large, considering the population of the town, and the services well attended.

St. Philomen's Roman Catholic Congregation was organized in 1852, by Rev. William O'Hara, at present Right Rev. Bishop of the diocese of Scranton. After a year's work in the field, Father O'Hara was succeeded by Rev. Moses Whitty, now of Scranton, and Vicar-

General of the diocese of that city. Under his ministrations the congregation increased in strength and zeal, and has since started a number of missions in towns adjacent. Father Whitty was, in 1865, succeeded by R. M. Filan, now of the Church of the Annunciation, Philadelphia, who remained but a short time. The next pastor was Rev. B. McCallum, who remained for five years. Toward the close of this period he went on a mission to Rome, and died there. Rev. John P. O'Malley, the present pastor, was his successor. During the ministration of Rev. Father Whitty the present church edifice was erected. At that time it was ample for the congregation, but now it is inadequate, and will be pulled down and replaced with an imposing stone structure at an early date. The societies attached to St. Philomen's are the Catholic Benevolent Association, an insurance organization for members of the faith. The Compatriots of the Holy Rosary, Sodality and Father Mathew Societies. The latter are devoted to the furtherance of good morals. Attached to this congregation are the missions of St. Mary's, at Ledgedale; St. Joseph's, at White Mills; St. Patrick's, at Milford; and St. Mary's of the Assumption, at Lackawaxen, each of which is referred to in the chapter devoted to the locality where it is situated

The German Evangelical Church of Hawley was founded by a number of German families in 1853. Among its first members were Father Warj, Jacob Keller, Geo Schlager, Geo. Grosbinder, John Dittman and Fred. Vicines. The first pastor was Rev. Fred. Baur Tellee, under whom the church was commenced in 1859. In 1860 Rev. Mr. Frankfort was called, and under him the edifice now in use on Church Street was completed. It cost four thousand dollars, and was built without contracting a debt. The present pastor, Rev. John U. Wagner, was called in 1873, and under his ministration the congregation has been considerably enlarged. The present membership is nearly two hundred. The congregation is an independent one, subject to no synod, and its teachings are "liberty of belief and conscience, with rational and scientific interpretation and application of the Bible, and the basis of happiness, the moral universal, commenced by Moses and perfected by Jesus Christ."

There is a flourishing Sunday-school with eighty or ninety scholars connected with the church.

Lodges, Fraternities, Etc.—The Hawley Lodge, No. 2207, Knights of Honor, was instituted May 7, 1880, by G. L. Field, D. G. D., with the following list of twenty-five charter members: Officers,—F. H. Hardenburgh, P. D.; M. M. Treadwell, D.; H. Reafler, V. D.; J. K. Terwiliger, A. D.; D. Daniels, R.; P. Davis, F. R.; M. W. Simons, T.; William Bigart, C.; M. Turner, Guide; S. S. Speers, G.; J. Decker, S. Members,—H. P. Woodward, L. Phillips, G. W. Lake, F. B. Pellett, E. H. Demming, H. A. Plum, S. Avery, F. Nell, M. Oram, W. H. Mills, J. L. Ford, A. B. Haperman, J. T. Rodman, Wm. Decker.

The lodge has distributed to its beneficiaries four thousand dollars upon the death of two of its members. It has grown to a membership of sixty; is in a flourishing condition, and ranks well with the organizations of the day.

Hawley Lodge, No. 305, F. and A. M., was organized 1857, with the following charter members: Wm. L. Hawley, Stewart, Oscar Freeman, Henry J. Tarball, Edward M. Spencer, George F. Wilber, Emery Teusdrell, James Balf, Gilbert Alexander, William Hapemam, E. A. Esterline, John Spencer, G. H. Hardenburgh, Randal Williams, A. Griswold and David Bishop. The following officers were elected for the year 1885, and installed on St. John's Day, 27th of December, 1884: Brother Walter J. Shelly, W. M.; Gaston W. Nanes, S. W.; Isador H. Levine, J. W.; John H. Ames, Treasurer; Wm. D. Curtis, Secretary. Trustees, Wm. L. Overton, Morvelden Plum and Wm. D. Curtis. Past Masters, Wm. D. Curtis, N. R. Harkins, James Millham, John J. Baisden, John H. Ames, William L. Overton, Morvelden Plum, James T. Rodman, Mordecai W. Simons, Reuben T. Ames, H. A. Plum, Isador Kastner, Wm. A. Gregg, Wm. Schardt, M. M. Teedwell.

Lackawaxen Lodge I. O. O. F., No. 667, was instituted at Hawley, May 18, 1869, with the following officers: M. Kellerman, N. G.;

M. Reafler, V. G.; G. Hittinger, R. C.; Charles Schardt, A. S.; Frederick Nell, Treasurer. There were nineteen charter members, and the meetings are held each Monday night, at Teeter's Hall. The lodge owns property to the amount of twenty-four hundred dollars, and is in a prosperous condition. The present officers are Frederick Schalm, Jr., N. G.; John Rominger, V. G.; C. Buck, R. C.; John Weinss,[1] A. S.; R. Teeter, treasurer.

Wayne Council, No. 127, of the American Legion of Honor, was instituted March 19, 1880, with the following officers: James Rodman, Commander; F. B. Pellett, Vice-Commander; George M. Wilson, Past Commander; E. R. Kalbfus, Chaplain; H. A. Plum, Medical Examiner; Jacob Heiss, Collector; George M. Wilson, Treasurer; E. H. Hemming, Secretary; J. E. Mandevill, Orator; J. S. Hecker, Guide; G. C. Blossom, Warden; A. L. Bishop, Sentry. There were twenty-four charter members, and the fraternity has increased largely. Only one death has occurred in this council.

The present officers are Samuel Geary, Commander; John Bell, Vice-Commander; G. W. Buckland, Chaplain; H. A. Plum, Medical Examiner; G. W. B. Allen, Collector; Simeon Brink, Treasurer; Asher Atkinson, Secretary; James Keen, Guide; J. M. Owen, Warden; and Lewis Barnard, Sentry.

The Hawley Mannerchor was organized February 5, 1874, with the following charter members:

R. Warg, Sr.	John Weinss.
M. Reafler.	Frank Schroeder.
Alexius F. Voigt.	H. Reafler.
Ch. S. Gelbert.	Fr. W. Schalm.
Wm. Lyon.	John Glass.
V. Gilbert.	Fred. Nell.
August Brunner.	Ph. Hein.
Jacob Zeller, Sr.	G. Barhon.
John Kellerman.	C. Burk.
John Hoehn.	Jacob Siedler.
Ernst Vogler.	Jacob Schmidt.
John Threlcke.	Fr. Seidler.
Wm. Schardt.	Ch. H. Schardt.

The society owns a fine park on the mountain, just outside of the town, and has it fitted up for musical and social events. The present officers are F. W. Schalm, president; H. Reafler, vice-president; R. Warg, secretary; John Glass, treasurer; J. H. A. Peterson, conductor; G. Albrecht, archiver (librarian). The society meets for practice every Thursday evening in Snyder's Hall.

A Father Mathews Society was organized in Hawley in March, 1878, with a membership of twenty-five, which increased in two months to forty-five. It continued to flourish until the autumn of 1883, when there was a split in the society, and the dissenters formed a new society in what is now outside of Hawley borough. In the spring of 1884 the society proper changed into a Literary Society, having now a membership of forty, with the following-named officers, to wit: President, P. H. McAndrew; Vice-President, E. J. Richardson; Corresponding Secretary, T. F. Kelly; Receiving Secretary, P. Neylon; Treasurer, William M. Slattery; Sergeant-at-Arms, M. J. Howley. Meetings first and third Sundays in each month at Kimble's Hall; public entertainments by the members about twice a year. Several temperance societies have existed for brief periods in Hawley; at present the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the only society for carrying forward the work of temperance reform.

Journalistic Ventures in Hawley.—On May 23, 1851, a weekly paper was started in Hawley called The Hawley Chronicle, being edited and published by Robert Denton, who had been connected previously with the Journal at Ellenville, N. Y. It was neutral in politics and religion. It was in folio form, the size of each page being fifteen and a half by twenty-one and three-quarters inches. Subscription price, $1.50 per annum. Mr. Denton continued its publication to October 10, 1851 (or until the general election of that year), when the publication ceased for want of sufficient support—the circulation being about four hundred copies. Mr. Denton went from Hawley to Addison, N. Y., where he started a paper called the Addison Journal. In September, 1881, he was still alive and residing at Jersey City Heights.

The second attempt to publish and maintain a paper in Hawley was made by Chas K. Beardslee, formerly publisher of a German paper in Honesdale. In August, 1863, he removed the press and material, which had been used on the German paper, from Honesdale to Hawley, and fitted up an office with its aid, and on the 4th of September, 1863, issued the first number of a weekly paper called the Hawley Free Press. It was published in quarto form (eight pages), each page being nine by twelve and a half inches. Mr. Beardslee continued as editor until December 1, 1883, when he sold out to Jacob Smethers, who, on January 1, 1884, changed its form to a folio of six columns to the page, each page being fourteen by nineteen and a half inches. The subscription was $1.50 in advance, or two dollars at the end of the year. On the 6th of February, 1864, Mr. Smethers sold out to F. A. Dony, who continued its management until June, 1865, when he sold to C. B. Cotter. Mr. Cotter had charge of it until February 9, 1866, when Mr. Dony again became its manager, and after issuing three numbers in that month, suspended its publication. He then removed the press, type, etc., to Honesdale, and there commenced the publication of the Eleventh District Monitor. The entire period of the publication of the Free Press was two and a half years, during which time it changed properties four times.

The next attempt to start and maintain a paper in Hawley was in 1874, by H. P. and F. P. Woodward, who, on the 18th of September, issued the first number of a weekly paper called The Hawley Times. It was a folio sheet, with seven columns to the page—each page being fifteen and a half by twenty-one and a half inches, with the subscription price two dollars in advance. The Times was published by the Woodward Brothers until the close of the first volume (September 18, 1875), when H. P. Woodward sold out his interest to his brother, Frank P., who continued to publish it until June 30, 1876, and it was then suspended. In August, 1876, H. P. Woodward again started it. The paper was reduced in size to a six-column folio—each page being thirteen and a half by nineteen and a half inches—and the subscription price reduced to $1.50 per year in advance. On the 13th of September, 1878, the paper was restored to a seven-column folio, and continued until October 13, 1882, when it was enlarged to an eight-column paper—each page being eighteen by twenty-four inches. The Hawley Times was published by H. P. Woodward until January 1, 1885, when the paper was sold to Herbert W. Wagner, who is the present proprietor and publisher.

LEVI BARKER.

His father, John Barker, a native of Connecticut, spent his active business life on Long Island, and was a boat-builder. He erected the first house ever built on Coney Island, a part of which is standing in 1886. John Barker's wife, Hannah Berlin, who died in 1855, at the great age of ninety-nine years, bore him the following children: Mary, wife of Samuel Tredwell, of Hempstead, Long Island, where both died; Polly, married Richard Denyce, of Gravesend, Long Island; Joseph went aboard a privateer during the War of 1812 and was never heard from since; William was a seafaring man, was captain of a wrecking vessel off Florida Reef, and died in New York; Sarah first married Abram Van Syckel, and after his death became the wife of Cornelius Vanderbilt; Eliza married Albert Palmer, of New York; Jane married Silas Ficket, of Alexandria, Va.; Levi, subject of this sketch; and John who came to Hawley with his brother Levi, and was engaged in boat-building until his death, which occurred in 1881, at the age of sixty years. He left a widow and one daughter. The father of these children died in 1821. Levi Barker, son of John Barker, was born at Jericho, Long Island, February 9, 1810. He had very limited opportunities for any education from books, but his early impressions, gained through necessity, of industry and economy as necessary to success in business, came to be of great value to him, and gave him practical ideas and good judgment which characterized his life's work. As a boy, he began learning boat-building with his father, but completed his education on this subject by serving a term of four years with Alderman Buckmaster, a boat-builder of New York City. In 1832 he went to Montville, N. J., where he engaged in building boats on his own account, for use on the Morris Canal, and continued this business there until 1848, when he came to Honesdale, Wayne County, and worked at his business for one year. In 1849 Mr. Barker settled at Hawley, where he has been constantly engaged since in the construction of boats for the Pennsylvania Coal Company, and the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, and in mercantile business. For these two companies he has constructed some three hundred and fifty boats, at a value of about fifteen hundred dollars each, and even at his advanced age oversees his workmen and superintends his boat-building works with the same anxiety and care that he did when much younger in years.

Mr. Barker opened a store at Hawley for general mercantile business about 1855, which he has personally managed until recently, the management of which is now mostly in the hands of his son-in-law, M. M. Treadwell, Esq. Besides his other business he has dealt somewhat in real estate, has built several residences, and owns and occupies the residence first built on the east side of the Lackawaxen.

He is one of the few men who have encouraged the various enterprises that have contributed to the growth and prosperity of Hawley, and from straitened circumstances as a boy he has, by his own honest industry, obtained a fair competency. He married, in 1835, Eliza Hiler, of Montville, N. J., who was born April 1, 1817. Her father, Peter Hiler, died in 1837. Her mother, Charity (Collard) Hiler, died in 1847. She has two sisters,—Ellen married a Mr. Cassidy, of Essex County, N. J., and resides at Dundee, Mich., and Jane married a Mr.

L. Barker

Slingerland, of Montville, where she died, leaving one son. Of the seven children of Levi and Eliza Barker, only two grew to mature years, viz.: Mary (1845–72), was the wife of Gilbert Luddington, of Carmel, N. Y., and died leaving one child, Joseph Barker Luddington; and Josie married, in 1875, M. M. Treadwell, a native of Ipswich, Mass. He is the son of Nathaniel and Emeline C. (Jewett) Treadwell, the former a boot and shoe manufacturer, who died in 1857. His paternal grandfather, Nathaniel, a sea captain, commanded a privateer in the War of 1812, and was one of the prisoners confined in Dartmouth Prison. After the release he went to sea, but was never after heard from. His great-grandfather was of English birth.

On account of the death of his father he was compelled, when only a boy, to do for himself. Upon the breaking out of the late Civil War, Mr. Treadwell enlisted at Boston, in the Twelfth Massachusetts, and served in various positions until the close of the war. He came to Hawley, Pa., from Boston, in August, 1869, and was in the employ of the Pennsylvania Coal Company until he took charge of his father-in-law's mercantile interests in 1876. He read law with E. Richardson, Esq., of Hawley, and was admitted to practice in 1883.

JACOB S. AMES.

Jacob S. Ames, merchant, banker and miller, of Hawley, Pa., was born in Canaan township, Wayne County, Pa., June 26, 1830. His boyhood days were spent on the home farm and attending the district school. At the age of seventeen, resolving to carve out a competence and home for himself, he began work for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company for the daily wages of eighty-one cents. After nine months he went to Hawley, where he was engaged on the Gravity Railroad until it was completed. For three years following the completion of the road he ran a stationary waterwheel for drawing the cars up the inclined plane at Station No. 15, on the Gravity Railroad, and for the next three years thereafter he was employed at Hawley to run the stationary power there. By this time, by economy and prudence, he had saved from his earnings sufficient to embark in business for himself, and for five years he engaged in buying cattle and sheep in Illinois, Ohio and Pennsylvania, and at first drove them to Eastern markets, but subsequently shipped them by rail to New York and Boston. In 1861 he quit droving, and opened a general mercantile house at Hawley, which he has continued since, a period of twenty-five years. In 1872 he built his present steam grist-mill in the borough, where the farmers in the surrounding country find ready sale for their grain or have it prepared for home consumption. On July 28, 1885, Mr. Ames established a private bank (the first of any bank being located in Hawley), which, together with the mercantile business, are mostly conducted by his son, Gaston W. Ames. About 1870 he engaged largely in the lumber business; rebuilt one steam saw-mill and one water-power saw-mill in Paupack township, Wayne County; purchased large tracts of timber land in Palmyra, Paupack, Lake and Salem townships; and, after clearing off large quantities of the timber and manufacturing it into lumber, he sold several hundred acres of this land for farming purposes, yet retaining some two thousand acres to himself. His annual sales have averaged five million feet of lumber, which has been marketed mostly in Philadelphia, New York and Newark. Although only twenty-five years in established business, Mr. Ames has given to Hawley and surrounding country as much enterprise and labor to those classes depending upon work for their livelihood as any other citizen in the community. His honorable purpose in life's work, his integrity in his business and his sterling habits make him esteemed by all who know him. He married, October 26, 1854, Harriet N. Woodward, of Paupack township, Wayne County, who was born March 7, 1836. Their children are Gaston W. Ames, merchant and banker, before mentioned; Helen Augusta (1856–78) and Hattie Florine (1875–80), both deceased. Mrs. Ames' father, Amasa L. Woodward (1806–78), was a resident of Paupack township, Wayne County, and was the son of John Woodward, of Cherry Ridge township, where Enos Woodward was one of the first settlers. Amasa L. Woodward was a cousin of the late Judge Woodward, of Wilkesbarre, and belonged to the same family as the late Judges Warren J. and George W. Woodward, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, whose ancestors were also among the first settlers of Cherry Ridge township. Mrs. Ames' mother, Irene R. Kellam (1809–64), was a native of Paupack settlement, on the Wallenpaupack, where the family settled during the early days of the county. The children of Amasa L. and Irene R. Woodward are Helen, deceased; Melissa, wife of John H. Ames, of Hawley; Harriet, wife of Jacob S. Ames, subject of this sketch; Adelia; Robert Bruce (resides on the homestead in Paupack township, Wayne County); Moses, deceased; Ellen, deceased; and Cassius H. Woodward, a leading grocer at Hawley. Mrs. Ames' maternal grandfather was Moses Kellam, Esq. (1792–1862), a prominent and esteemed citizen, who was justice of the peace at Paupack settlement for many years, and a county surveyor. The father of Jacob S. Ames —Joseph Ames—(1790–1849) was a native of North Stonington, Conn., and came to Cherry Ridge township in 1814. He was a teacher, and taught here several terms. About 1815 he bought some two hundred acres of land, where Canaan Corners are now located, and there made the first clearing. Subsequently he settled about one mile east of the Corners, where he owned some one hundred and fifty acres of land, where he spent the remainder of his days. He belonged to the old Whig party, and most of his descendants are Republicans. His wife, Gertrude, a daughter of Colonel John H.

J. S. Ames

Schenck, was born in 1793, and, in 1886, resides at Somerville, N. J. She is a woman of high moral character and Christian excellence, and instructed her children in all that makes true manhood and womanhood. Colonel Schenck came from German ancestors, early settlers in New Jersey, of whom many may be found in Somerset and Monmouth Counties, in that State, and was an officer in the Revolutionary War. He was one of the early settlers of Cherry Ridge township, from Millstone, Somerset County, N. J., and subsequently removed to Canaan Corners, where he died. Gertrude Schenck is an own cousin, on her father's side, of the late Theodore Frelinghuysen, who ran for Vice-President with Henry Clay on the Whig ticket, in 1844. The children of Joseph and Gertrude (Schenck) Ames are Erasmus D., died in Somerset County, N. J., in 1873; Nelson W., died in Mattoon, Ill., in 1883; Eliza H. Ann, first married A. G. Anderson, of Dundee, Scotland, and, after his death at Dubuque, Iowa, she married Joseph Annin, of Liberty Corners, Somerset County, N. J.; Caleb T., died at the age of fourteen years; George R., of Elk Falls, Kan.; Clarissa K., wife of John Clawson, of Somerville, N. J.; Henry C., on the old homestead in Canaan township; Jacob S., subject of this sketch; John H., a merchant at Hawley; Reuben T., in business at Hawley; and Sarah Denton, wife of John Stryker, of Somerset County, N. J.

The grandfather of Jacob S. Ames—Joseph Ames, of North Stonington, Conn.—was a private in the Revolutionary War, and, upon the breaking out of that memorable struggle, his patriotism led him to leave his plow and join the Continental army.

Nearly the whole Ames family of North Stonington remained there and spent their lives in their native place. The Hon. E. B. Ames, ex-judge of the courts of Minneapolis, Minn., and ex-minister to Germany during President Pierce's administration, is a cousin of Jacob S. Ames, and his father was William Ames, who settled in Rockford, Ill.

Judge E. B. Ames was the law-partner, at Springfield, Ill., of Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, candidate for President of the United States in 1860. The Ames family in Wayne County, Pa., are of the same stock as the late Bishop Ames, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the religious persuasion of the family is of the same church. They are of English origin, and the Schencks of Holland extraction.

JAMES MILLHAM.

James Millham, merchant, of Hawley, Pa., was born near Newton, Sussex County, N. J., August 1, 1832, and is the son of John and Charity (1804-80) Roof Millham. John Millham, born May 11, 1804, near Newton, removed from Sussex County with his family and settled on a farm one mile east of Hawley, in Pike County, on the Milford and Bethany turnpike, where his wife died. He was a blacksmith by trade, but since his removal has carried on farming and blacksmithing. His children are Caroline, wife of Alexander Tuttle, of Hawley; George, of Creeklock, Ulster County, N. Y.; James, subject of this notice; Eliza J., wife of William Cromwell, of Hawley; Mary; Allen S., of Hawley; and Joanna, wife of S. T. Wells, of Hawley. Morris Millham, grandfather of James, died near Hawley, whence he had come from Dover, N. J., at about the age of fifty-six years. His maternal grandfather, Jacob Roof, came from Holland, served in the Continental army during the Revolutionary War, and settled in Sussex County, N. J., where he was a farmer at Paulenskill, raised a large family of children and died there.

James Millham, like most of the boys of a half-century ago, started out in life without home assistance, but with resolution and a purpose to accomplish something. He had obtained only the limited book knowledge to be gathered in the district school. At the age of twenty he began a clerkship in the store of William C. Conkling, an old and respected merchant of Hawley, where he remained for two years. He then spent a short time as clerk for Ira Daniels; when he engaged as clerk in the store of Joseph Solliday, of Hawley, where he remained for four years. In 1857, himself and J. T. & W.

Cromwell bought out the store of Mr. Solliday, which they successfully carried on for three years, when Mr. Millham sold out his interest to his partners, but remained with them as salesman for two years thereafter, and until 1862, when he was appointed by Samuel Oliver, of Easton, Pa., assistant assessor of internal revenue for a part of Wayne County. This lower branch he served on the several committees—elections, compare bills, iron and coal companies, printing and elections.

In 1864 Mr. Millham opened a store for general mercantile business at the Erie depot, in East Hawley, which, together with his lumber interests in connection with Mr. Solliday for a few years, he has continued to carry on since.

James Millham

place was held by him until a change in the administration, in 1866, but he was reappointed in 1868 by General Selfridge, of Bethlehem, Pa., and held the office until 1870. He was elected a justice of the peace at Hawley, and served in that capacity from 1870 to 1875, and he served as school director for the year 1880. In the fall of 1880 he was elected to the State Legislature from his district on the Republican ticket and served one term, and while a member of the

He is an active and thorough-going business man, and has identified himself with the growth and prosperity of Hawley, and interested himself in its educational and other kindred works. In the spring of 1860 he married Mary Dunlap, of Hawley, who was born June 17, 1842. Her father, James Dunlap, born in Scotland in 1804, and residing with Mr. Millham in 1886, was brought up in Edinburgh, where his father was a merchant; resided in Glasgow for a short time, but in June, 1821, came, via Canada, to New York, where he was engaged as a mason on the Croton Aqueduct. He worked at his trade on the construction of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, and since 1847 has been the mason for the Pennsylvania Coal Company at Hawley. His wife, Sarah Rexian, died in 1863, and bore him the following children: Elizabeth, wife of Andrew C. Bryden, of St. Louis; Mary, wife of James Millham; John (deceased); and Sarah, wife of Robert Bryden, of Carbondale, Ill. The family resided in Hawley since Mr. Dunlap's business relations began with the Pennsylvania Coal Company. James Dunlap has a brother who came to this country with him and remained in Canada, where he carries on farming and is a large cattle dealer, and shipper to New York and other Eastern markets. The children of James and Mary Millham are Eva J., wife of Wilson D. Decker, of Dunmore, Pa.; Sarah E.; and Lucy Millham.

CHAPTER XXVII.

PAUPACK TOWNSHIP.

ALTHOUGH composed chiefly of territory lying in the immediate vicinity of the old Wallenpaupack settlement in Pike County, and penetrated by pioneers almost coeval with those of the earliest townships in the county, Paupack did not have a separate civil existence until the year 1850, when, on petition of the inhabitants of the southwestern portion of Palmyra for better election facilities, the excision took place at the September Term of the Quarter Sessions. By the lines then run it is bounded on the northwest by Cherry Ridge, northeast by Palmyra, southeast by the Wallenpaupack and west by Salem and Lake townships. Its early settlers did not find that the land was as arable as that in adjacent townships, and its growth has been exceedingly slow. Forty or fifty years ago, when the turnpikes that passed through it were main arteries in the commercial activity of the county, its hamlets were considered important locations, destined to be towns of prominence; but the competition of Hawley and Honesdale drew its enterprises from it, and the township has naught left to depend upon but lumber, that is being rapidly exhausted, and the cultivation of its stony and not very fertile soil. Most of the lands in the northern and eastern portions are unimproved, while parts that have been cleared up along the Wallenpaupack have been allowed to grow up in brush and scrub timber. A portion of the western part of the township was in the dark and dreary swamp known as "The Shades of Death," and low, wet bottoms are common along the lake line. The township is well watered and on the streams that lead from Goose, Long and Purdy's Ponds are some good mill-sites. Through the northeastern section the Middle Creek flows, and the Wallenpaupack, which forms about one-third of the township boundary, is a deep, slow-moving and navigable stream for small steam-boats from Wilsonville to Ledgedale. Before the French and Indian War a man named Carter had settled at Wallenpaupack, and though he and his family were murdered and his house was burned, his place of settlement always remained a post on the route from Connecticut to Wyoming. Later a number of emigrants to the latter place located there, abandoning their first plan of going on to the lovely valley of the Susquehanna, and a log fort was erected, which served as a refuge for settlers and emigrants alike. The road to Wyoming was a path through the woods of Paupack marked by blazed trees, and it was the custom of the emigrants to send a party in advance a day's journey to the top of Cobb's Mountain, where at eventide a fire was kindled which could be seen by those in the fort, and was the signal that the advancing party had traversed the distance in safety, and would await the coming of their companions. This signaling was made the more practicable, because "the oak woods," as it was afterwards called, had been quite recently burned by the Indians, and was so cleared up "that a deer was visible as far as the eye could see."

Silas Purdy and his family were the first settlers who located in the then unbroken wilderness on the west side of the Wallenpaupack, having come from Kingston, N. Y., by the way of Cushutunk and the Wallenpaupack settlement, in what is now Pike County, in 1783. He was surrounded on all sides by dense forest, his location was isolated, and the difficulties and hardships which he and Hannah, his wife, had to endure were even greater than those which fell to most pioneers. Little by little he extended the clearing on which he had erected his modest cabin and sowed the seed corn which he brought on his back from the Wallenpaupack. Farm implements were crude and unadapted to the conditions under which they had to be used, and were scarce withal. The virgin soil was broken by a rude plow borrowed from a settler at Wilsonville, and until the first crops were ripe the family lived on game, that abounded on every side. But under all the unfavorable conditions he prospered, and raised a large family of stalwart sons and capable daughters. Jacob, the oldest son, was the first blacksmith in the township, and after working at his trade for many years, emigrated to the lake country, in Western New York, at the age of forty. The second son, Ephraim, was also of a mechanical turn of mind, and built the first grist-mill, which was patronized by the settlers at Salem, Canaan and all along the Lackawaxen River. It was located at the outlet of Hallock Pond, and, although it was built toward the close of the last century, decayed timbers still mark its site. Amos and Isaac, two other sons, emigrated to Ohio, and settled on the Connecticut Reserve. Nicholas, Marshal, Fannie (the wife of S. C. Purdy) Chester (who lived at Cincinnati) and Peter were also children of Silas. The homestead descended to the last-named, and is still occupied by his descendants. The old stone chimneys are still standing and mark the site of what was a pretentious house for that time. It was located on the old road from Milford by the way of Blooming Grove to Hezekiah Bingham's, and thence through Purdyville to Cherry Ridge and the North and South road, which it intersected near Asa Stanton's. For many years a tavern was kept in the old house, and it was looked upon as the most important business location in the township.

Elder William Purdy, a cousin of Silas, was of Connecticut origin, having been born in Fairfield County. In 1769 he married Rachel, a sister of Silas Purdy, and soon afterward moved to New York State, residing for some time at "Nine Partners," in Dutchess County. Afterward he moved to New Marlborough, where he was baptized on profession of faith by Rev. Jacob Drake. He settled at Pleasant Valley, and was soon ordained a deacon of the church there, and was subsequently licensed to preach. In 1793 he moved with his family to Paupack, and settled about two miles west of Silas, on lands that had been taken up two years previous. He erected a house of hewn logs, and aided by his sons commenced clearing up a farm. He immediately commenced preaching, too, and his labors soon extended to the surrounding settlements. A number of his own family were converted, and soon the interest in religious life was so strong that the Palmyra Baptist Church was organized, and he was made its pastor. His ministerial labors were not confined to this church and its dependencies. Following the rough road over the Moosic Mountain, he carried the Word all through the Lackawanna and Wyoming Valleys. He continued the esteemed pastor of the Palmyra Church for nearly a quarter of a century, laboring without stated salary, and sustaining his family by his own exertions, and died in 1824, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He had a family of six boys and two girls. Reuben, the eldest son, lived adjoining his father, and as a licentiate filled the pulpit in his father's absence. He was also for many years a justice of the peace, and died in 1855, aged eighty-two. His son, Reuben R. Purdy, was at one time a county commissioner in Wayne. Darius G. Purdy, another son, is the postmaster, and one of the most prominent residents of Purdyville at the present time.

Solomon Purdy, a second son of the elder, occupied lands adjoining his father on the north, and was a prosperous farmer, devoted to hunting and fishing, and beloved by all as a pleasant companion and excellent sportsman. He lived to be eighty years old. James, the third son, who first settled east of his father, afterwards bought a farm on the Lackawaxen, near Paupack Eddy, where he spent his last days, living to be seventy. William, the fourth son, entered the Baptist ministry, and preached for many years to the church in Bethany, where he also resided. He afterwards removed to Ohio. Ebenezer, who was the fifth son, died in the prime of life. He owned a farm near that of Solomon. Abner was the youngest in the family, and he also moved to Ohio, where he died in 1881, in the ninety-second year of his age.

The Purdys had very few neighbors during the early history of the township, and for many years the family comprised nearly all the prominent residents. Major John Ansley moved from the Wallenpaupack settlement and located about two miles below Silas Purdy's, where he kept a hotel on the old Lake Country road. His son Mifflin inherited the property. Mifflin was the victim of an epidemic, very malignant in character, that made its appearance in the township in 1831 and caused much alarm. It was at first thought to be cholera, but was afterwards known as camp fever. Brinson, a cousin of Mifflin, was also a victim.

Samuel Hartford appears on the assessment list as a resident of Palmyra, but he lived in Salem, near the township line, and an account of him will be found in the chapter devoted to that township.

Ambrose Buckingham, who came from Saybrook, Conn., in 1825, also settled near the line between Paupack and what is now Lake. He was one of five sisters and brothers, all of whom, with one exception, settled in various parts of Wayne County. In 1827 Mr. Buckingham married Miss Mahala Keller, of Salem, and exchanged his farm for one hundred acres in Paupack township. Here he resided for fifty years, and his untiring industry summoned waving fields and blooming orchards from under the shadows of the beeches. He was a keen thinker, had clear judgment and was respected by all who knew him as an earnest, honest man. He died in 1877, and was buried in the family plot on the farm. His children were Jane G., the wife of A. G. Smith, of Paupack; Olive, who died in 1831; Fidelia, the late wife of A. B. Vandervort, of Newark, N. J.; Susan, the wife of Major M. Wardell, of Daleville; Jasper; Eunice S., who married George Chapman, of Salem; Adaline M., the wife of Louis Andrews, of New York; Ambrose H.; and Emma May, the latter an authoress, of whom mention is made in the chapter on bibliography.

Uriah Williams, a lineal descendant of Roger Williams, lived in Paupack many years; his wife was a Hewitt, and George Williams, one of their sons, lives on the homestead. John H., another son, lives at Nobletown, and others of his children have removed West.

The following names appear on one of the first assessment lists made out after the erection of the township:

Easter Ansley.	Hermon N. Kimble.
Jonas Ansley.	Benj. T. Killem.
Oliver Buckingham.	John Lonlasher.

An Indian Camping-Ground.—When the Purdys first located in Paupack there were many signs of a recent occupation of the country by the red men, and relics were plenty. About one-half mile south of the farm now occupied by Sylvanus Purdy, in a retired place but a few rods from the main road, an even spot, two or three acres in extent, was cleared and made perfectly smooth. On this were found many traces of its having been a flourishing Indian village at no very distant date. Flints dressed for arrows, a stone broad-axe, a stone gouge, tomahawks, flint knives and bits of clay pots were scattered around the remains of clay fire-places. In one place it was evident that some of the tribe had carried on the manufacture of arrow-heads, and in the large piles of flint chips were found bits of all colors—varieties that abound only in remote localities. This camping-ground was elevated several feet above the surrounding flat, and ended in an abrupt natural ledge of rock, from under which flowed a large cold spring. A marked trail led to the Wallenpaupack Creek, on the bank of which stood a tree which bore the marks of Indian axes, while on the rocks near by were traced some rude characters, which have since been obliterated by the action of the water. Along the banks of the creek many natural mortars, with stone pestles in them, were found, and a stone pot, carefully worked from some variety of rock, not found in the vicinity, was discovered on a ledge at the falls of the Wallenpaupack. It was supposed to have been left there by a party of Indians who were known to have made this a temporary abode about the time that Carter and his family first settled at Wallenpaupack village, before the first pioneers crossed the Cobb Mountain, penetrated the forests of the Lackawanna Valley and settled at Wyoming. This statement is based upon the story of an Indian doctor, who was stopping at a tavern in Ithaca, where one of the Purdys also put up for the night. When the latter said he was from near the Lackawaxen, the old Indian raised his head and said, "Ugh! me know the Lackawack before you was born." He then told the story of how his tribe had been driven from their hunting-grounds and were traveling up the river, and how they came to the falls of the Wallenpaupack, where one of the party killed a bear. They stopped to eat a portion of it, and afterward, finding elk and deer plenty in the vicinity, made it a temporary abode, camping on the spot to which reference has already been made. Tradition has it that these were Delawares.

Mills and Early Improvements.—One of the first requisites of the Paupack pioneers was a saw-mill, and as soon as Silas Purdy had erected his cabin of hewn planks and logs, and had enough land cleared to support his family from the scanty crops it brought forth, he commenced the construction of the mill. Just what time this was is now unknown, but it is certain that it was before the close of the last century, and probably several years before the erection of Wayne County. The mill stood on a small stream which runs through the farm now occupied by Myron Purdy. The first mill was built entirely of hewn timber, and was a spout mill, the water being conducted to the driving-wheel in hollow logs, which were supported on stone piers several rods, until they entered a small head-race. This race was also constructed chiefly out of hewn plank, and one of them is still shown as a curiosity by Mr. Malen Purdy, from whom many of these details were obtained. This mill was burned down after it had been standing but a few years, and was again built on the same general plan; a second time it was destroyed, and it was then rebuilt as a penstock mill; afterward it was converted into a trunk-mill, with greater capacity for sawing.

As soon as the saw-mill was completed, and good lumber could be obtained, Silas Purdy erected a tavern on his farm. It was on the road leading from the Wallenpaupack settlement to Cherry Ridge, a much-traveled route for those days. This house was a pretentious structure for the time, and had its roof supported by high stone chimneys at either end. These are still standing, a credit to the honest architecture of those days. One of them contains six fire-places, an oven and a smoke-house, all of them in fair condition.

The next important improvement was the erection of a grist-mill on a stream running through the farm now owned by the heirs of Harvey Purdy. It was built by Silas Purdy and his son Ephraim, and, with the exception of the mill owned by Abel Kimble, in Pike County, was the only one accessible to settlers for miles around. Its single "run" of native conglomerate, taken from the Moosic Mountain, were driven by an overshot wheel, and the coarse meal was only bolted by hand; nevertheless the mill was patronized by people from Salem, Cherry Ridge and even Mount Pleasant.

At a later date William Purdy and his sons erected a saw-mill on a small stream which runs through the farm now occupied by B. Dingman. This mill did service for many years, and was subsequently much improved. In 1825 John Tyler built a saw-mill on the outlet of Long Pond, which became the scene of a tragedy. It was there that the owner was found hanging from a rafter one day. After his death the mill passed into other hands, and was one of many that were running in Paupack during the palmy days of the lumber trade. The mill now run by J. S. Ames & Co. was built on a tributary to the Purdy Pond, by Charles Woodward in 1855. There was also a saw-mill built at Hemlock Hollow in 1820; it was converted into a circular mill in 1860, and is still in use.

In 1844 E. Killam built a mill at the outlet of Long Pond, and ran it for Russell Daniels, and subsequently Robertson, Gale & Co. erected a steam mill northwest of it, and near the Lake township line. The later industries of Paupack are few. In 1874 Darius G. Purdy and William Hankins started an establishment for the manufacture of saw and fork handles and umbrella sticks at Purdyville, which, after running a year and a half, was destroyed by fire, and has not since been rebuilt. In 1876 D. G. Purdy erected his grist mill. It has two "run" of stone, operated by three turbine wheels —two thirty inch and one twenty-four inch. It runs chiefly on corn, rye and buckwheat for custom work.

LUMBERING has had a prominent place in the history of Paupack township, and has been the source of great profit. For many years the supply seemed exhaustless, and much was wasted, and it is only within a few years that the people seem to have realized that the most available timber has already been felled. It was many years after the first settlement that lumbering was begun with any degree of earnestness; meanwhile, farms had been cleared, and the primitive mills had been kept in motion only for the local trade. The means of marketing were poor and indirect. The roads to the Lackawaxen made hauling very bad, and rafting on the Wallenpaupack could not be carried on without a second handling of timber at the falls, which did not pay. But in time the forest of magnificent pine attracted the attention of the ship-builders, and as prices went up, the whirr of the saw was heard from every available mill-site. Only the best timber, clear and free from knots, was taken, and when drawn to Paupack Eddy and rafted down the river, it brought from seven and a half to ten dollars a thousand, the latter being considered an extremely good price. The lumber with which to construct the ship-house in the Philadelphia Navy Yard was obtained at Hemlock Hollow, as was also much of the timber used in building the great ship of that day—the "Pennsylvania." The masts, which were ninety feet long and two feet in diameter at the top end, were the largest ever felled in the township, and were drawn to Paupack Eddy by twenty yoke of oxen. These great masts were furnished by Enos Goodrich, of Salem. Among the prominent lumbermen of the township were D. Bishop, Russell Daniels, Joseph Atkinson, Rufus Bennett, D. Bingham and M. Tyler. Most of them were residents of the township. Mr. Bishop had a mill on the Middle Creek, near No. 14 Plane, and bought of Killam, Torrey and Woodward. Russell Daniels purchased the trunk-mill of William Purdy, and made a number of improvements which increased its capacity. For several years Peter Long lived at this mill and did the sawing. From him the mill received the sobriquet of "the Pete Long mill." Moses Tyler's mill has been before referred to. It was in Killam Hollow, near the Tyler Spring. Rufus Bennett did most of his lumbering at Hemlock Hollow, where Henry Harmon then had a mill. 'Dolph Bingham, of Pike County, was also a prominent lumberman in Paupack, and used to camp out at "Abisha Meadow," as the Beach house was called, in remembrance of Abisha Woodward, who first cleared up a place for a cabin there. Leonard Labar, the Shouses, Eli Utt and others, whose names are mentioned in connection with other townships, acquired competencies before the lumber trade in the region suffered diminution.

THE POST-OFFICE.—In the early history of the township the mails were very irregular, and letters for Paupack went sometimes to one place and sometimes to another. It was not unusual for those expecting mail to go to all the adjacent post-offices and make inquiries. After a regular mail route was established between Honesdale and Stirling, as Purdyville was on the road, a post-office was established there with R. R. Purdy as the first postmaster. This was in 1839 and for ten years the mails came regularly once or twice a week. Then the route was changed and the office abandoned, residents of the township having to go to Tafton, Paupack Eddy or into Pike County. Much dissatisfaction was thus occasioned, and in 1857 the office was once more established, with Abbot M. Purdy as postmaster. In 1868 Hemlock Hollow was established and A. J. Roloson put in charge, and soon after the other office was abandoned. Mr. Roloson was succeeded by Darius G. Purdy, and he gave place to Mrs. F. M. Purdy, the present incumbent.

Hemlock Hollow has two stores, and until quite recently had a hotel. There is also a mill there, a blacksmith-shop and the other small industries found in a quiet hamlet.

SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES.—The first school in Purdyville stood on the bank of the brook that flows near the residence of Mr. O. M. Flemming. It was a log structure and must have been built early in the present century. The name of the first teacher has been forgotten and many of those who sat on the rude slab benches have finished the lesson of life.

The Palmyra Baptist Church owes its existence to the labors of William Purdy, who commenced preaching in the neighborhood of his new home soon after he located in Purdyville, in 1792.

In 1800 Rev. Lebbeus Lathrop, of Orange County, N. Y., visited the settlement and baptized Silas Purdy, Jr., Jacob Purdy, Miss Jane Purdy, the wife of William Purdy, Jr., and one other, and in the spring of 1801 Rev. Epaphras Thompson, of Mount Pleasant, preached there and baptized Miss Phœbe Purdy. In September of that year the Palmyra Baptist Church, consisting of fifteen constituent members, was recognized by a council convened for the purpose, and at the same time William Purdy was ordained as pastor of the infant church. Revs. Epaphras Thompson, John Caton, of Brookfield, N. Y., and William Bishop, of the Lackawanna Valley, officiated on this interesting occasion. Asa Cobb and Daniel Bowers were soon appointed deacons and the subject of doctrine and discipline was taken up. In 1802 the church decided to hold communion with none but Baptist believers, and in the following year resolved that it was the duty of every male member who was the head of a household to hold domestic worship, and that female members ought to pray in secret. In 1804 it was resolved to hold covenant meetings on the last Saturday of each month.

The church grew and prospered, and in 1807 united with the Abington and Mount Pleasant Churches in forming the Abington Association. In 1810 the report to the association showed that there was a total membership of forty-seven, of which thirty had been added by baptism. From the following year until 1817 it remained almost stationary, but in 1818 it shared with the other churches of the association a great revival, and the total membership was increased to sixty-four. In 1824 the pastor died and Mr. George Dobell, a licentiate, was chosen to supply the charge. This he did to the satisfaction of all until 1829, when he was ordained a regular pastor, a relation which he sustained until 1840. It was during this period that the "Old School" schism took place, and the dissensions were felt in no slight degree in the Palmyra Church. From 1840 to 1852 the church was destitute of a pastor and stated preaching, but during the time it maintained a feeble existence. In the fall of the latter year Rev. L. L. Still began to preach for the congregation and Rev. Henry Curtis gave an occasional sermon. Rev. Sanford Leach supplied them a portion of the year 1853, and in the spring the church had a total membership of forty-two. In 1854 Rev. Newell Callender was ordained pastor, and his labors were greatly prospered. In the fall, however, eighteen members were dismissed to form a church at Jonestown, Lake township. From that time the strength of the church gradually decreased, its members uniting with other congregations that grew up in the villages and towns near by. Ill health deprived the congregation of Mr. Callender, and J. M. Ball, a licentiate, was secured as stated supply. After him came Rev. Thomas Grennell, and then Elder Henry Curtis. The last pastor was W. H. Dewell, who served the church until six or seven years ago, when regular service was given up.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was commenced as a class at Rollisontown, a small hamlet, about fifty years ago, and Nathaniel Rollison was the first class-leader. Who the original members were is not now known, but among them were the following, who are now living: Moses Masters, aged ninety-seven; James Osborne, aged seventy-eight; Rebecca Rollison, aged seventy-six; and Polly Bidwell, aged eighty. The first meetings were held at the house of Urial Williams, on what is now known as the Cole farm. About 1844, John Dwight Safford began preaching in the old log school-house that had been built on the Rollison farm ten years before, and from that time the church began to grow until, during the present year, it has nearly completed a creditable church edifice, and is filling a wide field of usefulness. Among those who have filled the pulpit were the following: Revs. William Reddy, Samuel Griffin, Aaron Gillett, Charles Perkins, William Dean, Thomas Eilcox, William Silsbee, James B. Cooper, —— Blackman, —— Cushman, —— Barnes, Welcome Smith, George W. Leach, C. V. Arnold, Marcus Carrier, J. A. Baldwin, Charles W. Giddings, Charles White, I. T. Walker, J. Madison, Jacob Miller, Gabriel Westfall, Henry Stantly, J. L. Race, W. H. Gavitt, Robert Emmett Hall, M. D. Fuller, George T. Price, R. C. Gill, George W. Robinson, C. W. Blake, Sanford Swingle, Stephen Jay, J. Durham, A. B. Eckart, A. J. Van Vleft, D. A. Sanford, Charles Lane Rice, the present incumbent, to whom the writer is indebted for these facts.

The first Sunday-school in connection with this church was conducted in the old log school-house by Hiram Clements, an earnest worker from Salem. He was succeeded by Charles Potter, Joseph Moore, Daniel Brundage, Redford Longstreet, A. J. Rollison and George M. Bidwell.

The corner-stone of the new church edifice was laid on June 20th of the present year, and a creditable house of worship is now under roof.

The Free Methodist Church at Hemlock Hollow was organized about six years ago, by Rev. G. W. Swingle, and already has a large membership and a comfortable house of worship. It is on the circuit with Hollisterville, South Canaan and Jonestown, all four churches having one pastor.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

PRESTON TOWNSHIP.

This township, formed of parts of Scott and Mount Pleasant, April 28, 1828, was named in honor of Judge Samuel Preston, of Stockport, first associate judge of Wayne County. It appears from the records that at the formation of the town it was at first proposed to call it Ararat; but as it was taken mostly from Scott, which had been named from Judge David Scott, he deemed it proper to return the compliment, and give it the name of the first settler of Buckingham, the mother township of both Scott and the new township. The territory thus set off has retained its integrity to the present day, with the exception of the small portion which was incorporated as Wayne borough, in 1853, and is the third largest township in the county. It is bounded on the north by Starrucca borough and Scott, on the east by Buckingham, on the south by Mount Pleasant, and on the west by Susquehanna County. The highlands which divide the drainage basins of the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers traverse it from north to south, and its topography is broken by picturesque hills and dotted lakelets of uncommon beauty. The larger of these ponds are Shehawken, Como, Twin, Sly, Spruce, Seven Mile, Poyntell, Long, Big Hickory, Little Hickory, Five Mile, Bone, Long Spruce, Independence, Wrighter, Coxtown and perhaps some others. All of them are fed by fine springs, and give rise to streams that flow in every direction, furnishing an abundance of water-power, most of which is still unimproved. Most of the ponds were surrounded by fine timber, which could be felled on the banks and floated through the outlets to the mills below, so that the facilities for lumbering have been exceptionally good, and it was, and is still, a leading industry. The Lackawaxen has its head-waters from Independence and Five Mile Ponds; Wrighter, Coxtown and Long Spruce pour a volume of crystal water into the Starrucca; from Shehawken flows the creek of that name, and Poyntell, Little Hickory and Big Hickory form the Big Equinunk. The ponds lie chiefly in deep depressions on the hill-tops, and most of the streams descend rapidly, over rocky beds, broken by many abrupt falls, forming natural mill-sites of great value. The lake sources of the streams, moreover, make their flow constant, and the high altitude of the country makes it subject to copious rain-falls, so that an abundant water-power may be stored in these natural reservoirs, and, at slight expense, made always available. Although Ararat and Sugar Loaf Mountains are in the township, and most of the surface is a succession of rolling hills, there are few declivities that interfere with successful cultivation. The soil is fruitful, droughts are rare, and good crops of rye, oats, corn and buckwheat are raised, while the potato crop is always reliable and abundant.

EARLY SETTLEMENT.—There were few, if any, settlers in what is now Preston township before the beginning of the present century. The tide of emigration moved slowly, and the first comers were those who penetrated the then dense forest only after the adjacent settlements along the river and in Mount Pleasant, where the earlier pioneers had located had been made. After the first clearings were made, the growth of the population was comparatively slow, and in 1829, when the first assessment was made by Peter C. Sherman, the total number of taxables was only sixty-nine. In 1831 this had fallen to sixty-five. The following names are from that assessment, the earliest now extant:

David Babcock.	James Moore.
Widow Bennett.	John Martin.
Jesse Corwin.	Eleazer Monroe.
Ira Cargill.	William U. Norton.
Luther Chafee.	John Ostrander.
Riley Case.	Daniel Rose.
Willet Carr.	James Simpson.
Cushman Bassett.	John Stanton.
Joseph Dow.	Joseph W. Simpson.
Joseph Dow, Jr.	Ebeneze r Stanton.
Enos Dow.	Benjamin Sampson.
Elijah Dix.	Henry Sampson.
Franklin Duvall.	John Stephens.
John Dunn.	Peter Spencer.
Matthew Dunn.	Russel Spencer.
Jeremiah Flinn.	Abner Stone.
Thomas Foster.	David Stout.
Milo Frink.	James Simpson.
Francis J. Grelett.	Peter C. Sherman.
Clark Gardenier.	John Starbird.
Rufus Geer.	William Starbird.
Andrew B. Gibson.	Lyman Tiler.
Perry Hine,	Elihu Tallman.
Cyprion Howard.	William Tallman.
George Hall.	Christopher Tallman.
Abraham Haynes.	E. Wilcox.
Benjamin King.	David Wooley.
Silas Kellogg.	James Woodmansee.
Jesse Mapes.	Gideon Woodmansee.
Jirah Mumford.	Squire Whitaker.
James Mumford.	Henry Whitaker.
Joseph Margurat.	Daniel Underwood.

Gideon Woodmansee, whose name appears in the above assessment, came from Connecticut in 1816, accompanied by his brothers, James and Thomas, and all of them settled on the "Stockport road." Gideon located on the place now belonging to John Randall, in Buckingham township; he bought property in Preston, however, and was prominently identified with the early history of the township. Mr. Woodmansee had been a soldier in the Revolution, and had three sons,—James, Thomas and Jeremiah. The first-named inherited the homestead, and his brothers moved to Michigan. James married Polly Underwood, and his children were James M., Jedediah, Samuel, Lyman, Horace, Phœbe, who married George Gates; Susan, the wife of Alvin R. Squire; Mary J., the wife of Joseph B. Sanford; Huldah, who married W. W. Blasdell, of Jackson, Susquehanna County; Rhoda, the wife of Jacob Martin; and Mahala, who married William Kingsbury, of Lake Como.

Rufus Geer, who was a native of Rhode Island, came from that State to Preston about 1816, and settled on the Twin Lakes, on the farm now occupied by W. J. Hemstead. His children were Harry, now of Buckingham; Rufus, deceased; Levi, of Orange County, N. Y.; Eldad, of Elk County; Hiram, of Preston; Amy, the wife of Stephen P. London; Mary, who married James Christian; Jerusha, the wife of George G. Labar; Lodema, the wife of William McCollough; Zubie E., the wife of James Cleveland.

Andrew B. Gibson was brought up by a brother of Rufus Geer, who lived in Mount Pleasant township. As soon as he arrived at maturity Mr. Gibson located on the place now occupied by John McGraw, on Equinunk Creek, near the Labar mill. He married a daughter of David Wooley, and had a large family, but only one of them, Mrs. Joseph Fletcher, remains in the township.

John and William Starbird were the sons of John Starbird, of Maine, who moved to Stroudsburg in 1783, and there married Hannah Stroud. His sons moved into what is now Preston in March, 1817, and John made his first clearing the following year. He was a justice of the peace for what was then Scott township, and also made the assessment there in 1823. In 1824 he built a saw-mill on Shehawken Creek. He had a family of thirteen children, all of whom grew to man's estate. William Starbird cleared up a farm in 1822, and in 1851 rebuilt the saw-mill his brother had constructed. The mill is now owned by S. T. Whittaker.

David Wooley came from New York City in March, 1817, accompanied by a number of others from the same place, and settled in that part of the township known as "Little York." He had a number of children, among whom were William and John, who went West; Sarah A., who married Jedediah Woodmansee; James and Mary Jane, who both reside in Ohio.

James Moore, who was also a settler at "Little York," came about the same time as Mr. Wooley, and located near him. Mr. Moore's oldest daughter married Ezra Spencer, of Mount Pleasant; and Eliza, another, married Jirah M. Kellogg; Adeline is the wife of James Lord, and Cornelia married James Gibson, and lives in Illinois.

Elihu Tallman, the father of Esquire C. P. Tallman, of Tallmansville, was a native of Massachusetts. At an early age he was put on board a coasting vessel as cabin-boy and cook, and subsequently learned the trade of shoemaking. He first located in Saratoga, and there married in 1799, and soon after came to Wayne County, and settled in Mount Pleasant. After various vicissitudes he bought out the improvement of Samuel P. Green, on the East Branch, and also a tract of timber at Six Mile Lake (now Lake Como), where he completed a saw-mill, and hauled to Stockport the first raft of pine ever floated there, in 1820. In 1822 he bought a large tract four miles from Starrucca, known as the Krider tract, and was subsequently a prominent lumberman of the township. He had two sons,—William and C. P. The latter bought a large tract where Tallmansville now stands in 1826, built a saw-mill and cleared up a fine farm. He has been for many years a justice of the peace and is a public spirited-citizen. He has been twice married, and his children are as follows: Edwin E., Addison B., Philena J., Darwin W., Eudalia J. (the wife of Addis Moore), Olive L. (the wife of Frederick D. Benedict).

In 1821 Willet Carr, a native of Hancock, N. Y., settled on the place now occupied by Amos O. Sherwood, at Preston post-office. Mr. Carr was a resident of Preston until about 1837, when he moved to Steuben County, N. Y., taking all the surviving members of his family with him. Green, one of his sons, was buried on the place. The next occupant was David Blowers, who resided there about a year and then went elsewhere.

On the adjoining farm James Simpson, an Englishman, who had recently emigrated, located in 1821, and the place is still in the hands of his descendants. His children were James, Joseph and John, all deceased; Henry, a resident of Buckingham; Mary, the wife of William Duvall; Christina, who married Alber Barrows.

Riley and E. T. Case, two brothers from Gibson, Susquehanna County, came to the township in 1821. Riley located on the farm where Samuel Decker now lives. He married Pollina Whitney, and his children were Charles, Franklin and Emily; the latter is now married and a resident of Great Bend. E. T. Case married Melila Dow, and their children were Olive (the wife of William Baker), Sophia (who married Ellis Tyler and then Jasper Savery), Phelene (the wife of Luther Carpenter), George, Julia, Virgil, Robert, Horace, Eva (the wife of Charles Cory), and Ella, (the wife of Edson Barrett).

Franklin Duvall was one of the settlers at "Little York," and located where Charles McCabe now lives. He had one son, William F., who lives near Preston post-office. The latter had a large family, some of whom live in Preston and adjacent townships.

Peter C. Sherman was an early settler at Preston Centre, but just when he located there is uncertain. He made the township assessment, which has been before referred to, in 1829, and at that time had ten acres of improved land, four hundred and thirty-six acres unimproved and a house valued at eight dollars. The township and general elections were held on his place for many years. The place afterwards fell into the hands of J. Carr, who disposed of it to C. B. Dibble, its present owner.

Luther Chafee located on the farm now occupied by C. P. Tallman, Esq., in 1823. He married Rebecca Perkins, and his children were Hervy, Harriet (the wife of Henry Aitteny), Samuel, Joseph and Larcomb. Mr. Chafee sold his farm in 1838 and moved to Ohio.

David Babcock located on a part of the farm now owned by John Clark, in 1823, and resided there for some years. He afterward sold out and removed West, though some of his descendants still reside in the township.

Deacon Peter Spencer was one of the earliest settlers and came from Connecticut. He located on the place now occupied by Nathan A. Monroe, and married a Miss Russell, of Mount Pleasant. Their children were Ruggles, Samuel, Lucretia (the wife of Silas Freeman, of Mount Pleasant), Sarah (who married William Labar, now living with her son, S. W. Labar, in the township).

John Stanton, for whom Stanton Hill was named, came from Connecticut at an early date, and settled on the farm now occupied by Alpheus Dix. He married Rhoda Tallman, and their children were Samuel; Betsy, the wife of David Dix; Mary A., who married Ambrose Payne, and afterwards Martin Ellis; Henry P.; David; Sidney; Maxy, the wife of Jesse Haines; Eunice, who married Charles Roberts; and John.

John Stephens, who was one of the first to keep a public-house in the town, was an Englishman, and began early on the farm now occupied by Stanley H. Hine. The exact date of his settlement cannot be ascertained. The assessment of 1829 showed him to have two hundred and twenty-five acres of land, much of which was of superior quality, indicating that he had been there some time then. His first license was granted in 1830, and he kept a tavern as long as he lived.

Abner Stone was an early settler on the Stockport road, and located just north of Samuel Bookings, on the farm now occupied by Henry K. Stone. He had a number of children, among whom were Albert, of Equinunk; Hosmer, of Illinois; Henry K.; Sible, who married Nathan Sherwood, and then Thomas Tiner, of Equinunk; and Lucy, the wife of Byron Freeman, of Mount Pleasant.

Daniel Rose, whose name appears in the assessment above quoted, cleared up the farm where George Wainright now lives, and afterwards moved to Pike County, where he is mentioned more fully.

Ira Cargill, who came from Connecticut, started a flourishing settlement on the road leading from the Ochquaga turnpike to Starrucca in 1830. His farm, which was near Rider Pond, is now owned by Jesse Carpenter. Mr. Cargill was a prominent man in his day, and was several times a township officer. He has been dead many years, and left no descendants.

Clark Gardner, who was a prominent man in the western part of the township, was of New England origin, and located on the farm now occupied by Robert Tenant some time prior to 1830. He afterwards moved to Mount Pleasant township, where his descendants all reside.

Nathan T. Carpenter, a native of Attleboro', Mass., took up the two hundred acre tract that he has since cleared, in 1830. He married Mary Luther, of Swanzy, Mass., and his children are Theophilus L., of Jackson, Susquehanna County; Mary, the wife of J. F. Duvall; Daniel, who was killed in the late war; Hannah; and Nathan, who resides in Mount Pleasant.

Eleazer Monroe moved from Mount Pleasant about 1830, and located on the place now occupied by Charles Monroe. He married Catherine Roberts, and his children were Lyman, deceased; James and Jonathan, who live in Kansas; Mary, the wife of Sheldon Stearns; and Ellen, the wife of Gilbert A. Forbes, of Honesdale.

Joseph Margurat, a native of Switzerland, settled on the place now occupied by one of the Sherwoods, about 1830. He afterwards moved to Sandusky, Ohio, but left a number of descendants in Preston township. Mrs. Ezra Ferris is his granddaughter.

George Hall, whose name appears in the above assessment, settled at Lake Como in 1830, where he married a Miss Hill. He died in 1835, and his wife afterwards married a Mr. Barrager, and lived in Buckingham township.

John Martin was a Hessian, who went from Canada to Duchess County, N. Y., and from there emigrated to Wayne County. He had been in the army, and used to say facetiously that he was sent out of camp one day, and forgot to go back. He lived on a number of farms in Preston and adjoining townships. His family is scattered. Jeremiah lives in Buckingham; Daniel is a resident of the township; David was killed in the late war; Stephen lives in Nebraska; Mary is married, and lives in New York, as do several others of his daughters; Julia, one of them, married James C. Menhennett, of Lake Como.

David Stout located where A. C. Wilcox now lives, near Twin Lakes. He had one son, David, who now resides with his son-in-law, Peter Harris, of Mount Pleasant; and a daughter, Lucy, who married Ambrose Wilcox, of the same place.

Merritt Hine came from Massachusetts about 1811, and settled first in Ararat, Susquehanna County. In 1831 he moved to Hine's Corners, on the place now occupied by Philander Hine, and bought most of the land near by, selling it on easy terms, and starting a flourishing settlement. He married Catharine Belcher, and had a large family. His children were Julia, the wife of William Knapp; Ira; Miranda, who married D. M. Benedict; John; Royal; Philander; Elena; Lorenzo; Sarah J., the wife of David Thurston; Elizabeth B., who married Daniel Tuthill; Mary E., who married Sidney P. Tallman, and then a Mr. Enslin; David J. Merritt Hine was one of the champion hunters of the region, and could boast many thrilling and hair-breadth escapes from wolves and panthers. He was skilled in woodcraft, and frequently went sixty miles to Wilkes-Barre, through the then almost trackless forests.

Francis J. Grelett was a Frenchman, who located on what is now called the George Failing place, about 1831. He was a man of much education and considerable culture, and it was said that he had been an officer in Napoleon's army, and had left France for political reasons. He was one of the early teachers in Honesdale, where he gained quite a reputation as a fine mathematician, though he was somewhat eccentric. Alexander, the eldest of his four sons, always lived in Philadelphia; Joseph resides at Tallmansville; Victor went to Illinois; L. Donot is at Lake Como. Of his daughters, Louise married Thaddeus Campbell; Ciserine was the wife of Earl Griffin; and Justine married and went West.

Colby Chamberlain came from Virginia about

1837, and located on Spruce Pond, where he took up a tract of one hundred and sixteen acres. He married Ardelia Seay, and their children were Harriet, the wife of Abner Palmer; Worcester, who resides on the homestead; Osmer; William H.; Edgar B.; Jennie, the wife of Jonathan Kellogg; and Josephine, who married John Davis.

Silas Kellogg was one of the early settlers of Mount Pleasant, emigrating there from Saratoga in 1792. He was elected sheriff of the county in 1813, and was a prominent man in the early history of that township, under which a more extended notice of him will be found. He moved into Preston in 1837 and resided there for many years. His sons were Azor and Jirah Kellogg, and Mary, his oldest daughter, was the wife of John K. Woodward, and the mother of the late Warren J. Woodward, and of Jackson K. Woodward, deceased, of Honesdale.

Amos O. Sherwood came from Fairfield County, Connecticut, about 1837, and first settled at Rileyville. In a few years he took up a tract at Preston Centre, and his place has since been well known in the locality. He married Betsy Burr, and his children are Eunice, the wife of Ezra Seeley, of Connecticut; Eben B.; Amelia, who married Marcus Moore; Nathan J.; Eleanor; D. B.; William H; and Sally, the wife of Reuben Beech.

Among those who arrived in the township at a later period were J. B. Sanford, who settled at Little York about 1841; George Wainright, who came a year later; Omar A. Lakin, who was a grandson of Josiah Parks, of rafting fame, and came from Hancock, New York, in 1844; and John Tenant, of Luzerne County; and John Van Housan, of Delhi, New York, who located near Rider Pond in 1847 and 1848.

Daniel Underwood removed from Connecticut in 1830, and located on the Stockport road, northeast of Amos O. Sherwood. He was a skillful carpenter and builder, and erected the Methodist Church in Mount Pleasant. He was the father of a good-sized family, and all of his sons have become prominent men in both township and county. They were Lewis A. Underwood, Hon. Nelson F. Underwood, who represented Wayne County in the Legislature of 1880, W. G. Underwood and Preston, who removed to Kansas; the daughters were Lavinia, who married James E. Woodmansee, and lives in Buckingham, and Ann Eliza, the wife of L. E. Howard, of Hancock, New York. Daniel Underwood died in 1873, aged sixty-seven years.

Early Improvements.—The first saw-mill built in the township was that already referred to at the outlet of Six Mile Pond, as Lake Como was then called. It had been commenced by Samuel P. Green, who owned a four hundred acre tract there, and had met with financial reverses after beginning his improvements. Elihu Tallman made his purchase of the property in 1819, and at once finished the mill, and the first raft of sawed lumber was hauled to the Stockport banks in time for the spring freshets of the following year. At this time there were no roads running north and south for many miles, except the old Stockport road, which led from the Delaware to Mount Pleasant, and this had only the small trees and bushes cut out, and the larger trunks so blazed as to guide the settlers on its course in deep snows. This was connected with the Cochecton and Great Bend turnpike by a road east from Union Settlement, in what is now Manchester, and there were also a few private roads, about half opened. Mr. Tallman's lumber venture proved a good one, and soon others embarked in the business, some having their lumber sawed, and others drawing the logs to the river to be rafted to points down the stream. In 1824 he built a saw-mill at the outlet of Stanton Pond, on the Krider tract. The mill at Tallmansville was built by C. P. Tallman in 1830, and the same year Peter C. Sherman put up a mill on Coxtown Pond, now owned by Sydney B. Bennett. At this time the circular saw was unknown in Wayne County, and had been but barely experimented with elsewhere, and all of these mills had the old up-and-down saw; some of them were afterwards converted into circular saw-mills.

At this time there was a road marked out from Starrucca to connect with the Stockport road, and in some places the underbrush had been cut out, and the timber felled, but not cleared away. It passed within a mile of the Krider tract, which was soon connected with it by a branch road, and followed the general direction of the present county road. In the fall of 1823 a road was cut from the Tallman place to Mount Pleasant, and a number of settlers located upon it. As the population increased and became more concentrated, and fallows gave place to fields of grain, the roads were improved, schools were established and the township assumed character and a more inviting aspect.

Post-Offices.—When the first settlers located in what is now Preston township there were several post-offices in Wayne County; the day had gone by when correspondents sent their letters addressed to "Beech Woods," to remain at Wilkes-Barre till called for, and there was a mail route from Wilkes-Barre by the way of Mount Pleasant to Bethany and Milford, returning through Paupack and Cobb's Gap. The first office established in the present township limits was that at Tallmansville, and Elihu Tallman was the official in charge. He continued to serve, in spite of all the changes of administration, until 1860, when Edwin Tallman, his son, succeeded him, and has since retained the office. The Preston office was established in 1838, with Daniel Underwood as postmaster, and he, after a few years, gave place to John Stearns. J. F. Duvall and E. R. Leonard also served in turn, before the appointment, in 1880, of Elizabeth Bliss, the present incumbent. Residents of the eastern part of the township first received their mail at Jericho, in Buckingham township, where George Wainright was appointed postmaster in 1858. The office was removed to Lake Como, about 1860, with Lucian Horton in charge. John W. Thrall then took it; and, in 1867, John Turner, the present postmaster, was appointed. The office has had a daily mail since January, 1878. The office at Lakin was established in 1881, with Miss Addie G. Lakin in charge; that at Hine's Corners in 1879. N. F. Hine was the first postmaster in the latter office, and has been succeeded by L. L. Hine, E. M. Hine and W. H. Chamberlain, the present incumbent.

Schools and Churches.—In the early history of the township there were no schools between Mount Pleasant and Shehawken, as Hancock was then called, and few of the children had any advantages beyond those they could obtain when their hard-worked parents had time to give a little instruction in the veriest rudiments of education. As the settlers grew more numerous, and it was possible to concentrate a sufficient number of children at one place to hold a school, teachers were hired at private expense. One of these was Truman Wheeler, and Miss Mary Wheeler, presumably his sister, also appears in the early records. In 1824, Elihu Tallman hired Miss Sarah Jane Stoddard to teach four, and part of the time five, children in an old log house on his place. The school was kept by her for three months; and the next summer the same pupils were under the tuition of Miss Sally Kennedy. Miss Miranda Chittenden and a Mr. Hines followed, and completed a year's instruction, which, on account of the impassable condition of the roads in the winter, had to be extended through nearly two years. Each of these teachers was paid seventy-five cents a week and board, and was entertained first at the house of one subscriber, then at the next, and so on until this portion of her salary was distributed equally among the patrons of the school. It is to the credit of the township that the first money ever spent on any public improvement was for the erection of a school-house. The following account of this is from a manuscript kindly furnished by C. P. Tallman, Esq.:

"It was in the spring of 1829 or 1830 that a number of us in the neighborhood where I was then living agreed to put up a building, and start a private school, and after the matter had been well talked up, a meeting was held, and we fixed upon a site on the east side of my lot, where the road then ran—a spot which is now covered by a thick grove of maples. Some of the neighbors subscribed labor, others materials; I found nails, glass and sash to the amount of four dollars and eighty-four cents, my share of the estimated cost. The building, which was soon erected, was sixteen by twenty feet, built of sound logs cut near by, and had a stone chimney at one end, in which was a fire-place that burned four-foot wood. The building was stone chinked and mossed over, so that it was much warmer and more picturesque than many of the settlers' cabins, and presented a very respectable appearance for the times. The door and floor were made of rough hemlock, and the hinges and latch were of our own rude make. The benches were slabs with sapling legs in them, and the desk boards, fastened to the sides of the house; but everything was substantial, and good as the times afforded. The first teacher engaged was a Miss Watrous, an old and experienced teacher, who gave great satisfaction; and some of her pupils came several miles in all kinds of weather to profit by her instruction. We paid her a dollar a week, a larger salary than was customary; but she earned it by her earnestness, patience and faculty for imparting knowledge. Afterward, I do not remember that we ever paid more than seventy-five cents a week for a female teacher, and ten dollars a month for a male instructor."

Franklin Duvall and Daniel Underwood erected a plank school-house near the residence of the latter, and it was probably the next school building put up in the township. Daniel Fletcher taught there first, about 1839. The school-house at Little York was built near the present public school building, in 1845, and was opened by Miss Sally Sanford. After that, schools increased rapidly, and there are now fourteen buildings in the township, with an average value of five hundred dollars apiece.

As early as 1822 an effort was made to hold religious services within the limits of the present township; but the location of the families, their indigent circumstances and various other conditions incidental to the primitive character of the settlement were such that all attempts had to be abandoned, and, as one old settler records, "the Sabbaths were very loosely spent." Once in a while the various families were visited by the pioneer ministers of the Baptist and Methodist Churches, and it is possible that within five years after the date just mentioned some gatherings for public worship may have been held. Meanwhile churches had gained strength in the adjoining townships, and among their members were some of the early Preston settlers. It was some time after 1825 that John Rain, Primitive Methodist minister, came to Luther Shafer's and began to hold stated meetings, preaching and praying with great fervor, and attracting and interesting many persons. Two were baptized in the creek at Tallmansville, and soon afterward a class of thirteen was organized.

But soon it was discovered that Mr. Rain had not the proper ecclesiastical authority, and he went away, and the class was given up. But the seed had been sown, interest had been awakened, and it was not long before some of the members of the old class, and some who were members of churches elsewhere, began to long for the class-meetings and the "sweet hour of prayer." This led to the organization of the Tallmansville Methodist Episcopal Church, which took place in 1831, when a flourishing class was formed, with David Wooley as leader. Some of the original members of this were David Wooley, Jane Wooley, Sarah Ann Wooley, Wm. Wooley, James Wooley, Mary Jane Wooley, Lucretia Tallman, Lucretia Tallman (2d) G. P. Tallman and others of the same family. The first ministers were Revs. Morgan Ruger, George Evans, Samuel Griffin and Samuel B. Yarrington. The church edifice was built in 1866, at a cost of two thousand seven hundred dollars, and has been since improved. The congregation is now in a flourishing condition, and maintains a well-attended Sunday-school.

The Hine's Corners Methodist Episcopal Church was organized as a class in 1849, with D. M. Benedict as the first leader. The constituent members were D. M. Benedict and wife, Merritt Hine and wife, Royal Hine and wife, Philander Hine and wife, D. G. Hine, Elvira Hine, Elizabeth Hine, Gilbert Wheeler, Calvin Hatch and wife, David Thurston and wife, David Cordner and wife, James Dunn and wife. Others were soon added, and the class became strong enough to engage Rev. N. S. Dewitt as the first pastor. At this time the class belonged to the Lanesboro' charge, and Rev. Nathaniel Sartail, another pastor on that circuit, assisted Mr. Dewitt in a great revival that was an important event in the early history of the organization. This added many members, and as the congregation increased in strength and influence it was transferred to the Herrick charge. The members were chartered as a corporate body in July, 1876, with the following trustees: D. M. Benedict, D. G. Hine, N. F. Hine, Royal Hine, J. E. Fletcher, William Lee (3d), and H. W. Woodmansee. Under the pastorate of Rev. G. W. Robinson the present church edifice was erected, and was dedicated in the fall of 1878. It cost about sixteen hundred dollars.

The Stanton Hill Methodist Episcopal Church was organized about 1855, with H. P. Stanton as the first class-leader. The constituent members were Henry Stanton, Emeline Stanton, Mary A. Stanton, David Stanton and wife, Mrs. Richard McLaury and Eunice Roberts. Edgar Sandford and Alpheus Dix have also been class leaders. The church has been on the Lake Como Circuit, and has been served by the pastors there. The church edifice was built during the summer of 1883, and was dedicated on the 27th of the October following. It cost about sixteen hundred and fifty dollars. The present trustees of the church are H. P. Stanton, Frank E. Kilpatrick, S. E. Stanton, E. J. Sanford and A. R. Dix.

The Preston Centre Baptist Church was an offshoot from the church in Scott township. A few of the members of the latter organization, living, as they did, away from the central place of meeting, had for some years prior to formal organization acted as a branch of the mother church, and enjoyed the ordinances of the Supper and baptism at their place and pleasure. In 1858, however, they finally decided to form a "district church," and a council from the neighboring churches of the Abington and Bridgewater Associations was convened at Preston Centre, on the 14th of April of that year, to give them fellowship as a gospel church. E. K. Norton, of Clinton, was chosen moderator and B. B. Bunting, of Aldenville, secretary. Delegates were present from Aldenville, Clinton, Bethany, Gibson, Jackson, Lenox, Scott and Union Churches, and Revs. William Miller, R. G. Lamb, D. H. Halstead, A. O. Stearns and Rial Tower participated in the exercises. The constituent members who were then recognized were Charles Lloyd, William Knapp, Mary Hulett, Francis Pierce, Julian A. Andrews, Esther Carr, Walter Lloyd, Archibald Lamont, William J. Lloyd, Julia Knapp, Nancy Lamont, Clarissa Benedict, Benjamin E. Saxbury, Mary J. Carpenter, Luther Carpenter, Nathan Carpenter, F. A. Lobez, Caroline Lobez, Josiah Townsend and wife, Mary Ann Townsend. When the church was admitted to the association, the following autumn, four additions to the membership were reported, making twenty-four communicants. Rev. Rial Tower was the first pastor, and was secured about a year after the church was organized to labor a fourth of his time for the congregation. He remained for a portion of the time during the next two years, during which Samuel W. Lloyd was licensed to preach. He supplied the pulpit after Mr. Tower's departure, and was succeeded by Rev. William Tower, a son of the first pastor. A portion of the church records have been lost, and the only other pastors who can be learned of are S. W. Cole, Jacob Gessner, A. O. Stearns, S. E. Carr and James Pope, in the order of their succession down to the present incumbent. The church edifice was commenced in 1884, and cost about fifteen hundred dollars. It was dedicated by Rev. Charles Fitzwilliams, of Damascus, on January 22, 1885.

The Lake Como Methodist Episcopal Church was built about 1863. The society had previously formed a part of the circuit known as "Thompson Mission," with a preaching-place at "Jerusalem School-House." The first board of trustees consisted of John Davidge, Lyman Woodmansee and Moses Thomas. Rev. I. N. Pardee was at that time preacher in charge. Its successive pastors have been Revs. N. S. Reynolds, 1864–65; S. G. Stevens, 1866; H. H. Dresser, 1867–69; J. D. Woodruff, 1870; W. B. Kinney, 1871; David Larish, 1872–73; M. D. Fuller, 1874–76; J. H. Taylor, 1877–79; F. A. Dony, 1880–81; G. A. Cure, 1882–84; D. A. Sandford, 1885. The parsonage was built in 1866, and was first occupied during the latter part of the Conference year by the pastor and family. The name of the circuit, or charge, was afterwards changed to Tallmansville, and in 1880 to Lake Como. The society now has ninety members, and its Sunday-school numbers twelve officers and teachers and one hundred and forty-six scholars.

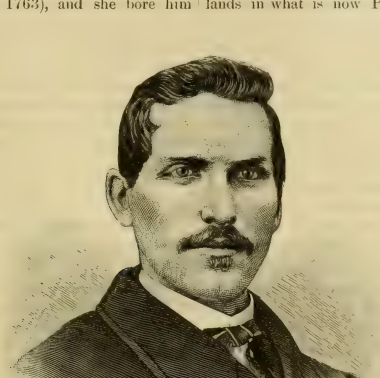
LAKE COMO.—The history of the village of Lake Como commences in 1859. In that year Messrs. Leonard H. Allison, John Davidge, Horace H. Crary and Lucien Horton, of Hancock, Delaware County, N. Y., bought of Daniel Underwood about eight hundred acres of land, comprising most of the William Cramer and Peter Henry tracts. Upon this land and upon the site of the present establishment they at once began to build a tannery. The price paid for the land purchased was forty-five hundred dollars. The building was finished and ready for business before the close of the season, and as soon as the necessary tenements for workmen could be made ready the work of manufacturing sole-leather was begun. The senior member of the firm, Mr. L. H. Allison, had not long before returned from a tour in Europe, and retaining a pleasing remembrance of Lake Como, in Italy, he gave to the new hamlet and the lake near it the name which it still bears. Under the firm-name of Allison, Davidge & Co., the tannery business and, in connection with it, a store, was carried on by the above-named partners until 1864, when their entire interest was sold to Albert E. Babcock, who had lately closed up a tannery at Hortonville, Sullivan County, N. Y., where the supply of bark had become exhausted. Mr. John Davidge moved with his family to Lake Como as soon as their purchase was made, and remained there until the property was sold, as did also Lucien Horton, who afterward married Hattie Burr, a sister of Mrs. Davidge and Mrs. H. H. Crary. The tannery and three thousand cords of bark were burned in 1868, and the building was again rebuilt by the original owners. Afterward, in 1876, it was again partially burned, and the burned portion built anew by Thrall & Babcock. On the death of Mr. Babcock, which occurred in 1872, the property went into the hands of his wife and his daughter, Mrs. John W. Thrall, and was carried on for four years under the name of Thrall & Babcock, Mr. Thrall still managing the business as he had previously done for Mr. Babcock. In 1880 his health became so impaired that he could no longer give the establishment his attention, and the entire property passed into the hands of Hoyt Brothers, of New York. This tannery is now nearing its close, and the men who have been its owners and managers have been most important factors in the history of the whole region round about it. It has consumed at least one hundred thousand cords of hemlock bark, for which fully five hundred thousand dollars has been paid in cash, and this sum has done much toward clearing up and paying for the surrounding farms, as well as promoting the various public and private enterprises in the vicinity and furnishing employment to numbers of men engaged in various kinds of labor. On the 26th day of October, 1885, Hoyt Brothers sold their remaining interest in the real estate to Hon. N. F. Underwood, reserving only the use of such buildings as might be necessary for their employés while finishing up the tanning business, which they expect to do in one or two years.

LAKE COMO LODGE, No. 965, I. O. O. F. was instituted April 10, 1879. Its charter members were Jerome Underwood, Andrew McKee, W. C. Rutledge, W. P. Lakin, D. C. Kingsbury, Z. C. Cole, H. C. Christian, Azor E. Kellogg, Rufus London, W. O. Ferris and N. L. Woodmansee. Its Noble Grands have been, successively, Jerome Underwood, W. P. Lakin, D. C. Kingsbury, J. E. Woodmansee, Samuel S. Van Etten, Dr. T. A. Haugh, J. H. Taylor, N. F. Underwood, A. T. Poole, Horace Woodmansee, G. E. Littell and E. G. Greenwood. Its membership now numbers eighty-one, and it has about fifteen hundred dollars of invested funds.



BIOGRAPHICAL.

IRVIN STARBIRD.

The first record of the Starbird family we can find is the birth of John Starbird on March 25, 1754, at Brunswick, Maine. He left home when the call "To arms!" was uttered on behalf of the Continental troops, and, having enlisted, served throughout the Revolutionary War, was wounded and afterwards mustered out when the necessity for patriotic services in the field had ended. He proceeded to Trenton, N. J., and taught school a time; from that place reached Easton, where he again gave instruction, and then located at Stroudsburg, Monroe County. Here he married Hannah Stroud (born October 10, 1763), and she bore him Jacob, John, Elizabeth, William, Daniel, Peter and Franklin.

He was a man of considerable education, and in possession of his grandson Irvin is a MS. arithmetic book of good size, evidently prepared for the use of his children, full of valuable rules, examples, etc. He was engaged in farming until his death, December 14, 1839, his wife surviving him until May 4, 1845. William Starbird, the fourth child of John and Hannah, was born May 27, 1798, at Stroudsburg, Pa. When nineteen years of age he left home and came to Wayne County, made a home at Stockport, and bought timber from the Prestons, which he rafted down the Delaware to Philadelphia. Thus commencing a career as a lumberman, he continued to follow such business until 1854 very successfully. On September 26, 1824, he married Elizabeth Barrager, near Stockport, and purchased farm and timber lands in what is now Preston township, then Buckingham. At one time he owned seventeen hundred acres of land, in a solid piece, in the township, when no roads had been cut through the vast pine wilderness, and the track was traceable only by blazed trees. Here he formed a home and raised a large family of thirteen children, as follows: Ransom, Horace, Emeline V., George, Alfred C., Benjamin F., Edwin, Ann, John Q., William P., Irvin, Henry C., Caroline A. Of these, Alfred C. entered the army of the North in the Rebellion, enlisting in Company C, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves, on May 31, 1861, and was discharged from the service for physical disability on July 10, 1862. He afterwards re-enlisted in a cavalry regiment. He lost his life near Washington, D. C.

In 1851 Mr. Starbird put up a new mill in the extreme northeastern corner of the township, which requires special mention. His boys and himself were unusually large and powerful men, and on the occasion referred to, instead of waiting the old-time "raising bee" gathering, he relied upon his family, and with two sons erected the entire structure. The mudsills were timbers sixty feet long and fourteen inches thick (still in the same position); the plates sixty feet long and twelve inches square, and all the frame timbers were twelve inches square. No machinery was used in this undertaking, and the building was, until quite recently, a monument showing what brain and brawn and pluck, as personified in the Starbird family, accomplished. William Starbird was a thorough mechanic and each part of this mill, excepting the iron work, but including the wheel, was the work of his hands. He was also an athlete of renown, and many are the tales of his proofs of strength and the quickness of his eye in shooting game. In 1863 he sold some thirteen hundred acres for eighteen thousand dollars, and removed to Buckingham township, upon a large farm at the mouth of the Chehocton Creek, where he passed the remainder of his days, dying there January 20, 1881. Mrs. Starbird died March 24, 1875.

Irvin Starbird, born July 13, 1842, in this township, was educated in the district schools until his twentieth year, when he commenced clearing his present farm of one hundred and eighty acres, part of the large tract of his father's, given for extra time services. The woods gave way to sturdy work, and ere long a house was built and a partner sought to make a home. This was consummated when, on January 1, 1866, Miss Ann Z., daughter of Robert K. and Minerva H. (Tallman) King (whose family sketch is to be found in the history of Starrucca borough), became his wife. This marriage has been blessed with the following children: Ali King, born March 12, 1867; Alfred Clair, born July 11, 1868; William Robert, born February 16, 1878. In addition to which, a little girl, Bessie Mabel, born April 18, 1882, was adopted into the family October 20, of the same year.

Mr. Starbird is a Republican in political matters, and has been called upon several times by his party to fill offices in the township, among such being collector, assessor and school director, in which positions his services have been satisfactory. Both himself and wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Lake Como, and were members of the Starrucca Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, until its dissolution, a few years since, Mr. Starbird being the Master and Mrs. Starbird acting as Ceres.

CHAPTER XXIX.

On the extreme northern boundary of Wayne, separated to some extent from the rest of the county by a range of high hills, lies the thrifty borough of Starrucca. The location is one of natural beauty, being at the head of the fertile Starrucca Valley and at the confluence of the Coxtown with the Starrucca Creek. Starrucca existed as a village or settlement nearly three-quarters of a century before the formation of the present borough, which was erected in 1853 from a portion of Scott and Preston townships, and is bounded by the above-named townships, and the township of Thompson, in Susquehanna County.

Of the first settlement at Starrucca no written record remains, and tradition alone rescues from oblivion the early history of the place, and even tradition gives nothing definite as to the first settler. However, it is quite certain that the first settlement at Starrucca was established prior to 1800, and that among the early settlers—if, indeed, not the earliest—were Ezekiel Sampson, Henry Sampson, Jesse Whittaker, Jones West, Conrad Edick, David

[1] By J. E. Farrell.

Spoon, James Hanford, Ogden Weed, David Benedict, James Gleason and Jirah Mumford. Nearly all the immediate descendants of the above-named pioneers have passed away. Until 1820 the nearest grist-mills were at Wilkes-Barre and Great Bend. To these places without roads, and guided only by marked trees, the people were obliged to travel for bread-stuffs. For very many of the articles absolutely needed, long and laborious journeys had to be made, and not until 1815 or 1818 were any places established within the settlement for supplying the wants of the people.

Between the years 1815 and 1818 the first blacksmith-shop was established by Jones West, who came hither from Albany County, N. Y.

In 1826 the first boot and shoe shop was opened by David Benedict, whose son, N. M. Benedict, one of Starrucca's most highly esteemed citizens, still continues the business.

In 1850 Egbert Englet established a shop for building and repairing wagons. The time of beginning other industries will be mentioned under their respective headings.

The first hotel or public-house was situated where now is the dwelling-house of James J. Dalton, and was kept first by David Spoor and afterwards by Thomas Carr. The second hotel was built near the present residence of M. M. Benedict, and was kept at different times by —— Sampson, Jesse Corwin, W. Sampson, John M. Sampson and H. McMurray.

In 1862 H. Johnson opened a hotel in the building afterwards purchased by W. W. Mumford, and now occupied by him as a dwelling-house.

Starrucca, at present, has two well-conducted hotels,—the Starrucca Valley House, in the centre of the village, is owned and kept by Thomas Caden. This hotel is second to none in the vicinity. The Mountain House, large and commodious, is well-kept by Mrs. John Redington.

Dr. Thomas J. Mumford was the first resident physician at Starrucca. He commenced practice here in 1845. The resident physicians at Starrucca since Dr. Mumford's time have been Dr. J. P. Shaw, who came from Franklin, N. Y.; Dr. Utter, Dr. Green, Dr. A. J. Harris, from Candor, N. Y.; and Dr. J. C. Bateson, who at present has a very successful and extensive practice. Dr. Shaw is still a resident of Starrucca.

Growth—Incidents, Etc.—The growth of the village was very slow until 1845, the year in which the building of the tannery was begun. At this time there were but eleven dwelling-houses where the village now is.

Outside the village, but within the present borough limits, some of the afterwards most prosperous and energetic citizens of Starrucca had located. Among these were Benjamin and Robert King, of King Hill. The Messrs. King came here from Mount Pleasant township.

Both are still living and are among the most honored and trusted citizens of the borough.

Little of interest occurred from the erection of the tannery, in 1844, until the formation of the borough, in 1853.

The first assessment was made in 1854. The valuation at that time was $14,235.75, and the number assessed was fifty persons, as follows:

HASSADIAH SAMPSON, I. D. MUMFORD, Collectors.

In the fall of 1864 great damage was done the village by the bursting of the dam at the reservoir, now known as the Moore Pond. The reservoir, which is about three miles above the town, was filled suddenly by heavy rains, and when the dam gave out, the immense body of water swept down on the village, destroying much property and for a time endangering the lives of many persons. All bridges were swept away and some houses carried down the stream. The main street of the village was entirely torn up. One man, M. Dervin, narrowly escaped being drowned. Dervin and Thomas Caden, now proprietor of the Starrucca Valley House, escaped from the tannery in a boat, and when out in the current the boat capsized. Mr. Caden, being able to swim, reached the shore in safety, but Mr. Dervin not being a swimmer, would have been drowned had it not been that the current carried him into or against a tree-top, to which he clung until the following morning, when he was rescued by Henry Johnston, now of Carbondale, who at that time kept the hotel at Starrucca. It was a long time before Starrucca recovered from the effects of this disastrous flood.

The completion of the Jefferson Branch of the Erie Railroad in 1870 gave new life to the industry and trade of the town. Previous to this the nearest railroad station was at Susquehanna, eleven miles distant. The Jefferson Branch passes through within the borough limits, but the depot is over the line in Susquehanna County, and a little more than half a mile from the centre of the village. It was after the construction of this road that some of the most attractive dwelling-houses and places of business were built. Noticeable among these are the fine residences of Angus Smith, Homer E. Spencer and many others, the stores of Osborn & Co., W. W. Mumford, Stone & Mumford and Mrs. Fred. Erk, the Methodist and Catholic Churches and the two hotels.

August 18, 1873, occurred the death of Hon. James Mumford, one of the most successful, public-spirited and enterprising citizens of the borough.

In the year 1877, Starrucca suffered another great loss—the death of Benjamin Sampson, Sr. Mr. Sampson, like Judge Mumford, was energetic, thrifty and public-spirited, always leading in anything that promised to advance the welfare of the community at large. At the time of his death he had a family of twenty-seven children, nearly all of whom still live at or near Starrucca.

February 26, 1878, Mr. A. M. Lancaster, who for years had been an honored citizen of the borough, was accidentally killed while on his way from Honesdale to Starrucca. The circumstances attending Mr. Lancaster's death were distressing in the extreme. In the fall of 1876 he labored for the election of P. A. Clark to the office of sheriff.

Mr. Clark was elected and Mr. Lancaster was appointed deputy sheriff, and he removed at once to Honesdale. On the morning of the fatal February 26th he was out on official business at Starrucca. The road taken by him crossed the premises of James T. Hyatt. Mr. Hyatt at the time was chopping down a tree which stood by the side of the highway. The day was wild and stormy. Mr. Lancaster being wrapped up did not see the chopper, and Hyatt, in turn, did not observe the approaching traveler. The wind rose suddenly, and the tree went down across the road at the very moment the sheriff was passing. Mr. Lancaster was struck by the body of the tree and instantly killed. He was buried with Masonic honors by the Great Bend Commandery, Knights Templar, of which, at the time of his death, he was a member.

In the summer of 1878 a second tragedy, the famous Van Alstine case, occurred. The details of the affair are still fresh in the minds of the people of Starrucca. We have here only to record the principal points. In 1876 Van Alstine was sentenced to the State Penitentiary for an aggravated assault on a neighbor. In the summer of 1878 he was released and returned to his home at Starrucca, where he found his wife about to become a mother. A few weeks after his return Van Alstine died in terrible agony. All the symptoms and circumstances indicated that he died from the effects of poison. His wife was arrested on charge of murder, and committed to the county jail to await trial. While in the jail she gave birth to a child. The commonwealth failed to establish the guilt of the woman and she was released. Van Alstine, at the time of his death resided on the premises afterwards purchased by William M. Kerr, who has improved and beautified the place, making it one of the most productive farms in the vicinity.

After this there followed a whole chapter, as it were, of tragic deaths. In 1879 Charles Mayo was instantly killed in Case's mill. June 21, 1884, Dr. Daniel Utter fell down the stairs of his residence and was killed outright. October 15th of the same year Mrs. B. C. King, wife of Benjamin King, and one of the most estimable ladies of the borough, was thrown from a wagon while on her way to Starrucca, and killed. In the winter of the same year, Peter Heufflin was killed by a falling tree. And in the following spring, W. H. Stanton, a much-esteemed resident of the place, was killed by being caught by a revolving shaft in a mill in which he was at work. All of these fatal accidents happened within a radius of half a mile.

At the time of taking the census in 1880 the population of the borough was six hundred. The number of taxables at present is two hundred and four, and the total valuation is seventy-three thousand five hundred and ten dollars. In thrift, public spirit and enterprise, Starrucca is second to no village in the county. Many improvements have been made in the appearance of the place since 1883, church edifice newly roofed and repainted, streets and roads improved, and private residences enlarged and beautified.

In addition to the branches of trade and industry mentioned elsewhere, there are three blacksmith shops, one harness shop, one boot and shoe shop, one furniture store, one barber shop, one wagon shop, two meat markets, one job printing office and one manufactory of extension ladders. Of the organizations not referred to elsewhere is the Starrucca Cornet Band, of eighteen members, organized in 1882, and now under the leadership of Professor S. V. Stockman.

Manufacturing and other Industries. —There is but very little to record of the manufacturing interests of Starrucca, until the erection of the tannery, in 1884.

The first mill for manufacturing lumber was built about the beginning of the present century. It was situated on the premises now owned by John Glover, and was owned by Henry Sampson and John Crosscup. The second mill was known as the "Middle Mill," and was located nearly where now stands the saw-mill owned by Judge Strong. Soon after this numerous mills were erected, and lumbering became the principal industry. The lumber, of course, was marketed at Philadelphia, and after being manufactured had to be hauled to the Delaware River, at Hale's Eddy, N. Y., from which point it was floated to market. When we remember that this product had to be hauled a distance of twelve miles to the river, and then make the hazardous passage of the Delaware to Philadelphia, and that the price of lumber delivered at Philadelphia was remarkably low, we can readily understand that this industry was very laborious and by no means profitable. Surely it must have required a hardy and persevering people to continue it.

In or about the year 1818 the first grist-mill at Starrucca was built by Henry Sampson. The site chosen by Mr. Sampson was the picturesque Starrucca Falls, on the farm now owned by James J. Dalton. The old mill, the foundation walls of which remain, stood in the weird chasm which now is spanned by the "high trestle" of the Jefferson Branch of the Erie Railroad. The shricking locomotive does much to modernize the place, but the "Falls," with its old ruins, is Starrucca's favorite resort. The second grist-mill at Starrucca was built in 1842 by the late Judge Mumford. This mill was several times rebuilt, and finally, in 1884, was entirely destroyed by fire. At the time of its destruction it was owned by C. D. Mumford, E. C. Mumford and C. M. Keene, the latter a grandson of Judge Mumford.

After the destruction of the Mumford mill Mr. H. E. Spencer erected a flouring-mill, in which he has placed steam-power and all the latest improvements.

In the fall of 1844 was begun the building of the Starrucca tannery. For years this was the most important industry of this whole section. The tannery was first owned by McMurray, Graham & Cowan, the first two of Delaware County, N. Y., and the latter of Greene County, N. Y. Mr. H. McMurray, who is still living at Starrucca, began the building of the tannery. Judge Cowan, of Delhi, N. Y., was at one time a member of the firm. In 1848 the concern was sold to Hyde, Graham & Stone, and later on to Howe, Drake & Salsbury, by whom it was sold to Major E. P. Strong. In 1863 the tannery was destroyed by fire, but immediately rebuilt. For many years the hides used at the tannery were hauled from Honesdale, and the leather, when manufactured, taken to Honesdale and shipped, by canal-boats, to New York. After the construction of the Erie Railroad, the carting was done to and from Hale's Eddy, N. Y., later from Susquehanna, Pa.

Major Strong continued to operate the tannery until the spring of 1884, at which time it was discontinued on account of the scarcity of hemlock bark. The building was burned down in the fall of 1885.

The first factory, for the manufacturing of acetate of lime, crude-wood spirits and charcoal, built in Wayne County, was the one erected at Starrucca in 1876. There are now three of these factories, commonly called "acid factories," at Starrucca. The first is owned and operated by the Starrucca Chemical Company; the second, built in 1881, by the Susquehanna Chemical Company; and the third, built in 1882, by the Melrose Chemical Company. None of these companies are incorpoporated, simply operating as private business firms. All the products of these factories are obtained from wood,—beech, birch and maple. The process of manufacturing is this: The wood is placed in iron retorts, the fronts of which are carefully and securely sealed; the back of the retort having an opening fourteen inches in diameter, to which is attached eighty feet of copper pipe. This pipe is coiled in a vat, filled with water so as to submerge the pipe. A fire is then kept burning under the retorts, thus charring the wood in the retorts and causing all fumes created by the charring of the wood to pass through the copper pipe. This condenses fumes, or gas, into liquid. The liquid is then passed to a second floor, where lime is mixed with it. The lime acts as a body wherewith to retain acid. This liquid is then transferred to stills, where the spirit is extracted, and the remaining portions removed to evaporating pans, where it is reduced to an almost solid substance. From these pans it is taken to kilns, where it is dried, after which it is placed in sacks ready for market. The spirits, or liquid portion of the product, is shifted to refineries, where it is rectified, and is known to the trade as wood alcohol. At one time this was a most profitable industry, but over-production has reduced prices to such an extent that at present only a very moderate percentage on money invested is received by those who are engaged in the business.

From 1883 to 1885 the facilities for manufacturing were increased to such an extent that in less than two years the production was more than doubled, thus overstocking the market and reducing prices to such an extent that several factories, in different parts of the country, were, of necessity, closed. This relieved the market, and prices advanced, so that at the present writing the business is paying a moderate profit.

To erect and equip one of these factories, of the average capacity, involves an expense of eighteen thousand dollars. The price now received for the acetate is three-fourths to one cent per pound, and for the crude alcohol, fifty to sixty cents per gallon.

A very important addition to the industries of Starrucca is the turning-works, owned and operated by the Osborn Turning Company. This enterprise was originated by Colonel George B. Osborn, who is, and has always been, one of the enterprising citizens of Starrucca. Colonel Osborn, with his characteristic thoroughness, has equipped this factory with machinery of the most approved kind, for all kinds of wood-turning. The factory is supplied with steam-power and employs a large number of hands. This comprises all the manufacturing interests, excepting the manufacture of hemlock lumber, which has been conducted on an extensive scale, at different times, by the late Judge Mumford, Captain H. L. Stephens, N. E. Spencer & Co. and many others.

Mercantile.—In 1844 Starrucca had one general store owned by McMurray, Graham & Cowan, and known by the appellation of "7x9" store, so nicknamed because of the small size of the building. This store was situated on the site where now stands the residence of B. C. Kidder and the finely appointed millinery parlors of Mrs. B. C. Kidder. The second store was established by S. D. Mumford. The first regular store building was erected in 1847 by McMurray, Graham & Cowan. In this building the mercantile business was carried on at different periods by the following firms: L. A. Osborn & Co., Osborn Bros., E. P. Strong, W. W. Mumford & Co. and finally Geo. B. Osborn & Co., who continued business in the "old store" until 1876, in which year they erected the store building now occupied by Quinn & Sherman. In this building, which is one of the largest, best finished and finest arranged buildings of the kind in the county, Osborn & Co. continued trade until January 1, 1885, when they were succeeded by Aldrich & Sherman, who rented the store of Osborn & Co. for a term of five years. The firm of Aldrich & Sherman was dissolved in September, 1885, F. S. Sherman continuing the business for a time, and in May of the present year was succeeded by the firm of Quinn & Sherman.

Starrucca now has four general stores, each one of them being well stocked and doing a thriving business. The parties engaged in this branch of trade are W. W. Mumford, Quinn & Sherman, Erk & Bundy and G. S. McMurray. In addition to this, there is one hardware store, two family goods stores as also the drug and book store of J. E. Farrell & Co.

Schools.—The first school was kept in an old dwelling-house near the present residence of C. D. Mumford. This school is said to have been taught by Miss M. J. Stoddard. This was about 1828. The first school building was erected in 1839 on the hill where the present Protestant Cemetery is. At present there are three school buildings in the borough,—one known as the "King Hill School," another as the "County Bridge School," the third being the Starrucca Graded School building, erected in 1882 and conducted the first year by Professor Lindsay and Mrs. N. L. Woodmansee and the second and third years by Job S. Niles and Mary E. Farrell.

CHURCHES.

Baptist.—It is quite certain that among the earliest settlers of Starrucca borough, the Baptists were, by far, the most numerous. Tradition says, that as far back as 1795 or 1796 services were conducted at Starrucca by an ordained minister of the Baptist Church, Rev. Ezekiel Sampson, of whom it is related that he rode on horseback, guided by marked trees, a distance of twenty miles, to Mount Pleasant township, where he officiated at the first marriage solemnized in that township.

The "Scott Baptist Church," a history of which is given by Bailey, in his "History of the Abington Association," published in 1863, was the original Baptist Church of Starrucca, and was formally organized November 5, 1823, at the residence of Squire Whittekar, which is almost opposite the hotel of Thomas Carr, where, years later, the first Methodist, as also the first Catholic, services at Starrucca were held. When first organized, the society consisted of fourteen members. The council of Baptist brethren who came to Starrucca Baptist Church was composed of members of the churches at Tompkins (now Deposit), N. Y., Masonville, N. Y., Windsor, N. Y., Mount Pleasant, Pa., Damascus, Pa., and Bethany, Pa. The first person appointed deacon of this church was Jirah Mumford, Jr., and Squire Whittekar was the first clerk.

Among the first Baptist preachers who officiated at Starrucca were Rev. Jason Corwin, of Franklin, N. Y., Rev. John Switzer, of Bethany, Pa., Rev. James Clarke, Rev. Elijah Peck, also Rev. Michael Fredrick, of Great Bend, Pa., and Rev. Charles H. Hubbard, of Bethany, Pa.

In 1830 the church was in a flourishing condition, having fifty-eight communicants, and up to 1840 continued to prosper, but during the next ten years experienced much trouble from within. Tradition has not handed down the exact nature of all these sorrows, but historian Bailey writes that during this period the church experienced many "painful and peculiar" trials.

In 1833 Mr. David Benedict (father of Mr. N. M. Benedict, of Starrucca) was appointed clerk of the church, and this year also the Abington Association held its twenty-fifth anniversary at Starrucca, and, according to the records, was "greeted with a hearty welcome."

From 1835 to 1839 Rev. Isaac D. Jones served the society, and was assisted in his ministrations by Revs. Henry Curtis, J. W. Parker and Ezekiel Sampson.

March, 1839, Rev. J. J. Fuller became pastor, and so continued until 1843, being assisted at times by Revs. D. D. Gray and Silas Finn.

In 1843 Rev. James Spencer became pastor. Elder Spencer's immoral and unchristian conduct brought odium on the society, and in August, 1848, he was repudiated by the church and no longer allowed to officiate.

From this time up to 1853 the society appears to have been without any regular attendant minister, Rev. Rial Tower, Silas Finn and O. L. Hall officiating at intervals, also Rev. J. B. Worden. In 1853 Rev. J. W. Van Horn assumed the pastorate of the church and for a time the society grew rapidly, ninety-one communicants being reported in 1854. However, Elder Van Horn, like Elder Spencer, soon brought sorrow to the society by his licentiousness, and on the 17th of March, 1855, was promptly excluded from the church "for his notorious wickedness," as the annals have it. From this time up to 1861 Rev. E. C. Cook and Rev. H. Sherwood (the latter of New York) officiated occasionally. From 1861 until 1863 Rev. Elder Tower acted as pastor and was succeeded by Rev. Geo. W. Evans, now of Sherman, Pa. Elder Evans was succeeded by Rev. Geo. Howe. In 1870 the church was again agitated and disheartened by the improper (or at least so reported) conduct of its pastor, and, as in the case of Elder Spencer and Elder Van Horn, convened a council and, after due deliberation, withdrew the right hand of fellowship from Elder Howe and excluded him from the church.

Soon after this Rev. Mr. Addams, now of Hawley, Pa., became pastor and remained such until 1876. For some time the church was again without a pastor. In 1878 Rev. S. W. Cole was placed in charge and continued to act as pastor until 1881. Here again the church was left for a time without a minister. In 1883 Rev. S. E. Carr accepted a call from the church at Starrucca. Rev. Mr. Carr remained with the society until 1884, when he returned to Hamilton College to resume his studies. If this society has, at times, been dishonored by unworthy clergymen, it was surely honored in the person of its last pastor, "the blind preacher," Rev. S. E. Carr, who was in every acceptance of the term a Christian gentleman. His amiability, gentleness and scholarship—remarkable in one who from his sixteenth year had been entirely deprived of his eyesight—won for him the esteem and admiration of all, regardless of sect. From the time of Mr. Carr's withdrawal until the present writing the church has been once more without a pastor. Notwithstanding the fact that many of the wealthiest citizens of Starrucca were members of this society, no church edifice has been erected (however, the Baptists contributed liberally towards the erection of the present Methodist Church building). How long the congregation will remain without a suitable house of worship remains to be seen.

No fitter words can be found, wherewith to close this article, than the concluding sentences of historian Bailey's article on the same church in 1853.

"The field is still promising, and faithful brethren and sisters will, it is hoped, yet gather up their strength and gird themselves for the conflict on the scene of their former trials and triumphs."

THE METHODIST CHURCH. — The first authentic records of this society at Starrucca begin with the year 1838, in which year Nathaniel Lewis, a local preacher of South Harmony (now Susquehanna), Pa., came to Starrucca, and after meeting many rebuffs in his efforts to secure a suitable place for holding service, finally succeeded in persuading Thomas Carr, the inn-keeper, to allow him to preach in his bar-room.

Mr. Lewis preached with so much effect that Mrs. Carr, the landlady, and her daughter, Miss Carr, were at once convinced, and soon after Mr. Carr, the landlord, declared his belief in the truth of Christianity as set forth by Mr. Lewis.

For some time the preaching was continued in the same place, resulting in the formation of a society. Local preachers continued their labors, in which they were aided at regular intervals by ministers of the surrounding Methodist charges.

This resulted in a continued increase of members, and after a lapse of time the services were transferred to the school building at that time known as the "Baptist School-House." In this building the Methodists continued to worship until the erection of the first Methodist Church at Starrucca, known as the "Old Church." The building still exists, and is one of the landmarks of the village. Some years ago it was removed from its original site to the lower end of the town, and is now used as a dwelling-house.

The first charter granted the Methodist Episcopal Church at Starrucca was confirmed by the Wayne County Court in December, 1853. The trustees named in this charter were C. A. Lakin, Lyman Woodmansee, Henry Sampson, C. P. Tallman and D. M. Benedict. The society continued to grow, and in 1871 the present tasty and commodious edifice was erected.

In the erection of the present church the society acknowledge their indebtedness to Judge E. P. Strong for munificent aid.

We append herewith a list of the regularly appointed ministers who have officiated as pastors of the Starrucca Methodist Episcopal Church, from the time of its formation up to the present date,—

Alanson Benjamin	1839–40
Philo Blakeman	1841
Peter G. Bridgeman	1842–43
David Davis	1844–45
Philip Bartlett	1846
N. S. Dewitt	1848–49
C. V. Arnold	1850–51
William Shelps	1852–53
Samuel G. Stevens	1854–55
Minor Swallow	1856
Joseph Madison	1857–58
Frederick Illman	1859
Joseph Williams	1860
Geo. W. Leach & Carter Woodward	1861
Ira M. Pardee	1862–63
N. I. Reynolds	1864–65
J. D. Woodruff	1866
S. G. Stevens	1867
H. H. Dresser	1868, 1869–70
W. B. Kenney	1871
David Laresh	1872–73
Moses D. Fuller	1874, 1875–76
James H. Taylor	1877, 1878–79
F. A. Druay	1880–81
George A. Curl	1882, 1883–84
D. A. Sanford	1885–86

The present board of trustees consist of Dr. J. P. Shaw, William B. Stoddard, Hon. E. P. Strong, Myron P. Leach and Frank L. Van Hoesen.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The history of the Catholic Church at Starrucca is very indefinite as to date. Of the early Catholic inhabitants of the town, not one now remains in the locality. Like the first settlers of Starrucca, they have either passed away or have removed to distant parts of the country, where they cannot now be reached. From non-Catholic sources the writer learns that up to the year 1851 services were not held regularly by the Catholics at Starrucca, but that the people were favored with an occasional visit from priests stationed at Honesdale, Pa., and Deposit, N. Y. Father O'Riley, of Susquehanna, was the first Catholic clergyman who visited Starrucca regularly. The first Catholic service was held in the ball-room of the old "Tom Carr" hotel (the same hotel in the bar-room of which the first Methodist service had been held years before), and we are informed that the Catholics present did not number ten persons. During Father O'Riley's pastorate the society grew rapidly in numbers, and soon after his coming to Starrucca arrangements were made for the erection of a church edifice. The site was selected and lumber purchased, but for some reason, now unknown, the movement fell through. Soon after this, Starrucca was taken from Father O'Riley's parish by the Bishop of Philadelphia, and attached to Banagall, in Mount Pleasant township. Rev. Father Delenave then became pastor of the church at Starrucca, and in time was succeeded by Rev. Father Brehony, who, in turn, was succeeded by Rev. J. J. Judge. It was during Father Judge's pastorate the building of St. Paul's Church was begun. This was in 1871, and before the building was completed Starrucca was again made a part of the Susquehanna parish, and Rev. J. Slattery became pastor. Soon after this the church edifice was finished. For a time the congregation was attended by Rev. Father Brehony, who was succeeded by Rev. Richard Hennesey. Father Hennesey died very suddenly in August, 1880, and from that time until the coming of Rev. P. F. Broderick the church at Starrucca was, necessarily, sadly neglected. Father Broderick again established regular service, driving to Starrucca himself, after having celebrated Mass at an early hour in the church at Susquehanna.

After the departure of Father Broderick from Susquehanna, in 1883, the Starrucca Church was attended, for a time, by Rev. W. Nealon, who was succeeded by Rev. L. O'Loughlin.

The church is located finely on a beautiful knoll in the centre of the village. The ground on which the church stands was donated by Judge E. P. Strong, to whom, as also to many other non-Catholics, the Catholics of Starrucca gratefully acknowledge their indebtedness for generous aid.

Since 1883 the church has been much improved (especially so since the coming of Rev. Father O'Loughlin), and at present is one of the most attractive church edifices in Northern Wayne County. Rev. A. J. Ryan, the "Poet Priest" of Alabama, who once lectured in the church, styled it the "Parlor Church" of the diocese.

SOCIETIES.

Starrucca Lodge No. 2903, Knights of Honor, is entitled to the honor of being the first Mutual Benefit Association organized at Starrucca. This lodge was instituted January 12, 1883, by W. G. Greely, of Honesdale, assisted by a delegation from the Knights of Honor Lodge at Thompson, Pa. The Supreme Lodge, Knights of Honor, granted a charter on the 30th of August in the same year, and since that time the society has made rapid progress. The membership has more than doubled, and, at the present writing, the Starrucca Lodge, Knights of Honor, ranks high among organizations of its kind in the county. Their rooms (the Starrucca Library Rooms) are commodious and neatly furnished. The following were the first officers of the lodge: Past Dictator, C. D. Mumford; Dictator, George B. Osborn; Vice-Dictator, W. W. Mumford; Assistant Dictator, Irwin Nash; Reporter, Andrew Koehler; Financial Reporter, A. C. Lindsay; Treasurer, W. T. Finch; Guide, Calvin Utter; Guardian, A. R. Tennant; Sentinel, E. G. Bowell; Chaplain, E. J. Collyer.

Starrucca Library Association,—This organization was formed September 1, 1879, with the following officers: President, Clarence G. Mumford; Vice-President, Nelson, L. Woodmansee; Treasurer, Major E. P. Strong; Corresponding Secretary, B. C. Kidder; Recording Secretary, James E. Farrell; Board of Managers, Hon. W. W. Mumford, N. M. Benedict, Colonel George B. Osborn.

Within a few months from the time of its establishment the society numbered two hundred and ten members, which, considering the population of the village, is somewhat remarkable. In less than one year from its formation the society accumulated a collection of a little more than six hundred volumes of choice works. Rooms were procured and neatly furnished. A librarian was appointed, a salary paid and the rooms opened to the public two afternoons and evenings of each week.

During the first five years of its existence the association maintained a course of lectures and entertainments, always employing the best available talent. Among the names of those who lectured before the association, we find the following: Hon. Schuyler Colfax, ex-Vice-President, Benjamin F. Taylor, of Chicago, General Judson Kilpatrick, John Boyle O'Riley, of Boston, Anna Dickinson, and many others.

Whatever the future of the association may be, this much is certain, it leaves to Starrucca as a heritage one of the finest collections of books to be found outside the county-seat, Honesdale. In the catalogue, constitution, etc., of the Library Association, printed at Binghamton, N. Y., in 1880, we find the following:

"The association gratefully acknowledge their indebtedness to the following persons for generous donations of books and other aid: Hon. Edward Overton, Towanda, Pa., Mr. L. A. Osborn, New York, Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Strong, Boston, Mass., Mr. W. J. Kellam, New York, Mr. E. A. Penniman, Honesdale, Pa., Hon. George M. Beebe, Monticello, N. Y., Mrs. H. L. Stevens, Starrucca, Pa.

Captain Oliver Mumford Post, No. 373, G. A. R., was mustered in September 15, 1883, and was named "Captain Oliver Mumford Post," in honor of Captain Oliver Mumford, of Starrucca, who was killed in the battle in front of Petersburg, May 18, 1863. This organization has been the "Banner Post" among the G. A. R. Posts of the county, and includes nearly all the surviving Union soldiers who reside in the townships of Scott, Preston and Starrucca, together with some who reside in Buckingham township. The post meets the second and fourth Saturdays of each month, in the rooms occupied by the Starrucca Lodge, Knights of Honor, and Starrucca Library Association. The first officers of the post were Colonel George B. Osborn, Commander; J. M. Surrine, Senior Vice-Commander; John Knapp, Junior Vice-Commander; Calvin Utter, Officer of Day; J. H. Smith, Quartermaster; N. L. Dow, Adjutant; M. Cramer; R. F. Howard, Quarmaster-Sergeant; A. A. Ayers, Sergeant-Major.

The present membership is about one hundred.

St. Paul's Branch, No. 32, C. M. B. A.—This branch of the Catholic Mutual Benefit Association was instituted at Starrucca, June 12, 1886, by District Deputy Hasset, assisted by a large delegation from Susquehanna, Pa. The charter granted by the Supreme Council of the order bears date September 1, 1885. St. Paul's Branch, since its organization, has—like the Starrucca Lodge, Knights of Honor—made wonderful progress. Only a few months have elapsed to the present writing, and yet the membership has increased almost three-fold. The society meets each alternate Saturday, in the commodious branch-room at the Mountain House Hotel.

The first officers of the Branch were President, John Dougherty; First Vice-President, M. Gilleron; Second Vice-President, H.Ording; Treasurer, James E. Farrell; Recording Secretary, P. H. Harrington; Assistant Secretary, J. J. Traynor; Financial Secretary, J. H. Farrell; Chancellor, S. V. Stockman; Guard, Thomas Yates.

First representative to the Grand Council of Pennsylvania, James E. Farrell; Alternate, James J. Traynor.

Post-Office.—The first post-office at Starrucca was established upwards of fifty years ago. The records now to be found at Starrucca do not give exact dates; neither do they give the name of the first postmaster. However, tradition says that Thomas Carr was the first postmaster, and that in 1836 the mail was carried from Deposit, N. Y., to Echo, Pa. (now Thompson, Pa.), via Starrucca, by Nathan Dean, and afterwards by S. O. Dean, who at the time of his death, in 1885, was president of the village of Deposit.

In 1850 the mail-route was changed, making

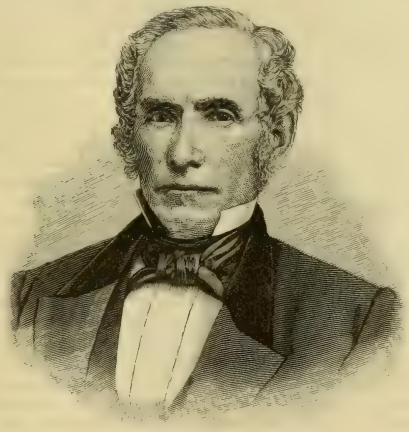
Lanesboro, Pa., the starting-point, and, going by the way of Starrucca, Thompson, Ararat, Jackson and Gibson, Pa., terminating at Harford, Pa. This route remained unchanged until the completion of the Jefferson Branch of the Erie Railroad, since which time the mail has been carried by D. T. Benedict from the railroad station to the post-office.

The names of those who officiated as postmasters at Starrucca since 1836 are James Cowan, James Howe, Lewis A. Osborn, Nelson M. Benedict (Mr. Benedict receiving his commission from President Pierce, and retaining the position until 1869), Colonel George B. Osborn, Henry F. Aldrich and James E. Farrell, the present incumbent.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JUDGE JAMES MUMFORD.

The origin of this prominent Wayne County family is somewhat shrouded by the dust of the passing centuries, although there is reason to believe it to be of Welsh extraction, inasmuch as Thomas and Peleg Mumford, two brothers from Wales, settled in Rhode Island, the country of the Narragansetts, just previous to 1700. Thomas had six children, one of whom, Jirah, born 1702, married 1721, was probably the progenitor of the family. In support of this theory we find Jirah born 1747, married March 14, 1776, to Deborah Lillibridge, born 1756, moved to the smiling valley of the Connecticut in 1780, and had thirteen children, Jirah, born February 16, 1778, being the eldest son.



On March 25, 1793, another removal was made, and the entire family settled in Mount Pleasant township, Wayne County, Pa., after the father had purchased land near Belmont and prepared a home for them. It would seem that Jirah was sent to Orange County, N. Y., probably to procure the education unobtainable here in those days, and on February 26, 1800, he there married Polly Baker, afterwards returning to Wayne County to commence lumbering. He was one of that association known as the "Nine Partners," their mill being located about two miles north of Starrucca, at the point now called Melrose.

His children were Deborah (married James Dickison), John, James, Phœbe (married Joseph Hyatt), Thomas R. (a physician and county official of some prominence, who died in 1850), Stephen Decatur, Dolly Maria (married J. M. Sampson) and Sally Ann, who died young. Mary ("Polly"), one of the sisters of Jirah Mumford, was one of the participants in the first wedding in Mount Pleasant township, being united to Silas Kellogg, on January 1, 1796, by Rev. Ezekiel Sampson, the pioneer pastor of Starrucca borough. His Uncle Thomas was married to Eliza Fisher, and had two children, one of whom, Thomas, born 1780, married Theodosia Carr, who bore him five children, Mary Ann, born August 9, 1811, being the youngest. Jirah Mumford, the third child of this couple, was born in Mount Pleasant township, on December 20, 1805. Owing to the lack of educational facilities in those early days of the county, he received but limited advantages, and has frequently said his education was obtained almost entirely by the light of a pine knot, or seated before a blazing wood fire during the long winter evenings. When he was about nine years old the family moved to what is now the borough of Starrucca, and Jirah Mumford took up several thousand acres of land for farming and lumbering purposes, and his name appears on the tax-list of 1823 for a mill located on the Starrucca Creek proper. In this employ the youth of James was passed, and a hardy, self-reliant, energetic manhood obtained. In 1830 he bought a beaver dam, below his father's home, on which he put up a house in which he boarded the men working on his various business ventures. On December 8, 1831, he married his relative, Mary Ann, daughter of Thomas Mumford, before mentioned, and, aided by her wise counsel and judicious advice, was enabled to extend his operations and increase in value and standing. Taking an interest in public affairs, he was, in 1834, elected justice of the peace, and continued in such office until 1846, when he received from the Governor the appointment of associate judge. When, in 1850, the Constitution was amended providing for the election of judges by the people, Judge Mumford and T. H. R. Tracy were the first associate judges elected, and both served until the expiration of the term, in September, 1856.

In 1840 he erected the grist-mill on the stream, and in 1850 had purchased three thousand acres of timber land at Melrose; hence, on the expiration of his term of office, he determined to devote his life to his family and the large and constantly increasing demands of band did not long survive, he dying August 18, 1873. At the time of his death he owned and operated two saw-mills and one grist-mill, and some twelve hundred acres of farm and timber land, and was employing considerable labor. He was a tender husband, a devoted father, a firm friend and kind neighbor, ever ready with aid and advice, always foremost in good works and honorable in all transactions, both public and private.

business. During the next sixteen years he engaged in cutting and manufacturing the timber from his extensive tracts of land, and in 1872 sold the remaining bark to Major E. P. Strong, and the land to Bennett & Webster.

Then he bought some six hundred acres, nearly surrounding the Coxtown Pond, which now is in the hands of Hon. Warren W. and Clinton D., two of his sons.

On August 9, 1870, the life's journey of Mrs. Mumford came to an end and her hus-

The children of Judge James and Mary Ann Mumford were twelve in number, viz.: Oliver, born December 10, 1832; Olive, born July 29, 1834, married V. M. Keene; James L., born May 28, 1836; Mary Adelaide, born May 30, 1839, married Colonel George B. Osborn; Warren W., born December 5, 1840; Hattie E., born April 24, 1842, married Daniel Cargill, and died June 18, 1866, leaving one child (son), Daniel C.; Clarence G., born March 2, 1844, married Susie Avery; Clinton

D., born November 24, 1845, married Joanna Pickering and has one child, Louis; Urban B., born November 14, 1847, married Emma Ball; Elwin C., born August 8, 1849, married Ella Sutton and has one child, Mary A.; and Thomas J., born August 13, 1857.

Of this large family, two entered the army when the country needed their services during the late Rebellion, and gave their lives to perpetuate the Union,—Oliver, lieutenant Company A, Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, being killed while leading the regiment into action at Petersburg, Va., and James L., captain Company G, One Hundred and Forty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, losing his life on the field at Chancellorsville, Va. Clarence G. was one of the three months' men and went out in the State militia. Another son, Hon. Warren W., was elected to the State Legislature in 1874. Two other sons, Urban B. and Elwin C., chose the law, and are rapidly building a good name and lucrative practice in such profession, the first in Washington Territory, the latter at Honesdale, this county. Warren W. and Clinton D. are heavily engaged in business here and elsewhere. They built and still operate the Starrucca Chemical Works, which were the first of such character in the county, and are prominent factors in the prosperity of the county at large. Mary Adelaide and Thomas J. still reside on the homestead, within the limits of Starrucca borough.

This sketch would be incomplete without a certain special mention. Oliver Mumford married Anne Legg, who bore him one child, whose life went out shortly after the death of the heroic father. The widow devoted her remaining years to the spreading of Gospel truths and has during the past fourteen years been located in Turkey in Europe, a highly successful missionary of the Presbyterian Church Society. One church at Philippopolis has been erected through her, and much valuable service rendered. During the Russo-Turkish War (during all of which she maintained her position) she adopted two children, whose father had been slain in one of the numerous fights, and has them in this country, undergoing a course of education with a view to giving their life-work to the cause of Christianity in their native country. She it was who hung the American flag to the breeze from the window of her house in Philippopolis while the victorious Russian troops marched through the city, as was described by the correspondent of the New York Herald at the time.

HON. W. W. MUMFORD.

This gentleman, the oldest living son of the late Judge James Mumford, was born on December 3, 1840, in that section of Preston township which now is incorporated as Starrucca borough. When in his seventh year he was sent to the district school and remained an attendant upon its teachings until eighteen years old, when he went to the academy kept by the then County Superintendent of Schools S. A. Terrell and Professor Briggs, at Prompton, Wayne County. After one term's tuition there a season as teacher followed, that being succeeded by a course of study at the Montrose Academy. In 1862, he attended the State Normal School at Millersville, Pa. While there, in 1863, the call for troops to defend the State against the rebels was made, and Mr. Mumford joined the special company raised by Professor J. P. Wickersham among the Normal students. The alarm having subsided, the company was disbanded and our subject attended Lowell's Business College, Binghamton, N. Y., for a term, on conclusion of which he returned to Starrucca and entered mercantile business as clerk with Major E. P. Strong. His services proving valuable, at the end of one year, in 1865, he became partner in the business, under firm style W. W. Mumford & Co. Five years later the interest of Major Strong was purchased by Colonel G. B. Osborn and the firm became Mumford & Osborn.

This continued some three years, until the death of Judge Mumford, in 1873, necessitated the retirement of Mr. Mumford for the purpose of settling up the extensive business interests of his father. This step was accomplished by the purchase of his interest by Major Strong. During the fall of 1874 his nomination for representative of the State Legislature was made unknown to himself; but buckling on the Republican armor, he entered the lists to overcome a Democratic majority and succeeded by a handsome surplus. In Starrucca his popularity was so great that but three votes were cast against him. In the House he was placed upon three committees and served the people faithfully and well. During his membership he had determined upon a future course and had erected a large store for mercantile purposes near his residence in the borough; so upon retirement from the halls of legislation he at once placed a varied stock of goods in the building and recommenced business life in 1876. About this time, having given considerable thought and attention to the question of the manufacture of chemicals, and in company with his brother, C. D. Mumford, having purchased eight hundred acres of timber land, it was decided to establish works for the purpose. Associating with them a practical and experienced manufacturer, the factory was erected and the Starrucca Chemical Company was put in operation, the pioneer of an industry in Wayne County which now engages five large works, heavy capital and employs a large list of men in its various departments, making pyroligneous acid and wood alcohol from the abundant beech, birch and maple forests of the country.

Mr. Mumford was elected school director in the spring of 1874, and recognizing the immense advantage of a liberal education, he has always given support to matters looking to the pushing forward such ability. The school-house had long been insufficient for the numbers seeking its doors, and was, in addition, old and dilapidated, and the energies of Mr. Mumford were turned towards remedying such defect. After several years' effort, appropriations were made and increased by subscription lists circulated by the members of the board, and by a fair undertaken for such purpose, until a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the present handsome structure (finished in the fall of 1881) was made up.

At the outset it was said "no use for a larger house;" now of the present edifice, "'tis not large enough for all;" still all classes are proud of the building, and the attendance has rapidly increased.

On October 16, 1868, Mr. Mumford was united in wedlock with Miss Laura A., daughter of Theodore Swift, of Ulster County, N. Y., and the union has resulted in the birth of six children—Lorena, Hattie E., Jennie E., Minnie Belle, Harry W. and Iva Louise.

The Swift family, formerly from Connecticut, have long occupied an honorable position in Ulster County, N. Y., having, for several generations, been extensive farmers and bridge-builders, the majority of the bridges in the vicinity of Gardiner having been put up by the present Mr. Swift or his deceased father. The wife's family name, Bradley, is also prominent in that county, identified with farming interests.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Mumford have long been members of the Baptist Church, and their aid and support to the society and Sunday-school have always counted heavily.

Mr. Mumford is connected with various secret societies; became a member of Susquehanna Lodge, F. and A. M., in 1866; of the Great Bend Chapter in 1871, and of the Great Bend Commandery in 1872. When the lodge of Knights of Honor was organized (1882), at Starrucca, he became one of its charter members, and was its chief officer during the term of one year since then. These affiliations he continued to find pleasure in, and from his various business enterprises takes time to attend their requirements. A thorough business man, he is never content unless up and doing; as a certain sequence, is prosperous and happy.

HON. E. P. STRONG.

Among the earliest settlers in the colonies, the ancestors of this family, emigrating from Shropshire, England, and locating in Connecticut, require mention. The years passed and progress was made, until, in 1785, Elisha Strong, with wife (Anna Pinneo, of French Huguenot descent) and son Jairus, moved farther west and took up a home in Greene County, N. Y.

Hon. Jairus Strong, born at Sharon, Conn., May 4, 1774 (married, January 9, 1799, Dosha Bissell, of East Windsor, Conn.), became an important factor in business and political affairs, and retained large interests in mercantile and tanning operations until his death, in June, 1838, aged sixty-four years. His family consisted of ten children,—Austin, born December 14, 1799; married Elizabeth Bigelow Morss, and died March 16, 1872. Olivia, born November 3, 1801; married Hon. Henry Kinsley, and died October 22, 1850. Clarinda, born January 7, 1804; married Loring Andrews, and died April 9, 1828. Aurelia, born May 4, 1806; married Hon. Albert Tuttle. Minerva and Maria, born March 7, 1808. Minerva, married Hon. Albert Tuttle, and died June 23, 1833. Maria, married Colonel George Robertson, and died April 17, 1877. Elvira, born February 10, 1810; married Dr. Josiah H. Stedman. Daniel Bissell, born July 4, 1812; married Mary Ann Peck, was colonel of the One Hundred and Sixteenth New York Militia for many years, and died May 22, 1874. Louisa, born December 1, 1814. Elisha Pinneo, born August 4, 1818. The mother of this large family died June 6, 1865, aged eighty-eight years. E. P. Strong, born at Ashlan, Greene County, N. Y., received his education at the common school of the district and at the Durham Academy, and in 1842 became interested in the tannery business at Woodbourne, Sullivan County, N. Y., with his eldest brother. Retiring from this connection in 1851, in the fall of that year he was nominated by the Democracy and elected to represent Sullivan County in the State Legislature. At the end of his term a home was once again made in Greene County and retained until his removal to Wayne County, Pa.

On attaining his eighteenth year, Mr. Strong had entered the State Militia, becoming lieutenant in the One Hundred and Sixteenth New York Regiment, commanded by Colonel D. H.

Snyder, of which he became major some time afterwards. After holding a commission therein four years, he retired in 1840.

In 1852, in company with Mr. Guernsey Osborne, Major Strong purchased the Starrucca tannery property, and the first-named gentleman managed the works until 1862, when Major Strong took control of the interest and made a home in the borough, as aforesaid. Shortly after the purchase above mentioned, and while engaged in getting its affairs into running order, Major Strong was notified of his nomination for member of Congress from Greene and Ulster Counties, N. Y., but owing to the pressure of business affairs he could not give personal attention to the canvass and was defeated by the candidate of the Whig party, aided by the Know-Nothing branch.

At the next nominating convention, in 1854, he was again the choice of his party for this honorable office, and, recognizing the strength of the opposition, made a vigorous effort to overcome the majority which they had regularly rolled up.

In this he was so far successful that, although his opponent was elected to the position, yet it was with such a small majority (about twenty) as to leave but little room for congratulation, and afforded abundant testimony of the esteem of the citizens for the subject of our sketch.

E. R. Strong

On July 6, 1846, he married Caroline Peck (born March 17, 1824), who bore him Henry Peck, born June 10, 1847, married Amelia Dietrich, of Dresden, Germany, while visiting in that empire. One child, William Dietrich, born August 18, 1879, has resulted from this union, and the family are residents of Boston, Massachusetts, interested in the New England Conservatory of Music. Daniel Bissell, born July 23, 1849, chose a medical career, and after passing through Claverack (New York) Academy was educated to such end at Paris and Marseilles, France. In 1871 he located at the latter place and has since practiced there with great success, attaining a position of prominence in the medical profession of our sister republic. He married a daughter of France, who has borne him four children—Caroline Stephanie, Mary Magdalene, Elisha Emanuel and Emma Louise (died in childhood). The death of Mrs. E. P. Strong occurred October 14, 1863, and on November 26, 1877, Major Strong was united to Estelle E., daughter of Elisha and Maria Brown, of Jackson, Susquehanna County, Pa., who has borne him one child, Louise, born May 16, 1879.

The subject of this article was engaged in mercantile business in the borough, and withdrew in 1884 after a career of some fifteen years. During a period of about thirty years he carried on a heavy business in the tanning of sole leather for the New York market and in making and shipping lumber, in which operations he necessarily employed considerable numbers of men, and through which the resources of the county were greatly developed and benefited. The depletion of the bark supply caused the closing of the tannery in 1882. During the long business career of over thirty years Major Strong never had a contested lawsuit. It is said of him "he has always been kinder to others than to himself," and sentiments of respect and esteem are heard on all sides.

He has served in various offices to help forward the interests of the borough, and in June, 1884, was appointed by Governor Pattison to the position of associate judge of Wayne County, and in the following November was elected by the people to fill such office for the regular term of five years.

Major Strong has largely interested himself in the dairy question and has gathered a fine herd of Jerseys and Jersey grades, while he is also endeavoring to bring the farming and dairying community to a conception of the greater proportionate value of blooded stock for such purposes.

Regarding the church as a motor necessary to the well-being of civilized people, he gave to the Methodist Episcopal Society of Starrucca a plot of ground and was mainly instrumental in the erection of their building in 1871, and has since been identified with its workings.

When the Catholic society became sufficiently strong to put up a building for church purposes, he again came forward, presented them with a piece of land and gave financial aid in the erection of their place of worship.

Many years ago he joined the Masonic fraternity and holds membership in the Susquehanna Lodge and Great Bend Chapter and Commandery.

ROBERT K. KING.

In the general history of Mount Pleasant township, and also of Starrucca borough, will be observed considerable mention of this family, which, originally from New England, settled in the first-named township late in the last century.

Benjamin King was born in Rhode Island May 23, 1777. During early manhood he accompanied his parents, who were blessed with a large family, to Pennsylvania, and made a home in Mount Pleasant township, as stated. On December 15, 1798, he married Eunice, daughter of David Kennedy, who was born September 25, 1775, whose family also receives proper mention in the history of their township. Their children were Cynthia K., born November 24, 1799, married Peter C. Sherman; Sally Ann, born April 24, 1801, married Reuben Peck; Hawkins, born May 18, 1803; Lucinda, born June 9, 1805, married C. Palmer Tallman; Durinda, born September 25, 1808, married David H. Clough; Pamelia, born November 25, 1812, married Squire Crater; Robert Kennedy, the subject of our sketch; Benjamin C., born April 15, 1818.

Mr. King, in addition to farming, engaged largely in lumbering on the Lackawaxen, near Pleasant Mount village, and on the Starrucca Creek, within the present limits of the borough, and, after a long and useful life, passed away on June 15, 1860, having survived his partner, who died March 18, 1848.

Robert Kennedy King, born August 27,

1815, spent his first nineteen years on the homestead, and the following three or four years learning more of life among his surroundings. On June 9, 1838, he was united in marriage to Minerva H., daughter of Elihu and Lucretia Tallman, of Preston township, Wayne County, and three days after set out for the then far West, bringing up in McHenry County, Ill., where he began farming. Chicago was then but an infant, and Mr. King township, and made a home in the woods, on that beautiful elevation since known as King's Hill. For some twelve or fifteen years, until the land was cleared of its timber, he cut logs and sent them down the Delaware River to Philadelphia, to market, since which time his days have been spent upon the farm, improving it year by year, until the present handsome appearance has been reached.

Mrs. King also claims New England descent, says he could have visited all the houses it contained in any one day desired. There were no more stores, etc., then in the future metropolis of the West than are now found in Starrucca borough, and yet the new-comers were compelled to go to that place from their home, forty miles north, in order to obtain household supplies. Tiring of this, and finding the climate very malarial, after a year's experience they returned East, and, in 1842, they bought property near the northwestern corner of Preston on both paternal and maternal sides. Her grandfather, Ebenezer Tallman, born at Bedford, Mass., removed to Utica, N. Y., and effected a settlement there. He married Rhoda Akins, and had a numerous family, and many descendants still reside in that part of the beautiful Mohawk Valley. Elihu, their eldest son, was born March 28, 1780, and in 1799, having just been married to Lucretia Perkins, near Ballston Springs, N. Y., moved to Wayne County and made a home in Mount Pleasant township, as will be seen in the general history. Their children were Rebecca P., born 1801, married David Babcock; Rhoda A., born 1802, married John Stanton; William, born 1804; Christopher P., born 1806; Maxamilia, born 1808, married Perry Babcock; Akins, born 1810; Sidney, born 1812; Lucretia A., born 1814, married Alonzo Bennett; Oliver P., born 1817; Minerva H., born November 4, 1819, married Robert K. King, as aforesaid. The Tallman family have written that name in very strong characters upon the history of Mount Pleasant and Preston townships, having been, since the first, foremost in progressive works and in religious and educational matters.

The union of Robert K. King and Minerva Tallman has been happy, and the following children came to gladden their hearth: Anna Z., born July 2, 1840; Ali E., born May 22, 1842, killed at the battle of Petersburg, Va., while bravely upholding the cause of his country, June 18, 1864; Elmer A. and Ellen A., born July 1, 1844; Eunice L., born September 30, 1846; Clarence A. F. E. L., born August 12, 1849; Hector E., born November 21, 1851; Kate I, born March 18, 1854; Lillie Durinda, born April 11, 1857; Ada Alice, born June 11, 1860; Robert B., born March 19, 1863. Anna Z., married Irvin Starbird, and has borne him Ali King, Alfred Clair and William Robert. Elmer A. married Elmira Labar, who has borne him Nellie, Josephine, Minerva and Benjamin Charles. Ellen A. married Edgar Stearnes, and bore him John K. and Minnie S. After the death of Mr. Stearnes she married Henry Hill, and has borne Leona, Lionel and Pearl. Eunice A. married David H. Cole, bore him Ward R., Susie E. and Elmer D., and died July 8, 1882. Clarence A. F. E. L. married Rosa Fletcher, who has borne him Bert E. and Bird R. (twins, Bird R. since deceased), and Anna E. Hector E. married Eva M. Yale. Kate I. married Stephen L. Callender, and has borne Nelson, Everett, Leroy, Archie, Aurora and Vida. Lillie Durinda married David H. Cole, and has borne Leonard and an infant son unnamed. Ada Alice married Wesley D. Peck, and has one child, Cora. Robert B. married Mary Temperton.

This large family has been properly raised and well educated, and is a valuable factor in the growth and prosperity of the county. Mr. King for twenty-one years served the people as school director, a large part of the time being president of the board and treasurer, and his influence and example have ever been of the best, well worthy being handed down to posterity for their respect and emulation.

CHAPTER XXX.

SCOTT TOWNSHIP.

At the time this township was set off from Buckingham, in 1821, it included a portion of what is now Preston; and diminished as it has been, it is still the fourth township in point of size, and perhaps the most sparsely populated in the county. It is the extreme northern township of Wayne, extends from the Delaware River to the Susquehanna County line, and is bounded on the north by New York State, east by the Delaware River, south by Preston and the borough of Starrucca, and west by Susquehanna County. Like the township to the south of it, its water-shed is divided, and a portion of its streamlets flow to the Susquehanna, while the greater part lies in the drainage basin of the Delaware. The chief streams are the branches of the Shehawken, Shrawder's Creek and Hemlock Creek. There are also several fine natural ponds, the largest of which are Four Mile and Island Ponds. The topography is much broken, and the country in the centre of the township lies high on the crest of the ridge that divides its two drainage areas. Much of this land is still rough and uncultivated, and there are many fine timber tracts as yet untouched by the woodman's axe. The southwestern and northeastern portions are thinly settled, and the precipitous hills that lead down to the river contain little land that is available for cultivation. Yet there are many good and productive farms in the township, and as good crops as those in any other part of the county attest how fertile are the fields of this barren-looking soil. The altitude and its increased northern latitude over other portions of the county give the township a long and bitter winter, and its short season will admit of only the successful cultivation of the more hardy crops. The region is particularly adapted to the culture of Northern fruits, and is also a good sheep-growing and stock-raising country. That it should not be a more thickly populated and a more popular township among the settlers of the present day is a matter of surprise to all who know anything of the advantages it offers by reason of its superior railroad facilities. The Erie Railroad skims its eastern border, and the Jefferson Branch of the Delaware and Hudson system touches Starrucca. Enterprise, chiefly from New York State, has built up a thriving village in the northern portion, and industries that promise to contribute much to the rapid settlement of the locality are in successful operation there.

THE EARLY SETTLEMENT.—The first settlers in the township came chiefly from other parts of the county, where they had grown to manhood, and had been inured to the hardships of pioneer life. There was also a contingent from New York State, that crossed the line from the settlements in Delaware County, and a few from other States, who chose this as their first place of residence in Wayne County. At the beginning of the present century the township was all an unbroken wilderness, and a decade of 1800 passes before the first pioneer had penetrated its bleak hills and piny fastnesses. Even after the first clearings had been made, and a trail through the woods connected the new outpost with the older settlements to the south, the increase was slow and discouraging to those that had made it their future home. Even at this late day, its hilly roads are among the worst in the county, and it is easy to understand how, fifty or sixty years ago, the township was isolated and inaccessible. By an assessment made by John Starbird, in 1823, two years after the township was set off, it appears that there were only forty-seven taxables, though a large portion of what is now Preston was then included within the limits. There were then only thirty-seven houses, with a total value of two hundred and fifty dollars; the seven mills were assessed as worth thirteen hundred dollars; fifty-seven cows, seven hundred and fifty dollars. Many of these forty-seven taxables lived in Preston, and when it was set off, three years later, the list was reduced nearly one-third.

The first settler of whom there is any record was Samuel Alexander, a native of Mendon, Mass., who located first in Deposit, N. Y., and moved from there to the farm now occupied by his descendants, just over the Pennsylvania line, on the Deposit road. He married Mary Carpenter, of Orange County, N. Y., and their children were Josiah, still living at the age of eighty-six; Elizabeth, the wife of Robert Early, who lived on the Nelson Sampson place; Elisha, still living on the homestead; Isaac, who went to Nebraska; Charles, a resident of Sanford, N. Y.; Abigail, the wife of Zedekiah Gardenier; Hamilton, who went West; and Mary, the wife of Elijah Carrier, of Winsor, N. Y.

Peter Coal came from Albany during the War of 1812, and located on the farm now known as the "Courtright Place." His wife was Abigail Homan, the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier, and their children were John; David; William; Sally, the wife of a gentleman named Johnson, and afterward married to a Mr. Fish; Betsy, who married Joshua Sands; Polly, the wife of James Lord; and Narcissa, who married Hiram Kennedy.

Rev. Gershom, or "Priest Williams," as he was popularly known, claimed to be a descendant of Lord Townley, and was one of the Williams family of Long Island. He inherited considerable wealth, and at one time owned considerable property in the vicinity of Trinity Church, as well as the largest interest in the only ferry then running between New York City and Brooklyn. Early in his ministerial career he was settled over one of the Brooklyn Churches, and served as pastor for some years. He then moved to New Jersey, from whence he came to Wayne County, and located near Scott Centre, in 1813. He had four sons,—Calvin, Philander, Melancthon and Hervey D. Williams. The latter married and remained on the homestead, and was for years the surveyor of the town. He had four sons,—Abram, Oscar H., George and Charles. There were also two daughters in this generation, both of whom married and moved out of the county. Gershom Williams was a college-bred man, and all of his family were educated, refined and talented people. Mr. Williams was twice married, and his second wife was the victim of a tragedy referred to further on. His grandson, O. H. Williams, was the first town clerk of whom there is any record.

Uriah Smith came from Long Island about 1814, and settled near Maple Hill, clearing up the farm now occupied by B. F. Tewksbury. His wife was Sally, a daughter of Townsend Weyant, and their children were Eliza, the wife of William Dickey, who went West; John F., a resident of the township; Lewis, who is in the West; Michael, who lives near Honesdale; Julia A., the wife of Adam Englert, a resident of the West; Harriet, who married William H. Cushman, of Honesdale; Abigail, who also married Mr. Cushman; and Uriah T., and Wesley T., both of whom are West.

Michael and Townsend Weyant were Long Islanders, who came to Scott about 1814. Michael lived on the place now occupied by William Bowen. He had a number of daughters and the sons mentioned above.

John Smith was also from Long Island, and commenced to clear up the farm on which his son, John H. Smith, now lives, in 1815. His wife was Catharine Harrington, and his children were Charity (the wife of Isaac Alexander), Elizabeth (who married Jonas Parker, and moved to Iowa), Anna (deceased), Ezra, John H. and Adeline (the wife of Wesley T. Smith.)

Benajah Jayne, a brother of Dr. Jayne, of Philadelphia, who has attained world-wide notoriety by his patent medicine ventures, located on Maple Hill about 1816, and cleared up the farm that is still known by his name. He married Polly Whitteker, and had six sons and three daughters, all of whom have gone West. Benajah Jayne is now a resident of New York City, and will be remembered as the person who gained much notoriety, just after the Civil War closed, in connection with the custom-house frauds of New York. He was employed by the government to collect duties on all the goods that had run the custom blockade, and given a large commission. A fortune resulted.

Charles and George Mateer cleared up what is known as the Conant farm, about 1820. Both married daughters of John Whitteker, and went West many years ago.

Whipple Tarbox moved from Jackson, Susquehanna County, about 1824, and cleared up the place now owned by his son Harvey. He had seven children,—Parmelia, who married and went West; Mary, the wife of Lee Sparks; Loise, who married John F. Smith; Hannah, the wife of Lewis Smith; Harvey, who lives on the homestead; and William.

John Dickson is thought to have been the first settler on Shad Pond Creek, and occupied the land where Sherman now stands for a number of years after 1826. Some of his descendants still reside in the vicinity.

Orin Burleigh was a native of Connecticut, who cleared up the farm now occupied by O. L. Burleigh, his son, in 1827. His family consisted of two sons and three daughters. The former were O. S. and W. B. Burleigh, and the latter were Mary, who married Abram Lord; Chloe, the wife of Martin Gardenier; and Harriet, who married Samuel Newman.

Erastus Carr, who is still a resident of the township, came from New York State in 1830, and has a large family, which has added to the valuable citizens of the township.

Major Andress came from Hancock in 1837, and located in what is now Sherman. He married Susan E. Taylor, and was the father of Nancy M. (the wife of Thomas Brown), Amelia J. (the wife of Wilber Brown), and William and Everett Andress.

Among the prominent men of the township, and a resident of Sherman, was Dr. Alanson Raymond, who settled on the farm now occupied by his son, B. W. Raymond, in 1840. He was both a physician and a lawyer, and practiced both professions. His wife was a sister of Rev. Anderson Reynolds, the first pastor of the Baptist Church, and his family was intelligent and well educated. His sons were Rufus, Benjamin, George and John. Ella, one of his daughters, married Daniel Lowe, and the other,

Elvin Scott. Dr. Raymond's widow is now the wife of A. D. Bird.

William Curtis is a native of England, and moved from Honesdale to Scott township in 1845, locating on the place where he now resides. He married Sarah Smith and has a large family, some of whom have gone West.

Abraham W. Ransom, also an Englishman, located first in Mount Pleasant, but afterward on the place now occupied by his son, about 1835. He has three or four married children living in the vicinity.

Barnard Farrell moved from Sullivan County. He was a native of Ireland, and came to this country in 1835, settling first in New York State. He married Ann McKenna, and their children were Catherine, Bernard C. (of Potter County), Patrick H. (to whom the writer is indebted for much valuable material for this chapter), John A., Ann (the wife of Charles Frazier, of Delaware County, N. Y.), James E. (of Starrucca), Mary E., Joseph and Katie.

Captain David Allen moved from Deposit in 1854, and settled at Sherman. He married Electa Lamarcaux, and their children were Catherine (the wife of Willis Watkins), Cordelia, Darius, Emily (who married Norman Brundage) and Martha (the wife of Jacob Gardenier).

Egbert H. Mills came from Orange County in 1859, and has a large family, all of them residents of Sherman.

The Bell Murder.—As has before been stated, the wife of Rev. Gershom Williams was the victim of a tragedy that is memorable in the annals of Wayne County, and created great excitement at the time. It was at nine o'clock on the morning of Sunday, August 1, 1847, that Mrs. Williams, then a lady of about sixty, left her home to meet her Sunday-school class in the school-house a mile and a half away. Her sisters were visiting the house at the time, and were to follow her in the wagon, accompanied by Mr. Williams, an hour later, to attend church in the same building.

The family lived in about the middle of the township, on the Mount Pleasant road, and where the cross-road runs a mile and a half westward and joins the Starrucca road. She went through a little patch of woods, then passed the house of John Smith, through another bit of woods, passed the residence of Lewis Smith, and then on into the deep woods that darkened the road for the last half-mile of her journey. The night before this, a tramp, who pretended to be a cripple, had asked permission to sleep in the barn of George Henderson, and the latter, with true hospitality, had taken him into the house. He remained there during the night, and left the next morning, immediately after breakfast, taking the road that led toward Williams'. An hour later he once more emerged from the woods, and went toward Starrucca. Mrs. Williams' class had no teacher that morning. When it was known that she had left her home an hour before and had not been seen since she entered the woods, an alarm was given and the forest was searched for her. Soon the body was discovered beside the road, blackened by the burned logs over which it had been tumbled. Her dress was soiled and torn, and there were deep marks of the murderous fingers that had been pressed into her throat. There were evidences of a bloody struggle, and one of her gloves and a part of her cape were gone.

The tramp was suspected of her violation and murder, and was soon in custody. When he was taken before a justice, he confessed the deed and gave his name as Harris Bell. Although excitement ran high, he escaped lynching, and was taken to the county jail at Honesdale, where the grand jury found a true bill against him at the September Sessions. He was tried at the December Term, and a great effort was made to save his life on the ground of imbecility. This defense was ably argued by F. M. Crane, William H. Dimmick and Franklin Lusk, while District Attorney R. M. Grennell, Charles S. Minor, Earl Wheeler and John W. Myers appeared for the commonwealth. Bell was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and in spite of strenuous efforts to obtain for him a new trial, was sentenced by Judge William H. Jessup, on February 12, 1848. He was executed at Honesdale, September 29, 1848.

Industries.—The first saw-mills in the township were those of Gershom Williams and Squire Sampson, and must have been built about 1820. In 1828, Joseph Saunders and Jesse Sampson erected the mill now owned by Captain David Allen, on a tributary to Shad Pond Creek, just below the village of Sherman. It has passed through the hands of many owners, and some years ago was rebuilt by Egbert Mills, who also added machinery for cider-making on an extensive scale.

In 1855, H. W. Brandt, Jacob Schlager, Henry Brunig and William Bergmiller started a tannery at the village of Sherman. It was an extensive plant, and did a good business for many years, but finally the competition of the larger establishments in the East was too great, and it was closed about five years ago. In its place, the Scott Chemical Company was organized, and now does an extensive business in the manufacture of acetate of lime, wood alcohol and charcoal. The present members of the company are H. W. Brandt, S. Schlager, R. Kessler, C. Schlager, W. S. Brandt, W. T. Finch, D. Arneke, J. Schlager.

Roads and Post-Offices.—The first road built in the township was that leading from Starrucca to Deposit, which was constructed before the township was set off, and the next was the one from Lanesboro', on the Susquehanna River, to Ball's Eddy, or Winterdale, as it is now called.

Rev. Gershom Williams was the first postmaster in the township and was appointed when the office at Scott Centre was established. He was succeeded by his son, Hervey D. Williams, who gave place to Nelson Early, the predecessor of Uriah T. Smith, the present incumbent. The post-office at Sherman was established about sixteen years ago, and Henry Brunig was the first postmaster. His successors were Alanson Raymond, Marinda Raymond, Charles Smith, James Surine and Chas. Greenman, in the order named. The office at Winterdale was established two years ago, and G. H. Sands, the present postmaster, was the first appointee. The Island Pond office dates from 1875; Sidney E. Stanton has held the postmastership since the establishment.

Schools and Churches.—There is no record of any school within the township limits before 1826, when a log building for that purpose was erected at the foot of Maple Hill, near where Major Andress now lives. The first teacher there was Miss Emily Stiles, who afterward married Ogdon, the son of John Whitteker. The next school was built in 1830. It was a little log building on the farm now owned by Henry Tarbox, and Loise Tarbox, now the wife of Uriah T. Smith, was the first teacher. It is probable that there were some private schools before either of these, but there remains no record of them now, except that one old resident remembers that he heard his father tell how Rev. Gershom Williams used to school his own children, and as many of the neighbors as cared to come in, but this as a labor of love. The same gentleman also conducted the first religous services in the township, and prayer-meetings were held regularly at his house for many years. The churches of the township were all of late growth, because of the proximity of the churches of Starrucca and Preston.

The Maple Hill Baptist Church, of Sherman, was organized July 19, 1851, in the old Jayne School-house, and had sixteen constituent members,—Deacon George Reynolds, Deacon Justis J. Jayne, Dovill Reynolds, Newell Reynolds, Beniah Jayne, John W. Jayne, Henry D. Jayne, Julia Reynolds, Mary Jayne, Catherine Jayne, Rhoda Jayne, Philena Reynolds, Miranda Raymond, Nancy Andress, Abigail Whitmore and Mary Ann Owens. The council of recognition was held August 6th following, and on the succeeding December 18th the church ordained Rev. O. L. Hall its first pastor. The succeeding pastors have been Revs. Anderson Reynolds, Elder Francis, Barrick Bunting, W. N. Tower, George Evans, A. J. Adams, William Carr and James Pope, the present pastor. Worship was at first conducted in the school-house, but in the summer of 1854 a church edifice was erected for use in common with other evangelical denominations, and was dedicated on the 18th of the October following. There are at present fifty-two communicants.

The Scott Presbyterian Church was organized in 1843, with seven members, and struggled along for a number of years without a regular pastor or stated supply. But the work of ministers from the churches of townships adjacent bore fruit, and at last the congregation was placed on a firm basis. Worship was conducted in the Baptist Church until 1874, when the present edifice was erected, and was dedicated August 13th. Since that time the congregation has had a regular pastor, Rev. James M. Phillips, and now has sixty communicants.

David Allen

BIOGRAPHICAL.

CAPTAIN DAVID ALLEN.

Just after our Revolutionary War had closed large numbers of foreigners sought the shores of the New World, among them Cornelius Alleine, a native of Brest, France. During the Jacobin troubles in that country, prior to the prominence of Napoleon Buonaparte, many had left their loved "La Belle France" and sought homes in foreign lands. One of these, the uncle of this young man, had established himself at Martinique, West Indies, and thither the father sent his son, Cornelius. Overtaken by a storm, the ship on which he sailed became a total wreck, and passengers and crew were rescued by a ship destined for Boston, Mass. Reaching that port, strong efforts were made to induce the stalwart young Frenchman to remain and become a citizen of the infant United States, and he concluding to do so, became a resident of Franklin County, Mass., and took up a large farm there. On this place he lived and died, in 1852, aged seventy-six. He married Susanna, daughter of James Cady, of Worcester, Mass., and she bore him eleven children, —six sons and five daughters—and deceased, 1870, aged ninety years.

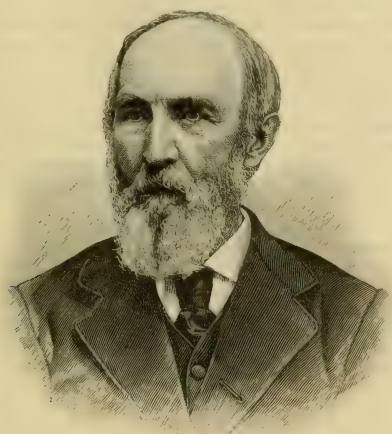
The subject of our sketch was the fourth child born in Brookline, Vt. (where the parents made a home for a few years), October 26, 1804.

His boyhood was spent upon the homestead, and his education obtained at the district school. When twenty-one years old he determined to go West to get rich, as he expresses it, and got as far as Deposit, on the Delaware River, and stopped. Commencing lumbering, he rapidly acquired the necessary acquaintance with the grades of timber and its manufactured products, and ere long was enabled to ship his lumber down the Delaware in rafts to the Philadelphia market. For fifty years the fall, winter and spring months were given to his lumber interests, and for that same long period his summers were devoted to mason building. In this latter department much work was done and a large number of solid structures in Deposit and elsewhere attest the honesty of the workmanship he caused to be done. The handsome Deposit Seminary, which was burned down about the year 1856, was erected by Captain Allen, also many others of almost equal value and appearance. Various town offices were held by him while residing there, in all of which his great energy and uprightness were fully shown. In 1854 he removed to Scott township, Wayne County, Pa., where he bought a farm of three hundred and fifty acres and saw-mill establishment, which enabled him to manufacture his timber into lumber for the markets. From this place, in 1870, he decided to depart, and the pleasant home which he had built some few years before was prepared for the family, and in this house life has since been happily spent.

On April 12, 1832, Captain Allen married Electa, the daughter of Abram Lamareaux, of Deposit, N. Y., who was born October 19, 1808, and the following children have blessed their union: Catharine Sophia, born March 1, 1833, married Willis Watkins, and has borne him one child, Charles O., who married Kate Squires, and has two children,—Sarah and Catharine. Darius Marvin, born October 12, 1834, married, 1st, Christine Howard, who bore him two sons,—Durward Mortimer and Fred. Lamareaux; 2d, Elizabeth Gardinier, who has born him one child, David. Horace, born May 1, 1837, died August 3, 1841; Mary Cordelia, born August 20, 1841, married Elijah P. Reynolds, who had two children,—Allen and Laura,—and who died April 20, 1876. Mrs. Reynolds now resides with her father at Sherman. Emily Augusta, born June 29, 1843, married Dr. Norman Brundage, of Sherman. Martha Amelia, born April 16, 1845, married Jacob Gardinier, and has one son, Clarence. Mrs. Allen died May 11, 1867. Captain Allen, his wife, and nearly the entire family have been for many years prominent and consistent members of the Presbyterian Church of Sherman, and the influence exerted is always for good, not only in religious, but in educational matters.

During his residence in Deposit he was nominated for member of Legislature, but, happily for himself, was short a few votes when the count was made. In Pennsylvania he has invariably declined to allow the use of his name for political preferment, although always an ardent Democrat.

Thoroughly progressive and never so well pleased as when doing something towards the building up of material interests and to insure the employment of labor, Captain Allen was quite earnest and influential in locating the tannery, chemical works and other interests at Sherman, and has ever evinced strong interest in the welfare of similar enterprises. To-day he stands, in his eighty-second year, comparatively hale and hearty, an honorable example of a stirring and valuable life, loved by the many, respected and esteemed by all.



HALLOCK EARLY.

During the first quarter of the eighteenth century many English families were added to the population of the colonies, and York received the addition of one of particular interest to this sketch, bearing the name of Gilbert Early, who made a home in Dutchess County. His marriage produced four sons,—Gilbert, Absalom, Elijah and Robert,—who aided largely in the clearing up of the acreage which he had taken up on making a settlement.

The eldest son, Gilbert, was born there in 1755, and on reaching manhood espoused a young lady named Pauline Egert, and eight children were born to the union,—William, Egert, Elijah, Robert, Gilbert, Nancy, Pauline and Almira. When Robert was an infant (in 1788) the family moved farther West and made a new home on the east branch of the Delaware. A large tract of timber was rapidly cleared away, and the entire family became interested in that important and growing industry, in addition to attending to the large farm. On arrival at a proper age to assume such important duties, Robert was united to Abigail, daughter of Michael Wolfe, of Wolfe's Hill, Bradford County, Pa., about 1813, to which county he had removed during the previous year. Engaging in farming, he cleared considerable land, and here Electa, Hallock, Deborah, Elizabeth, Eliza Ann and an infant were born, the birth of the latter of whom cost the life of the mother in 1831. Shortly after this sad event the family returned East, and made a home at Sherman, Wayne County, Pa., following which Mr. Early again entered married life, Elizabeth Alexander becoming his wife and the mother of Abigail, Mary, Louisa, Nelson N. and William N. (twins).

Hallock, the second child by the first marriage, was born June 3, 1818. The educational facilities in Pennsylvania in those early days were indeed limited, and in most cases the parents esteemed the physical abilities of their offspring of greater importance than the mental; hence the youth of our subject was passed without a great deal of schooling in book-learning, but with much practical use in the department of life he was destined to follow. His deficiencies in that regard were, however, partially overcome by a disposition to acquire knowledge, with a general aptitude towards a business career. On reaching his eighteenth year his father placed him in charge of the entire business, and cutting timber, making and shipping and selling its product were under his control from that time,—a strong tribute to his excellent judgment and value,—and when, at twenty-one years of age, he was sent to Philadelphia to sell the product of their mill, he was fully posted on qualities and measurements,—in fact, a thorough lumber inspector,—and made a successful trip. These points have, until the past six years, occupied his attention, and success has been achieved by thoroughness, uprightness and his excellent knowledge of men.

In 1854 Mr. Early embarked in the initial commercial venture at this place, which previously had been without a name; and, in order to give directions for shipment of goods, he gave it the name of New Baltimore, which continued to be used until a post-office was established under the present name of Sherman. (Mr. Early was the second man to make a home in this village, and is somewhat proud of the distinction.)

Through the chicanery of his partners this venture was not a success, and he retired from it in favor of lumbering in 1857. In no sense considering himself a politician has he served the people of his township as school director, supervisor, etc., and invariably to advantage and their satisfaction.

He was married, May 7, 1854, to Abigail Whitmore, daughter of George Reynolds, who bore him two children, which died in infancy, and were followed by the mother on July 12, 1861. On March 30, 1862, he was united to Rosalie G., daughter of Strong Seeley, of Wells Centre, Bradford County, Pa., at one time owner of a large portion of the land upon which the city of Elmira, N. Y., is now located. The union has resulted in the birth of Willis, born March 27, 1863; and Furman M., born April 27, 1870. To add the pleasure of female childhood to this happy family, in July, 1870, Lottie Buchanan, a babe born March 26, 1874, was, by the free consent of the mother, a resident of New York City, adopted into the home and has remained, giving and receiving joy to its occupants. Mr. Early has, from his early youth, been much interested in religious and kindred matters, and has given liberally in aid of the different associations here, when they desired to erect houses of worship, and in their support without regard to sect. Mrs. Early is an earnest member of the Presbyterian Church, and a generous giver to its charities, etc.

The eldest son of this estimable family has received the advantage of a good education, which he aids by judicious study, and has engaged in teaching and in the industry of bee culture to a considerable extent. In this he is rapidly acquiring a valuable experience and reaping a gratifying reward for the outlay and patience.

Mr. Early retired from active business some years ago, and now gives attention to home matters and the affairs of an extensive farm. He receives the high respect and regard of the citizens without reference to party, and is recognized as an honorable and progressive man, alive to the needs of the times, and at all times open to the calls for aid and counsel preferred by his neighbors and acquaintances.

C. S. HACKETT.

Among those sterling old New England families which went to the then West during the early part of the present century, that of John Hackett must be mentioned.

He was born in Litchfield County, Conn., about 1789, and, desirous of striking his own swath, he, in 1812, settled in Bleuheim, Schoharie County, N. Y., where he carried on a farm and hotel for many years.

He first married Lovisa Choate, who bore him one child, William, and died in 1821. He subsequently married Ann D., the daughter of Cornelius Simonson, whose wife was a daughter of Tunis Rappalye, of New Brunswick, N. J. By her he had Cornelius S., John and Lovisa. John married Angeline, daughter of Hontice H. Couse, of Oneonta, N. Y., and has had three boys and one girl, and now resides at the latter place. Lovisa married Ellery Moredock (who was killed on the railroad at Oneonta some four years ago), and bore him one son and one daughter. The family now resides at Milford, Otsego County, N. Y.

John Hackett, the elder, removed from Schoharie County to Otsego County in 1831, and made a home at Oneonta, where he resided until his death, which occurred in 1854.

The eldest son, C. S., spent his youthful days at the family home; was sent to the district schools, and afterwards attended Elder Harrington's select school at Oneonta, in 1834.

During the next few years, in summers he gave his attention to farming and lumbering, and in the winter seasons imparted to the district, as a teacher, such instruction as he had been gathering during his own course. In 1848 he was joined in matrimony to Caroline, daughter of Henry J. Couse, of Oneonta, N. Y., and the first two years of a long wedded life were spent upon the homestead. In 1851 he purchased property in Scott township, and at once began making a home which, from time to time, has since been improved, until now it stands one of the tastiest and most homelike farm properties in the northern section of the county. He was first to recognize the mountainous county as a valuable dairyland, and put over twenty cows aside for such an important purpose, and his aim has ever been to improve the breed of stock throughout his circle. Much attention has been given to this laudable undertaking and great success reaped in the dairy business as a natural sequence, and his advice is considered very valuable by those interested.

The timber from his extensive tracts has been cleared off, and the products disposed of at the different marts along the Delaware, and the entire farm is now devoted to that which has become so great an industry in this county,—that of dairying. The pleasant home has been brightened by the following children, viz.: William H., born December 25, 1858, married Hattie Z. Smith, March 1877, who bore him Ethel L., and Ida S. (the father of this interesting family was unfortunately killed, April 19, 1881); John E., born October 12, 1864, died March 2, 1865; Ervin E., born January 23, 1868, and now attending the Waymart Academy.

Some twenty-five or thirty years ago Colonel Hackett became a Mason, since which time he has taken the chapter degree, and retains membership in the ancient and honorable order at Deposit, N. Y. A Republican in politics, his aid has largely been given in township offices, and, as in everything else in which he has been interested, his services have been strengthful and appreciated. A man of great force of character, he is an ardent friend and a clear-headed, far-sighted counselor, and consequently the people of his county largely rely upon his judgment.

CHAPTER XXXI.

SALEM ("land of peace") was set off from Canaan and Delaware in 1808. Sterling was taken therefrom in 1815, making the Wallenpaupack River the southern boundary. In 1876 a line was run east and west through the centre of the township, and the northern half, together with a small slice from South Canaan, were erected into a new township, called Lake; consequently Salem is bounded on the north by Lake, on the east by Paupack, on the southeast by Greene, in Pike County, on the south by Sterling, on the west by Madison and Jefferson, in Lackawanna County. It is broken in irregular hills and valleys with ridges. The creeks all flow south into the Paupack River. James' Creek is the outlet of Cobb's Pond in Lake, and forks with Potter Creek at Hollisterville, thereby forming the Paupack. Moss Creek rises in the hills of Lake, west of Jones' Pond, and flows south, through Moss Hollow, into the Paupack; Spring Brook has its source among the hills above William Glossenger's home, south of Jones' Lake, flows south through the historic Little Meadows, and empties into Bidwell Lake; Laurel Run, the outlet of Bidwell Lake, flows southeast through a deep gorge and empties into the Paupack above Ledgedale. The Five Mile Creek is the outlet of Jones', Allen, Dayton and Peet or Marsh Ponds, and flows southeast, entering the Paupack below Ledgedale. The Wallenpaupack, which forms the southern boundary, is composed of two branches. The West Branch, which is formed at Hollisterville, flows east between Salem and Sterling to the point where it forks with the South Branch, which rises in Monroe County and flows north between Sterling and Dreher on the west, and Greene township, of Pike County, on the east. After uniting, the stream has a smooth and slow current through the beautiful Paupack flats, where the Indians encamped on its banks in their journeyings from Capouse and the Susquehanna Indian settlements, as they came through Cobb's Gap in the Moosic Mountains eastward through Little Meadows to Paupack Flats, and onward still to the Delaware River. The fact that the Indians more frequently saw the river at this point, where the current is sluggish and deep, doubtless led them to call it Wallenpaupack, meaning "dead waters;" though towards its outlet it belies its name and dashes into rapids and waterfalls, descending three hundred and twenty-five feet from Wilsonville to the place where it unites with the Lackawaxen.[2] The Ledgedale Tannery Company ran a horse-boat for a time from Ledgedale to a point above Wilsonville. An old Indian trail ran through Salem; because Cobb's Gap, the only natural pass in Moosic Mountains eastward, lies directly west of Salem. This pass, used by the Indians traveling eastward, has been utilized by the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Coal Company and the Erie and Wyoming Valley Railroad Company for the same purpose, it being the natural thoroughfare eastward for the Lackawanna anthracite coal-fields. Salem was originally covered with a dense growth of timber, consisting of beech, birch, maple, cherry, pine, basswood, ash, and down towards the Paupack, where Joseph W. Woodbridge settled, there was a tract of country covered with chestnut; but the tree that predominated was the hemlock, which, considering its lumber and bark, is the most valuable tree produced in Wayne County forests. Underneath these trees, skirting the streams in most places, and generally wherever the hemlock was thickest, grew an almost impenetrable undergrowth of rhododendron and laurel, giving this region the name of "The Great Swamp," which was nothing more than the northern continuation of the swamp known as "The Shades of Death." Where the beeches and maples grew it was more open, which gave it also the name of "The Beech Woods." This "Great Swamp" extended from the Moosic Mountains on the west to the Wallenpaupack River flats on the east, unbroken except by "The Little Meadows" or Beaver Meadows, so called because years before the whites settled here beavers had built two dams across Spring Brook, one near the road and another near its mouth, thereby flowing the land, killing the timber and making the Little Meadows, which were covered with wild grass. These meadows, being on the line of the Indian trail, naturally became one of their camping-places, as Paupack flats was another. Aside from this, we have no evidence that the Indians ever had any settlements in "The Great Swamp." They probably hunted here for deer and bear, or fished for the speckled trout, all of which were plentiful, but it was too dark and dismal even to make it a seat of their power. Here the timid deer drank from the mountain brook unmolested by man; the screaming panther, the howling wolves, the doleful owl and the sullen bear slept securely, undisturbed by any save savages as wild as they. Towering o'er all, the sombre, solemn hemlock, lifting its head towards the midnight stars, kept eternal vigil over the dismal solitude. There was another little meadow on the Five Mile Creek, now called Dobell's Meadow, but formerly Wright's Meadow, because Nathan Wright settled there about 1802. Here he was shut in on every side by the hemlock and rhododendron, no one living within miles of him. His wife, often utterly desolate and disconsolate, was rightly named Lamenta, and well has the poet sung,—

> "O solitude, where are the charms
> That sages have seen in thy face?
> Better dwell in the midst of alarms
> Than reign in this horrible place."

Such was "The Great Swamp" or the "Beech Woods," where our ancestors first penetrated this wilderness and felled the giant monarchs of the forest, erected log cabins, cleared a piece of land on which they grew corn, potatoes, beans, rye and oats, and hunted, fished and trapped. They managed to clear enough land to have a yoke of oxen and a cow or two, possibly a horse. They kept sheep for the wool, and also raised flax, out of which the good housewife spun and wove fabrics for wear. Some of the settlers made as much as one hundred yards of linen cloth a year. The maple yielded its saccharine juice and the wild bees made honey. Joseph Woodbridge erected a distillery near a spring on the North and South road in 1804, contemporaneously with the earliest settlement of the township, but he discontinued it eight years after and the building was used for a school-house. Thus did our Puritanic ancestors bring the Bible, the church, the school-house and the means of manufacturing rye whiskey all together. Ashbel Miller who resided where Thomas Bortree afterwards lived, had a log hut, arranged his cabin so that he could drive a yoke of cattle through with a heavy back log. It contained one room, ten children and some whiskey, and this was a log tavern. Old settlers say people were glad to stop even at such a place after traveling all day through the wilderness. All the early settlers were in a certain sense tavern-keepers, for when houses were five or ten miles apart they could do no less than keep a belated traveler, and what they lacked in accommodations they made good in hospitality, for our New England ancestors were a hospitable people, a trait which has not departed from their descendants.

The first settlement in Salem was naturally at "Little Meadows," and we cannot do better than copy from Goodrich, who was born on this place and knows its traditions, "According to accounts given by the old settler in Paupack, a man by the name of Strong first built here in 1770. Soon after the battle at Wyoming, he, with some others, had a desperate fight with the Indians at this place. Strong and his family were all massacred, and Jacob Stanton was the only man who escaped. He fled and notified the settlers upon the Paupack of their danger. Late in the fall of 1779, Stanton came back to the place and found the Indians had burned down the house. He dug a grave, and gathering up the bones of the whites and Indians and placing them together, raised a monument over them. Seth Goodrich, who afterwards owned the place, would never allow the mound to be disturbed. There was a very old orchard there which must have been planted by the Indians, as Little Meadows had been a favorite rendezvous for their hunting-parties." There is now (1885) but one tree standing of the old Indian orchard, and it alone casts its morning shadow o'er the hallowed ground which contains the sacred dust of the first settler of Salem and his savage foes. Jacob Stanton built a house and moved his wife and family to Little Meadows in 1780 or 1781, where, during his life, he kept a public-house. He and his wife were buried in the northwest corner of the orchard, near the wall. His son William Stanton, succeeded to the business, remaining until 1795, when he sold his interest to Moses Dolph, who must have been a brother-in-law, according to Goodrich. John Torrey says Samuel Preston speaks in his diary of having stopped here in 1787. Moses Dolph's deed is dated December 10, 1795. In it William Stanton sells "All his rite and possessions in the place called Stanton's place, in the Great Swamp, at Little Meadows, on the (road to the) Delaware River, containing and comprehending which both my father, Jacob Stanton, and myself at the time of his decease, or that I since have made or occupied." This deed locates a point, but attempts no boundaries, which is excusable when we remember that his nearest neighbors were eight or ten miles away, in Purdytown and Paupack settlement, eastward. Asa Cobb certainly lived under Cobb Mountain at that time, ten or twelve miles west of him. He could claim from the centre as far as he could see, until Robert Freeland came and built a log cabin and made an improvement on the opposite side of the road, about thirty rods northwest of Dolph's, on the place afterward owned by George Foote. He planted apple-trees, some of which are standing.

A tragedy happened between the Dolph and Freeland families. Two of their boys were playing with guns and fell to snapping them at each other when the one in the hands of young Dolph was discharged, killing young Freeland. He was buried beside Stanton in the orchard. In 1799 John Bunting assessed Canaan township, of which Salem was a part. Moses Dolph was assessed as a farmer with two houses or huts valued at $20; one barn, $12; two horses, $70; seven oxen and cows, $85; forty acres improved land, $400; three hundred and sixty acres unimproved land, $340,—total valuation, $947. His neighbor, Robert Freeland, is assessed with one hut, one horse, one cow, twelve acres improved land and three hundred and eighty-eight acres unimproved land,—total valuation, $424. Edward London, farmer, one house, one barn, four oxen or cows, fifteen acres improved land. Elisha Potter, weaver, one house, one horse, three oxen or cows, three acres improved land. Samuel Wheatcraft, farmer, one house, one cow and three acres of improved land. The total number of acres of improved land in Salem in 1799 was seventy, with six huts, two barns, four horses and thirteen oxen or cows. These old settlers all had themselves assessed with four hundred acres of land with allowances for roads, which they called their possessory right. We have seen what an illimitable title Moses Dolph received, and he gave titles to about one thousand acres of land in the vicinity of his hut as good as his own. September 25, 1799, he deeded to Theodore Woodbridge and Charles Goodrich, Jr., "the south part of the lot on which I now live, and was taken up as vacant by Wm. Goodrich and deeded to Jacob Stanton and was sold to me by Wm. Stanton, the only son and heir of said Jacob, and contains 400 acres, with such allowance as is given by the laws of their State for one possession right." September 4th he sells three hundred and fifty acres more to Theodore Woodbridge. October 20, 1709, Robert Freeland deeded four hundred and forty acres, "bounded east by lands of Moses Dolph, together with buildings and improvements," to Theodore Woodbridge, "being my right by possession." In 1801 Moses Dolph sold the Little Meadows farm to Dr. Lewis Collins, who, in 1803, sold the same to Seth Goodrich. Jas. McClure surveyed, returned and patented this land, but Goodrich held it under his possessory title, and Justice Gibson told him "not to be troubled about his land." P. G. Goodrich says, "If a man erected a cabin and raised grain on land he was entitled to four hundred acres." They certainly should have been allowed to patent the land upon which they had squatted; but the landgrabbers were early on the ground; hence in September Sessions, 1801, we find Republica versus David Hale, Theodore Woodbridge, Jeremiah Osgood, Solomon Jones and Michael Mitchell indicted for intrusion, John Bunting, Silas Purdy and Edward London becoming sureties in the sum of one hundred dollars each; subsequently Francis Nicholson, Josiah Curtis and Richard Tuck were brought before the grand jury for the same thing. In December Session presentments were made against Robert Freeland, Theodore Woodbridge, Timothy Hollister, William Dayton and Ephraim Bidwell. The squatter jurymen began to understand the thing by this time and ignored these bills; however, these Yankee settlers were annoyed by suits until they generally obtained titles from Edward Tilghman, the Cadwalladers and other Philadelphians who had either patented the land themselves or bid it off for taxes of others who had done so. Moses Dolph, with his large family, consisting of seven sons and four daughters, returned to the Lackawanna Valley, where many of his descendants now live. His sons' names were Alexander, John, Aaron, Charles, Reuben, Stephen, Richard and Derrick, the daughters being Polly, Ruth, Susie and Zilpha. Two of the sons of Richard Dolph live in this vicinity, Stephen resides in Lake and Orator A. P. Dolph lives off of the Chapmantown road, near Moses Masters. Edward London, blacksmith, built a log cabin near the Salem Hotel some time prior to 1799. In 1801 he bought four hundred and twenty-four acres of land of Edward Tilghman at the Salem Cross-Roads (now Hamlinton), paying £23 11s. therefor. In 1802 Edward London and his wife, Sabillah, sold this land to Charles Goodrich, Jr., for twenty-five hundred dollars. There were three Charles Goodrichs,—Chas. Goodrich, Sr., who lived in Connecticut, was the father of Charles, Jr., and Seth; and Charles, Jr., had a son Charles, who lived at Salem Corners. Chas. Goodrich built a log house above the spring which is now led out to the road east of Salem Corners. He married Ann Bidwell, was a Revolutionary soldier and went as a substitute when he was sixteen years old. He died in 1838, aged seventy-four. His children were Charles, who married Judith Cross and lived on the southeast quarter of land purchased by his father. The house which he occupied stood a little east of the corners, on the south side of the road. The other sons, Jabez and Enos, moved elsewhere. Of his daughters, Anna married Gideon Curtis, Mary married James Hultze, Lucy married Ellery Crandall and Laura married Henry Matthews, all of whom are dead. Charles Goodrich (3d) was a great hunter. He had a steady nerve and could hold a gun to the mark; when hungry he could eat a deer's heart raw. He had a cabin near Roaring Brook, with a hole in the top as an entrance.

The Charles Goodrich farm is now owned by George W. Walker (2d), who has built a wall and otherwise improved the property. Elisha Potter settled on the old road from Paupack to Capouse, on a creek which bears his name. The county line between Wayne and Luzerne passed through his premises, leaving his house on the Luzerne side, though assessed in Salem for a number of years. He arrived in 1795, according to Hollister's history. His son Charles recently died in Paupack; Chloe, his daughter, married Samuel Wheatcraft, Jr. Samuel Wheatcraft, Sr., settled on the hill west of Hollisterville, not far from Potter's and probably about the same time with Potter. Benjamin Harrison, an Englishman, married Hannah Wheatcraft, one of the daughters, and obtaining title to the property which his father-in-law had squatted upon, conveyed the same to Frederick D. Sayre, who married Leonor Snook, about 1825. Nancy Woodney, another daughter of Samuel Wheateraft, Sr., surpassed Doctor Tanner in the matter of fasting, more than fifty years ago. She claimed to have fasted fifty days without either eating or drinking. A book was published concerning the occurrence at the time by a sister in Ohio. She imagined that she was suffering for the sins of the world.

William Dayton, born in Rhode Island, brought up by Coggswell, in Litchfield County, Conn., married Anna for his first wife, and Lucena, her sister, for his second wife, daughters of Moses and Hester Wright. Dayton and his brother-in-law, Nathan S. Wright, came together about 1796 and settled near Carey's Pond, where the former built a cabin. Shortly after Nathan S. Wright moved to Slocum Hollow, where he remained a few years; then came to Dobell's Meadows and from there moved, in 1803, to the place now occupied by John B. Walker, a mile south of Salem Corners. He was a blacksmith by trade and very useful to the early settlers in that capacity. He had four sons—Miles, who never married; Abel, who married Caroline Peet, and settled on the place now occupied by Sylvia Smith, his daughter, on the East and West turnpike. Two of his sons, Albert and Eugene, were in the War of the Rebellion. Abel, a farmer, hunter and trapper, died recently, being over eighty years of age. Moses married Polly Peet and settled near his father's. He was an ingenious man and made spinning-wheels and reels and various other articles needed by the settlers; Sanford married Sally Edwards and lived on the old place for a time, when he sold and moved near his father-in-law, Thomas Edwards, where he recently died, aged nearly seventy-six. Of the girls, Lucena married Amos Brooks, and Ruth, Lyman Brooks, both farmers. They each lost a son in the late war. The remaining girls, Polly, Anna and Hester, will be noticed hereafter.

William Dayton moved to a place on the south side of the road, towards Purdytown, about one-half mile east of Five-Mile Creek, in 1802. He and his wife, Lucena, were good Methodists and very hospitable people. He left no kin to perpetuate his name. The old house has been demolished.

About three miles north of Dayton's is a sheet of water covering about twenty acres, around which Mr. Dayton used to trap bears, and bearing his name. The trap is still to be seen in which he caught twenty-two bears and two "painters."

Major Theodore Woodbridge, who bought doubtful titles of Dolph & Freeland, as we have noticed, in 1799 and 1800, probably came into Salem about 1800. He built a house on the East and West road, about midway between Hamlinton and Little Meadows, on the north side of the same, and was the wealthiest man in the place. He was also a major in the Revolutionary War, belonged to the order of "The Cincinnati" and was often visited by officers of distinction. He built the first sawmill in the town at the outlet of Bidwell Pond, in 1803, which was soon afterward burned. He then built a small grist-mill and saw-mill on Moss Creek, at what is now known as Moss Hollow. The major was active in promoting the welfare of the community. His son William says the first religious meeting ever held in Salem was held at his father's house. He was a Congregationalist, but appears to have accepted the class leadership for the Methodists. Esther Plummer, of Glastonbury, Conn., was his first wife, by whom he had four children,—Ashbel, William, Anna and Laura. He married Mrs. Hale as his second wife, and died in 1811, and was buried in the old orchard on his place. His son Ashbel married Pamelia Stratton and built a house, which was sometimes used by the Congregationalists for meeting purposes, on the Bidwelltown road, about one-fourth mile south of his father's. He afterwards moved to Luzerne County and died aged seventy-eight years. Orselia, one of his daughters, married George Brown and lives on the East and West road, two and one-half miles west of Hamlinton. Chester, one of his sons, resides on the North and South road, near the Wallenpaupack. William married Almira, only daughter of Elijah Weston, Sen., and remained many years in Wayne County. He had four sons,—James, Ward, Weston and Theodore—who emigrated to Illinois, taking their father with them. In his old age he came again to Salem and lived with his daughter, Mary Jane, who married Amos Polley. He eventually returned to the land of his fathers in Connecticut and lived with his daughter, Eliza Pelton. He started one of the first Sunday-schools held in the township at the East School-House, about 1820, and was violently opposed to secret societies. The following is taken from a Connecticut paper: "William Woodbridge died in Portland at the residence of his son-in-law, R. G. Pelton, aged eighty-one years and eight months. Great-grandson of Rev. John Woodbridge, first minister settled in Hartford, grandson of Rev. Ashbel Woodbridge, second minister settled in Glastonbury, Conn., and son of Major Theodore Woodbridge, of Revolutionary fame." Anna married Clement Paine and moved to Tioga County. She was a devoted Christian and went as a missionary among the Cherokees for awhile. Laura married a Presbyterian minister by the name of Bascom.

Joseph Woodbridge, a cousin of the major, bought four hundred acres of land of Edward Tilghman, June 8, 1801, located on the North and South road at the point where the Bidwelltown road crosses it, two miles south of Hamlinton. Like his uncle, he was a prominent man in the new settlement; was commissioned justice of the peace for the Fifth District of Wayne County by Gov. Thomas McKean, January 1, 1806, and held the office till he died, which occurred in 1816. He married Ann, a sister of William Hollister, and had seven children, Egbert, Wells, Howel, John, Ebenezer, Mary Ann and Eliza. The last three mentioned married and moved from Salem. Egbert, Wells and John were bachelors. They built a stone house on the old homestead. Egbert was a man of considerable influence, especially during the war. He was an ardent Republican and anti-Mason. He was three times elected justice of the peace and discharged his official duties creditably. The members of this singularly constituted household lived to a good age, and are all dead but John, who still lives at the old place. The family is remarkable for the number of its members who became clergymen. Rev. John Woodbridge, of England, was a Wickliffite, born in 1493. He was the first of seven generations of clergymen of the same name. His grandson, Rev. John Woodbridge was banished to the continent for his Puritan principles in 1634. Rev. John Woodbridge, of the fifth generation, was a Puritan emigrant. He was one of the first ministers of Newbury, Mass., and married a daughter of Hon. Thomas Dudley, Governor of the colony. He had twelve children, five of whom became clergymen, and lived to see four of his grandsons candidates for the Gospel ministry. One of these grandsons was Rev. Ashbel Woodbridge, the grandfather of Major Theodore Woodbridge and Joseph Woodbridge, Esq.

Josiah Curtis came to Salem in 1800 or 1801, and located on the East and West road, about one-half mile west from Hamlinton. From an obituary written to the Advocate and Journal, by Rev. Alanson Benjamin in 1836, we extract the following: "Josiah Curtiss emigrated to Salem in 1801, being one of the four who first settled in this place, which was then a dreary wilderness and had been but a short time before traversed by the savage of the forest. Their first object was to establish the worship of God among them, that the holy Sabbath might be honored. For several years they were deprived of hearing the Gospel preached, except they were occasionally visited by a Presbyterian missionary. Our deceased father was among the first who espoused the cause of Methodism in this country under the pious labors of Rev. Christopher Frye. In 1807 a glorious revival then took place, and he, with two others, united with the Methodist Episcopal Church and were soon followed by about sixty others." He died aged seventy-eight. He was the first assessor of Salem after it was set off from Canaan, in 1809, and returned sixty persons assessed. His children were,sons, Gideon, Fitch H. and Edward, and daughters Sophia, Rebecca and Marilla.

1. Gideon Curtis, a farmer, who was for many years a noted supervisor of the town, married Ann Goodrich. His children were Lorenzo, who went south; Charles, who lives at Dunning; Josiah, who married Ann Catterson and lives on the homestead. He is noted for his memory of dates and events. His family consists of six children,—Emma, who married W. A. Van Sickle, lives on the old Charles Peet place. The others are John Edward, Helen, George and Arthur. Almira married E. R. Jones, of Jonestown; Louisa married Jared Bennett and lives in Paupack.

2. Fitch H. Curtis was an excellent cabinet-maker. Many cherry and curl maple bureaus and other articles of furniture, made by him, are in possession of the families of Salem, and show the skill of the maker. He was one of the first Methodist class-leaders in the place, and acted as such for thirty-four years. He married Lydia Rogers and lived on the place now owned by L. G. Clearwater. Among his ten children was Noadiah, a bachelor, who lived on the place and worked as a carpenter. He is now dead. Noadiah Curtis, Levi Powell, Thomas R. Benson and Henry Davenport were the four men from Salem who responded to Abraham Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand men for three months to crush the Rebellion. Mary Curtis married James Powell, a substantial farmer and Methodist class-leader at Maplewood. They have one daughter, Lydia. Sarah married Amzi Swingle and lives in Peckville.

3. Edward Curtis was a bachelor. He lived on the old homestead with his sister Marilla, who never married. Mahala Jones and Jane Butler, two nieces, also lived with them. Edward Curtis was a carpenter and farmer and a very honest man. Marilla, when she died, bequeathed her property, amounting to eighteen hundred dollars, to the Salem Presbyterian Church. Rebecca married Edmund Nicholson and Sophia married Amasa Jones.

The Curtis family, taken together, are remarkable for their integrity.

Michael Mitchell came to Salem about 1800. He had a log cabin opposite the camp-ground, not far from the spring, where Jairus was born in 1802. He then moved to a place below Wilkes-Barre, and from there to Spring Brook and elsewhere. He died in 1855, aged eighty, and his wife in 1867, aged ninety-one. His children are Eli, Nancy (Mrs. Daniel Landon), Salmon, Jairus, Leveret, John P., Julius, Alva and Shepherd.

The Mitchells are nearly all good singers and inherit the happy-go-lucky disposition of their ancestor. Ambrose Nicholson says his father, Francis Nicholson, of Glastonbury, Conn., was a soldier of the Revolution, and was during the war part of the time in Pennsylvania. He married Rachael Loveland, and they had ten children. In February, 1800, he moved to Salem, and settled one mile west of Salem Corners on the East and West road. His children were Edmund, Jonathan L., Mynis, Polly, Cleora, Fanny, Zenas and Ambrose.

Edmund Nicholson married a daughter of Josiah Curtis, and lived one mile southwest of Hamlinton.

Zenas Nicholson was a carpenter and millwright. He resided on the old homestead until 1830, when he removed to Hamlinton. His first wife was Mary Goodrich. Their only son, Horatio, was a lawyer in Wilkes-Barre. By his second wife, Nancy Goodrich, a sister of his first wife, were children—G. Byron Nicholson, who was also an attorney-at-law in Wilkes-Barre, and Lieutenant Lyman Nicholson, who was killed at Gettysburg.

Seth G. Nicholson married Mary A. Bortree. He was twice justice of the peace in Salem, had a store at Hamlinton for a number of years, and subsequently moved to Sterling. His daughter, Marian, married Ira Kellam. Frank, his son, married Mary Houck, and Rhoda is at home. Milton Nicholson married Elizabeth Potter, and lives in Kingston. Oscar Nicholson is in Lackawanna County. Mary married John Leonard. Her children are Marion, (who married George W. Bidwell), Josephine and Byron.

Emeline Nicholson married George W. Simons, a merchant at Hamlinton and now (1885) county commissioner.

Ambrose Nicholson, the youngest of Francis Nicholson's family, is the only one now living, aged eighty-three, in Tecumseh, Neb. He married Minerva Fish, and lived on the old homestead for many years. His children were Hobart, who died in the army; Gilbert Nicholson, married to Mary Potter; Austin and Emma, who went West.

James Thomas was the next family on the west, adjoining Francis Nicholson. His children's names were Lucy, Delia and James.

Timothy Hollister married Betsy Treat. He and Ephraim Bidwell came from Connecticut to Salem in the year 1800. They lodged in a hut used in a sugar camp, a mile north of Little Meadows, on the Jonestown road. Returning to Connecticut, they brought their families the next spring, when Hollister and his friend separated. Hollister remained where they had broken ground, and Bidwell settled in what is now called Bidwelltown, one mile south of East school-house. Timothy Hollister was a worker and a good farmer. In his old age he moved West. His children were Betsy, who married John Andrews, Jr.; Nabby, who married Isaac Kellam, and lived in Paupack; Timothy and Milla, who lived in the West; Thomas, married Hannah Andrew; and Jemima, who married Daniel Peet, Jr., who lived about one-half mile north of Little Meadows. They had twelve children, among them Solon Peet, who married Harriet Stevens, and had one son, Alby F.; he died in the army. Abigail Peet married Mahlon Christie, a wealthy farmer of Sussex County, N. J. Abner married Jane Howell, and resides north of Peet Pond. Rebecca married Captain Curtis, and lives in Hawley. John C. and Mynott are in the township.

Ephraim Bidwell married Dorcas Andrews, sister of John Andrews, Sr. He was a Revolutionary soldier, served under Washington, and was present at the execution of Major Andre. He settled on the place now owned by Calvin Peck. His children were Luther, Prudence, Jabez, Sally, Orren, Lucy, William, Ashbel and Rachel.

Luther married Polly Miller, and located one-half mile west of his father, on the cross-road from Bidwell Hill to Woodbridge's. He had six children; one of them, named Luther, lived with Moses Wright. Prudence married Samuel Pease, who died from hydrophobia.

Jabez Bidwell married Sally Daniels, and settled about one-half mile east of his father, on the Ledgedale road. He had a large family. Among them were Anson, who married Manda Andrews, and located east of his father; Ephraim, who married Elizabeth Davis and lived in Bidwelltown; (he died in the army; his children are Wilmer, Eugene, Ella and Thomas); Chauncey, married Charlotte Sheerer, is a stone-mason; Sally, married James Stewart, who lived near his brother-in-law, Orren.

Orren Bidwell married Betsey Daniels, and located near Laurel Run, about two miles from his father's, on the road towards Ledgedale, where he built a saw-mill. He had thirteen children, among them Ira, who married Eliza Wright, lived on the old place and ran the saw-mill for many years; William Harrison, married Joel Jones' daughter, and lives in Lake township; George, who married Marion Leonard, and died from disease contracted in the army; Louisa, who married Archie Smith; Mary Jane, who married Abram Simons; Manda, who married Reuben Engle; Armenia, who married 'Gus Webster; Hiram, who married Dolly Nicholson; and Frank, who died in the army.

Lucy Bidwell married Noah Rogers, and moved to Canaan; William Bidwell married Caroline Brown, and finally moved West; John Bidwell, one of their sons, recently died in Honesdale.

Ashbel Bidwell married Polly, a daughter of Rev. William Griffing, a Methodist minister, who had thirteen children. He lived on the old homestead many years, and sold to John P. Landsiel, purchasing elsewhere. He had four children,—George Melvin, who married Mary Ammerman; John William, who married Adelia Loring; Julia, married Thomas Conklin; Sophronius, a carpenter.

Rachel Bidwell, the last of the old family, married Josiah Davis, who also lived in Bidwelltown. Their children were Solon, Byron, Roger and Loring. These facts are chiefly taken from old records kept by Polly Bidwell, who is now eighty years of age. The Bidwells are an industrious, hard-working family, and have contributed their share in clearing the farms, building walls and houses and otherwise improving the township. The family furnished more soldiers for the late war than any in Salem. Bidwell Lake, a beautiful sheet of water covering about seventy acres, is named in their honor.

Jeremiah Osgood came to Salem in 1801 and settled on the North and South road, about one mile north of Hamlinton. He served four years in the Revolutionary War. He lived to be ninety-nine years old. Among his children were Jeremiah, Daniel, Joseph and Lydia. Jeremiah Osgood, Jr., married Diantha Lutz, and had four children; Ruth, who married John Wilcox, and lived on the old place, now occupied by her son, Angelo Wilcox; Merritt Osgood, who married Susan Cobb and had three children,—Ruey, Alice and Friend.

Daniel Osgood married Susan Spangenberg, and had four children. John Osgood, one of the sons, married Lydia Fairchild. His son Daniel is a lawyer in Tecumseh, Neb. Dr. Joseph Osgood married Elizabeth Bartlow, and had ten children, among them Joseph Osgood, Jr., who lives near his father; Lucy, who married Elbert Goodrich; and Didema, who married Eugene Goodrich. Dr. Joseph Osgood was born in 1804, and is still living. He commenced practicing medicine in 1836. Lydia Osgood, the only daughter, married Ebenezer Cobb.

Jesse Morgan settled between Jeremiah Osgood and Salem Corners about 1800. He subsequently moved to Morgan Hill, where Samuel Morgan afterwards lived. His son George died in Canaan, aged ninety-seven.

Aaron Morgan began farming north of his brother Samuel; subsequently purchased the northeast section of the old London lot of Charles Goodrich, Jr., and built a stone house, which is now occupied by Frederick A. Abbey. He married Ruby Rathbone. His children were Sarah, Jeanette, Lucia and Alice. Sarah married Henry Abbey. Her children are Frederick and Clark. Alice married Matthias Haag, a devoted Christian man, who was the leader of a small band of Perfectionists.

Oliver Hamlin, mentioned above, married Nancy Baldwin, and kept a store and public-house in Hamlinton. He subsequently lived in Bethany and Honesdale; was county commissioner three years and associate judge five years. His children by his first wife were Harriet, Hannah, Horton, Hobart and Henrietta. Horton was a merchant in Honesdale for many years.

Harris Hamlin, Jr., a farmer near Hollisterville, married Mary Long. His children were Lyman, postmaster at Cedar Keys, Fla.; Ruey; and George, who married Frances Davis, and presides over the Salem Hotel, at Hamlinton.

David Hale took up the place afterward occupied by Daniel Peet, Jr.

Dr. Lewis Collins bought the Little Meadows place in 1801, and occupied it two years. One of his sons, Decius Collins, resided in Pucker Street. His daughter, Sophia A. Collins, is an assistant teacher in Scranton graded school, and Phimelia married N. A. Hulburt, music dealer in Scranton.

Thomas Cook married Julia, a daughter of Abner Collins, and lives on the Luther Weston place. His children are Sidney W., Dr. Lewis Cook, Ella and Stella.

Seth Goodrich bought the Little Meadows place of Dr. Collins in 1803. He married Polly, a daughter of Phineas Grover, who led the forlorn hope at Stony Point. His children were Anson, George, Phineas and Dwight, sons; and Mary, Nancy, Sally and Rebecca, daughters.

Anson Goodrich, a farmer, lived in Pucker Street, on the farm now occupied by his son Hiram. He married Eunice Andrews and had eleven children. Of his children, Julia married Stephen Clarke, who lives in Lake; George L. married Lois Russell; Mary married Horace Bell, the children being Frederick (merchant in Hawley), Harriet, George, Charles and Adaline; Lucy married Lafayette Rhone and removed to the West; Sally married Charles Pelton, a farmer in Pucker Street. They have three boys,—Frank, who married Addie Walker, is a merchant in Moscow; Florence T., who married Jane Walker, lives on the Decius Collins place; and Leroy, who married Olive Nash, is on the homestead.

Nancy Goodrich married Charles Gillett, and George, their son, lives west of Hamlinton.

Hiram, who occupies the homestead, married Rachel Robinson, and Phebe Quick for his second wife. Angeline is the wife of John Bell, of Hawley.

George, the second son of the original family, married Abigail Moore, a daughter of Joseph Moore, Sr. He retained the Little Meadows place and dispensed the hospitalities of the old homestead in a generous manner. Having no children they adopted several; among them, Mary Barlow, Mary Jane White, Nancy Moore and Warren Moore. George Goodrich was an elder in the Presbyterian Church and clerk of the session for many years; also justice of the peace for a number of terms. He was one of the solid men of Salem in his day.

Phineas Grover Goodrich was born at Little Meadows in 1804. He lived on the homestead until eighteen years of age, then taught school in Salem, Paupack and Connecticut for nine years. In 1836 he moved from Salem to Bethany, and took charge of the county offices as clerk, under Paul S. Preston. In 1845 he was elected prothonotary and clerk of the courts for three years. He engaged in surveying in 1850, in connection with farming. He was elected county surveyor in 1856, was twice elected county auditor and served from 1874 till 1880, and, during the court-house trouble, was an anti-court-house man. He set off the townships of Texas, Cherry Ridge and Paupack, was appointed justice of the peace in 1865, and has held the position since. His most important work is Goodrich's "History of Wayne County," a work which future historians of Wayne County will depend upon to a considerable degree. He is a ready writer, something of a poet and a good story-teller. His mind is stored with folk-lore and reminiscences of the old settlers, poetry and anecdotes. His overflowing humor and varied information have ever made him a companionable man to young and old. He married Lucia Rathbone, and both are living at Bethany. He is eighty-one years of age, has been administrator of a large number of estates, and is a trusted man in such offices. Nancy married Zenas Nicholson for her first, and Dr. Erastus Wright for her second husband. Her family is elsewhere noticed. She is still living, with her daughter, Emma Simons, aged eighty-three. Rebecca Goodrich married Joseph Moore, Jr. She had five daughters and one son, Warren G. Moore. The Grand Army Post in Hollisterville is named in his honor.

Sallie married Alanson Hollister and will be elsewhere noticed. Dwight is a bachelor.

Seth Goodrich's second wife was Mrs. Hewitt. She had four children by her first husband,—Dettric, Isaac, Mary Ann and Betsey.

Mary Ann married Phineas Howe, of Sterling, and is still living.

Betsey Hewitt married Uriah Williams and was the mother of George, John and Sandford Williams.

Samuel Harford was in Wayne County as early as 1801. He moved from Purdytown to the spot where Michael McKegney now resides, in 1809, and commenced farming on Peet Hill in 1810.

James Harford came later and lived on the place first owned by Abner Goodrich.

Samuel Harford was an honest Christian man.

In 1829 Harford sold his place to Daniel Peet, Sr., and moved to Moss Hollow.

About 1831 David Warner started a tannery at Moss Hollow, containing seven or eight vats. Abijah Peet, a practical tanner and currier, assisted him. He also carried on shoemaking with two or three men. Subsequently Gaius Moss and his son-in-law, Alexander Guile, of Susquehanna County, bought the tannery and carried on an upper leather manufactory under the name of Moss & Guile. Some years later Friend B. Moss took the place of his father in the firm. They carried on harness-making also, until Guile was killed in the back-woods, when Angelo Brown, who had married Cornelia Guile, succeeded as member of the firm. Moss & Brown built a new tannery and ran it with the saw-mill until 1878, when they failed, since which time no tanning has been done.

Friend B. Moss was a good conversationist, pleasant and genial in his manners, which made him very popular. He held various township offices and was once elected associate judge, but refused to serve. He now lives in Moscow.

Angelo Brown, Josiah Brown, James Wetherill and Samuel Blois, who had helped carry on the works at Moss Hollow, moved to Stanley, Nebraska. Angelo Brown was one of the anti-court-house committee. He was a man of reading and reflection.

Caleb Kendall married Philena, one of Samuel Harford's daughters, and Aaron Gillett, Betsey, the remaining daughter.

Aaron Gillett came about 1821, and taught school in East school-house. He built a plank house west of Bidwell Pond in 1823, and occupied it for thirty years, when he built the house on the hillside now occupied by his widow. He will be remembered for his great kindness to the poor. The latch-string ever hung out, and all, however wretched, were welcome. Mr. Gillett preached for the Protestant Methodists for many years. He also did surveying for the neighbors. Henry Cooley, a deaf and dumb negro, lived with him many years. Abraham Johnson, a pauper, whom he sheltered, died at the age of one hundred and eight years.

Aaron Gillett had thirteen children,—Charles (who married Nancy Goodrich, lives at Hamlinton), Harvey (married Emily Brooks and lives in Jefferson), Philemon (married Ellen Engle and is a farmer on the road from Bidwelltown to Ledgedale), Ezra (married Jane Buck, both are dead and have left three children), Charlotte (married Simon P. Lutz and raised a large family), Diantha (married Columbus Delong and lives in Hemlock Hollow), Olver (died in the army), Sarah (married Charles Delong and moved to Scranton, where she died).

Elijah Weston, Sr., came to Salem in 1807 and settled two miles southeast of Salem Corners. He had two sons,—Luther and Elijah, and one daughter, Almira, who married William Woodbridge. Luther Weston married Laura Jones, a daughter of Deacon Asa Jones, for his first wife, and Miss Sallie Hewitt for his second wife. Sallie Weston is still living, aged eighty-three years.

Luther Weston was a member of the first Congregational Church organized in Wayne County. He was made a ruling elder at the organization of the Presbyterian Church of Salem, in 1832, and continued in that capacity till he died, covering a period of nearly forty years. He stood a pillar in Zion for more than sixty years.

Elijah Weston married Minerva Torrey, a daughter of Jason Torrey. He was also an excellent man and a temperance advocate. His son, Edward Weston, lives in Scranton, and has charge of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company's lands. Charles Weston, another son, had a flouring-mill in Shenandoah Valley, Va., which was burned by General Sheridan. He afterwards owned a feed-mill in Scranton.

Gabriel Davis settled in the southeastern part of Salem as early as 1809. Of his family, Elsie married Moses Bingham, one of the daughters married a Rogers, another a Whitehead. His sons Draper and Alexander moved away and Philip, who married a daughter of Jonas Sutton, remained on the homestead. He was killed by an accident. John Becker married Esther Ann. Matilda married Benjamin Beach. Henry Avery came to Salem in 1810. He settled just south of Timothy Hollister. He had been a sailor for many years and was a man of fair attainments. He was appointed justice of the peace about 1816 or 1818, and served until 1840. He was a steward in the Methodist Church in 1812 and lived to be nearly ninety-seven years of age. He married Lucy Fisk and had a large family of children, among them Lamira, who married Timothy Wetherill and had eleven children. Of her children, William Wetherill married Hulda Everett and settled east of Albert Stocker; James Wetherill married Ellen Guile. He was a harness-maker. Dennison is also a harness-maker at Hamlinton, having married Camp Rosencrantz's daughter.

Captain Alexander N. Avery, who settled on the corner east of Little Meadows and north of Albert Stocker's, married Elsie, a daughter of Captain Howe. He sold his place to Joseph B. Edwards in 1854, and moved West.

John Andrews, Sr., came to Salem as early as 1809. He took up a farm near Harris Hamlin's, built the house now occupied by E. E. Black, and was one of the first Methodist class-leaders.

1. Adrial Andrews, his oldest son, was a wagon-maker and farmer, and he lived on a hill north of Salem Corners. He died recently, aged ninety-four. He had three wives, and three children by each wife, among them Hannah, who married Thomas Hollister; Lavina, who married D. T. Abbey; and Lucina, who married Dwight Chapman. 2. Charles Andrews married Ann Pease, and had four children. 3. Eunice married Anson Goodrich. 4. David married Lucina Lutz, and had ten children, all of whom are dead. 5. Anna married Walter Moore. 6. Luna was killed by an accident. 7. Amanda married Robert Stanton. 8. John Andrews, Jr., bought Ashbel Woodbridge's improvement, about one-half mile south of the East school-house. He married Betsy Hollister for his second wife, and had eight children.

Abner Andrews kept the homestead which is now occupied by his son-in-law, John Watson. He built a house west of the East school-house, which he now occupies, having married Orinda Peet, who is the mother of three daughters and one son. Salinda married William Jones, and lives a little south of the East school-house. Adelaide married John Watson. Ann Eliza married Henry Blake, and lives on the Gilbert Nicholson place. John married Anna Pellet, and lives at home. Andrew J. Andrews married Harriet Jones, and lived on the Timothy Hollister place for a number of years. He sold this place to Thomas and Frank Engle, who had married Mary and Martha Andrews, his sisters, and moved to Hamlinton. Andrew Andrews has no children. He was the most liberal contributor toward the Centenary Methodist Church, and also the leading spirit in the building of Little Chapel. He works with the nervous energy peculiar to the Andrews family. John Glossenger came to Salem about 1818, settled northeast of Anson Goodrich, and cleared a good farm, which is occupied by William Glossenger. Robert C. Glossenger married a Tisdell, and settled in Hemlock Hollow. Polly Glossenger lived to be eighty-four years old. Harry Heermans is assessed as a carpenter in 1811. He was a practical business man, and built a number of the first frame houses in the township.

Edmund Hartford came to Salem about 1814, and is also assessed as a carpenter. He owned a grist-mill on the Sterling side of the Paupack, which, according to Goodrich, was built by Ephraim Bidwell, Ashbel Woodbridge and William Hollister. He lived to be ninety-four years old. His son, Thomas Hartford, now runs a saw-mill at this point.

William Hollister came to Salem as early as 1814. He first settled south of the Paupack, at Hartford's, then bought the Major Woodbridge place, which he sold to Ralph Chapman in 1839, and moved to Hollisterville, on the spot now occupied by his son, Asa Hollister, who married Loduskey Purdy. William Hollister married Polly Jones. She lived to be eighty-four years old. They had seven daughters,—Jerusha and Harriet were wives of James Waite, a merchant of Hollisterville. Laura A. married A. B. Walker. John B. Walker married Jane. Leonard G. Clearwater married Amanda. Thomas M. Noble, Esq., married Eliza. Emily C. was the wife of Frederick Leonard.

Asa Cobb settled in Lackawanna County in 1784, on the place now owned by Asa Cobb, Jr., at the foot of the mountain, and near the gap which bears his name. Of Asa Cobb's other sons, Ebenezer, Henry, William and Cyprian settled in Salem. Ebenezer Cobb married Lydia Osgood. E. S. H. Cobb, one of his sons who lives on the homestead, has given much attention to the raising of fruit, especially pears, of which he has about thirty varieties. He has preached for the Protestant Methodists nearly forty-three years. Jeremiah Cobb, a brother, has a saw-mill on Potter Creek, near the line.

Michael Mitchell built a turning-mill at Hol-listerville in 1814, about twenty feet above the present grist-mill. Ebenezer Cobb erected the first saw-mill in Hollisterville in 1816.

Amasa Hollister came from Glastonbury, Conn., March 15, 1817, and purchased Ebenezer Cobb's interest in the saw-mill. He drove an ox-team, ten sheep and one cow, via Newburgh, and was two weeks on the road. Alanson Hollister, his son, came in September, 1817. He was then in his fifteenth year. The same fall he and his father raised the house now occupied by E. B. Hollister, Esq. Amasa, being a blacksmith, made all the nails.

January 27, 1820, Alanson was married to Sally, daughter of Seth Goodrich, at Little Meadows. She died May 17, 1875, aged seventy-six. Alanson died July 30, 1876, aged seventy-eight.

Alpheus H. and John H. came in 1821. Being mechanics, with the assistance of Alanson and their father, they erected the Hollisterville Grist-Mill, which was completed and in operation in 1822. Michael Mitchell was the first miller.

In 1830 or 1831 Alanson and Alpheus built a carding-machine. In 1836 Deacon Elijah Weston started a rake-factory, and the same year a foundry was built by John Mott, who is still living, aged eighty-four.

The first store in Hollisterville was built by Cyprian Cobb, in 1844. The same building now stands in the rear of Mrs. Waite's residence. Wm. Hollister and his son-in-law, James Waite, purchased this store and built the present one, owned by Mrs. Waite. C. M. West commenced store-keeping in Hollisterville about 1852. Lyman Hamlin bought E. B. Hollister's place, and converted the squire's office into a store about 1870. T. H. Baker afterwards owned it; Emanuel Stevens now occupies the place. George C. Andrews also has a store in Hollisterville.

Alanson Hollister was a methodical man in all business transactions, fixed in his opinions and determined in his purpose. He was appointed the first postmaster of Hollisterville. His children were Harriet G., who married Lewis S. Watres, an alderman of Scranton. She is a poetess of considerable merit, and writes under the name of "Stella of Lackawanna." Her son, L. A. Watres is a State Senator from Lackawanna County.

Dr. Horace Hollister married Mary Goff, and settled in Providence, Pa. He read medicine; graduated at the University of the City of New York in 1846; practiced since, until stricken with paralysis, in 1881. He has written the "History of Lackawanna Valley," "Coal Notes," "History of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company," "Recollections of our Physicians," and newspaper and magazine articles. He has an immense collection of Indian and stone relics, embracing twenty thousand pieces of stone, burned clay, bone and copper.

Sarah A. married Harrison Stevens, and is deceased.

Erastus B. Hollister married Mary Fessenden for his first and Mary E. Burns for his second wife. He lives on the homestead and holds his fifth commission as justice of the peace. A clever writer and a shrewd man. We are indebted to him for facts regarding the early settlement of Hollisterville.

Herschel H. Hollister married, first, Maria Norton, and Susan Ayres for his second wife. He lived for a number of years near his father's, but has lately moved to Scranton, where he is engaged in the slate roofing business.

Arian C. married Chas. R. Hall, a civil engineer, and lives at Rochelle, Ill.

Angeline H. married Giles Whitney, and went West, but has lately returned to Hollisterville.

Frances E. married L. W. Hamlin, and lives in Florida.

Alpheus Hollister married Mary Palmer, and had four children,—Clarissa married A. L. Gregory, hotel-keeper at Hollisterville. Albert G. Hollister, who owns the Hollisterville Grist-Mill. He married Mary Etting and has four daughters,—Maria, who married W. R. Beck, and lives at Moscow; Frank, who married Benjamin Kellam, attorney-at-law in Scranton; Nellie N.; and Carrie, who married Isaac W. Cobb.

Joseph Moore, Sr., had three children by his first wife,—Joseph Moore, Jr., Abigail and Matilda, wife of Jonathan B. Watrous. Two of the sons of the latter located in Hollisterville,—Egbert Watrous (who married Clarissa Skelton) and Joseph Watrous (who was a Protestant Methodist preacher of considerable talent). He was at one time president of this district in that church. J. B. Watrous lived to be over eighty years of age, and his wife survives at eighty-two.

Edward Moore married Esther Landreth and settled on the farm first owned by Harris Hamlin in 1825.

His children were Lucy, a maiden lady; Laura, who married John Dobson and lived in Sterling; Dr. Joseph S. Moore married Electa Jones and had one son, Newton, deceased; Horace Moore lives in Jonestown; and Walter Moore, who married Anna Andrews lives opposite the old homestead. He is noted for his hospitality. His children are Simon W., a justice of the peace in Lake; Delos; Esther A., wife of J. B. Mott; and Electa.

John Mott started a foundry in Hollisterville, which is now carried on by his son, J. B. Mott. His wife was Asenath Race. Their children were Lucy Ann, who married Alfred Burns; Philena B., who married Geo. M. Hathull, private company E, One Hundred and Forty-third Regiment; Siba Mott, who married Ann Burke, is a carpenter; J. Byron Mott, moulder; George E. Mott, jeweler; and Mary Mott, an accomplished school-teacher, who obtained her education largely without an instructor and has taught since she was sixteen years of age.

Solomon S. Sharp who lived in the western part of the township, was born in Philadelphia, and moved to Salem, where he raised a family of children. John H. Baisley, who was the father of thirteen children, was killed on No. 20 Plane, October 10, 1864, aged fifty-four years.

Dr. Asa Hamlin came to Salem about 1814 as the first settled physician. He rented the stand on the southwest corner of the London lot of Harry Heermans and kept tavern for some time. He was succeeded in the same business by John Roosa in 1826, and ten years later sold to William Nash, the father of John Nash, who is a tinsmith at Hamlinton. William Nash sold to William Engle, the father of Reuben, Frank and Thomas Engle. The remaining hotel, now the Salem Hotel, was kept first by Oliver Hamlin; second, by Luther and Elijah Weston, temperance house at that time; third, by A. B. Walker, who bought out William Engle and consolidated the hotel business;[1] fourth, by Abram Clearwater; fifth, by B. G. Clearwater, who kept one of the best country hotels in the county and is now enjoying the quiet of a farmer's life at his home, just beyond the camp-ground. George Hamlin has the hotel now. The physicians of Salem have been Dr. Lewis Collins, 1801 to 1803; Dr. Asa Hamlin, 1814; Dr. Erastus Wright, 1823; Dr. Button; Dr. Jos. Osgood, 1836, still living, aged eighty-one; Dr. Hiram Blois, 1839, living, aged eighty-seven; Dr. Chas. E. Burr, now in Carbondale; Dr. J. N. Wilson, who was one of the most skillful physicians ever in Salem; and Dr. T. B. Orchard, a son-in-law of Dr. Blois, who, by strict attention to business, has acquired a large practice.

Dr. Erastus Wright married Lydia, a daughter of Colonel John Muzzey, a talented lady. Dr. Wright's practice extended over an area of ten or fifteen miles. He had two daughters,—Mary and Frances. Rev. Albert R. Raymond, who married Mary, was born in Chenango County, N. Y., November 5, 1806. His father died when he was but a child and soon after he was taken by his grandfather Lathrop to Malta, N. Y., and thoroughly trained in Bible reading, Sabbath-keeping and church attendance. He professed religion and joined the church at sixteen, prepared for college at Ballston Spa Grammar School, graduated at Union College in 1831, receiving the degree of A.B. Spent one year in Princeton Theological Seminary. Owing to a cancer on the tongue relinquished study for awhile. Entered Auburn Theological Seminary in the fall of 1832, spent two years there in the regular course and six months as a resident graduate under Dr. Cox, was licensed to preach in 1835 and was ordained as an evangelist, preferring it to any special charge. He preached at Nelson and at the same time was principal of the classical school at Cazenovia, at Liberty and Franklin, and from September 1, 1844, to April 6, 1868, at Salem and Sterling, since which time he has ministered occasionally. His children were Frances (a music teacher), Helen, Gertrude, and Spencer. Colonel B. T. Cook, a farmer of Franklin, N. Y., married Frances, Dr. Wright's other daughter.

Charles and Abijah Peet came to Salem from New Milford, Conn., in 1827. Charles Peet built a log house opposite the Woodbridge store-house, where he lived one year, then moved north of Luther Weston's. He was a reader, had a good memory and loved an argument. He frequently tried cases before justices against Fuller, Wheeler and others, and often gained his suit. His wife, Anna Wright, was an ingenious weaver of cloths and carpets with the old-fashioned hand-looms. Catharine, one of his children, married Robert J. Bortree and lived in Sterling. Daniel N. Peet lives in Tioga County.

Abijah Peet began life at a place now owned by J. W. Bidwell. He afterward traded this with Horace Bell for the place on Peet Hill, where he died aged nearly seventy-four. Hester Peet, his widow, still occupies it. He was a man of great physical strength, and at the log house raisings in those days would often lift against two or three common men. He was a man of reading and thought, and most scrupulously honest. Daniel Peet, Sr., son of John Peet,[1] came to Salem in 1829, and bought the Samuel Harford place, on Peet Hill, where he lived till his death, aged nearly eighty-five. He had five sons and five daughters,—Charles, Abijah, Polly, Daniel, Jr., Alby, Caroline, Betsey Ann, Lydia Rebecca, John and Orinda.

Betsey Ann remained on the homestead and was never married. John Peet married Mary Jane White, and built a log cabin by a spring between his father's and Abijah's in 1844, which is still standing. He subsequently built on the road. John Peet was first lieutenant of the Salem militia company for four years and captain for three years. Jirah Mumford was colonel, and William R. McLaury major, Dr. Losey surgeon,—May 1st, training-day. Owen Chapman was captain, Jeremiah Fessenden second lieutenant and Anson Abbey was drummer. The companies contained about seventy-five men, who armed themselves. Captain John Peet is a man of natural ability, and has a more accurate knowledge of the lines, landmarks and early settlers in the eastern part of Salem than any man at present in the township. Albert Stocker, who married Lydia R. Peet, came to Salem in 1840, and purchased a farm east of Little Meadow, and north of Bidwell Lake, of William Swan, who had shortly before secured it of Isaac P. Hewitt. His widow is still living and has been of great assistance in preparing this historical sketch.

Albert Stocker was born in Kent township, Litchfield County, Conn., July 18, 1811. His father, James Stocker, was a shoemaker and farmer. He was an honest man and made a comfortable living for his family, but never acquired any property; consequently, Albert was early thrown upon his own resources. He worked for farmers and in a stone saw-mill which his father rented. During winter months he attended school and acquired a fair common-school education. He labored for nine years, becoming part owner of a shingle mill. In 1838 he married Lydia R. Peet, and in 1840 bought the place before mentioned, which then had but a few acres cleared. He immediately proceeded to clear a farm, on which he resided until his death, March 23, 1878. He was prompt and punctual in his engagements, honest in his dealings, and outspoken in his opinions. He was an ardent Democrat, and when there was a great prejudice among Americans against foreigners he extended to them the right hand of welcome.

Albert Stocker's four children were Melissa, who died young; Jerome T. Stocker, farmer and merchant, who married Emma F. Walker, and built on the Peet Hill road, about a quarter-mile from his father's (he was appointed postmaster of Peetona January 18, 1886); Rhaman-

[1] John Peet was a bloomer and part owner of a forge. He weighed two hundred and twenty-five pounds, and could lift a seven hundred and fifty pound anvil on to the block with ease.

thus M. Stocker, who retains the homestead; and James D. Stocker, who is in partnership with Sidney W. Cook, his brother-in-law, in the mercantile business in Jermyn, Lackawanna County, Pa.

William Rollison married Susanna Schoonover, and settled in Rollisontown in 1828. Mrs. Rollison lived to be nearly ninety-six years of age. She claimed to have lived in the first log cabin built in Bethany, and had seventy-one direct living descendants. Their sons were John, Nathaniel and Asa. John had a large family,—Enos, Jehu (killed in the late war), Otis and William. Merritt D. Rollison married Abigail Kimble, and lives on the homestead. He is postmaster of the place. Matilda married Edward Ammerman. Asa married Rachel Masten. They all settled near their father.

James Osborne, aged seventy-eight, came from Columbia County in 1828, and built a log cabin on the place he now occupies in Rollisontown. He married Rachel Persing and had nine children.

Peter Osborne married a daughter of William Harris, and bought the Ashbel Miller place, near that of William Rollison's. His children were Truman, Oliver, George, Wilson, Mary, Matilda, Lucy and Lamira. Robert Patten came to Salem from Middletown, Conn., in 1839, or thereabouts, and settled on the place now occupied by C. S. Cobb. He was a man of some wealth, erected good buildings and a saw-mill on the Paupack. He made a large clearing. Franklin Goodspeed came about the same time, but returned.

Samuel Swingle married Catharine Cobb, and had thirteen children. Robert, Enos and James have good farms in Lake. He bought his farm of William Swann in 1837.

John Van Camp came from New Jersey in 1826, and settled near Hollisterville. He married Polly Hales, and had twelve children, among whom were James Van Camp, who has been justice of the peace three terms, and Henry and Aaron, who located near home. James Van Gorder, who also lives in that vicinity, came in 1825. His children were Samuel, Sally, Aaron and Cyprian. George Foote bought the old freehold place in 1842. He was a brick-layer and plasterer by trade, and commissioner during the anti-court-house troubles. He married Anner Moorehouse, who is living, aged eighty-two. Francis Chapman married Sarah Foote, and lives in Lake. George M. Foote, a mason, also lives in Lake. C. R. Spangenberg, who married Esther, the youngest daughter, lives in the homestead, while the widow and two daughters—Catharine and Lamira—are at Hamlinton. Ralph Foote, the youngest son, lives west of Salem Corners.

Curtes E. Lamson came from Connecticut, and located on the Five Mile Creek, two miles east of Albert Stocker's, where he built a saw-mill, and started the first marble-works in Salem. Ralph Chapman came to Salem about 1840, and bought the Major Woodbridge place of William Hollister. He carried on blacksmithing and farming, and had a large family. Oliver lives in Prompton, and was once county commissioner. Orlando, Ralph, Edgar and Francis are not in the township. Ezeriah married Harriet Polly, and lives on the Amos Polly place. George Chapman married Eunice Buckingham, and is on the Henry Avery farm. Laura married Captain G. C. Davenport, and moved West. Russell Bidwell married Marietta, and reared a large family. Jeremiah Fessenden settled on the back road from Salem to Hollisterville in 1840. His son, Elizur, married Louisa Chapman, and has two children—George and Floyd. He runs a carding-works and grist-mill near Hollisterville. Ralph Chapman's second wife was Mrs. Ames. Of her children, Warner Ames died a bachelor, and Lorenzo Ames, who is a blacksmith, has a large family. Daniel Potter settled in Pucker Street about 1840, and had a number of daughters, all of whom were good singers. E. B. Smith, who married Eugenia, lives on the old farm.

Amos Polly, son of Esquire Polly, married Mary Jane Woodbridge, and lived on the place first occupied by P. G. Goodrich, in Packer Street. Of their children, Evaline married S. M. Peet, and is deceased. Ezeriah Chapman married Harriet, and lives on the old place, and Elbert Polly died in the army and Edward went West. Daniel Chapman, who lived north of John Glossenger, had two wives and fifteen children. Leander and Horace settled in Chapmantown in Lake; Leveret is in Salem.

Thomas J. Watson lived and died on the Major Woodbridge place, now owned by Henry Conklin. R. M. Knox married one of the daughters.

John Brown, a carpenter, bought the Luman Andrews farm in 1819, and married Manda Page. Their children were Pamelia, married to Henry Waite; Orlander Brown, married to Martha Dickens, who lives on his father-in-law's farm, back of Hollisterville. Richard Dickens had six sons, of whom one died in the army, another starved to death in Andersonville, and another killed by a cannon explosion.

Rev. Edwin E. Mendenhall was rector of St. John's Church in Salem for twelve years, and founded Zion Church in Sterling. He was also a surveyor, acted as school director, and generally participated in the affairs of the township. Rev. R. H. Brown was rector of the same church for about fourteen years. He had a number of preaching-places, and worked with energy until he died.

Anson Abbey settled on the place now occupied by his son, Ralph Abbey, in 1833. His widow, whose maiden-name was Clarissa Taylor, is still living, aged eighty-three. Jared Taylor, her brother, built a stone house about one-half mile north of Hamlinton, on the farm now owned by G. W. Walker (2d). Anson Abbey's children were Russell, David, Ralph, Mary and Lucy. Daniel Gorman came to Salem in 1838, and bought the Luther Bidwell place. He occasionally preached for the Methodists. Dawson Bortree married Elvira, one of his daughters, and lived for many years near the forks of the Paupack. Hiram Clements, a blacksmith, worked with Thornton at Hamlinton in 1833. Of his children, Rebecca married Charles Van Tassell; Wilbur F. Clements is a leading merchant in Moscow. Edwin E. Blake came to Salem in 1843, and taught school for five years. He was justice of the peace from 1870 to 1880. John Elliott, a blacksmith, has a good farm one mile north of Hamlinton. His son, John E. Elliott, married Nellie Waite. Irene is a school-teacher. Thomas Edwards, who lived until he was seventy-seven years of age, hunter and fisherman, reared a large family, and his widow still lives in Osgood District. Richard H. Simons, constable and collector, resides one-half mile south of East school-house. Adjoining him on the south lives William E. Simons, his cousin, who has three sons,—James, Walter and Thomas. J. L. Brown lives at Paupack Forks. Mark Ayres came from New Jersey. He married Loretta Van Auken, her grandfather being a hero of the battle of Minisink. Her mother was among the school children saved by Brandt, who came to the school-house and had the girls stand in a row and painted their aprons red, so that his braves would spare them.

E. J. Ayres, a son, is a school-teacher. Lewis Moore lives on the road to Hollisterville. James Cornell, a cabinet-maker and undertaker, lived and died in Hollisterville. Richard Evans followed the same business at Hamlinton. Sabinus Walker came to Salem in 1841, from Susquehanna County, and started a store in Aaron Morgan's house, and later engaged in the shovel handle business at Edmund Hartford's. Soon after A. B. Walker became associated with him, which business they conducted for five years. They bought the Salem Hotel and the store on the corner, now owned by Sabinus Walker, in 1851. The latter was built by Luther Weston, and had a Sons of Temperance Hall overhead. The hotel was sold to Abram Clearwater, May 1, 1859. Marshall K. Walker married Ann Hawley, and had fourteen children. He was a kind-hearted old gentleman, and eighty-three years of age when he died. His wife, who was a mother in Israel among the Methodists, lived to be seventy-seven years old. John B. Walker, the oldest son, lives on the old Nathan S. Wright farm. He has a large family. George Walker is at Nicholson. Sabinus Walker is a merchant at Hamlinton. His son, George W. Walker (2d), had the store a number of years. He was elected for one year as Representative in the State Legislature for Wayne, and he subsequently moved to Nicholson, and represented Wyoming County in the Legislature. Solomon T. Walker lived in the township a number of years, and Nelson

S. Walker was in the store for a season. Rev. Ira T. Walker is a Methodist preacher, and was at one time presiding elder.

Burton G. Morss purchased nine thousand acres of land in Wayne and Pike Counties, of R. H. Powell and John Torrey, in 1849, and began work at the tannery in the fall of that year. January 16, 1850, he formed a co-partnership with D. F. Morss, C. J. E. Martin and John A. Cook, under the name of Morss, Martin & Co. Martin managed the business, and later D. F. Morss and John A. Cook came to Tannerytown (so-called). The workmen blasted through a ledge of rocks to build a tail-race; hence it was afterward called "The Ledges" and Ledgedale. In 1858 B. G. Morss bought Martin's interest, and about one year afterward D. F. Morss returned to New York, leaving the management in the hands of John A. Cook, who conducted the business with ability until his death, in 1864, when Leonidas W. Morss assumed charge, and has continued as manager since. In 1865 B. G. Morss bought the interest of D. F. Morss and of the John A. Cook estate, and gave his son, L. W. Morss, a share in the business. The tannery was burned in 1879, rebuilt in 1880, and steam-power introduced. It consumes five thousand cords of bark per year, and turns out fifty thousand sides of sole leather. They have secured ten thousand acres of land since the first purchase, and sold to settlers, reserving the bark, until six thousand acres are left. There is a store in connection with the tannery, a grist-mill and houses for their men. There is also a large farm under the management of L. W. Morss. About 1845–50 the emigration from Connecticut ceased, and the building of the tannery brought a large number of thrifty Irish and Germans into the township, who have cleared farms and erected buildings. John A. Cook was an elder in the Salem Presbyterian Church and a leading man in the township.

Captain Darwin Cook and George Cook live in Chicago, Ill. Dr. Curtis, of Hawley, married Augusta, and Captain Joseph Atkinson married Helen.

James M. Fanning and Ira Kellam have been clerks for many years. John Becker is outside boss and bark measurer. Robert Walker settled west of Ledgedale. His son, Benjamin Walker, lives on the old Jabez Bidwell place. There is a German settlement north of Ledgedale, about Razor Hill. Christian Razor (or Rose), John Razor, Henry Creeger, John Shrader and Philip Stermer came from Waldeck, Germany, and live near together. Daniel Martin and William Patterson have farms in the vicinity. John Catterson lives on a road leading to Ledgedale from the East and West road. He has cleared a good farm. John Sosenhamer, an ingenious blacksmith, married one of his daughters. Going east from Abel Wright's, about half a mile, is David Patterson, who has a large farm well walled up. James M. Sheffield lives on the Lamson place. Farther east James Finlay and William Finlay each cleared large farms. John Altemeier, a Prussian, has improved a farm on a cross-road towards Rollisontown. He has thirteen acres of apple orchard. Samuel Marshall, Francis, John and James Hopkins and John Hanlon have all contributed toward the development of the eastern part of the township. Richardson Simons and James Simons live on a road running along the Five-Mile Creek.

Thomas Bortree lived and kept tavern on a spot near the line between Paupack and Salem, on the East and West road.

Lewis built a saw-mill on the Five-Mile Creek, but afterwards sold it to Roswell & William Noble, who, in turn, sold to John Layman.

Benjamin K. Bortree lived adjoining the Gabriel Davis place, near Ledgedale.

Lewis Longstreet resided in Rollisontown a number of years. Keturah, his daughter, graduated at Mt. Holyoke and taught school in Hawley a number of years. She is now the wife of James T. Rodman, of Hawley. Redford Longstreet reared a family of bright children.

Emma May Buckingham, the authoress, and her mother live at Hamlinton.

George Harberger kept the first store in Salem, in a part of Major Woodbridge's house. Nancy Wright, aged nearly eighty-four, says he sold a calico dress to her mother in 1810, at seventy-five cents per yard. He kept salt at five dollars per bushel, leather, paper, Bohea tea and pepper, and took pay in fox and deer-skins. Major Woodbridge was the first postmaster, succeeded by his son William. There were two copies of the Hartford Courant taken in 1815. Mr. Searle carried the mail on horse-back from Milford through Salem to Wilkes-Barre every fortnight. He blew a horn as he passed a settler's house. When the papers came the men gathered to hear the news. About 1816 Rev. George Lane built the first house at Salem Corners, the site of Walker's present headquarters. He was succeeded by Oliver Hamlin,[1] who was the first postmaster at Hamlinton. He associated Butler Hamlin with him in the business and finally sold to him. Butler Hamlin was appointed postmaster and continued the business at this stand until about 1839, when he built a store near his present house and occupied it until about 1868, when he built the store occupied by B. F. Hamlin, his son, G. A. Clearwater, his son-in-law, being also associated in the business. The property on the corner fell into the hands of Luther Weston, his brother Elijah conducting a store for a few years. Richard Evans removed this building to the place occupied by A. J. Andrew. Luther Weston built the present store and hall in 1850 and sold to the Walkers, who have occupied it since. The rear part was built by A. B. Walker, with a Masonic hall overhead. The hall over the first building was first used by the Sons of Temperance, then by the Odd-Fellows and Masons.

In 1827 Anson Northum had a store on the southeast corner and a dwelling-house on the site of George Walker's house. He was succeeded by Charles Roosa, John Raymond and Seth G. Nicholson, who built the store now occupied by G. W. Simons, about 1857. John Nash has a handsome store in the village.

Lodges.—The Sons of Temperance was the first organization of the kind in Salem. This was followed by Good Templars and the Band of Hope. Luther and Elijah Weston were the first prominent temperance men in the township.

[1] Ambrose Nicholson writes me that H. Heermans was first postmaster at Salem Corners.

Joseph Woodbridge's[2] account book from 1804 till 1812 shows that the settlers for ten miles around bought whiskey by the quart, gallon, half-barrel and barrel. They could not have a logging bee, raise a house or gather a hay crop without whiskey, and all drank it. Alanson Hollister and Anson Goodrich each had difficulty in raising buildings without its use.

Amphyctine Lodge, No. 356, I. O. of O. F., was organized July 12, 1849, with seven charter members—Alpheus Hollister, D. J. Ostrander, A. B. Walker, Roswell Morgan, J. Alden Williams, Jeremiah Fessenden and Anson Abbey.

Wayne Encampment was organized in 1867. Charter members: John B. Walker, G. O. Mott, F. B. Moss, Angelo Brown, Ebenezer R. Jones, George Foote and Edwin E. Blake. The Odd-Fellows' Encampment societies built a hall in 1882. The Salem Lodge, No. 330, F. and A. M., was organized May 23, 1859, by Sharp D. Lewis, D. D. G. M. of Luzerne County. The charter members were Thomas Nichols, W. D. Curtis, Dr. J. N. Wilson, E. B. Hollister, A. B. Walker, Stanley Day, Marcus Day and James Searles.

The Captain Warren G. Moore Grand Army Post has been organized recently at Hollisterville and is composed of soldiers of the late war.

Post-Offices.—There are five post-offices in Salem. The first office, established about 1812, was called Salem post-office, with William Woodbridge as postmaster and Ashbel Woodbridge assistant, as near as the writer can ascertain. It was adjacent to the East school-house, at Major Woodbridge's house. This office was moved to Salem Corners, with Henry Heermans as postmaster. He was succeeded by Oliver Hamlin, he by Butler Hamlin, the present incumbent being B. F. Hamlin. Some time after the office was moved the name was changed to Hamlinton. A. B. Walker and Dr. J. N. Wilson each held the office for a short time. The Hollisterville post-office was established in 1857 with Alanson Hollister as postmaster.

[2] Joseph Woodbridge was a conscientious man and stopped the distillery before he died, and Sally Case taught a school in the building about 1812.

Since then James Waite, Thomas Baker and Ernest Stevens have held the office. John Becker was postmaster at Ledgedale a number of years. L. W. Morss now holds. Simon P. Lutz was the first postmaster at Arlington, and Merritt D. Rollison now has the office. Jerome T. Stocker was appointed postmaster of Peetona January 18, 1886, and the first mail was received February 9, 1886.

THE METHODIST CHURCH IN SALEM.—Anson Goodrich, in a letter to Dr. Peck, says: "Ephraim Bidwell and Dorcas, his wife, came to Salem—then Canaan—in the year 1800. They were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It was by invitation from Mr. Bidwell that year, or the following, that two preachers, Chambers and Polemus, held services. Dr. Peck says they came from Wyoming,—Chambers probably in 1801 or 1802, and Polemus in 1803." Mr. Goodrich continues: "I recollect hearing Mr. Owen, Christopher Frye and Alfred Griffeths preach in barns, dwelling-houses and a log school-house (probably the East school-house); in fact, the only school-house in what is now Salem. Before Bishop Asbury left Wyoming he directed Gideon Draper to spend the rest of the year in what afterward became Canaan Circuit. Mr. Draper found Major Woodbridge in his log mill, at what is now called Moss Hollow. Mr. Woodbridge was a Congregationalist of many years' standing, but not so bigoted as to decline his aid in establishing meetings for the good of the new settlement. He was a little slow to pledge himself to the new sect, but lent an ear and proceeded as he saw light. He invited Mr. Draper to partake of the hospitalities of his house, but said nothing about his having a regular appointment in the place until he had heard him preach on the Sabbath. Subsequently Mr. Draper appointed a love feast to be held in Major Woodbridge's barn. They admitted all who wished to come, and the barn was full. Major Woodbridge, his wife and a Dutch woman assisted Mr. Draper. Many were awakened and the meeting continued late at night. An old raftsman, seventy years of age, was converted. Mr. Draper asked the major to take the names of all who wished to join the society. Twenty-two persons gave their names, and he was regularly installed as a class-leader in the Methodist Church, almost before he was aware of it."

In this account we have followed Dr. Peck's "History of Early Methodism." Anson Goodrich, in his letter, says: "The first class was formed in 1807, under Gideon Draper and William Butler. Major Woodbridge was appointed the first class-leader and continued in that position till his death, in 1811 or 1812. The following persons were members of the first class formed in Salem: Theodore Woodbridge, Ephraim Bidwell, Dorcas Bidwell, Harris and Ruey Hamlin, Ruey Hamlin Baldwin, Michael Mitchell, Lucy Mitchell, Catharine Hamlin Lee, Irena Potter, Dorcas Miller, Charles Goodrich, Ann Goodrich, Charles Goodrich, Jr, Timothy Hollister, Betsey Hollister, Josiah Curtis, Eunice Curtis, Gideon Curtis, Ann Curtis, Fitch H. Curtis, William Cobb, Salmon Jones, Sally Jones, Joseph Miller, William Dayton, Ann Dayton, Nathan S. Wright, Lamenta Wright, Jeremiah Osgood, Ruth Osgood, Edmund Nicholson, Rebecca Nicholson and Oliver Hamlin. In 1812 we find in the steward's book kept by Henry Avery the following additional names: Luther, Polly, Prudence, Jabez, Oren and Sally Bidwell, Sophia Curtis, Sally Hamlin, Lucena Wright, Polly and Joel Potter, Hannah Wheatcraft, Henry and Lucy Avery, Adrial and Achsah Andrews, Samuel Harford, John Andrews, Lucy Andrews, Lamira Avery, Benjamin Harrison. Later we find John Glossenger, Betsey Ryon, Sally Brown, Cyprian Cobb, Mary Glossenger, Nancy London, Eli Mitchell. Anning Owen appears to have been presiding elder in 1807. He held the first quarterly meeting held in Salem in Major Woodbridge's barn. This barn stood on the south side of the road, a little east of the house. Thomas Elliott is spoken of as a preacher in 1808 on Canaan Circuit. Loring Grant ministered in Salem in 1812, according to Henry Avery's book. From Fitch H. Curtis and John Andrew's class-book, the recollection of Jemima Peet and records in the hands of Andrew Andrews, it appears that Israel Cook preached in 1816. Ebenezer Dillitts and Robert Montgomery are mentioned. Isaac Grant preached in 1817 and 1818, Dr. George Peck in 1820, John D. Gilbert in 1821, Elisha Bibbings and Solon Stocking in 1821 and 1823, Sophronius Stocking from 1824 to 1826, John Sayre and Silas Comfort, 1826–27. Among the men that were prominent in the early history of the church were Harris Hamlin, Ephraim Bidwell, Timothy Hollister, Henry Avery and Fitch N. Curtis; later, Anson Goodrich, Hiram Clements, Andrew Andrews and Hiram Goodrich were prominent class-leaders. In 1820 Rev. George Peck was on Canaan Circuit, which then included Salem, Bethany and the region known as the Beech Woods generally. It was a two weeks' circuit, with a membership of two hundred and twenty-three and twelve preaching-places, one of them being the court-house at Bethany, three or four school-houses, the rest private houses—not one church. Dr. Peck says, after attending camp-meeting at Carpenter's Notch, Father Hamlin took his wife and child in his lumber wagon, while he rode behind on horseback, over Cobb's Mountain to Salem, a distance of thirty miles.

"He offered us a part of his house for the year and we gladly accepted it. We boarded with him a part of the time and he also kept my horse when I was at home and he refused to take any pay for all that he had done for us." The infant mentioned, twenty-five years afterward stood before the people of Salem as their pastor—Rev. George M. Peck. Subsequently he was presiding elder over Honesdale District. Still later, he preached again in Salem, for two years. They had two preachers for a number of years, one living at Canaan and the other at Salem. The Salem man would preach in Canaan every alternate Sabbath, and the Canaan man in Salem, till 1841–42, when Paupack Mission was annexed. Shortly after there were two preachers again,—one in Salem and one in Sterling. Their arrangements were the same as between Salem and Canaan. In 1859 Sterling was taken off, leaving Salem with one preacher. Salem charge now has five preaching points,—Hamlinton, Hollisterville, Maplewood, Little Chapel and Bidwell Hill,—with about two hundred members, five Sunday-schools, with thirty-eight teachers and over two hundred pupils. There have been many revivals among them, notably in 1837–38, when Rev. William Readdy was on the charge. It started in the prayer-meetings at Bidwelltown. Aaron Gillett exhorted. The preacher did not attend often, and forty or fifty joined the church. In 1859–60 the greatest revival occurred known in the history of the Salem Church, during Rev. Jacob Miller's pastorate, about one hundred and sixty professing conversion. The Salem Methodist Episcopal Church is the oldest of that denomination in the county and the parent church of all the Methodist Episcopal Churches for ten miles around. It has contained a goodly number of earnest workers, who have passed on to their reward. Benjamin Ryon, Sabin Andrews, Hiram Clements, Fitch H. Curtis, and scores of others who might be mentioned, will be remembered for their devotion. Their preachers are zealous, warm-hearted men, for the most part, who have waged aggressive warfare for their church. Among those who have come down to us as earnest preachers are Isaac Grant, Elder Bibbings, Solon and Sophronius Stocking, Dr. George Peck and his son, George M. Peck. The number of zealous preachers who have labored here are too numerous to mention. The first services were held in barns, private houses and school-houses. The East school-house was built about 1807 or 1808, and the West school-house a little later. In 1815 Charles Goodrich deeded the land where the Methodist Episcopal Church of Hamlinton now stands to Gideon Curtis, Adrial Andrews, Edmund Nicholson, Charles Goodrich, Jr., and Fitch H. Curtis, evidently for school and meeting purposes, this being the lot upon which the old school-house stood. In 1829 this same land is deeded by the above grantees to William T. Noble, Timothy Hollister, Anson Goodrich and Oliver Hamlin, trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Salem. In 1830 these same trustees, with the additional name of Samuel Harford, obtained a charter for the Salem Methodist Episcopal Church. A Union Church had been built on this ground and was dedicated August 18, 1827. The Methodists gave one-half and the Presbyterians and Protestants the other half, with the understanding that the Methodist Episcopal should have the church every alternate Sabbath in the morning and contra in the afternoon. The Presbyterians and Protestants divided the alternate Sabbaths. One Sunday the Protestants took possession one-half hour earlier than the regular hour, when it was not their turn. The Methodists got the keys and locked them out. These difficulties culminated in a lawsuit between the Presbyterians and Methodists, in which the Presbyterians were successful, when the Methodists bought out the interest of such individual Presbyterians as would sell, but Dr. Wright and some others would not sell and always claimed their rights. In 1832–33, when the Presbyterians built their church, some of the Methodists aided the enterprise. Whatever the difficulties which marred the harmony of the early church, they have long since vanished, and peace and good-will now prevails. This old Union Church was thirty-eight by forty, with two entrance doors in the south end, a pulpit between galleries on the sides and north end supported by large round pine pillars. It would seat six hundred people. The women all entered the west door and occupied that side of the church, the men taking the east side. Dr. George Peck preached the last sermon in the old church and also laid the corner-stone of the present Centennial Methodist Episcopal Church in 1866. The Rollisontown inhabitants built a log school-house in 1838, near the lane that comes to the road from Arthur Rollison's house. Before the school-house was built there was preaching occasionally at William Dayton's. Nathaniel Rollison was the first class-leader, as John William Bidwell is at present. They have just completed a beautiful little church, James Osborne giving the ground. It was dedicated December 19, 1885, by Rev. W. M. Hiller, Rev. J. O. Woodruffe, Rev. C. L. Rice and Rev. D. A. Sandford. Arthur Rollison, George M. Bidwell and J. W. Bidwell are the leading members. Rollisontown, Centreville and Ledgedale are in the Paupack Circuit. The first woods-meeting was held in Timothy Hollister's barn and the woods adjoining in 1815, according to the recollection of Abner Collins. Polly Bidwell, aged eighty, Joseph Osgood, aged eighty-one, and Sally Weston, aged eighty-two, say they were present at the first regular camp-meeting ever held in Salem, in 1818. Marmaduke Pierce was presiding elder and Isaac Grant preacher in Salem. It was held in the woods on the west side of the road, back of Adrial Andrews', near a spring. About 1825 they held camp-meetings in Canaan, and the Protestant Methodists had camp-meetings near Hollisterville. The present Salem Camp-Meeting Association was chartered February 2, 1875, by Judge Waller. Capital stock, one thousand dollars, with the privilege of increasing it to twenty thousand dollars. It is controlled by a board of fifteen directors chosen from the stockholders, which directors shall choose a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer. The stockholders purchased ten acres of ground on the south side of the road, about one-half mile west of Salem Corners, of A. J. Andrews, embracing a beech and birch grove, with a few hemlock trees scattered among them. The association have erected a rostrum or preacher's stand, a prayer-meeting tent with the prophets' rooms overhead, and a boarding-house and sandwich stand. About fifty cottages, owned by individuals, are ranged in circular form around the audience ground. The first board of directors were Rev. S. F. Wright, Rev. W. G. Queal, Rev. H. M. Crydenwise, Rev. Stephen Jay and Rev. Jonas Underwood; and the following laymen: Gilbert White, Sanford Williams, A. J. Andrew, J. P. Mitchell, J. W. Bidwell, James Van Camp, William D. Curtis, George Williams, John H. Williams and O. H. Pease. There has been a camp-meeting held annually since the charter was granted.

On John Andrews' and Fitch H. Curtis' class-book for 1816 it is written, "Be Particular Every friday Preceding quarterly Meeting, Must be observed As a day of fasting and Prayer For the prosperaty of Zion;" also "keep close to the Lord, keep close Class-Meetings," and they did keep close class-meetings. Sinners were sometimes admitted whom they supposed seekers; afterward they had written permits. They have been known to reject their own members when they had not these permits. After the Protestants retired they became more liberal in these matters. If members were absent for three consecutive class-meetings they rendered a reasonable excuse therefor. Falling or losing their strength was a phenomenon of early Methodism in Salem, as elsewhere. Dr. Peck says sinners, as well as professors of religion, used to fall. He thinks it was a practice to be discouraged. There are two Protestant Churches in Salem, one at Hollisterville, built about 1840,—and one near the township line, built in 1884. Rev. Joseph Barlow and Bern B. Doty were among the first Protestant preachers. About 1828 Amasa Hollister and wife, John Andrews, Sr., and wife, Conrad Swingle and wife, Jeremiah Osgood and wife, and John Cobb and wife organized the Protestant Methodist Church. Among the preachers were John Smith, Ambrose Abbott, James K. Helmbold and Dr. Payne.

Asa Cobb, Jr., and Aaron Gillett were local preachers; E. S. H. Cobb and Joseph Watrous were ordained elders; Joseph Watrous was president of the district at one time.

CONGREGATIONAL-PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—A number of the early settlers were of Puritan Congregational proclivities, and the Connecticut Congregationalists had missionaries on the ground at an early date. Among these missionaries were Rev. Seth Williston, Rev. E. Kingsbury and Rev. David Harroway. It appears from the old church records that a Congregational Church was formed in Salem, August 15, 1808, by David Harroway. The following is the list of those who united at that time: Hezekiah Bingham, Hezekiah Bingham, Jr., Joseph Woodbridge, Ashbel Woodbridge, Jesse Miller, Rachel Weston, Martha Stevens, Ann Woodbridge. Subsequently we find the names of Elijah Weston, Nancy Pellet, Eunice Bingham, Almira Woodbridge, Polly Ansley, William Woodbridge, Elijah Weston, Jr., Luther Weston. Rev. Daniel Waldo is mentioned among the early missionaries. When they had no preacher, sermons were read. People used to remark that they would as willingly hear Joseph Woodbridge read a sermon, as to hear a preacher. Rev. Worthington Wright was the first settled pastor over the churches in Wayne County in 1812. He resided at Bethany. Joseph Woodbridge contributed ten dollars; Seth Goodrich, six; Ashbel Woodbridge, six; Jesse Miller, three; William Woodbridge, five; and Elijah Weston, three. They agreed to double their subscription if the minister would live in Salem. In 1815, having lost his wife and his health failing, Rev. W. Wright asked dismission and left the county. Rev. Phineas Camp preached occasionally about 1818. The Salem and Palmyra Congregational Church was re-organized at the East schoolhouse, February 2, 1832, as a Presbyterian Church. Rev. Joel Campbell, of the Honesdale Presbyterian Church, was chosen moderator, and Stephen Torrey, a ruling elder of the same church, clerk. Of the old members there were the following present: Luther Weston, Elijah Weston, Nancy Pellet, William Woodbridge, Almira Woodbridge, Polly Ansley (absent), Ashbel Woodbridge, Henry Stevens, Martha Stevens, Eunice Bingham and Dolly Roosa. Marilla Curtis and Lydia Wright were admitted by letter. George Goodrich, Alanson Hollister and Miss Arrian Corbin were admitted on profession of faith. Also Minerva T. Weston, Nancy Nicholson, John H. Bullen and Hannah, his wife, were admitted February 19, 1832. Also at this meeting Luther Weston, Elijah Weston and George Goodrich were ordained ruling elders by Rev. Joel Campbell. Subsequently we find the names of John Roosa, Jared Taylor, Horatio Nicholson, Sally Hollister, Eliza Wheeler, Laura Weston, Dr. Erastus Wright, Catharine Northam, Zenas Nicholson, Margaret Adams, Edmund Brown, Jonathan B. Watrous, Matilda Watrous, Lucy Moore, Laura Matthews, Daniel Noble, Erastus Noble, Fanny Wheeler, Ambrose Nicholson, Minerva Nicholson, Ellen Andrews, Maria Woodbridge, Mary L. Raymond, Dr. Burr, Mary Leonard, Jane Butler, P. Howe, A. Howe, Mary A. Howe, Abigail Watrous, Mahala Jones, John A. Cook and family, Arselia Brown, and still later, Thomas Cook, Amos Polly, Austin M. Nicholson, John Nash, E. J. Ayers, R. M. Stocker, E. B. Polley, Lewis Cook, J. T. Stocker, James D. Stocker, Henry Cook. The Presbyterians built a church in 1833, in which they worshipped until 1852–54, when the present church was erected. Rev. David R. Gilmer, Rev. D. R. Dickson and Rev. Lyman Richardson supplied the pulpit until Rev. Moses Jewell was installed pastor of the church and congregation of Salem, by Rev. Adam Miller, September 24, 1833. He left March 23, 1834, and Rev. Joel Barlow preached from 1837 till 1844; Rev. Albert R. Raymond, from September, 1844, until June, 1863; Rev. E. Merriam,[1] two years; Rev. R. Crossett, two years; Rev. Samuel Hutchings, one year; and Rev. C. M. Des Islet, about three years, since which date students have supplied the pulpit during the summer. John A. Cook was made ruling elder during Rev. A. R. Raymond's time. Thomas Cook, John Nash and Austin Nicholson were made ruling elders about 1866, and Jerome T. Stocker became a ruling elder October 12, 1872. Of these, A. M. Nicholson removed to the West and John Nash joined the Methodists. As early as 1832 candidates before the session, in answer to questions put by the session, "express their determination to abstain from the traffick and use of ardent spirits as an article of luxury." The following is a specimen of old-time discipline copied from the minutes of the session, as kept by George Goodrich, clerk. Charges had been preferred against Mr. B—— for unchristian conduct. The minutes say: "The Session having had two interviews with Mr. B——, and he having acknowledged that the charges were true, and has neglected to make such satisfaction as the Gospel requires, it was voted by the Session that a written notice be served on him informing him that he stands suspended from all the privileges of the church until he make such satisfaction as the Gospel requires; and as he has of late expressed a willingness to make a Public Confession of his faults, that he also be notified that an opportunity for this will be given him on the coming Sabbath or at any other Public Meeting of the church within fifteen days from this date." A notice was accordingly prepared and served on Mr. B——, giving him an opportunity to publicly confess or stand suspended.

THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH was built in 1847. Rev. Mr. Cushman conducted service in the East school-house about 1840, before the church building was erected, Mrs. Robert Patten being the leading spirit in the enterprise. The leading members were Robert Patten and wife, Franklin Goodspeed, John Raymond, Caleb B. Hackley, Daniel Potter, Gaius Moss, Mrs. Anson Abby. Among others are Richard Evans, Russell Bidwell, George Simons, Catharine Foote, Lucy Walker. Rev. Edwin Mendenhall[2] was their first rector and officiated about fourteen years. After his death Rev. Mr. Cowpland occupied the pulpit for two or three years, when Rev. R. H. Brown preached for fifteen years. There has been no rector since. The Baptist Church in Hollisterville was organized in 1854–55, by Rev. Newel Callender, the prominent members being Alanson Hollister and wife, Platt Stevens, William Hollister and wife, James Waite and wife, James Rockafeller, Asa Hollister and wife, M. H. Race. The Catholics had preaching occasionally in Ledgedale school-house from 1851 until 1877, when they built St. Mary's Church near the township line. They draw their congregations from Paupack and East Salem. The Christians have some members who have preaching occasionally at Osgood's school-house. The Christian Church at Osgood's was organized November 26, 1866,

[1] Rev. E. Merriam was a young man who had just completed his studies, and was installed pastor of Salem Church, where he died, aged twenty-eight, much beloved by his congregation for his devotion and real worth as an unassuming, scholarly man.

[2] Rev. Edwin Mendenhall was born of Quaker parents, in Chester County, Pa., February 27, 1803. In 1831 he married Elizabeth Culbertson. Of their children, Elizabeth married Thomas B. Townsend, of Chicago; Ellen married Horace A. Beal, and lives at Parkesburg, Pa. September 28, 1841, Mr. Mendenhall entered the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va., was ordained July 14, 1844, and he was shortly after sent to Salem, where he organized a parish in 1845. He made personal application to friends for assistance from Philadelphia in erecting St. John's Church, which was consecrated by Bishop Alonzo Potter, August 5, 1850. Gaius Moss was senior warden and Daniel Potter was junior warden; F. B. Moss was leader of a volunteer choir, which, according to the testimony of the bishop and visiting clergymen, rendered the best music they heard outside of city choirs.—From Ellen Beal's letter.

by Elder Henry Black, of New Jersey. The first members were James Swingle, Enos Swingle, George Edwards, David P. Edwards, Eugene Goodrich, Jeremiah Wilcox, Adnia Wilcox and Eliza Edwards. They have since added thirty-four members. C. E. Wells, pastor; Samuel Swingle and James Swingle, elders.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS. — Ann Woodbridge, the widow of Joseph Woodbridge, after her husband's death, in 1816, went to Connecticut and attended Sunday-school in Hartford, Conn., and in New York. On her return, in 1817 or 1818, she asked Sally Brown, then fourteen years of age, to notify her young friends and come to her house the following Sunday for the purpose of organizing a Sunday-school. She agreed to it and kept her promise, but not without misgivings, and was troubled all the week to know how they could have a school on Sunday without breaking the Sabbath. The next Sunday, however, Sally Brown, Laura Goodrich, Ambrose Nicholson, Malvina Potter, Betsy Hollister, Abigail Hollister and Anna Wright appeared in the Widow Ann Woodbridge's[1] log house, which stood on the corner opposite the present stone house. She had them all stand in a row and read the Testament, of which they had two or three copies. She had several John Rogers primers, containing Catechism and commandments, which she loaned them. Shortly after we find William Woodbridge superintending a school at East schoolhouse, and every alternate Sunday was spent at the West school-house. February 5, 1832, the Salem Sunday-School Society was formed at the West school-house, Zenas Nicholson being president; George Goodrich, secretary; Elijah Watson, treasurer; Alanson Hollister, Amos Polly, Esq., and George Goodrich, directors. They adopted a constitution and effected a regular organization, making it auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union Society. Luther Weston, Dr. Erastus Wright, Medad Walters, Amasa Jones, J. B. Watrous, Jared Taylor, Ambrose Nicholson, Palmer Miller and Dr. Chas. Burr were connected with that society. Hiram Clements, Thomas K. Benson, Matthias Haag, Sandford Swingle and John Nash have been prominent Sunday-school workers. Rev. A. R. Raymond is an excellent Bible-class teacher. Mary L. Raymond, his wife, has taught for many years. There was a Sunday-School Association auxiliary to Wayne County Sunday-School Association organized at Salem in 1872, or about that time. Rev. C. M. Des Islets was first president and Jerome T. Stocker secretary. A number of Sunday-school conventions were held every year. There are usually ten Sunday-schools in operation in the township.

The first school-house in the township was the East school-house, which stood on the corner just west of Major Woodbridge's house. It was built about 1805–8 of hewn logs, with a door in the south end, a stone chimney on the west end and the teachers' desk opposite. The desks were against the wall, the sharp edges of which served as a back-rest when the pupils were not writing. The seats were thick plank, with sapling legs. Berkely, one of the first teachers in this school, was a college graduate and so was Rev. William Woodbridge, who taught later. Children came for five miles around to the East school. The West school was at Salem Corners. The London House and Charles Goodrich's house were used for school purposes until 1814, when a frame school-house was built. There was also a school-house near Elizur Miller's, made of basswood boards, for summer schools. P. G. Goodrich says he attended about 1810, Irene Potter being teacher. In 1827 a school-house was built on the knoll above L. A. Griffin's carriage shop in Hollisterville, Phineas Howe being the first teacher. Bidwelltown school-house was built about 1838 and Daniel Gorman taught two or more years.

A log school-house was built on the lane that comes from A. J. Rollison's in 1838. Tryphena Lee was the first teacher. Osgood's, Ledgedale, Centreville, No. 20, and Razor Hill schools came later. There are ten schools in Salem. Sally Hamlin Bonham taught the first school in 1804, when she was fourteen years old. She received a two-dollar bill for three months service, which was placed in an open book. As she sat before the fire-place, a gust of wind blew the bill into the fire and reduced her three months' labor to smoke and ashes before her eyes. Ashbel Woodbridge, Samuel Morgan, Mary Ann and Egbert Woodbridge, R. G. and George Goodrich, Sally Case, Mr. Benedict, Jason Bradley, Timothy Morgan, John W. Gordon, Oliver Hamlin and Joseph Moore, Jr., were among the early teachers.

An academy was built in Hollisterville in 1862. M. H. Race taught a number of years as did also E. J. Ayres. It is now used for a Methodist Church. Butler Hamlin placed seats over his new store and schools were taught there by E. D. F. Brownell, R. M. Stocker and F. J. Foley.

Roads.—From old records of Westmoreland County we find Esquire Tryp appointed, October 19, 1772, to oversee men working on "Rode from Dilleware River to ye westermost part of ye Great Swamp to Pittstown." The first roads were mere bridle-paths through the forest, indicated by marked trees. Later the swampy places were bedded with poles, called corduroy roads, pole bridges being made.

Nathan G. Wright signed a contract, October 8, 1818, with Samuel Morgan and Vene Lee, a committee appointed by the managers to construct the Belmont and Easton turnpike, to build one hundred and fifteen rods, commencing at Ann Woodbridge's, thence north one hundred and fifteen perches, to be completed September 1, 1819. They gave him six shares of stock for building it, and bound him under six hundred dollars forfeiture to keep it in repair. This road was a great thoroughfare for travel, and droves of cattle and sheep, amounting to a number of thousands annually, passed over it to market. The stock was gathered up north as far as the lake region of New York and driven to Easton and Philadelphia markets. The road was divided into sections about fifteen or twenty miles long, and a four-horse tally-ho coach passed both ways daily. The section passing through Salem Corners extended from Canaan Corners to Captain Howe's, a distance of eighteen miles. John P. Mitchell drove stage a number of years. The East and West road, which extended from Milford to Salem Corners, thence through Cobb's Gap to the Lackawanna Valley, was built in 1825. At that time Hamlinton was a place of some importance, but the railroads have left the towns situated on hills and passed through the valleys.

The oldest settlers of Salem were nearly all Revolutionary soldiers and from Connecticut. The town is more thoroughly New England than any in the county. The pioneers met many obstacles. They made logging-bees and house-raisings; thus, by associated labor, they helped one another to clear their farms and build their houses.

"There are no times like the old times—they shall never be forgot!
There is no place like the old place—keep green the dear old spot!
There are no friends like our old friends—may Heav'n their lives prolong,
And bring us all—life ended—to join the happy throng."

John Bunting assessed Canaan in 1799. It had twenty-eight taxables, five of whom belonged in Salem. John Bunting was also the first justice of the peace.

Josiah Curtis assessed Salem in 1809, after it was set off from Canaan. He returned sixty taxables. In 1810 there were fifty-seven. In 1811 fifty-four, Joseph Woodbridge and Salmon Jones assessors. In 1812 fifty-eight taxables. In 1816, after Sterling was formed, Elijah Weston, assessor, returned fifty-four taxables, and in 1824 there were eighty-eight taxables. In 1880, after Lake was formed, there were sixteen hundred and thirty-five inhabitants in Salem.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

JUDGE BUTLER HAMLIN.

Harris Hamlin, father of Judge Hamlin, of English origin, was born in the State of Connecticut April 27, 1767, and married Rue Easton, a native of the same State, August 22, 1787, who was born February 28, 1770. They left their native State in 1801, and, with nine children, came to the then wilderness country of Easton, Pa., and settled one and a quarter mile west from Salem Corners, in Salem township, Wayne County. Here they built a log house in which they resided for some eight years, when they erected a framed house—the first one built in the township. Harris Hamlin was a farmer and brick manufacturer, and both himself and wife were consistent Christians and members of the Methodist Church. Dr. Peck says of him: "He was a man of generous impulses and solid worth, an earnest Christian and a thorough Methodist." He died August 4, 1854; his wife died December 5, 1833. Their children are Rue, Sarah (wife of John Bonham, recently died in Wayne County at the age of ninety-four), Catherine (wife of Horace Lee, resided in Canaan, and her son John F. Lee is a farmer in the township), Ruey (the 2d, married Daniel Baldwin and moved to Minnesota; she was a talented and pious lady), Oliver, Amanda (wife of John Andrews), Harris, Ephraim W., Almira, Butler and Philena (who married Volney Cortright). The latter is the only one surviving in 1886—a widow and resides in Scranton, Pa. Judge Butler Hamlin, youngest son of Harris Hamlin, was born in Salem township April 17, 1808. His early life was spent on the farm at home, and, in common with the other boys during the early history of the county, he knew what hard work meant and had little opportunity for obtaining an education from books, being only allowed three months' schooling during the winter months each year, until the age of sixteen. His practical ideas in after-life, his general intelligence, his devotion to principle, integrity of purpose and sympathy for all worthy objects, however, bespeak how thoroughly he was educated in youth in all that made him the man so much esteemed by his fellow-citizens. For two years following 1827 he worked at the trade of a hatter with his brother-in-law at Montrose,

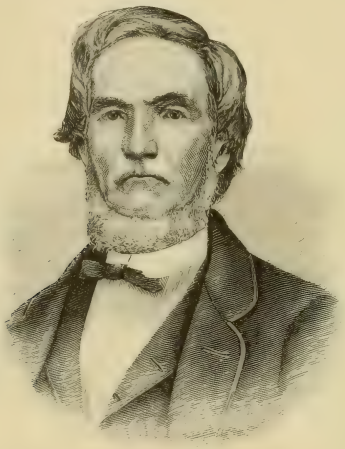
Butler Hamlin

Susquehanna County, Pa., for an annual stipend of thirty dollars, one-half of which, by strict economy, he saved, and now had, on reaching his majority. He spent two years more as a clerk in his brother's store and post-office at ten dollars per month, when he became a partner in the concern and continued this business relation until 1837, when he became sole owner of the store, was appointed postmaster and held the place with slight interruption through the various administrations and changes in political organizations until the time of his death, which occurred December 10, 1883. In 1861 he was elected associate judge on the bench with Judge Barrett. The two offices being incompatible, he resigned as postmaster, but was reinstated upon the petition of the patrons of the office as soon as his term as judge was completed. Again, during the Presidency of James Buchanan, he was removed for political reasons, but after a little more than a year he was reinstated during the same administration, through the petition of the patrons of the office, comprised of both political parties.

Judge Hamlin's political affiliations were with the Whig and Republican parties, and as a member of those he was a safe counselor and sought to support the principles of reform, rather than the men who represented party alone. It may be truly said that he acted justly and honestly toward all men in all the relations of life, and during his business career as a merchant, which continued for nearly a half-century in the same place, all who knew him accord to him sterling characteristics. Although he never united with any church organizations, he was a prayerful man, a constant and studious Bible reader and a supporter of all church work in the vicinity of his home.

In 1838 Judge Hamlin formed the acquaintance of a Miss Sallinda Rathbone, daughter of Abel and Alice Rathbone, who came to Salem, Wayne County, that year on a visit to friends, and during the summer taught the school in the neighborhood. They were married in October of that year, and their children who grew to man's estate are Lenora F. (wife of George A. Clearwater), Florence B. (died in 1875), Della P., Frank B. and Charles E. Hamlin.



HOWEL WOODBRIDGE.

Joseph Woodbridge and his wife, Ann Hollister, both natives of Glastonbury, Conn., soon after their marriage, December 30, 1802, settled in Salem township, Wayne County, Pa., on land heretofore described, a part of which remains in the family in 1885.

He spent his life as a farmer, was appointed the first justice of the peace in the township, and held the office until his death, October 14, 1816, at the age of thirty-five years. He was a man of more than ordinary ability, and was about to engage in mercantile operations when death came so prematurely, and cut his life short. He was identified with the preliminary work in organizing the Presbyterian Church of Salem, yet he did not live to see the fruits of his labor. His wife, a woman of culture and Christian fortitude, the first superintendent of the Sunday-school at Salem, was left with seven children,—Egbert, Wells, Howel, Mary Ann (wife of John Kelsey), John, Eliza (wife of William C. Gridley) and Ebenezer, of whom only three survive in 1885, —John, on a part of the old homestead; Eliza, in West Candor, Tioga County, N. Y.; and Ebenezer, at Lee Centre, Lee County, Ill. Of these children, Egbert Woodbridge lived to a good age, and died November 27, 1866, having served as justice of the peace in Salem township for many years, and filled other important positions of trust. By her second husband, Joseph Moore, Mrs. Woodbridge had three children. She died July 2, 1860, aged seventy-six years.

Howel Woodbridge, third son of Joseph, born at Salem, January 28, 1808, spent a part of his early life in Connecticut and acquired a practical education. He married Maria, daughter of Captain Jared Strickland, of Glastonbury, and settled upon a part of the homestead in Salem, which he afterward inherited, and there spent the remainder of his life. Their children were Hosmer, born January 1, 1838, died December 30, 1859; Henry, born September 5, 1840, served nine months in the late Civil War and until its close, and was killed by a falling tree July 11, 1869; Joseph, born January 17, 1843, served in the Second

Heavy Artillery in the late war and was honorably discharged (he married Elizabeth Van Norsdel February 22, 1870, and resides in Melborne, Marshall County, Iowa, and have children—Minnie A., Frank H. (deceased), Mary E. (deceased), William E. and Clarence L. Woodbridge); Sarah Ann, born December 1, 1849, a teacher for fifteen years, resides on the homestead; Mary W., born July 11, 1848, on the homestead; Jared, born October 13, 1850, resides in Arizona Territory.

Howel Woodbridge

Howel Woodbridge was a farmer, a highly respected citizen, and served a short time in the late Rebellion. He died August 29, 1878. His wife died April 24, 1871.

C. S. COBB.

C. S. Cobb kept a public-house (log tavern) for the entertainment of the traveling public. Both himself and wife, Mary (Stevens) Cobb, died at quite an advanced age, leaving as their successor their son John, who was born in Orange County, N. Y. John was a man of universal attainments. Besides conducting the old home farm successfully, he turned his attention to theology, and for many years represented in the pulpit the doctrines laid down by the Protestant Methodist denomination. Having acquired a competency, he contributed liberally to all worthy local objects, and was especially generous with those in need of pecuniary aid. In politics, he was first an Old Line Whig, but subsequently became a Democrat, which he remained until Lincoln's administration, when he identified himself with the Republican party. He was many times chosen by the people of his township to fill positions of trust, such as justice of the peace, etc. His wife was Mary, daughter of Conrad and Lucy (Bunting) Swingle. He died August 16, 1866, aged seventy-seven years, eight months and six days; and his wife died December 13, 1874, at an advanced age. Their children were eight in number, of whom Conrad S. was fifth in line. He was born February 8, 1825, in Luzerne, now Lackawanna County, Pa., Jefferson township. He remained in that locality until March, 1867, engaging in farming, carpenter and joiner work, etc., and having received a good English education, also engaged in teaching school and practiced surveying to a considerable extent. In politics, he is an independent Republican, and has been several times chosen to fill township offices, such as justice of the peace, school director, etc.

While a resident of Lackawanna County he was largely instrumental in making extensive and valuable improvements in the vicinity of his residence, but the facilities offered there being insufficient to gratify his ambition, he, in March, 1877, removed to Salem township, Wayne County, Pa., and settled upon land he had purchased but a short time previously, and here he continued his active career on what was known as the Robert Patten farm, the condition of which was such as to require an immediate outlay of money and labor. Mr. Cobb has, by industry and good management, placed the premises in such a state of improvement as to be second to none in Wayne County. His buildings are tastefully and substantially constructed, and the home of C. S. Cobb is one of the most sightly and picturesque places in Northern Pennsylvania. He was married to Laura J., daughter of Moses and Elizabeth (Cobb) Swingle, December 10, 1846. The children born to this union are as follows: John M. (deceased); Moses I., now residing in Hillsdale County, Mich.; Amy A. (deceased);

Velma E. (deceased); Jessie I., wife of Charles Uban; Polly A. (deceased); and Lucy, who resides at home.

Mr. Cobb is liberal in his religious views, but rather inclines to the faith of the disciples. He has been a liberal contributor to all church organizations in the neighborhood.

LEONIDAS WILLIAM MORSS.

Leonidas William Morss, of Ledgedale, Wayne County, Pa., second son of Benton Gilbert Morss and Caroline Amelia (Kirtland) Morss, was born at Red Falls, Greene County, N. Y., January 17, 1838.

He was fitted for college at Davenport and Prattsville, N. Y., and at Glendale, Mass., entered Williams College in 1856, and was graduated in 1860.

After his return from the College Natural History Society's Scientific Expedition, in September of that year, he was employed in his father's cotton-factory and store till November, 1864, when he removed to Ledgedale, Pa., and since then he has been the managing partner of the extensive business of tanning, merchandising, farming and lumbering, which was established at that place by his father in the years 1849–50.

He is a thorough-going business man, and understands what is being done about the tannery, in the store, and on the farm down to the minutest details.

He was married, in October, 1866, to Minnie E. Morse, of Carbondale, Pa., and has had by this marriage seven children, six of whom are now living.

A. J. ROLLISON.

His grandparents, William Rollison and Susana Schoonover, were natives of New Jersey, where they were married and reared a family, and at quite an early day settled in Cherry Ridge township, Wayne County, Pa. They shortly thereafter removed to Salem township, where the remainder of their lives were spent. He was a farmer and cooper by occupation, and both himself and wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. They died at quite an advanced age, leaving a large family of children, among whom was Nathaniel, father of the subject of this notice. He was born August 24, 1805. When a "lad" he went to live with his uncle, but only remained with him until he was old enough to make himself useful. He then entered the employ of different ones, contributing such of his earnings as he could towards the support of his father's family. He was married to Rebecca, daughter of John and Rebecca (McCabe) Osborn. Their children were Arthur James, Matilda W., deceased, who became the wife of Edward Ammerman), Zilpha, deceased, and Merritt D. Nathaniel Rollison made his first purchase in the fall of 1827, in Salem township. This land he subsequently exchanged for a larger tract in the same neighborhood, and there he spent the remainder of his life. He was a supporter of all worthy local objects, a consistent Christian and a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which he took an active part. In politics he was a Democrat until the nomination of John C. Fremont for President, when he became a Republican, which he ever after remained. He died April 28, 1876. His wife, who survived him resided with her son, Arthur

A. J. Rollison

J., until her death, in February, 1886, at seventy-seven years of age.

Arthur James Rollison was born September 20, 1828, in Salem township, Wayne County, Pa. His early life was spent at home upon the farm, where the usual routine was pursued incident to farm-life. He acquired such an education as the neighborhood school afforded. Upon reaching his majority he took upon himself the responsibility of purchasing a farm, incurring a debt covering the whole of it, which, by dint of courage, energy and economy, he paid off in due time, and made additional purchases, until he now owns two hundred and five acres of as finely-improved land as Wayne County affords. His entire life-work thus far has been devoted to agricultural pursuits, with the exception of three years he spent in merchandising. Mr. Rollison has ever taken an active interest in the neighborhood, township, etc.; has contributed liberally of his time and means to the support of church and kindred interests; was largely instrumental in the erection of the handsome church edifice recently built by the Methodist Episcopal Church organization in the neighborhood, of which he is a member and with which he is officially connected. He has always taken an active interest in school matters, and was for six years school director. He was married, January 1, 1852, to Lovina Ammerman. She died January 21, 1874, without issue. His second marriage occurred August 19, 1874, to Margaret A., daughter of Thomas Bortree. The children born of this union are Matilda E., Orra M. and Leroy L. Besides this, he has added to his family by adoption Aaron Cramer, William E. Woodward, Lafayette Ammerman, Orpha Ammerman and Annie E. Cole. The two latter reside with him at the present time.

CHAPTER XXXII.

LAKE TOWNSHIP.[1]

Lake Township was erected in 1877 out of the northern part of Salem and a small strip of South Canaan. The dividing line from the former township is substantially that run by L. S. Collins, R. S. Doren and J. R. Hoadley, commissioners appointed by the Court of Quarter Sessions, in June, 1874, to divide Salem into two election districts, in response to a petition signed by most of the residents of the upper portion of the town. The election-house was then located at Ariel, and has since become the town-house. The excision of the new district as a separate township took place in 1877, though the lines were not finally determined upon until two or three years later. The first assessment was made in 1878, and at that time the township had taxables. The line which divides it from Salem commences near the west side of W. H. Sharp's, and runs east so as to cross the Pennsylvania Coal Company's track southwest of Simon Moore's house. Thence it runs over what is known as "Morgan Hill," crossing the township road near Joseph Cobb's; thence across the old Salem road, between the farms of Horace Bell and J. L. Miller; thence across the lands of W. B. France; thence across the Chapmantown and Rollinsonville road, near the house of D. Lockcord, and thence south of Dayton Pond to the Rollinsonville and Purdytown road, near Hemlock Hollow, leaving Marcus Killam's farm buildings on the east side of the line and in Salem township. The South Canaan line was also straightened at the same time, so that a small strip of territory that formerly belonged to that township was included in the boundaries of Lake. The first election held in "Salem No. 2," as the district was first called, took place in February, 1875, and one hundred and seventy-three votes were cast, the first being polled by Samuel Safford.

The topography of Lake is much broken with large areas of sterile, rock-bound spurs of the Moosic Mountains, and several formidable swamps surrounded by almost impenetrable thickets of laurel, extending back from a few rods to a quarter of a mile. The morass in the eastern portion of the township is part of the great swampy region that extends over into Paupack, and is historic as "The Shades of Death," made memorable by tragedy and suffering, as the settlers who escaped the tomahawk and scalping-knife at [1] From matter supplied by P. W. Collins and Homer Green, Esq.

Wyoming fled to the Delaware. There is, perhaps, as much waste land in the township as in any equal area in the county, yet the central portion contains some good farms and is well populated. The proportion of uncleared land is large, much from which the timber has been felled being so covered with boulders and broken stone as to render it useless for agricultural purposes, and it remains a forbidding wilderness of decaying logs, brush and scrub oak, penetrated only by hunters and fishermen.

As late as 1850 probably two-thirds of the township was covered with heavy timber, hemlock predominating amid a valuable growth of hardwood and some white pine. The hardwood consisted chiefly of hard and soft maple, beech, birch, hickory in a few localities, considerable chestnut, black cherry, black oak, tulip tree and poplar. In 1851 the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Railroad was completed, and an outlet thus given to these hitherto almost inaccessible lumber regions. Soon axes were swinging busily in the forest, and tanneries sprang up to utilize the hemlock bark. As prices increased, still greater inroads were made on the mountain tracts, until now there is but little of the original unbroken forest left, and in its place are long stretches of ragged land covered with briar and brush, with here and there a solitary, fire-blackened tree standing guard over the abandoned field.

Although there is much land that will hardly be utilized for several generations, the township contains some as fine farms as will be found anywhere in the county; these are not, however, adapted to wheat or winter grains of any kind, though excellent for grazing. Those who make a specialty of stock-raising may be reckoned among the most successful farmers of the township, and corn, oats and potatoes are staple crops and give good returns. There are certain ridge farms, containing what is known as "red shale soil," which are better adapted to grain than grass. The Morgan farm, first occupied by Samuel Morgan, and now occupied by his son and daughter, is one of these, and has the reputation of being the best in the township for both crops.

Early Settlement.—Seventeen pioneers came into Salem township prior to 1803, and those who settled in the northern portion were, of course, the first settlers of Lake. The country in the vicinity of Jones Lake, being fertile land and comparatively free from large stone, was selected as the place for their clearings, and they and their descendants gave rise to two settlements which antedate all others in the township. Jonestown, the first of these, is a short distance east of the lake, and Elizur Miller was the first settler. He was the father of Joseph, Jesse, Ashbel and Hervy. The homestead descended to Jesse, who married Margaret Bishop, and was the father of five sons, —Palmer, John B., Jesse, Joseph and Jason. His wife, who lived to be a very aged woman, died but a few years ago. John B. Miller was the first to take up land in what is now known as the "Chapman District," about two miles east of Jonestown, on the Purdytown road. He married Nancy, a daughter of James Stone, of Arlington, who was one of the first settlers of Luzerne County. Mr. Miller had six children,—three boys and three girls. George, the youngest, who is the only son living, has the homestead. James Wiley, who married one of the daughters, lives on a part of the old place, and Silas Clark, the husband of another sister, has a place near by. The third daughter married Benjamin West, and has been dead several years.

Joseph L. Miller also settled in Chapmantown at first, but afterwards sold to George Killam and Silas Clark and went back on the Miller estate. He died in 1883, and Jesse Q. Miller, his son, has his homestead. In 1860, Jesse Miller, Sr., sold fifty acres of the estate to S. B. Dolph, of Luzerne County, who now resides on the north side of the place.

The Polly farm, which is north of the Miller estate, was first owned by Salmon Jones, a brother of Deacon Asa Jones. Salmon was elected sheriff in 1816, and moved to Bethany; but he must have sold the place before that, as it was assessed to Amos Polly in 1815. Esquire Polly was the second justice of the peace in Salem township, and held office until 1839. He was a carpenter by trade, and for a number of years the only one in Jonestown or vicinity, and many of the first buildings were erected by him. He was also interested with Deacon Jones in a saw-mill referred to elsewhere, and was a valuable man in the community. His wife was a sister of Joseph Headley, of Prompton, and he had six children,—three boys (Amos, Horace M. and Horton W.) and three girls (Sophia, the wife of Hiram Blois, who is still living at Hamlinton, aged eighty years; Hannah, the wife of Robert Headley; Electa, who married Edwin Haling). Most of them are now dead.

On the adjoining farm Deacon Asa Jones and Polly, his wife, settled in 1803, having come from the town of Newfoundland, Conn., by the way of New Jersey and the Delaware River. They had been recently married and Mrs. Jones had one grown son, afterwards Esquire Polly, by her first husband, Amos Polly, Sr. Deacon Jones had eight children,—Asa, Amasa, Joel, Polly, Hannah, Lury, Electa and Vesta.

Asa was a great hunter and trapper, and it is said of him that there was no man in the county who could infuse greater expectations into a party of hunters at the commencement of the chase, or bring about more satisfactory realizations at its close. He married Lucinna Buckingham and settled between the homestead and the farm of his brother Amasa. All of his seven children are dead except the youngest son, Amon, who has the old place.

Amasa Jones bought of Esquire Amos Polly when the latter moved to Hamilton and settled on the old Bethany road, near the Bethuel Jones' farm. Amasa was counted as a very successful farmer in the early days, and had one of the best appointed places in the locality. He married Morilla, a daughter of Josiah Curtis, of Salem Corners, and had five daughters,—Eliza, Mahala, Harriet, Vesta and Adaline. Washington Hoel, a son of Captain Charles Hoel, of Bethany, married Vesta, and now, with his family of three children, lives at the homestead.

Joel Jones married Delinda Purdy, a daughter of Reuben Purdy, of Paupack, and had five children,—Byron, who married Lucy Allen, of Luzerne County, and is one of the present justices of the peace for Lake township; Calinda, the wife of Charles Purdy, of Dalton, Lackawanna County; Melissa, who married S. T. Walker, and lives at Nicholson, Wyoming County; Reuben; and Polly, who married W. H. Bidwell, and lives near Sand Pond. Reuben married Abby Cobb, of Canaan, and lives at the homestead. His mother is still alive and resides with him.

Polly, Deacon Jones' eldest daughter, married William Hollister, and had a numerous family, most of whom reside in the township.

Lucy married Luther Weston, of Salem, and left no issue.

Electa was the wife of Joseph Moore, of Salem, and left only one son, who is now dead.

Vesta became the wife of Horace Moore, who, in 1827, bought of Timothy Hollister two hundred acres on the Salem and Cherry Ridge road, adjoining the farms of Amasa and Bethuel Jones. Mr. Moore had four children, and is still living, an aged man, and a deacon in the Jones Lake Baptist Church.

Hannah married Abner D. Collins, a son of Lewis Collins, of Cherry Ridge, and, in 1853, settled on lands lying between the old Asa Jones estate and the farm of Elder G. Dobell, on the place now occupied by P. W. Collins. They had six children,—Lysander Y., who married Eliza Brown, of Paupack, and removed to California in 1860; Elizabeth, the wife of Alva Harding, of Susquehanna County; Julia A., who married Thomas Cook, and lives in New York State; Hannah M., the wife of Warren Slocum, of Scranton; Philander W., who married Susan E. London, and resides at the homestead; Calista H., who married Warren Moore, and afterwards Edward W. Moore.

Ambrose Buckingham bought a few acres of Asa Jones, Jr., and built to the north of the latter's farm. After a few years he traded with Nathaniel Whitmore for two hundred acres in Paupack. Whitmore was a shoemaker, and one of the best in the county at that time, having owned a large manufacturing establishment in Connecticut previous to his removal to Pennsylvania. Besides the wide experience thus gained, he was a man of excellent education, and taught the winter schools several years.

Bethuel Jones came from Hebron, Conn., in 1822, arriving in Salem early in April in company with Lawrence Tisdel. The East and West turnpike was then in process of construction, and they came along the new road, staying the first night after their arrival with Seth Goodrich, on the Little Meadows place. Bethuel bought the place now occupied by his son, E. Z. Jones, from Jonathan Watrous, who had purchased from E. Flint and Jesse Miller. Bethuel was a brother of Asa and Salmon Jones, and was considered one of the most enterprising men of his time. He was a blacksmith, and had the only shop in the vicinity. He was three times married,—his first wife being Hannah Church, his second Lydia Rogers, and his third Betsy Isham. The latter survived him a number of years. He had six children,—E. R. Jones, Bethuel, Jr., Gates, Elizabeth, Lydia and Hannah. The eldest of these, E. R. seems to have inherited the enterprise of his father. He was a very successful lumberman in the early history of that industry, and enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him. He has been twice commissioner of Wayne County.

Lawrence Tisdel, who was a son-in-law of Bethuel, settled just north of him, and is still living, in his eighty-ninth year. Hannah, his wife, is eighty-four, and both are cared for by their son, George W., who lives at the homestead. Mr. Tisdel had a number of sons, all of whom have shown great constructive ability, and become noted for their skill in the avocations they have adopted. L. W. Tisdel is widely known among sportsmen as the ingenious gunsmith of Scranton. A. G. is a resident of Brooklyn, and has the reputation of being one of the best photographic and stereoscopic instrument makers in the country. Bethuel, who is a fine workman on calender clocks, is the foreman of a large establishment in Ithaca, N. Y., where another brother is also employed; while Frederick, the oldest son, has a very successful truck farm at Pittston.

John Watrous, a son of Jonathan, an early settler at Salem Corners, and a skillful shoemaker in his day, owns the farm adjoining the Tisdel place.

Chapmantown, the second of the early settlements, was begun about 1828, when Elder George Dobell moved from Sterling and located on a tract east of the old Jones place, on the Purdytown road. He had moved from England ten years before. Some improvements had been made on the tract by Jesse Miller, and as Mr. Dobell was very energetic he soon had a fine clearing that proved so productive as to attract others to the neighborhood. His early life was filled with domestic affliction. His first wife, a bride of a short time, died just before he sailed for America. In 1820, he married Catharine Smith, of Sterling, who also lived but a few years. His only son, John, was drowned, and sickness visited his children. In spite of all these discouragements, he was always cheerful in his activity, and uncompromising in integrity, and consistent in his Christian life. He held firmly to the old school Baptist doctrines, and, after having preached as a licentiate for a number of years, was ordained to the ministry, by Rev. Zelotes Grenell, in 1828-9. In 1824 he had preached the funeral sermon of Rev. William Purdy, the pioneer minister of the Baptists in Wayne, who organized the Palmyra Church in 1801, and was its pastor from that date. Mr. Dobell succeeded him, and for a number of years was closely identified with the congregation. He was a prominent figure in the controversy between the old and new school doctrines, and the disagreements growing out of it led him to resign his pastorate. Elder Dobell's third wife was Eliza Lawrence, whom he married in 1833; she died only a few months ago, aged nearly ninety years. His children were as follows: Eliza, who married Albert Purdy, and was the mother of George Purdy, Esq., of the Wayne County bar; Hannah, wife of Joseph L. Miller; Sarah, who married Henry Stevens, of Sterling; Frances, the wife of William Ramble; Martha; Mary Ann, the wife of Edward Smith; Charlotte, who married William Simmons, of Sterling.

William Ramble, who was skilled as a millwright, came from Northampton County, Pa., about 1847, and worked at his trade for many years on mills in the vicinity. In 1849 he bought the farm adjoining the Dobell place, and now has one of the best improvements in the district. He married Frances Dobell, as has been stated, and has six children; William, the eldest, owns the original Dobell place.

East of Mr. Ramble's is a farm owned by Edwin Haling, whose father came from Connecticut to Salem in 1844, and commenced clearing up a farm south of Jones' Lake, which is now owned by James Swingle. Mr. Haling married Electa Polly, and settled in Chapmantown in 1855.

The Chapmans who gave the name to this settlement, did not locate there until 1851. There were three of them—Leander, Horace and Alfred—brothers, and sons of Daniel Chapman, an old resident of Salem. They took up large tracts about a mile east of Jones' Lake, and were soon followed by others, among whom are W. B. Lesher, James Lesher and George Killam, who all occupy farms that compare favorably with those of the older settlers. On the new cross-road are some excellent farms, which have been quite recently cleared—notably, those of William Finn, W. B. Lesher, James Lesher and Hoarce Butler. Two other farms—the Ammerman and Daniels places, both settled much earlier—are now occupied by other than the original owners and their descendants.

In 1845 the turnpike from Salem to Cherry Ridge was completed, reducing the journey to Honesdale more than one half. The road led through what was at that time almost an unbroken forest, but as it became at once the main highway lands were quickly taken up and cleared, a paying market being found for both bark and lumber at Honesdale. Lewis Leonard had previously settled at Sand Pond, and it was through him and his son-in-law, Charles Washburn, that the road was so expeditiously opened. He was an oar-maker, who came from the State of Maine, in 1840, and settled on the place commenced by one Moore; and as the forest abounded with the best ash it was but a short time before he had a saw-mill and turning lathe at work.

George Leonard, a son of Lewis, settled next to his father, and has been one of the most successful and scientific farmers in the township. He is a man of broad technical knowledge and good constructive ability, and has been awarded several patents on water-wheels, ploughs, torpedoes and other useful inventions. He had until quite recently one of the most complete maple sugar camps in the county, and his apiary will compare favorably with any in the State. Mr. Leonard is an authority on bee-keeping, and elsewhere contributes to this work a valuable chapter on the industry. He is also a noted fruit raiser, and has the only power wind-mill in the township.

John Leonard, another son of Lewis, settled on the pike at the place now called "No. 17," and erected first a water-power saw mill, and afterwards applied steam. He at one time owned large and valuable tracts of timber land, but the estate, after passing through several hands, is now owned by Judge Giles Green, of Ariel. Charles Washburn, who has already been mentioned, settled near his brother-in-law, along the loaded track of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's railroad, two or three miles above Middle Valley. He was not very successful as a lumberman, and finally sold out and went to Minnesota, where he died a few years ago.

Among the others who settled in this locality are Charles Farrer, Emory E. Jones, Daniel Brundage, Jacob Curtis, Samuel Elliston, Daniel and William Evarts, and the late Laurain Moore.

Salmon Jones, a brother of Deacon Asa Jones, came to Salem some years before Asa. He had seven children—three sons and four daughters; Albert, the father of three children; Irving, who had six; Norton, who died in California; Evaline, Adaline, Caroline and Sarah. Salmon, the only son of Albert, was for many years a successful raftsman on the Lackawaxen.

Adventures of Early Settlers.—The dense forests into which the early settlers moved were filled with game; the ponds and streams abounded with fish, and the thickets were the home of the bear, the panther and the wolf. These latter animals proved exceedingly troublesome to the pioneers, and made it necessary to watch for the safety of the sheep and stock continually. On some of the clearings nearest to the swamps it was necessary to build strong stockades in which to fold the sheep and cattle during the night; and ofttimes, even then, a midnight sally of the gray pests would call the farmer from his bed to rescue his flocks. Not only were the sheep to be guarded, but young children had to be closely looked after, particularly in the winter, when the wolves were half famished; and, in more favorable seasons, grown people were not safe in the woods after nightfall, unless well armed. At one time, Mary Ann, a daughter of Elder Dobell, accompanied by her half-brother, went to the woods that skirted their father's clearing to drive in the cows just after sunset. They had found the cattle, and had turned their faces toward the house, when they heard the wolves howling just behind them. The children were in sight of the house, and felt quite safe; so they began to mock the wolves. Scarce had they uttered the first sound, when the infuriated pack dashed from the laurels, and rushed at them. Fortunately, the children were close to the cabin, into which they escaped, while the wolves howled around the house, and attacked the sheep-fold. None of the older members of the family were at home, and the frightened children did not dare to go to the rescue. The bleating of the terrified lambs increased the fury of the pack, which was augmented by reinforcements from the swamp until it numbered forty or fifty. The children saw that the situation was desperate, and at last plucked up courage to go to the rescue. There were no guns about the house, all the arms having been taken by the older members of the family as a protection in a journey through the woods; but the lad had not lived ten years on a clearing without gaining both courage and sagacity to protect the place. Each of the children caught up a splint broom, dipped it into some tar that there happened to be about the place, and igniting this rude torch, rushed out, brandishing the flames at the wolves. Snarling and growling, the wolves gazed in surprise at the strange method of attack, though scarce retreating as the brandished flames drew nearer. At last, when the burning pitch was within but a few feet of the foremost of the pack, the light breeze blew the flames in his face, and, with a howl of pain, he turned and dashed into the woods, followed by the others.

Some years afterward, relates Mrs. Frances Ramble, who was another daughter of Elder Dobell, the sheep-fold was again robbed. The pen was composed of stout poles so high that it was believed to be impossible for a wolf to get in, or, if in, to get out, and for several days it was thought that a two-legged wolf was committing depredations. Soon, however, unmistakable signs of a genuine wolf were discovered, and the pen was built a little higher. The next morning another sheep had disappeared. Grandfather Jones, as the deacon was always called, was consulted, and, at his suggestion, a big bear trap was set on what was considered the best side of the pen. The next morning the trappers were on hand as soon as it was light, and, to their surprise, found the trap missing, though all the sheep were there. The dogs were called and given the trail. After sniffing a moment, off they started to the woods, followed by half the male population of the neighborhood. About nine o'clock notice was given that game was ahead, and soon hoarse growls from a dense laurel thicket showed that the wolf was found. The clump of bushes was carefully surrounded, and when the huge animal, with the trap still attached to one of its legs, was driven out of her hiding-place, five bullets finished it. The wolf was the largest ever caught in that part of the township, and probably in the county. It measured twelve feet and an inch from tip to tip.

Early Industries.—The first saw-mill erected in what is now Lake township, of which there is any record, is one which Amos Polly and Asa Jones built on Five Mile Creek, the outlet of Jones Lake, as early as 1816. Subsequently Joel Jones built a second mill on the same stream, but much nearer the lake, and after that the mill now owned by H. W. Polly and J. S. Smith was put up. The first permanent dam at the outlet of the lake was constructed by Joel and E. R. Jones in 1829. There had been a temporary structure put up by Asa and Salmon Jones, who also had built a rude saw mill; but it was so inefficient that when E. R. Jones and Lawrence Tisdel came to the township in 1822 they found it necessary to go to the saw-mill of Moses Shaffer, in South Canaan, for lumber for building purposes. The early settlements were so identified with Salem that little was done in the way of home industries until the completion of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road. Prior to that (in 1846) Elder Dobell bought a tract of land on the head-waters of Five Mile Creek, and built a saw-mill. After his death, in 1867, it passed into the hands of Walker Brothers, who put in a steam engine and circular plant. Subsequently the mill took fire, and was entirely destroyed. The property is occupied by Amos Belcher at present.

Forest Mills is a busy hamlet near the western edge of the township, that has grown up through the large lumber and manufacturing interests that have centred there. The place is pleasantly situated on the line of the Erie and Wyoming Valley Railroad, and is connected by a branch road with the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road. The hamlet has two stores, a church, a school-house and a number of neat dwellings, and bids fair to be a thriving place in the near future.

In the fall of 1866, J. T. Barnes bought a large tract of excellent timber land from the Cadwallader estate, and erected a large saw-mill, taking his water-supply from the Cobb Pond, which is near by. In 1867 and 1868 he built a branch to connect with the Pennsylvania Coal Company's road, and increased the capacity of his mills until the output was over three million feet annually. By an arrangement with Messrs. Robertson and Gale, who were then running a large tannery at Middle Valley, he controlled the lumber on two hundred thousand acres, including the fine water power afforded by the Cobb Pond, or, more properly, Moosic Lake. This beautiful spring-fed sheet of water is on the summit of the Moosic Mountain, and is nearly two miles long. So clear are its waters that the fine sand and white pebbles on the bottom can be seen many feet below the surface. The lake is just on the edge of Lackawanna County. The land on the west side of the pond is excellent for grazing, and contains some good farms owned by Theodore Mitchell, Z. Keizer, Garrett Sickles, J. S. Collins, William Black, Abraham Bullard, Henry Halleck and others. The Collins place was taken up by Alonzo Collins, one of the first settlers in Bethany. The north and west sides of the pond have been taken up chiefly by employees of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, of whom there is quite a little settlement. A school-house near the county line is the regular meeting place for two denominations who have stations there, and Rev. Jacob Harris, a noted itinerant worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church, lives near by and keeps up regular preaching.

In the hamlet of Forest Mills there is a branch of the Evangelist Church, which has also a camping-ground, where meetings are held annually. The industry which has given the place its impetus was commenced by a company.

There also have been other lumber interests. In 1870 W. Sharp and W. S. Gibbs built a saw mill about a mile from Forest Mill, on the Hollisterville and Canaan road. It was burned shortly after, and has never been rebuilt. In 1883, H. Masters and J. Gromlich erected a new mill that puts out 7,000 feet daily. It is a mile from the Sharp mill.

Gravity is a small village that has grown up at the head of Plane No. 12, of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's railroad, and has been settled since the beginning of that enterprise. The first inhabitants were from Canaan. Beazilla Shafer had located there a short time before the railroad was surveyed, and was soon followed by Eli and John Shafer, Asher Enslin, Joseph McCoy and others. The first store in the place was kept by Edward Rogers, and the first tavern opened by John Shafer. A new hotel has been recently erected by Charles Masters. Since the opening of the Erie and Wyoming Valley Railroad, during the past few months, a commodious depot has been built, and Gravity promises to become an important shipping point. There are several excellent farms in the vicinity. G. M. Patterson is the postmaster, having been appointed this year, when the office was established.

Tresslerville, a hamlet near the Lake and Canaan line, owes its origin to the building of a small tannery at the junction of Halsey Brook and Middle Creek by Benjamin Kelley, Jr., in 1822. He afterwards sold to Samuel Shaffer, who enlarged the plant and did a large business for a number of years. Mr. Kelley, afterwards, about 1837, started a second tannery a mile further south on the North and South Turnpike, near the farms now occupied by O. Miller and Benjamin Jackson.

About 1850 David Tressler built a stone house south of Light Track of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Railroad, and gave a name to the place. Since then a number of houses have been built there, and the hamlet has a school house, and an Evangelist Church edifice, which was erected last year.

In 1844 Edward Andrews erected a water saw mill about a mile west of the Light Track. This mill, after passing through the hands of George Kimble and Charles Masters, has been converted into a steam mill, and is now owned by Harvey Bishop. Benjamin Jackson, who has been several terms a justice of the peace here, lives on a portion of the old Kelly farm.

The Village of Ariel owes its existence to the building of the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Railroad, and has sprung up about Plane No. 19 on the light track. It was considered an important station from the first, being midway between Hawley and Dunmore, and also the terminus of the branch road that leads from Plane No. 12. Within the past few years it has become quite a favorite summer resort for visitors from up and down the Lackawanna Valley, and its two hotels are well filled with pleasure seekers the season through. The village is within a few hundred yards of Jones' Lake, one of the largest and most beautiful natural ponds in Wayne County. It is a little less than a mile in length from north to south, and about a quarter of a mile in width; at its southern extremity, it bows out to the west for half a mile farther. In some spots a line will run down for sixty feet, but for the most part it is only of ordinary depth. The shores were formerly wooded down to the very water's edge, but a few years ago, a forest fire got into the timber on the west side, and destroyed several very beautiful groves, while the lumberman's axe has done much more damage. The east shore is still covered with a fine growth of hemlock and hard wood, as is too a large point near the outlet, known as "Plumley's Point," a gentleman of that name having there erected the first permanent lodge for summer sojourners. The lake is remarkably free from snags and other obstructions, and a pretty islet dots the western arm. On this were found many Indian relics, a number of which are in the collection of Mr. Sandercock, a merchant of the place, and seem to bear out the tradition that this was a favorite camping-ground for the aborigines. The lake was filled with fine fish in the early days and though most persistently fished, is still well stocked. Of late years, the fish have been cared for, and several new varieties added; but before it passed into the hands of its present owner, it was no unusual thing for several tons of pickerel to be taken through the ice in a single week.

The first house built in Ariel was that still occupied by Judge Giles Greene. It was erected about 1848, by the Pennsylvania Coal Company, at the time the road was built, and was first occupied by a man named Wilcox, who was one of the early employees of the company. Giles Greene was born in Clifford, Susquehanna County, and in common with General Nathaniel Greene, of Revolutionary fame, is descended from an English family that came to Rhode Island at an early date. His early life was spent on a farm, and on arriving at manhood, he entered the employ of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, and was appointed engineer in charge of Plane No. 19. He married Harriet L. Schenck, a daughter of Colonel Jacob Schenck, of Cherry Ridge, and located at Ariel with his wife, in November, 1850. Early in the history of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, its freight business was leased to Coe F. Young, of Honesdale, and Mr. Greene was employed to take charge of the business at No. 19, though he still continued to run the engine at the Plane. In 1861 he was appointed postmaster, and in 1864 made general lumber agent for the company. In 1870 Mr. Greene purchased large tracts of timber land, near No. 17, where he had a saw-mill and went extensively into the lumber business. Subsequently he resigned his position with the company, and devoted all his time to the mill. He had served several terms as justice of the peace, and in 1876 was elected associate judge of Wayne County. He has two children, Homer Greene, Esq., who has been district attorney, and a daughter, Sarah S., the wife of J. S. Sandercock.

Mr. and Mrs. Greene began keeping house in the only frame dwelling in the place. The other buildings were the engine-house and two or three board shanties occupied by the workmen, and the nearest clearing was at Jonestown, a mile across the lake. A road had been cut from near the engine-house to the turnpike near the house of Joel Jones. This was used but a few years, until the road now in use was laid out. The clearing at Ariel was only large enough for the few buildings mentioned, and now and then a deer would come out of the woods to gaze on the innovation of steam. But it was an important station, and the little clearing was speedily enlarged. Soon the company erected the residence still occupied by Dwight Mills, superintendent of engines on the eastern section of the road. In 1851 he added to his improvements, and is now the largest holder of real estate in the place. Mr. Mills is a man of strong opinions and much energy. He has four children: Elizabeth, wife of James A. Bigart, of Sand Pond; William W., of Dunmore; Frances, the late wife of Jonathan Brown; and Charles, who is also an employee of the company.

Ralph Potter who was one of the early settlers at Ariel built the first tavern, on the spot now occupied by Smith's Hotel. It was rather a primitive structure, and depended chiefly for custom upon the "runners," or trainmen, who were delayed at No. 19 over night. This hotel was burned in 1860, and Mr. Potter rebuilt. About 1870 J. S. Smith bought the property, Potter having sold out to Dwight Mills and moved west. Another fire occurred in 1876, destroying the hotel and Sandercock's store. The present commodious building rose up on the old site the following year, and has been well patronized since then. J. S. Smith, the proprietor, moved from Windsor, Broome County, N. Y., in 1858, and settled at Middle Valley, where he was in the employ of Robertson, Gale and others connected with the tannery for a number of years. He is assisted in the hotel business by his two sons, Lee and Orr.

C. H. Mills came from New York City, in 1859, and was for a number of years employed as a measurer of lumber for the Pennsylvania Coal Company. He has several sons.

Dr. William L. Marcy moved from Hawley in 1873, and has since practiced medicine, and carried on a drug store. He is a son of Joseph Marcy, who with Lorenzo Collins took a sub-contract to build the first court-house at Bethany.

Among the other well known residents of Ariel are: E. G. Stevens, postmaster and merchant, who moved from Sterling in 1875; William J. Hand, engineer in charge, who was for many years at Plane No. 15; J. W. Sandercock, merchant, who came from Cherry Ridge; Sylvanus Osborn, for many years the company's architect and builder, and S. L. Dart. The latter moved from Canaan in 1875, having bought Jones Lake. Up to this time, the lake had been common property and was a fishing resort for people for miles around. Mr. Dart forbade trespassing, and as his orders were disobeyed, considerable litigation followed. He was victorious, and has since stocked the lake with bass and landlocked salmon, and much improved the property. In 1876 he erected his residence, which has since been enlarged for summer boarders, and during the past year he has completed a fine hotel building, forty by sixty-four, and four stories high, which stands in a fine grove on the lake shore. There are fleets of boats, fishing camps and other facilities for outing on the lake, and several parties near by have pleasure groves.

Schools and Churches.—The first school of which there is any record was one held in the barn of Amasa Jones, during the summer of 1823. Rebecca Goodrich, a daughter of Seth Goodrich, of Salem, was the teacher. It is probable that this was the means of interesting the people in the subject of education, and led to the erection of a school-house the following year. This was known as "the Block School-house" from the fact that it was made of square timber laid up block fashion, and was built by Esquire Polly and Lawrence Tisdel. It was subsequently replaced by the octagon stone building now in use.

The school-house at No. 17 district was built by the Leonards soon after they located at Sand Pond, probably about 1840, and is still used for religious and school purposes.

Jones Lake stone school-house was erected by subscription in 1851–52, Messrs. Megargle, of Sterling, doing the masonry, and R. D. Lesher the wood work. It was used until 1878 for religious and other meetings. The school-house at Ariel was put up by subscription in 1852. The first teacher was Miss Emma May Buckingham, and Rev. G. B. Arnold preached the first sermon in it.

Jones Lake Baptist Church was organized February 15, 1854, fifteen members received, chiefly by letter from the church at Purdytown. The Council of Organization consisted of Revs. Sanford Leach, Zelotes Grennell, J. Ross and Newell Callender. The church edifice was enclosed in 1875, and was sufficiently completed in 1878 to admit of its use for the first meeting of the Baptist Association, held in Lake. The following have been the pastors of the church in the order of their succession,—Reverends Sanford Leach, O. L. Hall, ——Bullafant, Silas Coontz, T. M. Grennell, Benjamin Miller, William Jones, D. W. Halstead, S. B. Maryott, the present pastor.

The Post-Office.—The post office was established at Ariel in 1851, William Lesher being the postmaster. He kept the office until 1857 or 1858, when Joel Jones succeeded him. Jones and many of his family were southern sympathizers, and when the war broke out, a Confederate flag was flung to the breeze over the post-office. Lincoln removed Jones and appointed Giles Green, who was a strong Union man, so that in 1861, the office was moved to No. 19. It remained there until Johnson's accession to the Presidential chair, and was then removed to the house of E. R. Jones, who was an ardent Democrat, and lived at Jonestown. As the business of No. 19 continued to grow, the location became more and more inconvenient, and, in 1877, E. G. Stevens was appointed, and the office once more returned to a central location. It is at present in Mr. Stevens' store, and there is a daily mail in both directions.

The post-office at Gravity was established in 1884, with G. M. Patterson as postmaster. There is also at Forest Mills a post-office.

THE SECOND CHRISTIAN CHURCH is located at Chapmantown. It was organized, December 15, 1867, by Elder Henry Black, being composed partly from members of the First Church and partly from new converts in the vicinity of its location.

Among its first members were,—Enos Swingle, Elizabeth Swingle, Mary Bell, Rosa Keesler' Robert Swingle, Caroline Swingle, Leander Chapman, Mrs. L. Chapman, Esther Sheik, Mrs. —— Bishop, Alfred Chapman, Mrs. Alfred Chapman, W. B. Lesher, Maria Lesher, Jas. Lesher, Adaline Lesher, etc.

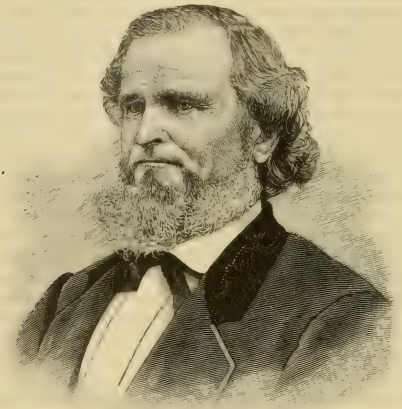
The pastors who have served this church are Henry Black, served about ten years; Geo. W. Headly, served about three years; J. J. Harvey, served about one year; —— Wallace, served about one year; J. W. Lowber, served about one year; C. E. Mills, served about four years.

Their house of worship was built in 1870, and dedicated January 15, 1871. Elder Milton Clark, of Madisonville, Lackawanna County, Pa., preached the dedication sermon. Its value is estimated at one thousand six hundred dollars.

Some time in June, 1885, steps were taken to have the church legally formed as a corporate body, accordingly, on the 15th of July, 1885, papers of incorporation were granted by the court of Wayne County.

The trustees are Jas. Swingle, Conrad Swingle, Enos Swingle, Robert Swingle and James Lesher. This church has passed through many trials and vicissitudes, but is now laboring harmoniously with the other two churches, under the care of the present pastor, who preaches alternately for each. It has now upon its roll sixty-five names. Its present officers are C. E. Mills, pastor; Enos Swingle, elder; Leander Chapman, deacon; George H. Swingle, clerk and treasurer.

BIOGRAPHICAL.



HON. GILES GREENE.

Hon. Giles Greene, of Lake township, though not one of the "early settlers," has been, for a quarter of a century, one of the prominent citizens of Wayne County, and an important factor in its progress and history.

He comes from the Rhode Island family of Greenes, of whom General Nathaniel Greene, of Revolutionary fame, was, perhaps, the most illustrious representative.

His father, James Greene, came from Coventry, R. I., in the year 1820 and settled at Clifford, Susquehanna County, Pa. James Greene's wife was Susan Westgate, who belonged to a Coventry family of Quakers. He died at Clifford in 1858, and his wife died at the same place in 1874. Giles was the fifth of a family of twelve children, all of whom grew to mature years. He was born at Clifford, on the 9th of November, in the year 1823. His father's farm was small, the family was large, and the children were put to work so soon as they arrived at an age when their labor was of any practical value. No exception was made in the case of Giles, and the two or three months of attendance at the district school each winter was all of his time that could be spared for educational purposes. Even this ceased when he grew old and strong enough to make his winter work of value. In November, 1843, on the day when he became twenty years of age, his father gave him a new suit of clothes and his time during the remaining years of his minority. That winter he attended school at the academy in Dundaff, a few miles from Clifford, and the following spring he went to Carbondale, and began work as a teamster, drawing supplies for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Co.'s railroad which was then in process of construction. At the end of three or four years he had, by the practice of strict economy, accumulated enough to purchase for himself a full teaming outfit, including a span of excellent horses. About this time "The Washington Coal Company," the name of which was soon afterward changed to "The Pennsylvania Coal Company," began the construction of their gravity railroad, from Pittston to Hawley, and the young teamster readily found employment with this company for himself and his team in hauling machinery and supplies from Honesdale to the various stations along the line of the new railroad. The work of construction was completed in 1849, and John B. Smith, the company's efficient general manager from the beginning, placed Giles Greene in charge of the stationary engine at inclined plane No. 19, with supervision of the local freight traffic and other interests of the company at that point. This village, which soon grew up about their station, was known for many years simply as "No. 19," but later on it took the name of the post-office "Ariel," and, still later, is equally well known as "Jones' Lake,"—the name of a beautiful sheet of water, on the northern shore of which the village lies, and which has, of late years, rendered the place popular and famous as a summer resort.

While the young man was still teaming from Honesdale, he boarded at the farm house of J. P. Darling at Cherry Ridge, and it was here that he first met his destiny in the person of Harriet L., one of the comely daughters of Colonel Jacob Schenck, of that town.

Colonel Schenck was the only son of General John H. Schenck, one of the six children of Henry Schenck, who came from Holland to America in the year 1720. Henry Schenck's father was Johann I. Schenck, who lived and died in Holland. Gertrude, a sister of General John H. Schenck, was the wife of General Frederick Frelinghuysen, whose second son, Theodore, attained distinction as a lawyer, as chancellor of the College of New Jersey, and as Vice-presidential nominee, with Henry Clay, on the Whig ticket of 1844. At the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, John H. Schenck placed his entire fortune by inheritance, amounting to some twelve or fifteen thousand dollars, into the hands of General George Washington, as a Revolutionary fund, and, entering the army as a private, came out of it, at the close of the war, with the rank of major-general. In 1796 he came from Newburg, N. Y., the ancestral home of his family, and located on a tract of land in Cherry Ridge township. He died at his residence in Canaan, Wayne County, March 5, 1845, at the age of ninety-one years. His son, Jacob, remained on the Cherry Ridge property to the time of his death, which occurred April 26, 1846.

Colonel Jacob Schenck had eleven children, of whom Harriet was the youngest but one. She was born at Cherry Ridge, January 14, 1827, and led the quiet life of a farmer's daughter and a village school-mistress until the young teamster crossed her path in the energetic search for his bread and his fortune. In February, 1850, Giles was called upon to act as best man for Harriet's youngest brother. Isaac R., who was, at that time married to Rebecca Bonear, and Giles and Harriet "stood up" with the bride and groom. The effect was presumably a happy one, for, on the afternoon of Saturday, September 21st of the same year, after his day's work at stationary engine No. 19 was done, the young engineer donned his best suit of clothes, mounted his fleetest horse, and made all haste toward the residence of Colonel Jacob Schenck in Cherry Ridge town, some eight miles away. Before the assembled guests sat down to supper that night Giles and Harriet had stood before the Rev. Darwin Chichester, and promised love and fealty to each other until death should them part. On the 18th of the following November the young couple began house-keeping in the only frame dwelling house in the clearing at No. 19. The first day of May has had no terrors for them—they have never moved. The same roof that arched above them in the brighter days of their honeymoon has sheltered them from the snows and rains of five and thirty years. In those early days at No. 19 the thick forest that surrounded the settlement and hid even the waters of the lake from view, abounded in wild beasts and birds of many kinds. The dismal hooting of the owl and barking of the fox at night, varied with the rumble of the cars and the puffing of the steam-engine by day. Not infrequently were the bear's tracks seen in the soft snow at Candlemas, and once as the young wife looked out at her door, a noble buck came out from the forest's edge, close by, and stood gazing with wide eyes on the dusky lines of moving cars and the white clouds of ascending steam, and then, turning, walked slowly back into the shadows of the fast disappearing woods.

It was here, as time passed on and the village grew, that Giles Greene spent the uneventful years, holding steadfastly to his work, practicing all the economy consistent with good cheer and good charity, contented with his lot, happy with his wife and children, and rejoicing in the love of labor as well as the labor of love. His political convictions were strong and well backed by both word and deed. He embraced, with enthusiasm, the political principles of the Republican party at its birth, and was largely instrumental in the organization and perpetuation of that party in Wayne County. In the stirring times that preceded the war he was active and outspoken, and when war came he left nothing undone to cheer and encourage those who went down to the battle-field and to comfort their families at home. He was one of the leaders in planning ways and means for Wayne County's share in the struggle, and not only planned but developed.

In 1861 he was appointed postmaster by President Lincoln, and established the post-office at his residence, where it remained until the incoming of the Johnson administration and the change of the executive policy of the government. By reason of his position of postmaster he was relieved from the operation of the draft, and was never drafted, but feeling that he had not yet measured up to his full duty to his country he went to Harrisburg in 1863 and procured a substitute to fight in his place, paying therefore one thousand dollars of his hard-earned money. In the fall of 1864 the Pennsylvania Coal Company recognized his faithful service and ability by making him their general lumber agent, which position he held until the fall of 1873. In this capacity he had charge of the purchase, manufacture and shipment of the immense quantities of lumber used by the company in the building of their coal-breakers and the opening of their mines during the era of prosperity that succeeded the war. In 1870 he purchased of Butler Hamlin about eight hundred acres of land, mostly well timbered, near No. 17, including the Leonard Saw-Mill property, and since then has been actively engaged in the manufacture and sale of his own lumber until within a very recent period. During this time his steam saw-mill has been twice destroyed by fire and twice rebuilt.

For many years he served the public as school director in Salem township, and for two terms, of five years each, he was justice of the peace. In the fall of 1876 he was elected, on the Republican ticket, to the office of associate judge of the courts of Wayne County; the Hon. Michael Brown, who was elected five years later to the same position, being his opponent. The fact that at that time the usual Democratic majority in the county was from five to seven hundred, attests, to some extent, his popularity. He was on the bench during the celebrated anti-court-house struggle, and though the exigencies of the bitter and exciting contest required large judgment and great firmness on the part of the judiciary, no word was spoken by any party against the ultimate wisdom, integrity and fairness of his judicial action, and he retired from the bench at the close of his term with the hearty respect and good will of all. His labor, foresight and economy have gained for him a handsome competence, and his kindly manner, pure living and upright, Christian conduct have made a warm place for him in the hearts of his neighbors and friends. The measure of Judge Greene's success in life is due, nevertheless, in no small degree to the intelligent counsel and devoted assistance of his wife, a woman of more than ordinary strength of character and intellectual attainment, and of fine, poetic feeling, but withal, of the most quiet, domestic habits and unselfish devotion to her household and family. They have two children, Susan S., born November 6, 1851, who is married to J. W. Sandercock, a merchant doing business at Ariel; and Homer, born January 10, 1853, a member of the Wayne County bar, residing at Honesdale.

Judge Greene has recently retired from active business, but rarely goes far from his home. His vigorous frame, his white hair and beard and his kindly face are a familiar picture to the residents and visitors at Jones' Lake. Surrounded with scenes familiar to him by daily contact through the best and longest period of his life, he enjoys the comforts of declining years and looks calmly ahead to the quiet of a serene old age.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

STERLING TOWNSHIP.

STERLING was set off from Salem April 25, 1815, and Dreher, including Lehigh, was taken therefrom Sept. 7, 1877. It is bounded north by Salem, northeast by Greene, southeast by Dreher, south by Lehigh and west by Madison, Lackawanna County. The Webster, Wilcox and Hornbaker runs flow into Hartford's pond and the Butternut and Mill Creeks into the Paupack. There are no lakes. There is a range of hills along the western side of the township that form the water-shed between the Paupack and Roaring Brook. Sterling is broken by hills and valleys and well adapted for grazing and the cultivation of such crops as grow in Wayne County. George D. Lee, John Gilpin, Lyman Noble and some others have large maple groves where much maple sugar is made. Henry Stevens, a Hollander, married an English woman and settled on the North and South road on a little hill near the Butternut about one half mile south of Noble Hill. In 1800 he was taxed as a laborer and in 1803 paid taxes on two hundred acres of land. He had received a good education in his native country, was an honest, upright man, and a member of the first Congregational Church organized in Wayne County, in Salem, in 1808. His children were Valentine, who married Sally Frasier and lived on part of the homestead; Jane, wife of Charles Cliff; George, who married Rachel Weeks; Nicholas, married to Nancy Catterson; Mary and Martha, successively wives of William Catterson; Ann, wife of John Catterson, and Henry, who married Sarah Dobell and lived on the homestead. These settlers are nearly all dead, but have left a numerous offspring who are among the active farmers and business men of Sterling and adjoining townships. When Jane was eight years old and George six they were lost in the woods. Mr. Stevens rallied what few neighbors he had and searched far and wide, but did not find them till the fourth day, near the Lackawanna County line. While they were lost the pious old Hollander prayed in broken English, "Lord Gott, give me mein kinder und Ich starb in ein minut." (Give me my children and I will die in a minute.)

John Clements came to Sterling about 1804 or 1805 and first settled where Samuel Bortree's mill now is. He sold this place in 1810 to Benjamin Beach, and located on the place now occupied by his son-in-law, William Edward Bortree, near Zion Church. His children were Hiram, a blacksmith, who lived in Salem; John P. Clements, who lives in Minnesota and Thomas and William who are in Stroudsburg.

Captain Phineas Howe came from Connecticut about 1802 and first settled or squatted in Dreher, on the flats near Thomas Madden's home. He and Denman Coe, William Akers and Gabriel Davis probably cleared a portion of what was afterwards called the Dutch Flats He settled in Howe's Valley about 1810. He built a log tavern under the Cliff or Howe Mountain, on the old State road, which ran about one half mile west of the present locality. The road was more convenient formerly than at present, but the Captain had its course changed because by some arrangement with the government he was to have land lying west for working it. He thus obtained better land. After this he built a large tavern on the road, which burned down about 1826, and became a large land-holder. When the North and South road was the main thoroughfare from Philadelphia to Easton northward into New York State, Howe's tavern was a noted stopping place. In fact taverns situated eight or ten miles apart on this road resembled railroad stations of the present day. Captain Howe married Lepha Hall, his children living being Phineas, who remained on the homestead and succeeded his father in the business. He was once associate judge of Wayne County, and married Mary Ann Hewitt, who is still living, aged seventy-six. Their children were Lepha Angeline, wife of Roswell Noble, who lives on the old place,—Morilla, who was unmarried; Emeline, wife of Theodore Brodhead, of Delaware Water Gap; Hewitt, who married Emeline Noble and lives at Nobletown; Elbert, who died unmarried; Windsor M., who married Emily Lamson; Almeron, who married Orra Hamlin, was register and recorder of Wayne County and a member of the Legislature and Mary, wife of Eugene Brodhead. Almeron and his sister Mary possessed fine voices and took a prominent part in musical conventions and cantatas.

(2). Abram, another son of Captain Howe, located about one mile west of his father.

(3). James Woodbridge married Polly, lived in Sterling a while and afterward removed to the West.

(4). Sarah was the wife of Ezra Wall.

Captain Hamilton Avery married Elsie and lived in Salem neighbor to Albert Stocker till 1854, when he moved to Illinois.

Orlando Avery, the oldest son, was a soldier in the war of the Rebellion; after its close took a soldier's claim to one hundred and sixty acres in Nebraska; subsequently purchased six hundred and forty acres more and is farming extensively.

Burrowes Lee was a farmer in Ireland. His children were Dawson, James, John, Thomas, Simon and George. Thomas Lee sailed from Belfast, Ireland, in the ship George, August 17, 1815, and arrived in New York October 15. He came to Sterling and settled on the Newfoundland turnpike one half mile southeast of Thomas Bortree, Sr. He married Maria Allen. His children were William A. Lee, an honest bachelor, who bought the Asa Dickinson improvement and owns the Patten saw mill on the Paupack, adjoining his farm. John H. Lee lives about one mile west of Nobletown. George, one of the original brothers, was a floriculturist and built a log house on the Pucker Street road, in Salem. On the opposite side of the road from his cabin there is a beautiful ledge of rocks supporting a hill which sheltered him from the northwest winds. He planted balsams and two rows of locusts in front and had shrubbery and flowers For years after the house was tenantless and fell into decay though the flowers bloomed and made it one of the most romantic places in the township. He went to California and was lost on the Pacific in the ship Central America.

Dawson Lee settled on the Newfoundland turnpike. His children were John, a bachelor; George W. Lee, who was justice of the Peace for a number of years: Dawson W. Lee, who lives near Paupack forks, in Salem; Anna Jane, who is the wife of Lyman Noble; Thomas M., Robert J. and William F., who all moved elsewhere.

Simon Lee married Mary, a daughter of John Clements. He settled on the place now owned by John Simons. Burrowes lived on the present George D. Lee place: Harriet E. married Alonzo Bortree; John C.; Mary Ann, wife of Doctor Loomis and Sarah J., wife of David C. Perry, live in Susquehanna County; Simon C. Lee lives in Jersey City and George D. Lee is a leading farmer in Sterling. Sally Lee came from Ireland with her children and lived with her son Thomas to the advanced age of eighty-five. Dawson Lee was a stone-cutter and a shrewd, witty man.

Simons.—There were six Simons brothers and one sister who came to Greene and Sterling townships at an early date. Their names were Joseph, Fannie, Abram, James, Thomas, Richard and Henry.

(1). Joseph married Mary Hazleton and settled in Greene, Pike County. His children were Edward, a blacksmith, who located in Pike County; Elizabeth, the wife of sheriff J. Buckley, of Luzerne County; William, a wheelwright; Mary Ann, Frances, Charlotte, Joseph, Thomas and Jane moved away.

(2). Fannie became the wife of Edward Cross, who came to Sterling about 1808 and settled about one and one-half miles east of Nobletown, on the place now occupied by Thomas Cross, one of his sons. His children were Robert, James, Judith, William, Mary Ann, Rachael, Thomas, Jemimah, Elizabeth and Frances Jane Cross. These children are all dead but Thomas and Jemimah. They married and raised families.

James Cross settled near the homestead and married Mary Ripp. His children are Samuel, Albert and Joseph, who constitute the firm of Cross Bros. merchants at Nobleville.

(3.) Abram Simons was killed by the falling of a limb when building the North and South road. He settled in what is now Dreher, near the Wallenpaupack. His wife and family moved to Philadelphia after his death.

(4.) James Simons located in Greene. His children were Silas, who moved to Philadelphia and learned the tailor's trade; Henry, a wheelwright, who moved to New Orleans. By his second wife James' children were George B., of Dreher; William, of Salem; Abram, Jabez, Thomas, James and Samuel, of Greene; Elizabeth, Frances and Mary.

(5.) Richard Simons came to Philadelphia from Tyrone, Ireland, in 1806, and to Greene township about 1807 or 1808, where he bought two hundred acres of land, partly paid for it and gave a mortgage for the balance. He returned to Philadelphia, and worked at nail-making when they were cut by horse-power and headed by hand. He moved into Greene, with his family, about 1819, paying four dollars per hundred to have his goods brought. They came by way of Easton and Stroudsburg, and probably by the old Wissemore road. John Simons, who gave the writer these facts, was then an infant in his mother's arms. She rode on horseback, while her husband followed behind. After living in Greene about seven years, he moved to the place now owned by his son William, just south of Zion Church. His children were Eliza, wife of John H. Bortree; John Simons, who married Ann Dobson and lives on the Simon Lee place; Annette, wife of Oatley Harding; Lewis Simons, who has a saw-mill on the Butternut; George W., Frances, Catharine and Richard, of Salem, and there mentioned, William, who has the homestead, and Mary, wife of Gabriel Walrath. The Simons are a hardy, industrious and prolific family.

Bortree.—There is a tradition in the Bortree family that their ancestor in Ireland was a foundling not many generations back, and found under a bush something like our elder called bore tree; hence the name, Bortree. Their family is presumably the only family of that name to be found. However little the name is known elsewhere, it is not uncommon in Sterling and Dreher. There were four brothers in Ireland—Robert, Thomas, John and Simon. Robert came first, about 1806, and will be noticed in the history of Dreher. Thomas Bortree, Sr., came to Sterling May 7, 1808, and settled not far from the Paupack. He lived to be eighty-four years of age, and his wife, whose maiden name was Ann Hazleton, was ninety-nine years and nine months old. Their children were William, who settled below Moscow; Simon, who settled about one half-mile east of Nobletown; Rebecca, wife of Abram Howe; Susanna, wife of J. R. Gilpin, who lived in Dreher; Dawson, who settled in the south part of Salem, near the Paupack forks; John H. remained on the homestead; Allan, Mary Ann, Elizabeth and Alonzo all located near the homestead; lastly, John Bortree's widow (Maria) came from Ireland, with her two sons, Thomas and Robert, and two daughters, Maria, wife of John Phillips, and Ann, wife of James Carruth, who located in Sterling and vicinity. She died June 10, 1864, aged ninety-six. Simon married an elderly lady of some means in Ireland, and was assassinated when riding in his carriage. Robert Bortree went to Ireland and brought back money from his estate to the brothers here.

David Noble married Sarah Grummond and came to Sterling about 1816. He bought a large tract of land and settled on Noble Hill, or at Noblesville, which was founded by him and his sons. William T. Noble, a brother of David, came to Sterling in November, 1821, shortly after built the first store at Nobletown, where B. E. Hamlin's store now stands, and engaged in mercantile pursuits for nineteen years, when he sold to James M. Noble and William E Hamlin in 1840, who conducted the business in partnership for twenty-four years In 1864 Thomas M. Noble became partner in his father's place, which partnership continued till 1869, when William E. Hamlin and his son, B. E. Hamlin, took charge of the business.

David Noble built a store in 1827 at Nobletown in the house now occupied by John Williams, and continued business till 1831, when he died, and the store was converted into a dwelling. Isaac F. Megargel built a store in Nobleville in 1861, which was occupied by Ernest Stevens for a few years, and is now occupied by Cross Brothers, who have recently completed a large, new structure. Dr. Charles E. Burr was the first resident physician, but did not remain. The people have generally sent to Salem for medical attendance.

The first school-house in Nobleville was built in 1837, Nancy Dayton being the first teacher in 1838. David W. Noble, son of William T. Noble, taught the next winter. David Noble's children were James M. Noble, who lived in Nobleville, and was for many years a leading merchant of the place. His wife was Eliza, a daughter of Dr. Asa Hamlin. Thomas M. Noble, his son, is justice of the peace, and lives in the village; Sarah Noble is the wife of Maberry Megargel; David Lyman Noble married Ann Jane Lee, and lives a short distance north of the village; William W. Noble married Mary A. Patten, and engaged, in connection with his brothers Lyman and Roswell, in lumbering business in Salem and Moscow, and, finally returning, located in Nobleville, where he acted as inn-keeper for the place, though he never took a license to sell intoxicants. There is no drinking-place in Sterling township.

Deborah Ann became the wife of William E. Hamlin, who has been for many years postmaster and a prominent merchant of the place. Roswell W. Noble purchased that portion of the old Howe place, which lies west of the North and South road, has built a large house and otherwise improved the property. His son Oscar resides with him.

James Dobson came from Ireland to Sterling about 1817, and settled on the North and South road, about three-fourths of a mile north of Nobleville. His wife was Susan Hazelton. His children were William, John, Mary, Fannie, Eliza, James and Ann.

John Gilpin, who lives on the North and South turnpike and kept the toll-gate, says, "We used to calculate there were about fifty head of cattle passing through the gate per day in July, about two hundred per day during August and September, and one hundred per day in October, August and November being the sheep months, and the same number of sheep were driven. They came from New York and Ohio. Raftsmen in returning came on this road, which was a great thoroughfare before the railroads. The turnpike was abandoned in 1868.

Joseph and Allen Megargel were brothers. Joseph came to Sterling about 1818. His sons were Amasa, James, Joseph, Jesse and John, all of whom lived in Sterling for a number of years. Amasa Megargel settled on the North and South road about one-half mile north of Howes at a place since called Jericho. He was a mason by trade. His son Maberry is a farmer and lives on the homestead. Charles, another son, is a blacksmith at Nobleville.

The Howe school-house was built in 1831. E. Mullensford held the first Sunday-school in Joseph Megargel's house in 1831. Tryphena Lee and James Woodbridge were among the first school teachers. Elder George Dobell and Edward Mullensford came to Sterling from England about 1818. Mr. Dobell moved to Salem (now Lake) in 1829. He was a Baptist preacher and officiated at Henry Stevens' as early as 1825. The Stevens saw-mill on the Butternut was built about 1821. Giles Dayton, a Methodist local preacher, came to Sterling about 1821, and built a saw-mill in 1825. Previous to this the mills of Edmund Hartford and Robert Bortree were frequented. Edmund Hartford lived to be ninety-four, and was a man of remarkable strength and suppleness. Lester B. Adams came to Sterling about 1825. He married Margaret Noble and purchased a place of Charles Cliff in Jericho. His sons were Henry, N., Enoch, Thaddeus, Theophilus and S. A. Adams. Benjamin Yates, a shoemaker, lived in a log house near Allen Bortree's in 1848. His sons William and Benjamin are in Sterling. Mr. Yates was an Englishman. He learned to read from the guide boards and became a reader of history. He was of a roving disposition, traveled much and was a man of observation and reflection. He moved to Salem, where his death occurred. J. R. Sinquet lives in the vicinity of Jericho, on the Charles Angel place. Daniel Sloats was at Nobleville. His sons were George, John, James and Daniel Sloats, Jr., who lives on the old place.

Patrick and Bernard McCabe were squatters on a place west of Stevens', under the mountains, at an early day. They are assessed as early as 1816, but abandoned their clearing and about 1835 Thomas Ferguson bought the place and cleared a large farm. Mr. Ferguson was a farmer and drover and county commissioner for one term. His children were George, Edward, John, Thomas, Joseph, William and Margaret, wife of Nicholas Stevens.

Charles Wildash located at Jericho in 1840, on the place now occupied by James Kerr. Jonathan Richardson, a carpenter by trade, from Philadelphia, was a man of capacity. None of his descendants remain in the township.

Levi A. Webster married Martha Munn, came to Salem in December, 1817, and remained with John Andrews, Jr., until October, 1818, when he moved into West Sterling and built the log house his son Hubbel occupies, near Webster Creek. His wife was Emaline Beardsley. Benjamin and Daniel live in Tioga County, N. Y. Conrad D. Webster is in Hollisterville, and was constable and collector for seven years. Lucy, wife of John Conyne, lives in Carbondale, Gustavus is in Sterling, and Gilbert a blacksmith in South Canaan.

Lewis Barnes located about one mile south of E. Hartford's, in 1818. He has a family of ten children, some of whom were in the army. Port Barnes is a noted fiddler at country dances.

Robert Catterson came from Donegal County, Ireland, to Philadelphia, in 1811 and to Sterling in December, 1822. He settled on the Moscow road about three-fourths of a mile west of Nobletown and built a log cabin where John Hawk now lives. He was seventy-six and his wife Ann at his death survived until her ninety-third year. Their children were William, who married Martha Stevens and located one-fourth mile south of the homestead. He died recently, aged eighty-four; Ann, the wife of N. Stevens, who lived north of the homestead; John Catterson, aged eighty-two, from whom the writer obtained these facts, residing west of the homestead. He says he and his wife, a daughter of Henry Stevens, were not worth twenty-five dollars when they were married. "I put up a log cabin and was just as happy as the day was long. I erected a frame next year and the high winds blew it down. We had a family of nine children, some of whom are living in the neighborhood." As the old gentleman smoked a stub of a clay pipe and talked of old times he seemed perfectly contented and happy.

William Catterson, a brother of Robert, lived in Philadelphia for many years and came to Sterling about 1845. He bought the Enoch Noble place one half mile west of Noble Hill. Of his children, Alexander, who lives on the homestead and Isabella, the second wife of Nicholas Stevens, are all who married in Sterling

The Catterson school-house was built just west of John Catterson's house, about 1832. One dollar per week and board were paid female teachers. Mary Ann Cross was one of the first teachers. James Van Camp taught there about 1840.

William W. Hawk came to Sterling from New Jersey and worked on the Pennsylvania Railroad for two years, when he purchased one hundred and eighty acres of land near the head-waters of the streams that flow into Hartford's pond, cleared a farm and built a good house. He has one of the finest apple orchards in the county, from which he obtains from ten to fifteen hundred bushels of good merchantable fruit per year.

Platt Stevens located on the farm adjoining Hawks' about 1850.

Benjamin Correll came to Sterling about 1810. His children were William, Benjamin, Ervin, Elias, Theodore Alexander, Hannah, Mary, Emeline, Margaret, Carrie, Harriet. One winter he kept eleven deer in his cellar on potatoes and let most of them go in the spring.

Benjamin Correll was born at Montrose, July 18, 1801. He married Dorothy Mettz, moved to Howetown when twenty-one years of age and became one of the pioneers of the county. When the Belmont and Easton turnpike was being built he was one of the foremen and also filled the same position on the old Drinker turnpike when that road was constructed. He was captain of a boat owned by David Noble, used to convey lumber from the forks on the Wallenpaupack to Wilsonville, and the first man who steered a raft over Clements' Falls, on the Paupack creek, as also one of the first men to run the narrows on the Lackawaxen. He was miller for Robert Bortree and Edmund Hartford for a number of years and afterward settled on his farm at Howetown. His second wife was Mrs. Mary Stucker, who survives, aged eighty-seven. He died at John Kipps', in Greene township, aged eighty-four. He had fourteen children by his first wife, nine of whom were living at the time of his death, in 1886, and left eighty-two grandchildren, eighty-four great-grandchildren and one great-great-grandchild.

George W. Butler, Sr., settled in Sterling about 1835, on the road from the forks to Zion Church. He married Sylva Jones, his children being Elisha J. Butler, who lives on the homestead; Horace L. Butler, of Lake; John Butler, of Greene; Sally, wife of George Chamberlain, of Lehigh; Charles, who was killed on the Allegheny Mountains; Manda, wife of James Hineline; Maria, wife of Joseph Ferguson; Angeline, wife of John L. Brown, who resides near the Paupack Forks, in Salem; Sylva, wife of Thomas Neville; and George W., Jr., lately deceased.

John Phillips came from Ireland to Sterling, September 15, 1830. He took up one hundred acres of land near Zion Church and cleared a good farm. His children were Samuel Phillips, of Clinton; John B Phillips, who lives on the John Bortree place; Mary A., wife of Herman Bartleson; Richard G. Phillips, who lives on the William Bortree place; Absalom, who lives in Dreher; and George W. Phillips, who lives on the homestead.

Edward Mullensford, who resided one mile east of the Howe place, died February 24, 1858, aged seventy-four. His wife preceded him eight days, aged eighty-seven, their only daughter having died only a few months before. He left one thousand dollars to the Methodist society to build a parsonage, besides several other charities.

Franklin Coggins resided in Sterling, but left no descendants. Aaron Nelson, an old colored man, lived and died not far from Zion Church. He was a great fisherman.

Jeremiah Bennett named Sterling, or suggested that name for the township. He was also the first assessor. Richard Lancaster was the first justice of the peace.

There are six schools and four churches in Sterling. The Methodist class at Nobleville was formed about 1822, William T. Noble, who was an exhorter, being the first class leader. The first members were William T. Noble and wife, Charles Cliff and wife, Lyman Noble, William E. Hamlin and wife, Simon Bortree and wife, Edward Mullensford and wife and Mary A. Mullensford.

William T. Noble led the class a few years, when it was divided, and Edward Mullensford and Isaac Megargel were leaders. They were associated with Salem Church till 1859, when Sterling became an independent charge. The Methodist Church at Noble Hill was built in 1848; Pierce Coston and Roswell Noble were the carpenters who constructed it. The West Sterling Protestant Methodist Church was organized in 1879 and the edifice built about the same time. The first class was organized in 1855, Alanson Gregory being the first class leader. Robert Catterson, Eli S. Barnes, John Wallace, Cyprian Van Gorder and James Carruth were the first members.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Rev. Joseph Barlow, the Salem preacher, ministered in Sterling about 1837. The Presbyterians or Congregationalists were Phineas Howe, Mary Ann Howe, Lester B. Adams, Margaret Adams and Henry Adams. During Rev. A. R. Raymond's time Gabriel Brown, Margaret Brown, Joseph Megargel, Abigail Megargel, Abram Howe, Rebecca Howe, Morilla Howe, Alexander Ore and wife, William Ore and wife, Nathaniel Martin and wife, Thomas Brown, Isabella Brown, Tryphena Howe, Almeron Howe, Tryphena Adams, James Kerr and wife, Mary H. Howe and Benjamin Correll united with the church. The church had existed as a Congregational Church till September, 3, 1871, when Rev. Yates Hickey, presbyterial missionary, and Rev. C. M. Des Islets, of Salem Church, reorganized it as a Presbyterian Church, with P. Howe and wife, Miss Mary H. Howe, W. M. Howe, A. R. Howe, Thomas Brown, Benjamin Correll, Margaret T. Adams, Amelia Cliff, Joseph Megargel, Abigail Megargel, Tryphena Megargel and Adelbert Howe as members. Lester B. Adams had been ruling elder of the old church and Benjamin Correll was made elder of the reorganized church. The church building was erected in 1850. The pulpit had always been supplied from Salem Church till 1884, when Rev. Norman Skinner, a student from Union Theological Seminary, came and preached during that summer and the summer following. He found the church in a dilapidated condition, but the congregation rallied to his support in connection with the help of Roswell Noble, Oscar Noble, Charles Stratton, the Cliffs, Stevenses, Yateses and the community generally. The building was repaired and fifteen members added to the church. The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition under the superintendence of E. T. Bone.

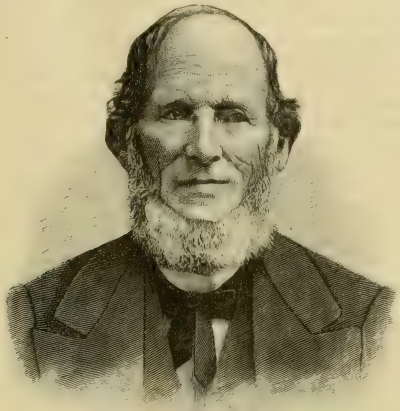
ZION EPISCOPAL CHURCH had its corner-stone laid October 25, 1851, by Bishop Alonzo Potter, during Rev. Edwin E Mendenhall's rectorship. The wardens were Richard Simons and John Phillips. The vestrymen were Edward Cross, Charles F. Clements, Ezekiel Ellsworth, John Phillips, John H. Bortree, Richard Simons, Erastus Jones, James Cross, James Simons, and afterwards Charles Wildash, William Catterson, William B. Simons, Joshua Neville and Robert J. Bortree were prominent members.

The early settlers of Sterling were nearly all Irish descent, and came by way of Philadelphia. Some of them came up by the North and South State road and others via Stroudsburg and through Monroe by the Wismere road. The Wallenpaupack seems to have been the dividing line between the emigrants from Connecticut, who came by way of Newburgh and Carpenter's Point, and the Pennsylvanians from Philadelphia. They founded a quiet community of peacably disposed farmers. They suffered hardships and privations, but by persevering industry have built up comfortable homes for themselves and their children.

In 1880 Winter & Ball, of Jersey City, N. J., purchased what was known as the Pethic property, containing about one thousand three hundred acres, and commenced, under the superintendency of Charles H. Stratton, the erection of a mill and factory for the manufacturing of umbrella and parasol handles and other turned goods. They built a very superior factory of its kind, employing twenty to twenty-five hands. Mr. Stratton, who superintended the mill for five years, purchased the Daniel Bortree place of B. E. Hamlin in 1886 and has gone to farming, being succeeded as superintendent by his son-in-law, F. B. Weed.

Lyman Noble died recently, aged seventy-eight. He was a man of fine presence and bland in manner. He had a fine farm a little north of the village of Nobleville, and was one of the leading men of the place.

John Gilpin, who also died recently, aged fifty-nine, lived still farther north on the North and South road, and had just completed a comfortable farm-house, which he was not permitted long to enjoy. He was an energetic farmer.



The village of Nobleville is beautifully located on rising ground on the North and South road, among the green fields of the surrounding farms; taken with its white residences and shaded roads, it is a very pleasant little country village. It contains three stores, a blacksmith shop, shoe shop, wagon shop, post-office, church and school-house.

Sterling Lodge, No. 959, I. O. O. F., was organized in September, 1879, with the following charter members: Rev. J. F. Warner, B. E. Hamlin, W. J. Wallace, Lewis Simons, George

E. Cliff, Willam Yates, Daniel Bortree, R. W. Balckom, A. C. Angel, B. L. Deckard, William Stevens, A. C. Howe, John H. Catterson, John J. Frey, M. J. Webster, P. T. Howe, J. R. Sinquet, S. T. Olmstead, Robert McLain and J. R. Osgood. The lodge is in good financial condition and meets over Hamlin's store. They contemplate building a hall for lodge purposes.

1830 came to Sterling and engaged in the lumber business, forming a partnership with his brother-in-law, the lamented James M. Noble, whose superior qualities of mind and heart rendered their intimate association for a long term of years most agreeable.

In March, 1840, the lumber firm of Noble & Hamlin bought the mercantile business of Wil-

BIOGRAPHICAL.

WILLIAM E. HAMLIN.

William E. Hamlin was born in Litchfield, Herkimer County, N. Y., June 7, 1811, and came to Wayne County when his father, Dr. Asa Hamlin, moved into Salem township, in 1816. His brothers, the late Hon. O. J. Hamlin, Darwin Hamlin, and his surviving brother, Hon. B. D. Hamlin, had located at Smithport, McKean County, Pa., and while still in his teens he went there with a view of making that his permanent home, but liking Wayne County best, he returned, and in liam T. Noble, and commenced merchandising, and from this time, with the exception of about two years, he continued in the mercantile business until January 1, 1879, at which time he sold his interest to his son, with whom he formed a partnership in 1869. October 18, 1840, he married Deborah Ann Noble, of Sterling. He was commissioned postmaster at Sterling in 1849, holding the office without interruption through all the changes of administration, and at this writing is one of the oldest postmasters in the United States, the citizens, without regard to party, recently joining in a petition asking that at Sterling no change be made. In 1854 he, with his partners in the lumber business, built the first steam mill in Wayne County, and for many years he engaged in manufacturing, buying and shipping hard-wood lumber. His industry and energy have only been limited by his ability to endure; his tastes were for, and he enjoyed most agricultural pursuits—gardening and fruit-growing—taking great pleasure, in his later years, with his garden and fruit, reaping the benefits, with friends, of many hours of labor, in years gone by, in the planting and rearing of the fruits best adapted to their climate. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in early life, and has ever since been connected with it, holding for many years the various offices of the church, and supporting, by a conscientious liberality, all the departments of its work. During the winter of 1884 and 1885 the health of his beloved wife failed, and in March, 1885, she, who for so many years had been his constant companion, passed from earth. His was a nature to keenly appreciate the loss of one of the noblest and most unselfish, Christian wives, the influence of whose life upon himself, his children and all that knew her had been the greatest blessing. He has three children,—Harriet A., Orra J., who married the late A. R. Howe, and B. E. Hamlin.

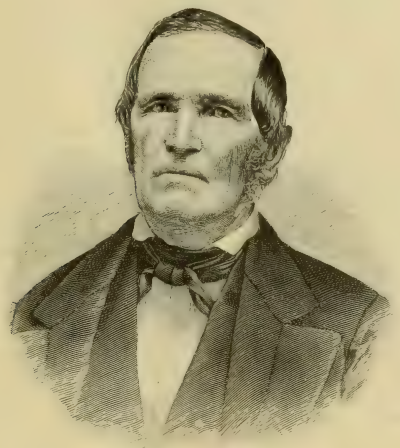
It is rare to find a person who possessed so many of the better qualities, and has been able to avoid so many of the bad. His character and conduct are well worthy of imitation, and can be studied with profit. A conscience moulded in Christian aspiration and trained by Christian practices has been his guide; what it bids him do, he does, whether hard or easy; what it bids him avoid, is avoided, whatever the seeming sacrifice. With good, natural endowments, and a mind well stored with knowledge derived from the pursuit of literature and the best companionship, he has chosen to be a listener rather than a teacher by words. His life has been one of physical labor, performed from a sense of duty to his fellows. He has acted on the belief that some must toil with their hands, and while himself competent to ride, yet willing to walk because others choose to ride. Of ambition he has had his full share, but it was an ambition to be felt rather than seen. His devotion of his kindred, great as any loving son, brother, husband and father ever had, has not limited his good deeds and their influences on all who have come within the circle of his acquaintance. The world is better for his having lived in it.

B. E. HAMLIN.



B. E. Hamlin, only son of W. E. Hamlin, in October, 1869, at the age of seventeen, left the Philadelphia High School and engaged with his father in the mecantile business, occupying the storehouse built by William T. Noble in the early history of Sterling. In 1874 the present commodious building was erected. The partnership continued until January 1, 1879, under the firm-name of W. E. Hamlin, Hamlin & Son and B. E. Hamlin & Co., at which time he purchased his father's interest in the business. He has been extensively engaged in lumbering, mainly in hard wood, in addition to merchandising. In February, 1883, he, with Henry Gilpin, of Pike County, made a large purchase of bark and timber land in Elk County, Pa., and the firm of Hamlin & Gilpin have since built a modern and fully equipped steam mill, and are engaged in the manufacture of hard wood lumber, they having cut from their lands about one million five hundred thousand feet of cherry lumber that, from their siding on Pittsburgh and Western Railroad, is shipped to Chicago and the Eastern markets.

NICHOLAS STEVENS.

Among the early settlers of Sterling township, in Wayne County, Pa., was Henry Stevens, who came from Germany. He came to Sterling in 1800, and bought four hundred acres of wild land, on which he built a log house and which he partly cleared and improved. He became a prosperous farmer, and the log house in time gave way for one of the finest residences in all the country around. Both he and his wife Martha lived to a great age, and died on the farm their industry and energy had redeemed from the wilderness. Their children were Valentine, George, Jane, Nicholas, Martha, Mary, Ann and Henry.

Nicholas Stevens, our subject, was born March 9, 1798, at Old Paltz, not far from Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He was but two years old when his father's family moved into the woods of Wayne County, and his earliest recollections were of the howling of wolves and the sight of deer and other wild game. He grew to manhood in Sterling, receiving a better education than was generally obtained by the youth of that day. His father hired teachers to come to his house and teach his children, an advantage enjoyed by but few in those early days. Nicholas remained with his father until he was twenty-four years old, and with his father and brothers built sections of the North and South turnpike, and for their services never received a dollar. Arrived at the age above named, he commenced life on his own account on a piece of wild land on which he erected buildings and on which he made the first clearing To this farm he added until he owned four hundred acres, of which he improved something over a hundred acres, and on which he resided until his death, which occurred July 28, 1880. Mr. Stevens was for a number of years preceding his death a member of the Episcopal Church. He was an ardent Republican for years. He was not a politician, and held only township offices. He never used tobacco in any way, and drank no liquor as a beverage, and was never heard to use profane language. Mr. Stevens married, in 1823, for his first wife, Nancy Catterson, daughter of Robert and Nancy Catterson. She was born July 28, 1801, and died in 1844. Their children were Ann, born December 11, 1824 (she married Weston Woodbridge; children,—Clarence, who died in the army during the Rebellion, Theodore, Emma, Mary, William and Laura); Henry, born June 4, 1826; Martha, born October 7, 1828, married Jacob Rosencrans (children,—Mary and Frank); Robert, born December 25, 1830, married Margaret Ferguson (children,—Alice, Everet and Clarence; Robert enlisted in the Union army in the early part of the Rebellion, and served till spring of 1865, when he was sent home sick and soon after died); William J., born April 16, 1833; Nicholas D., born August 28, 1835, married Arabell Burton

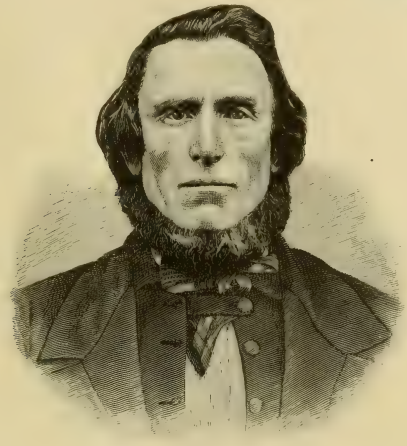
(one child,—Wade); Isaac E., born April 1, 1839, married Emma Swartz; Mary J., born May 2, 1842, married William Percy.

For his second wife, Mr. Stevens married Isabell (daughter of William and Elizabeth Catterson), who was born December 25, 1823. To them were born Elbert G., August 28, 1847; married, April 10, 1871, Miss Alice McFarland, who was born January 7, 1854, in Paupack, Wayne County, Pa. (children,—Selton W., born January 24, 1872; Burten E., born August 18, 1875). In 1875 Mr. Stevens engaged in the mercantile business in Ariel, Wayne County, and is doing a prosperous business.



Ernest A., born September 11, 1849; married, September 18, 1875, Irene M. Noble, who was born in Sterling, September 23, 1852; their children are Clinton C., born July 26, 1876; Wilmer N., born September 9, 1877; Fred, born December 25, 1881. Mr. Stevens is now a resident of Hollisterville, where he has built a new store and has just opened a general mercantile business.

Atherton B., born June 18, 1857. He graduated at Jefferson College, Philadelphia, and is now practicing medicine at South Canaan, Wayne County, where he has a large and growing practice. William A., born June 15, 1864. He is now attending Jefferson College, and expects to follow the medical profession. As stated in the beginning of this sketch, Mr. Stevens' earliest recollections were of wolves and other game of which he became a successful hunter. He killed two panthers and a good many wolves and bears, as well as deer and smaller game. The wolves used often in his younger days to enter his father's fields and kill their sheep; and one of his amusements was the trapping and killing wolves.

JOHN WALLACE.

John Wallace, a native of County Tyrone, Ireland, but of Scotch descent, is one of the thrifty and progressive agriculturists of Wayne County, Pa. He was born March 1, 1813, and reared on the home farm, where he assisted his father until he was nineteen years of age, when he, with his parents, embarked for America. His mother died on board of ship, and the survivors landed in New York City June 3, 1832. His father being advanced in years, and his pecuniary possessions being limited, a double responsibility awaited young John, and, to prove himself equal to the emergency, he immediately sought employment, which was soon furnished him on the docks in New York Harbor. He subsequently removed to Orange County, N. Y., and there served four years at brick-making, when he again removed—this time settling in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he resided until April 1, 1840, at which time he purchased and located upon one hundred and seventy-six acres of land, his present homestead, in Sterling township, Wayne County, Pa. He was married in Brooklyn, N. Y., May 2, 1837, to Mary McDevit, who was born in County Derry, Ireland, February 1, 1812. She came to America June 10, 1832. The children born of this union are Elizabeth (deceased), who became the wife of W. W. R. Gilpin; Joseph W. (deceased); Mary L., wife of John D. Houck; Joanna, wife of George W. Weldy; Sarah A., wife of Henry Benjamin; and Martha J. (deceased). Mr. Wallace, now in the seventy-third year of his age, and his wife, a little over a year his senior, are both hale and hearty, and are enjoying the fruits of a hard-earned competency, surrounded by loving children and grandchildren, and many friends who bear evidence to their meritorious traits of character. They are both members of the Protestant Methodist Church, and Mr. Wallace is an active Republican. Lieutenant Joseph W. Wallace, son of John and Mary (McDevit) Wallace, was born September 13, 1841. He spent his boyhood at home with his parents, who gave him a liberal education, thus qualifying him for the higher duties of life. He taught school for several terms, and, at the breaking out of the late Rebellion, was one of the first to offer his services to the Union. He enlisted April 20, 1861, in the three months' service, Company B, Eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry. He was regularly and honorably discharged at the expiration of the time, and re-enlisted September, 1861, in Company H, Forty-ninth Regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry for three years or during the war. In 1864, January 1st, he availed himself of the opportunity offered to again enlist for the veteran's bounty, with an allowance of thirty-five days' furlough. He was again mustered into service and promoted to a first lieutenancy, which commission he held at the time of his death. He was in many of the principal engagements during the war, among which were Yorktown, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Rappahannock, etc. He was killed by a bursting shell at the battle of Winchester, September 19, 1864. His remains were brought home and deposited in the family burying-ground at Nobletown, Sterling township, Wayne County, Pa. To say that he was a young man of fine parts but feebly expresses the honor due him. He was noble, generous and brave, and the space given him in the history of his native place is very creditably filled.

GEORGE E. CLIFF.

His parents, Charles and Seline Inkpen Cliff, were born in England,—himself in Nottinghamshire, October 22, 1786, and herself in the city of London about the year 1792. Their marriage occurred in 1814, and the year following, with one child, they embarked for America, and after a voyage of over two months landed in Philadelphia August 6, 1815. They remained there until the following summer, when they removed to Sterling township, Wayne County, Pa. It was here that Mr. Cliff pitched his tent, about one-half mile east of the present Presbyterian Church, in the woods, with a fixed determination to make the then almost unbroken wilderness give way to his ambition. His first purchase consisted of about sixty-four acres. He subsequently bought lands contiguous to this and when he died had acquired a competency. His chief occupation was farming. He was also a carpenter and joiner, but only worked at the latter at such times as seemed necessary to assist in the construction of buildings for himself and neighbors. He was a member of the Methodist Church. In politics he was a Republican and was several times elected to fill township offices, etc. He died in April, 1863. His wife died July 28, 1828. Their children were Selina, Stephen, Charles F. (located in Jericho on the North and South road), George E, John Wesley, Isaac F., A. J. and Jesse O. Cliff.

George E. Cliff, subject of this sketch, was born at the old homestead in Sterling township July 10, 1820. He remained at home until he reached his majority. For a couple of years thereafter he engaged in odd jobs, and in 1843, in company with his brother, Charles F., purchased a portion of the old homestead farm and continued with him in farming and lumbering pursuits until about 1858. He then sold his interest to his brother Charles and bought a portion of what was known as the Howe estate, in the same township, under Cliff Mountain. This he still owns and occupies, being successfully engaged in farming and lumbering. He is a member of the Methodist Church, a Republican in politics, and has held minor positions of trust. He is at present poormaster and school director. His marriage occurred November 27, 1861, to Elizabeth A., daughter of George and Rachel Stevens. Her grandfather, Henry Stevens, was the first settler in this neighborhood. To George E. and Elizabeth Cliff have been born Theresa, who died in infancy, Effie S. and Ella M. Cliff.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

LEHIGH TOWNSHIP.

LEHIGH TOWNSHIP was taken from Dreher, December 15, 1883. It is the southwestern township of Wayne County, and bounded on the north by Sterling, on the east by Dreher. The township is triangular-shaped, terminating at a point west of Sand Cut. There were no settlements in Lehigh until the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad ran through the southwestern part of the township, and Gouldsborough Station was established at Sand Cut. In 1856 Jay Gould contracted for one acre of land of Selden Scranton, sold that contract to Jacob Coon, who was constructing a plank road from Gould's tannery to Gouldsborough Station. J. Coon sold this contract to Solomon Edwards, who with Jay Gould, William D. Brown and Peter Winnie, met to locate that acre. Pratt and Gould did not wish those parties to build at the station; consequently Gould wrote J. L. Simons, of Tobyhanna, to meet him at the Sand Cut. Edwards was undecided where to build, and the matter was referred to Simons, who suggested a good location for a hotel. Edwards chose his acre, and it was surveyed to him. Gould, after he had Edwards located, said to Simons, "Now the coast is clear, go ahead and build a hotel; Colonel Pratt will be up next week and see you." Colonel Pratt came and instructed him "to see the house built, and when he lacked funds to call on him." On the strength of this, Simons erected a large hotel at Sand Cut, which was the first house, except some workingmen's shanties, erected in the township of Lehigh. He ran the hotel twenty years, then leased it to E. L. Harvey. He also ran the stage lines and was the first postmaster and station agent. He subsequently married the woman who figured conspicuously in the building of the hotel, for there was a woman in the case, and has retired from active business with a big lawsuit in connection with that acre.

George G. Smith came to Sand Cut in 1862 to load lumber for W. D. Brown, of Gouldsborough. William Wallace and Abram Coon built a store opposite the Simons House about 1862. G. G. Smith is now conducting the business at this store. He is also justice of the peace.

In the spring of 1863 S. H. Rhodes came to Sand Cut to superintend William Wallace's business. Afterward he became associated with E. Rosenburg, in the lumbering business. They established a store near their mills, and conducted business until 1876, when S. H. Rhodes, who had purchased Rosenburg's interest, built a store in the Sand Cut, where he is at present engaged in the mercantile business, in connection with his lumbering. He was postmaster for a number of years.

Simons built a storehouse which has been occupied by many persons. It is now used as a dwelling-house.

G. B. Herbine also had a store in the place and was succeeded by S. S. Hager.

S. A. Adams built a house which was used as a hotel for awhile, but has since been converted into a store. Mr. Adams is the present postmaster. S. S. Hager is station agent at Gouldsborough. L. L. Heller was among the the first settlers. His son, O. S. Heller, is a lumberman and butcher, and another son, Dr. J. A. Heller, is the physician of the place. Dr. Jackson was the first physician. Sarah A. Croft was the first school-teacher, about 1865, and taught in a dwelling-house. The schoolhouse was built in 1870. The Lutheran Church was erected in 1876. It was organized by Rev. George Rhodes, its first members being O. S. Heller and wife, R. E. Willard and wife, A. D. Dutol and wife, Mrs. Croft, S. H. Rhodes, Joseph Rhodes, Anna Rhodes and Mrs. Decker. The first Sunday-school was organized about 1868 by S. H. Rhodes, E. M. Price, L. R. Smith and G. G. Smith, on the property now occupied by Adam Gallomer.

The Gilpin brothers bought a large tract of timber land at the Marsh, four miles from Sand Cut. In 1875, or about that time, they sold the timber to Wagenhorst, who built a saw-mill. The bark was sold to Stephen Kistler. Wagenhorst became involved and the property was turned over to Kistler, who sold to Andrew Sebring for $22,500, and who had it two years and sold to John Callahan for $34,000. Callahan employs about twenty men, likewise S. H. Rhodes about the same number. Wallace employs about twelve men.

Enoch Adams owns the farm formerly occupied by A. J. Pace. R. B. Decker, a shoemaker, was also one of the first residents.

There are two Sunday-schools, the Lutheran and the Union, and two schools, one at Sand Cut and one at the Marsh. The township is seven miles long to the extreme point and has Lehigh River and Clifton township of Lackawanna County on the northwest and Coolbaugh of Monroe on the south. There are about seventy voters and three hundred and fifty inhabitants. Henry Hefferly lives in the woods at the Half-Way House. The township is mostly a slashing, having been lumbered off of and allowed to grow up. It is quite stony, but the soil is of good quality when cultivated. Three bears have been killed this winter of 1885 within two or three miles of Gouldsborough Station. G. G. Smith, Esq., took the writer to a trap where he had caught a bear five days before. Although the land is stony, its nearness to the railroad will cause it to be improved, especially in the vicinity of Sand Cut, and the future historian will doubtless see good farms in place of bear swamps and slashings.

CHAPTER XXXV.

DREHER.

DREHER was named in honor of Judge Samuel S. Dreher, at one time presiding judge of the Twenty-second Judicial District. It was separated from Sterling, September 7, 1877, and Lehigh was taken from it December 15, 1883. Dreher is a southern township of Wayne County and is bounded on the northwest by Sterling, on the east by Green and the south branch of the Wallenpaupack, which also forms the boundary line between Wayne and Pike at this point. On the south is Coolbaugh of Monroe County, and Lehigh township is on the southwest. The early history of Dreher and Greene is closely blended, as the South Branch of the Wallenpaupack flows north between the two townships through a fine fertile valley about five miles in length and from eighty to three hundred and twenty rods in width, hemmed in by the receding hills of Dreher on the west and the hills of Greene on the east. This flat land has been known as Newfoundland, so named by Daniel Stroud, who was informed by some hunters that they had found a tract where there were no marked trees for a long distance.

He investigated the matter and found one thousand nine hundred acres unsurveyed, which he called Newfoundland. After the Germans came it was called the "Dutch Flats." The southern part of Dreher was called South Sterling, and the northern part, where Robert Bortree settled, East Sterling. Mill Creek, Bortree Creek and some other runs flow into the Paupack through Dreher, and there are several tributaries from Greene, all of which have been noted trout streams. This sheltered valley once abounded in wild game and fur-bearing animals.

The first white man who visited this beautiful sequestered vale was a shrewd Yankee schoolteacher by the name of Denman Coe. He evidently came to Paupack settlement about 1794, and followed the stream to this point, and erected a cabin on a little rise of ground back of F. A. Oppelt's residence. Here he brought his family, hunted, trapped and lived a Robinson Crusoe life. He was a stern and powerful man, and for a radius of about ten miles around was "lord of the fowl and the brute." He conveyed two or three hundred dollars' worth of furs to Connecticut on his back every year. He cleared up part of the flats, and was soon joined by William Akers, his son-in-law, Gabriel Davis, Phineas Howe and Andrew Corey. Tradition has woven a romance around William Akers' marriage with Polly Coe. William Akers, a hunter from Stroudsburg, in his rambles in the wilderness, was startled one day to find himself near a human habitation. He approached to investigate. Denman Coe lived a long distance from any mill, and his daughters in turn broke the grain with a pestle and mortar. It happened that this day it was Polly's turn to pound the grain. She was but a young girl and was crying over her task. As Akers drew near he asked the cause of her grief, which she explained. His heart was touched by the girl's story, and shortly after he took her to Stroudsburg and was married. But Rebecca Kayser, now nearly eighty years of age is a daughter of William Akers, and says "that her grandfather was a stern man, and would have kicked Akers out of the cabin had he proposed the thing to him; that her mother never used the pestle and mortar, but that her aunt was made a cripple for life as the result of that work when young." She says "her mother Mary Coe, or Polly, as she was generally called, lived in Connecticut for five years after her father came here. About 1799, when fourteen years old, she came from Connecticut on foot with her father, and carried a bundle besides. One year later her father placed her in a weaver's establishment in Stroudsburg—probably at William Akers, Sr. Here William Akers married her when sixteen years old, whereat her father was very angry." About 1800 William Akers came to the flats and built a cabin south of his father-in-law, on the place afterward owned by Francis Rohrbacher. He built the cabin with a door so low that it was necessary to stoop to enter it. He had no chairs, no floor, no fire-place. The fire was built on the ground; his table, some say, was a stump, but his daughter declares it was a large ash log split in the middle. He bored holes on the bark side and stuck poles in for legs, with the flat surface up. Here was born the first white child in Dreher—John Clements Akers, about 1805, named in honor of John Clements, who had recently come into the township. William Akers and his wife were known as "Uncle Bill" and "Aunt Poll." Gabriel Davis was doubtless the third settler. He came in 1802 or 1803 and erected his cabin near an excellent spring of water, where the old Bennett house stood. The wife of Gabriel Davis was William Akers' sister.

Andrew Corey came with his family from Connecticut about the same time. He broke the stillness of the forest near the Tremper spring, on what was afterward the Tremper farm, at the northern and lower end of the valley, he erecting a comfortable log cabin for his family.

In or about the year 1806 Rev. Gideon Draper traveled through this valley, and dined with one of the families then residing here. His repast consisted of mush and milk, and served in a squash shell, which he ate with a wooden spoon. He heartily relished his meal, and in 1807 came back accompanied by Rev. William Butler, a devoted young man who preached only to save souls, and was much beloved. Mr. Draper was of a more excitable mind. They traveled on foot, there being few roads other than foot paths. In 1810 Bartle Bartleson, who had married Elsie, another sister of William Akers, came from Monroe County. He was the father of Thomas, Gabriel and Bartle Bartleson, all of whom are now living, the youngest, Bartle Bartleson, Jr., being eighty-three, Gabriel eighty-five, and Thomas, ninety or ninety-five. At the time the Bartlesons came there were but five families in the place The woods abounded in deer, bear, turkey and wild ducks, and the streams were alive with trout. John Bennett and Herman Newton came from Connecticut in or about 1814, Benjamin Beach in 1816, William Lancaster, Jos. Williams, Wm. and Isaac Long before 1820.

Denman Coe followed the old Indian trail up the Paupack, and found what was formerly called the "Big Island" cleared when he came. This clearing may have been made by the Indians or caused by overflowing water. Mr. Coe and others added to the clearing till he kept seventeen head of cattle. His hay was stacked on the flats when a freshet came and carried away his fodder, so that the cattle were obliged to browse. This reverse disheartened him and caused his removal to Ohio. His children were Dudley, Ransom and Harvey, who removed to the West, and Polly, wife of William Akers, and Ada, wife of Moses Chapman, of Paupack. Years afterwards Denman Coe wandered back to Dreher.

William Akers, Sr., was an Englishman, and a weaver by trade. He came to Dreher and lived with his son-in-law, Bartle Bartleson, Sr., being ninety-nine years old when he died. His wife was Rebecca Fish, and his children were John, William, Polly, wife of Gabriel Davis, and Elsie, wife of Bartle Bartleson. Of John Akers' children, Elizabeth married John Sheerer, and lives in Jefferson township, aged eighty-six, and John M. is a blacksmith in Dreher.

William Akers, Jr., was a great hunter, and killed panthers, bears and every kind of game. His children were Clements, who has one son in Dreher, and Rebecca, who married Frederick Kayser, who, after living in Honesdale and New York, finally settled in Greene, about one half-mile east of the Paupack. She is nearly eighty years of age and able to walk ten miles a day. She and her sister spun and wove one hundred and fifty pounds of wool in one year. Her son-in-law, Tunis Smith, killed the bear that was stuffed for the New Orleans Exposition. She has fifty grandchildren and twenty-five great-grandchildren living, making, with her children, about eighty living descendants. There was not a death in the family for fifty years. Her husband died recently, their children being William F. Kayser, who lives in Delaware, Charles F., in Iowa, Mary, wife of A. B. Drake, of Stroudsburg, Julia A., wife of Tunis Smith, of Dreher, Miranda, wife of Wien Forney, an editor in Harrisburg, and Sarah E., married to Theodore Correll, who lives on the homestead.

Sybil, another daughter of William Akers, married John Decker, who formerly kept tavern beyond Tafton, in Palmyra township.

Gabriel Davis sold his place to John Bennett in 1814 and moved to Salem, where his family are mentioned.

Of Bartle Bartleson's children, Rebecca married John Burns, one of the first settlers in Greene township. Thomas Bartleson, who is living in Greene, worked for Abel Kimble when he built his grist mill in Paupack settlement. Abel Kimble, Uriah Kimble and Thomas Bartleson got the millstones out of Cobb mountain, two spans of horses being required to draw them. They cut their own road part of the way. Bartle Bartleson, Sr., and William Akers, Jr., cut the road from the north and south state road to the south branch of the Wallenpaupack. Bartle Bartleson, Sr., settled on the place now occupied by Bartle Bartleson, Jr. Gabriel Bartleson has killed more than one hundred deer, and the first when a barefooted boy.

Andrew Corey was a fleshy man and not very energetic. His children were Job, who was drowned in the Paupack while rafting; Peter, who fell from the piazza of Howe's tavern and was killed; John, who settled Coreyville, in Greene; Polly, married to Asa Brundage; Olive and Patty who removed from the township. John and Thomas Dickinson are assessed as early as 1809.

Jacob Long settled one mile west of the Paupack. His children were George and Henry who lived in Greene; Mary Ann, wife of Harris Hamlin, Jr.; Elizabeth, wife of John Mitchell; Sophia, wife of Abner Eighmey.

Joseph Williams, in 1818, settled one fourth mile from the Paupack, where his son Jeremiah now lives. He was ninety-seven and his wife eighty-four when they died. His children were Martha, wife of Benjamin Sheerer; Jeremiah married Susan Bartleson who has a large family, among them John Williams, attorney-at-law, in Stroudsburg. Herman Newton came to Dreher from Connecticut, likewise, John Bennett who bought the Gabriel Davis place in 1814. His sons were Jeremiah and Nathaniel. Nancy Bennett, his daughter, taught the first school in 1812, in a school-house erected by Capt. Howe, near the residence of Denman Coe, at the rear of the Moravian parsonage. It was a square edifice, with a roof from each side running up to a point. Betsey Clements was one of the first teachers. She became the wife of Jeremiah Bennett. Nancy Bennett married Joshua Price and finally went West. Betsy, another daughter, was the wife of Ambrose Kellam. Jeremiah Bennett was the first hotel-keeper in South Sterling. He built the Lancaster saw-mill in 1819. His son Perry lived on Sugar Hill, in Greene township. Thomas C. Madden, who was a lieutenant in the late war, and is now justice of the peace, owns the property.

Benjamin Beach came to Sterling from Bucks County in 1816. He lived with John Clements two years and then took up fifty acres of land on the Paupack, which he increased to one hundred and fifty acres. He built a saw-mill near his house in 1835. He was a great hunter. His son Isaac thinks he has killed four hundred deer. Benjamin Beach was seventy-five when he died. His wife was Elizabeth Rush, and his children,—Christina who married John Dunning, a son of John Dunning, Sr., one of the first settlers in Greene; Jonas, who died a bachelor in Greene; Isaac, who lives on the homestead and is now seventy-seven, married Eliza Connery and raised a large family; Eliza, wife of Johnson Dickerson, who lived in Greene; Susan, wife of Nathaniel Oney, a great hunter; George, of Scranton; Benjamin, of Salem; and Philena, wife of Job Bartleson.

William Lancaster, an Englishman and a carpenter by trade, first came to Sterling to assist Robert Bortree build his grist-mill in 1816. He and his son Richard came to Dreher in 1819 and bought the interest of a squatter, took up two hundred acres of land one-half mile west of the Wallenpaupack, and cleared up the place now owned by C. W. Gilpin. Richard Lancaster was a jeweler by trade. He was appointed justice of the peace in 1823, and held that position until 1840, when he was elected sheriff, and was the last sheriff during the sessions of the court in Bethany. He was also a member of the Assembly, county treasurer and county commissioner. He was at a late date again elected justice of the peace. After holding all these offices, his vote being challenged, he was unable to find his father's naturalization papers, and the Legislature passed an act legalizing his official acts. He married Frances McIlwaine, his children being Richard, William, George, John (who married Amanda Barnes and lives in Greene), Franklin (in Moscow) and Hugh (who has a stick-factory and saw-mill on the Paupack). He had a shovel-handle factory in 1851 and a stick-factory in 1857, which was burned in 1885, and is being rebuilt. He started a store in 1844. The South Sterling post-office was established in 1848, with Richard Gilpin as postmaster. In 1851 Hugh Lancaster was appointed and held the office till 1885, when Josiah Whittaker was the incumbent. Robert and Christopher, two other sons of Richard Lancaster, live in Sullivan County. Margaret Ann is the wife of Charles W. Gilpin.

Richard Gilpin married Mary Bortree, sister of Robert Bortree, Sr. He came to New York from Ireland, crossed New Jersey to Easton, and in 1810 arrived in Dreher, where he took up four hundred acres of land on the Wallenpaupack, one mile east of his brother-in-law, Robert Bortree. His oldest child, Sally, married Abraham Heazelton in Ireland, and came to Dreher in 1820. Her children were Abraham, Richard, William, John, Thomas and Edward, sons. The daughters were Eliza (wife of William Skelton), Mary Jane (wife of William Cross) and Ann (wife of Dilworth Cross). The remaining children were Eliza (wife of Edward Bortree) and Ann (wife of John Bortree).

William married Sarah Bortree, among whose children were John B. Gilpin, who lives on the Ransberry place; Mary Jane, wife of Jesse Ransberry, who was for many years blacksmith for the settlement.

Richard, Jr., who married Eliza Bennett, had the following children: Charles W. Gilpin, who has been school director for twenty-six years, lives on the old Lancaster homestead and is an influential farmer; John, who was once county auditor; Jeremiah; William R., of Greene; Emory, of Houcktown; Lydia, wife of Isaac Barnes; Fletcher, M.D.; and James, who lives on the homestead.

John Robert Gilpin lived near the Paupack and had a saw-mill on the East Branch. His son, Thomas H. Gilpin, operates a saw-mill in Greene township.

Thomas Gilpin cleared a place and built a stone house now occupied by Simon Gilpin's widow. Another son, James D. Gilpin, lives in Nobletown.

John Nevins came to Dreher about 1820, and settled two miles west of the Paupack. He and his wife were hard-working people and cleared a good farm. Their children were Bernard, a bachelor, who lives on the homestead, in the log house built by his father; Thomas, who located west of the homestead; Mary, who is the wife of John M. Akers; and Jeremiah, who has been an invalid for forty years, living with his bachelor brother and maiden sister, Hannah.

Simon Todd cleared a place near Lancaster. His son Charles Todd became a Methodist minister.

Robert Bortree, Sr., came to Dreher in 1806, and settled what was formerly called East Sterling. It is now the northern part of Dreher. He built a grist-mill on Bortree Creek, near his place, in 1812, and had a native stone for grinding. In 1816 he secured a stone from Philadelphia.

Robert Bortree, Sr., "was an open-handed, free-hearted Irishman." He and Richard Gilpin, Sr., occasionally preached to the early settlers. There are persons still living who remember the rich Irish brogue with which Robert Bortree announced the old-time Methodist hymns:

> "The Lord's into his garden come,
> The spices yield a rich perfume."

"Brother John Bortree, will you start that tune?"

Mrs. Bortree was not a member of the church, and would give no heed to the old man's admonitions. One day a fearful wind storm arose; the old lady was terrified, and thought the world was about coming to an end. In this extremity she besought the old gentleman to pray for her. His sense of infinite justice was insulted by the proposition, and he replied, "Indade and I won't; this is what I have been telling you for this forty years, and now that the devil has come, it is too late."

His children were William, John, Edward, Thomas (2d) and Robert. William settled one-fourth mile northeast of the Bortree or East Sterling Church. His children were Charles; Mary Ann, wife of S. G. Nicholson; Samuel Bortree, who runs the grist-mill built by his grandfather; and Daniel. John Bortree settled one-half mile north of the East Sterling Church. Edward built a stone house on a hill one-half mile west of the Bortree Church. His children were Robert John Bortree, who settled north of Zion Church; Richard, who lives on the homestead; William Edward, who is on the John Clements place; and Mary G., wife of Jabez Simons. Thomas Bortree built a house and saw-mill near his father's grist-mill, both of which have fallen to decay. He finally moved to the Ashbel Miller place, in the eastern part of Salem, on the old East and West turnpike, and kept tavern for many years. Robert settled in Greene, opposite the Robert Bortree grist-mill.

Joseph Simpson located about one mile west of Robert Bortree. His sons were William, James, Abram, Thomas, John and Daniel.

Josiah Whittaker, an Englishman, bought John Eck's place and started a store in South Sterling in 1861 and now has the post-office; his son, John J. Whittaker, was county auditor. When Robert Bortree went to Ireland to settle his brother Simon's estate, Robert and Thomas Cross, brothers of Edward Cross, returned with him. Robert settled about two miles south of Robert Bortree, his brother locating next him. Robert's children were Dilworth, Mary Jane, Edward and Samuel, who died in the army. Thomas' children were Abraham and Nathan, who live in Greene; William, Mary A., wife of Simon Dilworth; and Sarah, wife of Nathaniel Martin, who located in Dreher.

Although the flats had been partly cleared by squatters, the title was vested in Abraham Singer, and George Schively, who rented the cleared portion to different persons. In 1828 twenty-two German families from Gundlesheim and Weingarden came to Easton. Charles David Wolfe, Charles Raetz and Jacob Rohrbacher bought about two thousand acres of Singer and the widow of George Schively. In 1829 Philip Krause, Charles Raetz, John A. Raetz, Michael Beeler and Magdalene Beehn came with her sons, Adam, John and Charles. Philip Heck, Christian Fribilie, Charles D. Wolf, Jacob Rohrbacher, Philip Able and Christof Snyder were the original colony. Jacob Heck, George A. Wolf, C. T. Hefferle, John I. Ziegler, Frederick Meyer, John Mesnart, Peter Hebberle and John Straub came later. This constituted the German settlement of Newfoundland, or the Dutch Flats. They each built a hut on the old road which ran along the side hill. The Newfoundland turnpike was built in 1840. It leaves the north and south below Hartford's mill, and passes southeast, then south through the flats up the south branch of the Wallenpaupack, and thence across southwest into the north and south again at Labar's. The Germans then built on the flats along the road. They all wanted a piece of the flat land and to that end the farms were surveyed long and narrow, running across the road. They are from seventeen to forty-eight rods wide and four hundred and eighty-two rods long. By this arrangement each one had a portion of the flat and side hill on both sides, thus bringing their houses close together along the road, which, with stores and shops, made a farmer's village. Among them were tradesmen, such as coopers, millers, tailors, shoemakers and carpenters. They were all musical. Originally Lutherans, the Moravians at Bethlehem loaned the money, bought fifty acres of land for the minister and helped them build a church. Strangers in a strange land, it is not singular that the kindness of the Moravians won them to that faith. They built a church, in 1840, of peculiar construction. It was thirty-five by forty feet, two stories high and designed for a church and dwelling for the minister. It was built of hewn timber, about six inches thick, standing about four feet apart, with cross-pieces well braced and filled in with stone and clay in the lower stories. Withed sticks in the upper story held the clay and plaster. The new church was built about 1853. Abram Brinninger gave five hundred dollars to the Moravian Society for the erection of the first edifice. Nearly all of the German immigrants belonged to the church. Rev. Chr. Trager was the first preacher, and organized the church August 13, 1837. He has been followed in the ministry by Revs. Lambert, Seidel, Simon, Ricksecker, Smith, Oehler, Praeger, Detterer, Nagel, Neu, Rommel and Charles Moench. There are two hundred and one members, with a Sunday-school of one hundred and seventy-five members, which the pastor superintends.

When the Germans first came to the flats they lived within themselves and had little intercourse with their neighbors. An outsider admired a daughter of Mr. Raetz, but the young Germans, who were jealous, caught the intruder one night as he was returning from a call on his German Dulcinea, and whipped him with a butternut root, for which offense six of them were fined five dollars apiece by 'Squire Lancaster. This illiberality has worn away, and the Germans have since intermarried with others. They are an industrious people, have made great improvements and their descendants have helped to populate Greene township and vicinity. Charles David Wolfe, one of their leaders, was not permitted to share in the triumphs of the colony. While felling trees he was killed by an accident. His was the first grave in the German burying-ground. Mrs. Christina Wolfe found herself a widow in a strange land with ten children, the oldest being but seventeen.

Of these children, (1) Charles D. Wolfe, Jr., married Catherine Robacker, and settled in Greene; (2) Frederick lives in Easton; (3) Christian G. Wolfe married Rebecca Long, their children being Oliver D. and Eliza, wife of J. R. Smith; he married Narcelia Gorman for a second wife, their children being Leroy D. Wolfe, who has been of assistance to the writer in preparing this sketch; Myra, who married Prof. J. F. Dooley; Adelia, wife of John A. Kipp; and Celinda, wife of R. Bartleson; Olin, Laura and Nellie are unmarried. (4) The fourth son was David Wolfe; then followed (5) Elizabeth, wife of James Hess; (6) Catherine, wife of Adam Hebberling; (7) Christiana, wife of George Waltz; (8) Louisa, wife of Henry Buzza; and (9) Christina, of Easton.

Francis A. Oppelt came to Dreher in April, 1840, from Northampton County. He was justice of the peace for thirty years, census taker in 1850, county commissioner in anti-court-house times and a good auctioneer. His children are Angeline, who married Frederick Ehrhardt, a leading merchant on the flats, who commenced business in 1860; Caroline married Christian Lange, a store-keeper in partnership with Emier Welter, who married Mary Oppelt; Lange was also undertaker and postmaster for a number of years; Isadore Kastner, of Hawley, married Anna; Sarah lives in Philadelphia; William Hebberling married Cilia; Henry is unmarried; and Edward lives in Greene. George L. Waltz started a store in Greene in 1866 and in 1868 commenced on the flats. After Charles died George continued the business alone. They also built a hotel on the East Branch in Greene.

South Sterling Methodist Episcopal Church.—Mrs. Gilpin says "she remembers that William Akers and his wife and Mr. Eldridge belonged to the first class. Edward Bortree was the first class-leader and after him Richard Gilpin. Rev. Benjamin Kellam, Elder Dobell and Rev. Mr. Purdy were among the first preachers. Sophronus Stocking organized the first class."

The South Sterling Methodist Church was dedicated January 1, 1857, and is thirty by forty feet, with a stone basement and class-rooms. It cost fourteen hundred dollars and is located on a little spur of the hill below Gilpin's.

The East Sterling Protestant Methodist Church was dedicated November 18, 1855. The first members were William, Edward, John and Robert Bortree and John R. Gilpin.

The Albright or Evangelical Church was built about 1854. The first preacher was Rev. William Mines. The first circuit preacher was Rev. J. Hess. The constituent members were George Waltz, John Krause, Charles Wolfe, William Robacker, Christopher Robacker, Christopher Neck and Jacob M. Schall.

Dr. Dietz was the first physician and Dr. Fletcher Gilpin the first resident physician. William Bortree was first postmaster at East Sterling and held the office till Polk's administration, when Charles Raetz was appointed. Afterward S. G. Nicholson, who had a store where Blankenbush now resides, received the commission. About 1856 there was a post office established on the flats, called Hopedale, Rev. Mr. Oehler being the first postmaster. Charles Tremper was made postmaster in 1858, as F. A. Oppelt also at Hopedale. They were so close together that Mr. Oppelt relinquished the office and East Sterling absorbed Hopedale. When Mr. Tremper failed Mr. Oppelt took it again. In 1858 H. A. Lancaster was appointed postmaster of Newfoundland and this absorbed East Sterling. Afterward C. Lange held it for twenty-three years. F. Ehrhardt now holds the office. John Bortree sold goods from his house in 1812 and William Bortree had a store in his house in 1818.

Wallenpaupack Lodge, I. O. O. F., No. 478, was organized December 18, 1852, by D. D. G. M. Jackson Woodward. The charter members were Ezekiel Ellsworth, F. A. Oppelt, C. W. Gilpin, Daniel Bortree, Erastus Jones, Jacob Seig, John Uban, Thomas V. Kipp, Hugh Lancaster, Thomas Nevin, Ehrgood Wolfe. There are now about two hundred members. The lodge meets every Saturday evening. They have their own quarters and three thousand five hundred dollars in money in the treasury.

Allen Megargel built a grist mill about 1825, which Isaac Megargel, his son and heir, sold to William Ehrgood in 1830, and his son Jacob Ehrgood operates the mill now.

John Haag built a steam grist-mill in 1857. L. D. Wolfe, in his sketch, in 1878, speaks of the Wolfe saw-mill and store, Lambert Frey's shop, R. L. Sieg & Co.'s and C. W. Akers' blacksmith shop. The Hopedale Hotel was then kept by J. J. Laager; it is now presided over by L. R. Smith. Dreher has five schools.

Gabriel Brown came to Sterling (now Dreher) from Scotland in 1842 and settled two miles south of Howe's, on the North and South road. His children were George Brown, of Salem, and Thomas Brown, who lives on the homestead; Isabella lived with Thomas. Thomas Thompson married Agnes and resides about one mile west of Jericho.

Owl Hoot or Angel's was first occupied by Mr. Webb, after which Mr. Sperry made butter boxes and veneering, employing a number of hands. These mills burned and Angel & Kerr now run a saw-mill. There is a post-office at Angel's on the same spot.

The Newfoundland Encampment, No. 219, I. O. of O. F., was instituted at Newfoundland, Wayne County, Pa., November 20, 1871. The following were the first officers; C. W. Gilpin, C. P.; L. R. Smith, H. P.; C. W. Down, S. W.; H. C. Lancaster, J. W.; F. A. Oppelt, Scribe; R. B. Dunning, Treasurer; A. H. Roemer, I. S.; C. W. Akers, O. S.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

TEXAS TOWNSHIP.

THE erection of Texas township out of the lower portion of Dyberry took place toward the close of the year 1837, and was brought about by the difficulty, which a scattered population, remote from the place where business was transacted, experienced in conforming to the provisions of the new school law and the statutes relating to township accounts. At the January Term of the court a petition, setting forth the inconveniences of the existing boundary lines, resulted in the constitution of Warner M. Preston, Virgil Grenell and Thomas Clark a committee of viewers instructed to report at the next term of court. They were favorable to the erection of the new township, and, after the usual delay entailed by surveying and plotting, the final order for the township of Texas was made November 23, 1837. The territory thus set off included a large portion of what is now Cherry Ridge, and its northern line divided the township of Dyberry into two nearly equal portions. Thus it remained until 1843, when the excision of Cherry Ridge took place and Texas assumed its present limits. It is now bounded on the north by Dyberry and Prompton, east by Berlin, south by Palmyra and Cherry Ridge, and west by Cherry Ridge, Canaan and Prompton. Its topography is irregular, and the valleys of the Lackawaxen and Dyberry, the streams which water it, are walled in by high hills and bold cliffs. The Lackawaxen flows southeasterly nearly through the centre of the township and at Honesdale is joined by the Dyberry, which flows from the north. The bottom lands on each stream are rich alluvial deposits, easily cultivated and very productive. Walled up by the cliffs, and stretching away into the adjacent townships on the east, is a large plateau many feet above the water level of the Lackawaxen. This table land is watered by several brooks that descend rapidly to the river, and form many available water-powers for saw and grist-mills, and were powerful auxiliaries in the early settlement of the region.

The population of Texas was not large at the time of its erection, but has increased rapidly in the past two decades. The assessment taken in 1840, some two years after the township was set off, shows the following names:

The earliest settlement in Texas was on the Indian Orchard, a body of land in the southern part of the township which took its name from a row of one hundred apple-trees that were planted at regular distances along the river-bank and a tradition among the early settlers has it that there were ninety and nine trees which bore sweet fruit and one only which every other year was covered with sour apples. At this time certain ceremonies were performed by the tribe, and the dancing-ground, a large clearing on the bank, paved with flat stones, was the scene of special rites. The dancing-ground has long since disappeared and but one of the hundred trees remains to trail its gnarled and decrepit branches over the stream; but now and then the plow-share, turning up the rich alluvium, brings to light broken flints and fragments of the rude implements with which the ground was strewn when by their fantastic dances the simple Indians invoked the aid of Manito, the great spirit, two centuries ago.

From[1] this old orchard one of the earliest grants to individual owners took its name, and the changes in the ownership and the circumstances that attended them form a part of the history of several adjacent localities. Early in 1763 the complaints that poured in upon the proprietary Governors and the Assembly stimulated them to take some immediate measures for the suppression of the terrible depredations of the Indians along the entire frontier line of the State. It was apparent that unless something decisive was done without delay the scattered whites would be driven from their homes to escape entire annihilation at the hands of the merciless savages. It was a year of terror in all the outlying settlements of the province. Upon the unsuspecting settlers at work in their fields there broke a savage tide of slaughter which wreaked indiscriminate vengeance all along the border. The whole frontier was ablaze with the torch and musket of the savage, and in the woods for some miles on either side of the Susquehanna families with their cattle sought the safety that the towns did not afford.

Seven hundred men were immediately enlisted and sent into active service, protecting the settlers and especially defending during harvest those in the most exposed situations. Among the officers who were sent to recruit the "back inhabitants" was Colonel John Seeley, of Berks County, and this officer in the discharge of his duties became acquainted and favorably impressed with this section of the country. After the campaign, on being relieved of his command, he made application for a large tract on the frontier, pledging its early settlement from the adjoining provinces. As it was the policy of the proprietaries to encourage the speedy development of the province at the expense of rival colonies, his application received favorable consideration, and on the 30th of July, 1765, a warrant in Colonel Seeley's behalf was issued to the surveyor-general directing him to survey ten thousand acres, in one or two tracts, on or near the north branch of Lackawaxen Creek, beginning about a mile above the forks of the creek and going near the tract already surveyed to the use of the proprietaries (i.e., the Wallenpaupack Manor). It was conditional that Colonel Seeley should secure thirty families of bona fide settlers on this tract within three years, or, in the event of war or other disturbing causes, within three years after the termination of such disruption. The survey, which was made by James Scull, was returned in February, 1769, and all the land surrounding the tract was marked as "vacant." The northwestern corner was at a birch-tree on the hill-side, a little south of "the old burying-ground," in the present borough of Honesdale. A large portion of the tract lay in the form of a square, with its southern limit a little below the old Indian Orchard, while a portion of it extended down the Lackawaxen to a point below White Mills.

Colonel Seeley did not fulfill his engagement with Governor Penn in the matter of obtaining settlers, and financial embarrassment coming upon him, in March, 1779, he conveyed the Indian Orchard tract to Mark Bird and James Wilson in fee as tenants in common, excepting and reserving one thousand acres at the north end of the tract. Mark Bird released and conveyed his share to Judge Wilson soon after, and in due time the latter paid the purchase-money and obtained a patent. Meanwhile other creditors of Colonel Seeley had taken measures to secure their claims, and the tract was levied on by Sheriff George Graff, of Northampton County, as the property of Colonel Seeley, by virtue of an execution issued at the instance of Isaac Levan in the interest of the estate of James Hamilton, deceased. Judge Wilson made two unsuccessful attempts to recover possession, once taking the case to the higher court.

Nearly thirty years elapsed after Penn issued the first warrant in favor of Jonas Seeley before any of the land was sold in small parcels with a view to actual occupancy. When the courts were located at Bethany, in 1805, the best portions of the tract were in the possession of half a dozen individuals, either as "squatters" or under contracts from James Bell, agent for Mr. Hamilton. In 1810 Mr. Hamilton acknowledged deeds for six tracts which he had sold to Walter Kimble and others, the first-named securing the portion of the property which contained the old Indian Orchard.

Who was the first settler at the Indian Orchard is now a matter of uncertainty. Tradition has it that one of the Holberts lived on the Walter Kimble place before he went there, and David Ford and James Hough both lived in the vicinity, Ford having a cabin on the west side of the Lackawaxen, nearly opposite the old mill-site.

Among those who came from Cochecton to the Wallenpaupack settlement were Jacob Kimble and his two sons, Abel and Walter. Jacob was then fifty-one years of age, and his boys just attaining manhood. They came from vigorous, self-reliant Connecticut stock, and were identified with all the varying fortunes of the settlement, enduring manfully the incredible hardships to which the pioneers were continually subjected. Jacob was made the tithing-man of the settlement in 1775.

Stephen Kimble, his nephew, was one of the three men who, when the news of the Wyoming massacre reached the settlement, in 1778, started, all haste, to notify the families of Benjamin Haynes, James Hough and David Ford, who lived in the vicinity of Indian Orchard and White Mills, of the catastrophe and the impending danger to the other settlements. They never reached their destination, being captured by the Indians near Paupack Falls and carried into captivity, where Kimble died. Walter Kimble was a participant in the exciting events that transpired when the settlers attempted to return from Milford and gather their crops in 1778–79, and his adventures at that time are narrated in the history of the Wallenpaupack settlement. The Kimbles located at the Indian Orchard shortly after the close of the Revolution. At this time Ford had a cabin on the opposite side of the river, and, as he was suspected of being a Tory, was a source of terror to all the women in the neighborhood when their husbands were away from home. Ford's Eddy, which was just below his cabin, took its name from him. Walter Kimble built on what was afterwards the site of the old Beardslee house, and commenced his clearing. "Jersey" was the base of all supplies except coarse meal and the barest necessities of life, which were procurable from Milford and the Wallenpaupack and Wilsonville settlements.

When he found it necessary to go after his grist, his wife took refuge in a cave on the river-bank that is now covered by the bed of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, and there remained in safety until her protector returned. Besides Walter, Jacob Kimble was the father of four other sons—Ephraim, Abel, Benjamin and Daniel. These located some on the Indian Orchard tract, and some in adjacent townships, and were among the first settlers of Wayne County.

The first saw-mill at Indian Orchard was built by Walter Kimble about 1790, and was located a few rods below the cemetery. It was, of course, an up-and-down saw, and had but a very limited capacity; nevertheless, it met the demand for lumber, and was for a number of years a profitable investment.

Ephraim Kimble married Eunice Ainsley, and was the father of William, Asa, John, Ephraim and eight daughters. Abel was united to Sibyl Conant, and their children were Uriah, Erastus, Philip, Arthur, Betsy, Clara, Sarah and Mahala. Jacob married Annie Ainsley, and of this union Moses, James, Jacob, Walter and Milton were born. Benjamin's wife was Elizabeth Cole, and his children were Amelia, Fannie, Dency, Phœbe, Abraham, Ira, Jacob and Simon. Daniel married Jane Ross, and there were born to him Samuel, Benjamin, Daniel, Joseph, Abisha, Percy, Scott, Amanda, Milly and Lucretia.

Walter Kimble was married to Betsy Jennings before he came from Connecticut, and had seven children,—Stephen, Hiram, George, Charles, Phœbe, Lucretia and Lucinda. Stephen married Catherine Davis, and lived at Traceyville, on what is known as the Carley Brook property. He left eight children—Jacob, George, Stephen D., Polly, Esther, Minerva, Lucinda and Betsy. Hiram and George, the second and third sons of Walter Kimble, moved to Ohio, where they married and left many descendants. Charles, the fourth son, married Margaret Cole, and his surviving children are Louis, David, Esther, Lavinda, Betsy. All of them reside in Michigan. Polly, the first daughter, married Robert Beardslee, and their children were Charles, Hiram, David, Robert, Lewis, Jackson and Sadie. Lucretia, the second daughter, married Bulkley Beardslee, and the children from this union were Eliza, Walter, Howkin, Bulkley, Abby, Phœbe, Andrew, Sarah and Charles. Lucinda, the youngest daughter, married a Howard, and left several children, among whom were Frank and James. In 1835 Walter Kimble sold his property to Bulkley Beardslee, and moved to Ohio, where he died.

Thomas Schoonover was almost contemporary with the Kimbles. He came from New Jersey, where he had previously married Margaret Cadrow, and settled on the Holbert farm, near the junction of Holbert Brook with the Lackawaxen. His children were William, Elijah, Polly and Margaret. William married Lizzie French, and left a number of children. Elijah wedded Rachel Bishop. Their children were Maria, Thomas, Amelia, John, George and Elijah. Polly married Lester Adams, one of the early settlers of Oregon, and their children were William, Elijah, George and Lester. Margaret married Jacob Kimble, and moved with him to Michigan, where their descendants now live.

William Schoonover was one of the first settlers on the Dyberry, and took up and patented a large tract of land, which included all of the upper portion of Honesdale. He located at the place afterward occupied by Daniel, as early as 1794, and was the father of Levi, the first white child born on the Dyberry. His descendants were Daniel, Levi, Jacob and Simon.

About 1796, Cornelius Corryelle came from Lambertville and located on the place now occupied by Christian Dorflinger, at White Mills. At this time he was a widower with one daughter, who subsequently married a Mr. Byles, and moved West. Mr. Corryelle was married a second time to Catherine Consaulus, and there were born of this union: John, who married Eliza Compton; Sarah; Nancy, wife of Frederick Seward; Amelia, wife of Lyman Solomon; and Lewis, who married Olive Bishop. Lewis Corryelle figured in a lawsuit that was quite notorious during the first decade of the present century, when, in company with Daniel Kimble, he brought an action against Jonathan Brink for erecting a dam in the Lackawaxen, just below the site occupied by White Mills saw-mill.

Bulkley Beardslee came to Indian Orchard in 1811, from the home of his father, Robert Beardslee, one of the early settlers of Bethany. He was married to Lucretia Kimble in 1815, and was the father of Hon. Howkin B. Beardslee, who was elected register and recorder of the county in 1845. Afterwards he edited the Wayne County Herald, and was elected first Representative and then State Senator. Mr. Beardslee is now the editor of the Luzerne Union, a Democratic paper of Wilkes-Barre.

Early in the spring of 1813, Peter Cole, his wife and his son Josiah, came from New Jersey and settled in the woods on what has since been known as Cole's Hill, one mile northwest of Honesdale. For miles around there was only dense forest, infested by wolves and bears. Assisted by his son, who was then but sixteen years old, Mr. Cole built a cabin without windows, and hung up a bed-quilt for a door. Then he and his son went back to New Jersey to assist in the harvesting; and Mrs. Cole was left with only a faithful dog for companionship and defense. Mrs. Cole was more than equal to the task that circumstances imposed upon her, and not only guarded the cabin, but found time to do much to increase the comfort of the male members of the family on their return several weeks after. Peter Cole was succeeded in his estates by Josiah, who had four children. One of his sons, Lewis R. Cole, was wounded at Fort Fisher, and died in the hospital in 1865; the other son, P. J. Cole, rents and conducts the Honesdale Mill. One of Peter Cole's daughters married Reynolds Case, and is now dead; the other is the wife of Charles H. Peck, and resides in Preston township. Elizabeth Cole, who married Benjamin Kimble, Sr., was a sister of Peter Cole, and the mother of Mrs. Fanny Atkinson, of Paupack Eddy.

Robert Beardslee settled on lands adjoining Peter Cole about 1812, and was identified with the early history of the township. He married a sister of Charles Kimble, and had two sons, Lewis and David. The family was originally from Litchfield County, Connecticut.

Robert Compton, one of the early settlers in the vicinity of White Mills, is a son of John R. Compton, one of the early settlers of Palmyra. Robert came with his father from New Jersey in 1838, and settled on the edge of Texas. He has four children,—Frank H., who lives at the homestead with his family; Edward and Mary, wife of John McCarty, both of Texas; and Ellen D. A. Compton, who lives near Hawley.

One of the oldest living pioneers in what is now Texas is Thomas Loud, who came to White Mills in 1827 from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and was employed on the Delaware and Hudson Canal until its completion. In 1832 he married Eliza, the oldest daughter of Jonathan Brink, and of this union there were born four children,—Helen, who married Hiram Bishop, and lives at Hawley;

Janett D., now a resident of Honesdale; Ophelia, the wife of Edward Rosekranz, of Port Jervis; Parmelia D. (Mrs. Frank Westfall), of Honesdale. Mr. Loud is now in his seventy-ninth year, and is in full possession of all his faculties. His recollections of early events are vivid and accurate, and much information concerning the early settlers was obtained from him.

The Dyberry assessment list for 1805 shows that the lands adjacent to, and now occupied by Daniel M. Eno were assessed to Isaac Seaman, the father of Charles W. Seaman. This property was afterwards sold to Peter Smith, who in turn disposed of it to Deming & Eno.

SEELYVILLE.—It was a summer day in the year 1760 that Rev. Jonathan Seely, a clergyman of Connecticut, who seems to have been imbued with a spirit of speculation and adventure, piloted by an Indian guide, threaded his way through the dense forests of the Lackawaxen Valley, and from a jutting rock on the bank surveyed the picturesque wildness of the spot where Seelyville now stands. The whilom hills of gray were emerald with the luxuriant foliage of June, and the free banners of the forest were flung from a thousand airy battlements under a perfect sky. Here the silvery stream came tumbling over the rocks, and, broken into long lines of skurring foam, fretted the fern fringes of the bank at their feet. Beyond the boisterous falls the hills stretched gently upward, laden with the forest growth of many centuries, the dense foliage of laurel and rhododenron pressed close to the trunks of the hemlocks and pines, and the air was perfumed with the breath of half-hidden wild flowers. They had come through acres of majestic solitude, where the air was silent save for the music of the birds and the crackling of the twigs under their moccasined feet, and now stood where, fifty years afterward, the murmur of the creek and the singing of the zephyr was destined to be broken by the whir of the mill-stone and the fret of the saw.

Jonathan Seely is believed to have been the first white man to set foot on the virgin soil of the Lackawaxen Valley, and, accompanied by his friendly guide, he visited other localities in the vicinity.[1] His object, as is shown by the record of his operations, was to secure large tracts of land contiguous to and including valuable water privileges, with a view to their greatly enhanced value, when, in the progress of time, the country should have become developed and mills of various kinds become a necessity to the growing population. Lands at Wilsonville, on the falls of the Dyberry, and those of Middle Creek and Jennings Brook were thus taken up, generally by, or in the names of, some of his children, as was the case with the Indian Orchard tract by Colonel Jonas Seely, as is elsewhere narrated.

The Seelyville tract was taken out by virtue of a warrent issued to Colonel Sylvanus Seely, August, 6, 1769, and was surveyed October, 30, 1790. Thirty years afterward, 1820, the patent was issued. The tract was surrounded by almost impenetrable forest, and a faintly marked trail was the only route by which chattels could be transported to the location the pioneer had decided upon as his future home. Nothing daunted by the isolation of the place, and the hardships that settlement in so remote a region would entail, he went energeticlly to work. It is not accurately known just when Colonel Seely commenced his improvements, but it was probably about the close of the last century. According to the recollections of Esquire Thomas Spangenburg, there were no mills in operation above Wilsonville when he first visited this part of the county, in 1794. After Bethany was made the county seat, and lumber was required for the first buildings erected there, the mills were in operation at Seelyville. It is probable that the saw-mill was erected in 1802. It was located just below the falls, and afterwards he built a little log cabin, into which he moved his family three years later. They came from New York to the Cherry Ridge settlement, and from that point Colonel Seely cut a road to Seelyville which he then called "Jane Mills." The grist-mill was erected a few years afterward, and was located just below the saw-mill. The stones which did the first grinding were obtained on the top of the Moosic Mountain, and were of the hard white conglomerate that forms some of the highest ledges of that range. A portion of one of these stones is now used as a carriage-block in front of the residence of Mr. W. S. Birdsall, and the marks of the burr-pick made seventy-five years ago are still quite distinct.

The only lumbering that would pay at this time was the sawing of pine and hard woods. Small rafts of curled maple and cherry, containing seven or eight thousand feet each, were floated to the ground where Birdsall Bros. woolen factory now stands, and were there sawn, made into still more compact rafts, and sent down to Philadelpia. Colonel Seely had a blacksmith shop, and was the leading spirit of the place, which had by this time become a prosperous settlement; but, as he devoted most of his attention to milling and lumbering, little was done toward the development of the agricultural resources of the vicinity. Toward the close of his life, Colonel Seely became financially involved, and at his death, in 1821, his entire estate, including the mills, was sold.

There was then an interim when the growth of the village ceased, and though the mills were kept in operation, there was little sign of growth or progress. It was during this time that R. L Seely, of Warren, Trumbull County, Ohio, came east on a visit, and, a year later, in 1825, returned with his father, John W. Seely, and bought the property, consisting of three hundred and thirty-six acres, for nine hundred dollars. He arrived to take possession on March 16, 1826, coming by the way of Cherry Ridge, over the road that Col. Sylvanus Seely had cut. This went on to Bethany, and was the only road to the mills. The uninviting isolation of the place did not discourage him, however, and he went briskly to work. A new saw-mill was built, and the grist-mill was repaired. His aid and advisor at this time was Jonathan D. Simpson, and under disadvantages that would have overpowered most men, he showed pluck and enterprise. The Delaware and Hudson Canal and the line of the railroad were located in 1827, and this infused new life into business. Hundreds of laborers were soon employed on the new work, and the products of Seely's mills were in demand. Not only was there closer and better connection with the eastern market; but, better still, Honesdale began to flourish, and the impetus of a new town within so short a distance of the mills, made Seelyville an important location.

The year 1830 brought several new enterprises. Ross, Baldwin & Co. began the manufacture of edged tools; Casper Hollenback started a small foundry; and John H. Bowers commenced building a turning-shop. These improvements, together with the saw and grist-mills, gave the place a busy aspect. The next year brought some changes: the Ross interest in the edged tool works was sold to Joseph Whitmore and the firm became Whitmore, Baldwin & Co., Col. R. L. Seely being the "Co.," early in February, and the shop was enlarged the next summer; a number of new settlers also came in. In 1832, Levi Bronson started a shovel handle factory in the loft over John H. Bowers' turning-shop, which had meanwhile been bought out by Gilbert, Knapp & Co. The firm of Thomas T. Hoyt & Co. also succeeded the firm of Whitmore, Baldwin & Co. in the tool business, and soon gave place to Burk, Story & Co. It was this year too, that Isaac P. Foster, Ezra Hand, Daniel P. Kirtland and John F. Roe started a tannery on a tract of land that I. P. Foster had bought from Jonathan D. Simpson, in 1829. It was part of the Stephen Day warrant, and had been patented to Col. Sylvanus Seely. After a few months, the firm was changed, and I. P. Foster bought out the interest of his partners. He continued to run the business until 1848, when it became I. P. Foster & Sons, and so continued until 1861, when Foster Brothers & Co. succeeded, in whose hands the business remained until 1874, when it was abandoned.

In 1833 the old edged tool shop was torn down and Col. R. L. Seely erected a new one, thirty by thirty-six, two stories high, and leased it for ten years to Burk & Story. A few months afterwards, David Burbank took Story's interest, and the style was changed to Burbank & Burk. Mr. Burbank lived in Hartford, Conn., and his interests were looked after by Abi Marsh.

Early in 1834 Daniel C. and Bester Payne leased the second story of the axe factory for drawing lead pipe. The same year Jason Torrey and R. L. Seely, who commenced the manufacture of scoop shovels, and two years afterwards the Paynes gave up the pipe business and took charge of the shovels to finish them.

Omitting a number of minor business changes, we find that in 1838, Simpson and Gill were running the turning-shop, and Hand and Kirtland had leased the loft over the axe shop as a sash-factory. D. C. White had succeeded Burbank & Burk in the tool business. A new industry was given to the place in 1841, when Leonard & Bartlett started a pail-factory; they did quite a business for two or three years. In 1844 John H. Gill, a native of Yorkshire, England, started a foundry at Seelyville. He had come to the place many years before, and was the builder of the new mill and several other buildings in the village. This foundry is still carried on by B. F. Gill, and keeps half a dozen men employed.

The year 1847 witnessed the starting of two important industries. M. F. Van Kirk and Walter Knight started an umbrella stick manufactory, on the south side of the river, and ran it for several years. The firm was dissolved in 1853, and Mr. Van Kirk then moved to Tyler Hill, in Damascus township. He re-located in Honesdale, in 1856, and is still carrying on the business there.

The second enterprise was the starting of the Birdsall woolen-mill, now the most important manufactory in the place. James Birdsall, its founder, came to Seelyville in 1846, having for several years previous resided in Carbondale. He leased land of Col. R. L. Seely, and started carding rolls as first machinery. The mill was burned on December 24, 1850, entailing a serious loss, as there was no insurance, but a new mill, four stories high and sixty by thirty-six was soon commenced, and Mr. Birdsall was ready for business a few months after. By good management the business continued to grow, and he was constantly making improvements until his death which occurred in January, 1857, when the business descended to his sons, William S. and James C. Birdsall, the present owners. When the mill was first started it used probably ten thousand pounds of wool per year, and employed ten or twelve hands; to-day it is spinning one hundred and twenty-five thousand pounds a year, and there are nearly a hundred employees on the pay roll. The mill is what is known as a "two set" mill, and manufactures cassimeres, flannels, yarns and blankets.

Colonel Seely rebuilt his saw-n ill in 1849, and the same year Christian Erk started the umbrella stick manufactory he is still running. The first firm was Erk, Merz & Co., and the machinery was in the sash and blind shop of Hand & Kirtland. This building was burned in September, 1855, and the present factory was erected on its site. This same year M. B. Bennett & Co. started a foundry and machine shop in a large frame building erected by Colonel Seely on the south side of the stream. This was occupied by various firms and finally burned, and was replaced by the substantial brick building standing at present. Seelyville has a number of other industries of more recent date.

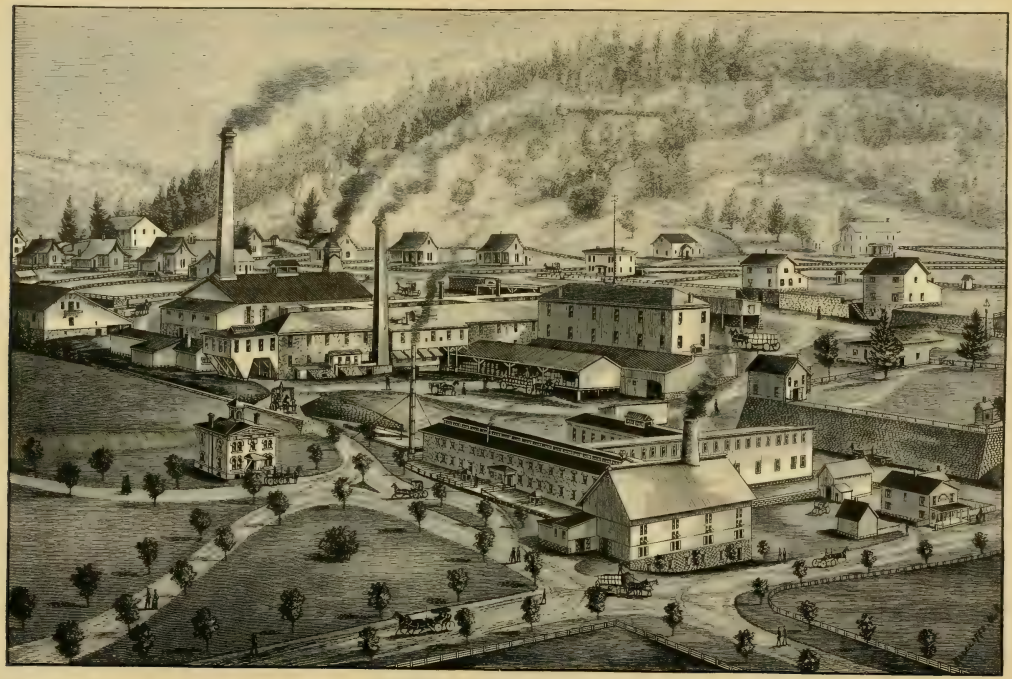
The first school in Seelyville was held in an old log building which stood on a spot now in Mr. Birdsall's orchard, and was on the old road to Bethany. It was erected about 1835 or 1836. In 1842 the building now used by Mrs. Bissell as a residence was erected for a school-house, and was occupied until the present central building was put up, in 1858. Seelyville was at first an independent school district, including a portion of Texas township, and when this was erected in 1857 Prof. G. W. Trim, now of Jermyn, Pa., was engaged to teach in the new building. He filled the position acceptably for fourteen years, and was succeeded by Miss E. J. Avery and late by W. T. Butler. In 1865 the village of Seelyville was cut off from the Texas district before referred to and erected as an independent district. The average number of pupils on the roll is one hundred.

The post-office was established in 1874 and G. Smith, the first appointee, is still postmaster.

Traceyville.—Although just outside the limits of the borough of Honesdale, Traceyville had settlers long before the hemlocks and laurels at the confluence of the two branches of the Lackawaxen disappeared before the axes of the pioneers. The main settlements were at the mouth of Carley Brook, and at this point, it is stated on the authority of Esquire Thomas Spangenberg, there was, in 1794, a tub-mill built by Israel Kelly. So sparsely was the country inhabited at this time and so small the production of grain that the mill would not pay for the tending, and each pioneer came and ground his own corn. This old mill remained standing until the Honesdale Glass Company erected its works, and, when it was torn down, meal was found on some of the rafters that was ground perhaps during the first year of this century. In 1812 Stephen Kimble built a saw-mill on Carley Brook and ran it for many years. It was finally torn down in 1846, when Ephriam

V. White erected his axe-factory there. The latter business is one of the oldest in Wayne County, and was established soon after the summer of 1820. During that year E. V. White accompanied his father, who walked from Massachusetts to Wayne County. They first stopped at a small blacksmith shop in Damascus, and after a few months located at Mount Pleasant. In 1826 they moved to Dundaff, and from there came to Seelyville in 1835.

Three years after this a place on the road between Prompton and Honesdale was selected, and here the works were carried on until 1846, when the present location was secured. The founder of the industry was succeeded by his sons Gilbert G., Joseph and C. J., in 1857, under the firm name of G. White & Brothers, and the business was so conducted until 1862, when the brothers retired, and Gilbert White became sole owner. In 1872 R. W. Ham was admitted to a partnership, and the style assumed was G. White & Co., the firm which is now conducting the business. The present capacity of the works is twenty dozen axes a day, and between twenty and twenty-five men are employed.



About the beginning of the present century what was afterwards known as the Earl Mill was built just below where Saunders' tannery now stands. It was a very small affair, and did little until it was rebuilt by Mr. Earl in 1828. About 1849 it passed into the hands of Mr. Tracey for the Delaware and Hudson Company, and, after the destruction of the mill, the dam was retained as a reservoir for the Canal.

One of the early industries of the place was a small axe and scythe-shop, which John Bangs started near the site of the old tub-mill about 1832. It was afterwards closed, and what remained of the plant sold to the Whites.

The Honesdale Glass Works had their genesis at Bethany, where Christian Faatz, one of the first glass manufacturers in this county, commenced operations in 1816. After various vicissitudes related in the history of that town, the establishment passed into the hands of his son, Jacob Faatz, who removed the works to Traceyville in 1847, the first stake being driven on June 4th. During the next three years Mr. Faatz lost money, and, in 1840, Henry Dart and James R. Dickson became the owners. They made a large shipment of glass to California overland, and it was nearly a year on the way and seemed to be a dead loss, occasioning embarrassment which caused the works to pass into the hands of R. F. Lord and T. H. R. Tracey, who managed the business until they were succeeded by James Brookfield, who purchased the works in 1849, and engaged J. Sloan as his general manager. A number of improvements followed, and the next year Mr. Brookfield erected a store and a number of dwellings for the use of his employees. It was at this time that H. A. Clark erected a new dwelling and store, and Mr. Gilbert, of Oregon, made some improvements. Traceyville was a busy place, and during the next year the glass works employed between fifty and sixty men, and were making from eighteen to twenty thousand boxes of window-glass a year. Mr. Brookfield also had a shop for the manufacture of a patent pump.

During the great storm of 1861 the dam of a reservoir belonging to the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, far up the Carley Brook, gave way and carried the works of Mr. Brookfield into the river. For ten years nothing was done with the works, and then, under the firm name of The Honesdale Glass Works, Christian Dorflinger, W. W. Weston, C. S. Minor, William Weiss, W. H. Ham and S. A. Tyrrell bought the property and rebuilt the works. During this work of rebuilding, in 1873, the old tub-mill, the first industry of the place, was torn down to make room for one of the wings of the glass house. In former years the plant was used for the production of both bottle and window glass, but now only the latter is manufactured. The equipment consists of two five-pot furnaces, with a capacity of four tons daily, and facilities for shaping that much material, a saw-mill and a box-factory. Both steam and water-power are used, and the capacity of the works has been quadrupled since 1873. About one hundred and fifty hands are employed, and the annual disbursement for wages is over fifty thousand dollars.

In 1845 or 1846 Robert J. Knapp and Lewis M. Sears started a wheel-barrow-factory on Carley Brook, just above the axe-factory, and met with fair success. The business was carried on by this firm until April, 1864, when B. F. Frailey, a native of Ulster County, N. Y., bought the establishment and added to the plant machinery for the manufacture of hay rakes and other agricultural implements. The establishment now consists of a large saw-mill and factory driven by water-power, and makes a specialty of building lumber, boxes, wire mattress frames and agricultural implements.

Just above the upper bridge over Carley Brook is the tannery which Samuel Saunders built in 1858. It is a thirty vat plant, and ran full capacity until two years ago, when the heavy competition of the large establishments in the New England States absorbed the profit of smaller concerns. At present, the operations are limited to the pulling and pickling of sheep-skins, and dealing in hides and calf-skins. Just below the tannery is a large reservoir for the Delaware and Hudson Canal.

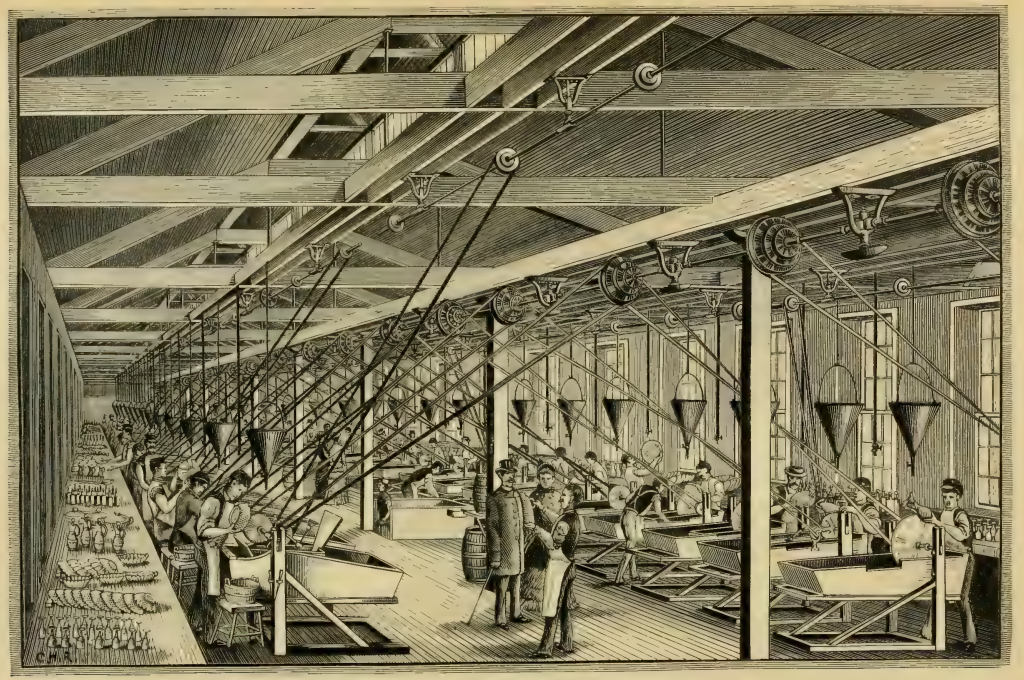
In 1822 or 1823, Benjamin F. Kimble, a son of Daniel Kimble, commenced a grist mill at Tracyville. It was of very primitive construction, and had one run of stone, which he brought from Easton, having rafted lumber to that point to pay for them. The mill was built almost entirely by Mr. Kimble's own hands, and its construction occupied him for nearly a year. In 1829, the mill was completely rebuilt, and its capacity was doubled; it did service until the new steam mill was erected. The old mill was burned in 1881. In the fall of 1868, J. P. Kimble, a son of Asa, went into business with Benjamin F. Kimble, and that year the steam mill was built. Later on, Wyman, a son of Benjamin F., succeeded to his father's interest, and, in 1876, sold it to J. P. Kimble, the present owner. The mill has four run of stone, and is driven by a forty horse-power engine. It does a thriving custom business. Benjamin F. Kimble married Prudence Vastbinder, and his children were, Ellen J. (Mrs. R. E. Bailey), Olive (Mrs. Jerry E. Hawker), Benjamin F., of Damascus, Wyman and Clarence, who live in Honesdale.

Leonardsville owes its name to John Leonard who settled there soon after the Delaware and Hudson Canal was finished, and commenced the building and repair of canal boats. The favorable location for this business soon led other good mechanics to locate near him, and for a number of years considerable business was done there. In 1835 Mr. Leonard built the dry dock, and ran it but a short time, when it passed into the hands of W. M. Turner, who did a thriving business until 1851, when James Pinkney bought it. It was operated under his direction until 1866, when Mr. C. C. Lane purchased it and has conducted the business up to the present time. The growth of Honesdale effectually killed the prosperity of Leonardsville, and little business beyond the dock is now carried on there. One of the earliest settlers was John Whittaker, who moved from Pike County in 1835, and erected the first frame house in the hamlet, near the site of his present residence. The school-house was built in 1839, and services are occasionally held there by several of the evangelical denominations.

A central figure in the history of Leonardsville, is that of Jabez Rockwell, whose grave is in the Methodist cemetery at Honesdale. He was born near the town of Ridgeway, Conn., October 3, 1761. When but little more than fifteen years old, he enlisted in a regiment that was recruiting under the supervision of Benedict Arnold, in whose division he fought at the battle of Saratoga, and was there wounded. He was afterwards transferred to a part of the army under General Putnam, near New York City, and later went under the direct command of Washington, and with him passed the winter at Valley Forge. During the following year Mr. Rockwell was wounded again, receiving a slight hurt at the battle of Monmouth, and after a short furlough returned to the ranks, and was at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. At the close of the war he returned to Connecticut, and on July 4, 1784, was married to Sarah Rundel. He emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1795, and located near the present site of Milford, in Pike County. He had seven children by his first wife, and one of them, Lewis, was the sheriff of Pike County from 1844 to 1847. Mrs. Anna Wells, the youngest child of that marriage, is still living at Milford, and celebrated her eighty-seventh birthday in March last, surrounded by all her children. In 1799 Mr. Rockwell was married a second time, Elizabeth Mulford, daughter of the third sheriff of Wayne County, becoming his bride. He had served as deputy under her father for three years. Seven children were born of this union also, some of whom are still living, Miss Sally Rockwell and Mrs. Catherine Broden, of Stroudsburg; Mrs. Gainford, of Ellenville; Mrs. Harrison Valentine, of New York, Henry Wells (of Milford), Edgar and Peter Wells (of Port Jervis), Moses B. Rockwell

(of Milford) and ex-Treasurer Charles F. Rockwell (of Honesdale), are grandchildren of the Revolutionary hero.

In 1824, accompanied by Samuel Whitehead and Joshua Hutchings, two companions-in-arms, Mr. Rockwell walked from Milford to New York, to see Lafayette, by whom they were warmly welcomed. The last years of Mr. Rockwell's life were spent in Leonardsville, to which village he moved in 1837. He died in January, 1847, and was buried with military and Masonic honors.



White Mills.—The first settler of whom there is any authentic record is Cornelius Corryelle, who came from Lambertville, N. J., and located on the farm now owned by Christian Dorflinger. He owned a large tract of land and was a man of much energy and enterprise, so that in a few years he had made a considerable inroad on the virgin forest that covered the entire region. Soon other settlers came, and, in the course of time, Daniel Kimble and Mr. Corryelle became jointly interested in the property adjacent to the site of the present saw-mill. This tract, as is stated in the records of the lawsuit before referred to, contained three acres, and was bought September 14, 1816. About the time that the transfer took place, Jonathan Brink, who owned the property adjoining them on the lower side, erected a dam, which caused the Lackawaxen to overflow the Kimble mill site, and render valueless the improvements that had already been made on the property. The facts in the case very ably set forth and, on trial of the case at the next sessions, the plaintiffs were successful, and were awarded damages. Brink removed the objectionable dam in a short time and the mill was commenced shortly after. In 1823 Daniel Parry came from New Hope, Bucks County, Pa., and bought the mill property, completing the structure which had been begun a few months previous. Lewis Corryelle, a son of Cornelius, was associated with him in this undertaking, the firm being Daniel Parry & Co. Although the owner of considerable property, Mr. Parry did not reside in White Mills, but had for the manager of his interests Enos Woodward, who built and laid out the handsome place now occupied by Hon. F. W. Farnham. About 1854 the mill property passed into the hands of Cornelius Hombert, and in 1854 was sold to Mr. Farnham, the present owner. It was then a double up and down mill, but, perceiving the great advantage to be derived from the change, the new owner converted it into a circular mill, one of the first successful ones in Wayne County, in 1857.

Enos Woodward, who carried on the business for Daniel Parry, was a son of John Woodward, and a grandson of Enos Woodward, the Revolutionary soldier. In 1836 he erected the house on the Farnham place, and two years later was elected county commissioner, in which office he was very popular. More concerning him will be found in the chapter devoted to Cherry Ridge.

Hon. F. W. Farnham came from Oxford, Shenango County, N. Y., in 1832, and in 1840 was united in marriage to Miss E. A. Gunn, of Oneida County in the same state. Three sons were born of this union, and reside near the homestead. In 1872 Mr. Farnham was appointed an associate judge of Wayne County, to fill out the unexpired term caused by the death of Judge Arnold, and filled the office much to the satifaction of the people.

The first frame house in the village proper was erected in 1846 by Daniel Kimble, and stands on the hill just beyond the glass works. It is now occupied by Patrick Slavin. B. F. Daniels opened the first store on the place in 1854. He occupied a small building near the canal lock, and conducted business there for two years. The post-office was established in 1850, and A. M. Atkinson was the first postmaster.

The Dorflinger Glass Works.—The large and interesting industry carried on by Christian Dorflinger & Sons at this place had its inception in 1865, the senior member of the present firm (of whom a biographical sketch is appended) being its founder. He began making glass in the fall of the year in what is known as a "five-pot furnace," and employed a small force of men. In the second year he had fully a hundred men and boys at work, and in 1867 he introduced a glass-cutting establishment, which was carried on in a small way and gave employment to half a dozen men. From the beginning even a careless observer would not have failed to notice that the proprietor of the glass works was a man of progressive ideas, for improvements were constantly made, and the capacity of the works gradually increased until the establishment was made, perhaps, the largest in the world. The works which have been in use for the past twenty years have just been supplemented by new ones built in the most substantial manner, and embodying every possible convenience which a life-long study of glass manufacture, coupled with a high degree of ingenuity, could suggest. What are now called the "old works" comprise a "glass-house," in which the furnaces are located and the various forms of glassware are blown by the workmen, and a cutting room, now used for packing and other purposes. The glass-house proper is one hundred by fifty feet in dimensions, and contains two seven-pot furnaces, a finishing furnace, and two annealing ovens. The building in which the cutting-room is located is one hundred and seventy-six by forty feet, and two stories high. There is also a three-story wing, eighty by thirty-five feet, and a building in which the great glass crucibles or pots are made, which is thirty by fifty feet. These figures give some idea of the space which has been necessary for carrying on the complicated manufacture, but the dimensions of the new works show how materially, in view of increasing business, it has been deemed advisable to enlarge the plant. The new glass-house is quite an imposing structure, fifty to sixty feet high and eighty feet long by sixty in width. A basement built of iron and stone extends under the whole building. This house contains one eight-pot furnace, three annealing ovens and other devices essential to the work to be carried on there. The building in which the new cutting-room is located, is three stories in height, one hundred and sixty feet long by thirty-five in width built in solid fashion of stone and made fire-proof throughout. There is a seventy-five horse-power engine on the second floor which turns the hundred or more wheels in the cutting-room, and has been made by thoughtfulness to perform some other work.

To this cutting-room from whence comes the flashing, chaste and beautiful ware, which now more than ever, is fascinating the artistic and fashionable world, we shall in due time return. For the present let the reader take a glance at the genesis of glass.

The process of manufacture savors a little of magic, or at least the marvelous, for who, without previous knowledge, looking at a pile of sand, another of oxide of lead, and a third of pearl ash, would imagine that such coarse, opaque, and sodden materials could be transformed by fire into the most transparent, glittering flint glass. Yet such is the fact. The workmen in the mixing room take, for instance, six hundred pounds of sand (it is from Berkshire county, Massachusetts, and nowhere else is found so good) with which he mixes four hundred pounds of oxide of lead, and two hundred pounds of pearl ash. To this compound he adds very small proportions of saltpetre, arsenic and manganese, and the whole, well stirred together, goes into one of the pots or crucibles set in a huge furnace of terrific heat. These pots hold from fifteen hundred to three thousand pounds. The mass is subjected to the influence of the roaring fire for forty hours, and then the "metal," as it is called, is ready for the deft manipulations of the skilled blowers, who hover about the furnace, and remove small portions of it at intervals upon long tubes or "blowers' pipes," something as a child might boiling sugar upon a stick. The glass blower handles his long tube as a fairy, or at least a columbine, does her wand, and with more of marked and marvelous result. His graceful sweeps and twirlings of the rod are not for appearance, but for practical effect in giving the bit of molten glass some peculiar desired shape, dependent upon whether it is to be a bottle, a pitcher, a punch-bowl, a wine-glass, or any one of a hundred other things. He swings the tube, blows through it carefully, expanding the red-hot bubble to the proper proportion, rolls it upon an iron plate, revolves the rod while he holds a tool against the pliant mass to give it form, heats it again and repeats the process, or delicately and rapidly touches it with two or three other tools, perhaps being assisted by a "helper" in some of these rapid manœuvres—and lo! the shapeless lump has become a wine decanter or a salad dish, or something else of most graceful form. Then away it goes to the finishing furnace, and finally to the annealing furnace, where, with hundreds of other pieces, it is very gradually cooled by being drawn slowly from the fire through fifty or sixty feet of brick arching. The whole process is more in the nature of an exquisite art, with something of sorcery about it, than a trade or manufacture. Yet it is hard work, and has more of utility in it than of the poetic or picturesque, for the busy groups of skilled men surrounding the furnaces. Their tools are simple —a few rude iron implements, a stick, a heavy, uncouth pair of iron shears, and his blow-pipe, are all that the glass-blower needs to perform his wonders. His work must be done while the glass is hot, and so there is intense activity, relieved only by the occasional waiting for the reheating of a half-formed object.

The greater portion of the glass manufactured here is white, or rather transparent. If color is desired it is made by throwing in various minerals. To produce the beautiful ruby color, which is so much admired by connoisseurs in glass, gold must be used, and into a pot of the sand and lead and potash mixture is thrown a hundred and forty dollars worth of the virgin yellow metal.

Even the construction of the pots in which the glass is made is an art and mystery, and requires knowledge and skill which only a very few workmen possess. At the Dorflinger works they are made in a long, low room—heretofore mentioned—which is kept at an equal temperature, that the great dome-shaped crucibles may become thoroughly seasoned or dried. The clay for their manufacture comes principally from Germany, though an article from Missouri is used with some success. This clay, properly moistened, is kneaded in a huge box by a man with bared feet, who treads it back and forth with peculiar sidelong steps, ten hours a day, for three weeks. No machinery has been invented which can take the place of this odd method in giving the clay the required tenacity. Another man builds up the pots in lots of eight, very much as a rubble house is built, making his circular wall of clay a few inches high, and then awaiting the drying process before carrying the wall higher. The pots are four feet high. It takes about three weeks to build a set of eight; often the clay is kneaded three days to heat them, and then they last but three months in the intense heat of the furnace.

From the glass-house the various objects or "blanks," as they are technically termed—decanters, bottles, bowls—a hundred styles of ornamental and useful dishes are taken to the cutting-room. They have the grace of shape, but lack the lustre and brilliancy that cutting will give. A hundred workmen are ready to make them flash and gleam with prismatic light. Here again the tools are simple—the skill of the workmen everything. A long shaft, running through the narrow room, whirls a hundred wheels placed in frames down each side of the well-lighted work-shop. At each one sits an operator. Many of them are young, scarcely beyond boyhood, but young eyes are good for the kind of work that is done here. The men work in three divisions, and there are three distinct processes in the cutting. First comes the "roughing," the deep cutting or grinding of the pattern, of which the principal points have first been marked upon the glass with red paint, For this work a thin iron wheel, to which sand and water are applied, is employed. The workman needs perfect eyesight, perfect nerves and much skill of hand, for the pattern must be cut with geometric precision. The second process, "smoothing," is done with fine, stone wheels, of which, as of the iron ones, there are a great variety for different kinds of work. From the "smoothers" the articles are passed to the polishers, who use wheel-brushes and wooden wheels, kept constantly smeared with what looks like yellow mud, but is in reality a compound of finely-ground oxide of zinc and lead called "putty." These leave the deeply cut lines and the facets of the glass as smooth as diamonds and almost equaling them in brilliancy of glitter and purity of light.

After careful washing the finished goods are taken to the stock or show-room, or shipped to the New York or Philadelphia market. In the show-room alluded to, in comparatively small space, may be seen from forty to fifty thousand dollars' worth of this beautiful ware, and upon a single table there is over three thousand dollars' worth. The variety of articles is almost bewildering, and there is also wide variance in the styles of cutting. There are ice cream and salad sets in the cut known as "the Parisian" vases, fancy dishes and bon bons in the "hob-nail" cut with double star, punch-bowls, etc., in the "brilliante" cut, with glass-handled ladles to match, and cut-glass, table-bells in various colors, which give forth a very musical tinkle. Special mention should be made of the Russian stem-ware and the line of elegant lamps, cut-glass throughout, with dome shades. There are also flower-vases, decanters, water bottles, jugs (the new "tusk" and "Flemish" styles particularly), cologne bottles and other vessels in almost endless profusion. These goods are comprised in those general lines or classes known as "rich-cut table and toilet glass, "druggist's" and "lamp goods." Almost daily new designs are brought out and new ones found for cut-glass, and the taste of the public for this elegant line of things useful and things beautiful is fast growing, so that the demand promises to be much larger than heretofore.

Since 1881 Mr. Dorflinger's sons, William, Louis J., and Charles, have been in partnership with him, and each one occupies a position of practical usefulness in the management of the large business. William is at the store of the firm, No. 36 Murray Street, New York, Louis J., and Charles at the works, the former residing at Honesdale.

The works give employment to about three hundred persons, and the pay-roll amounts to ten thousand dollars or thereabouts per month, a sum sufficient to support (as it does almost entirely) the village of White Mills.

CHRISTIAN DORFLINGER, the founder and contracting genius of these works, is one of the vast number of foreign birth whose energies and skill have contributed to the sum of America's prosperity. He was born in the Canton De Bitsche, in Alsace, France, March 16, 1828. His parents were Francis and Charlotte (Clemens) Dorflinger. He early left them to join an uncle over the line in the province Loraine, city of St. Louis, where he learned the trade of glass-making in one of the largest establishments in Europe. He remained there eight years, becoming a master in his chosen art, and then, desiring a field for more independent action and broader achievement, decided to come to America. This was in 1845. His father had died, and he brought his mother and other members of the family with him. They removed to the West, where his mother is still living, and the young man who is our subject went to Philadelphia, where he worked as a journeyman glass-blower. In 1852 he removed to Brooklyn, where he established the Long Island Flint Glass Works, a comparatively small concern, having what is known as a five-pot furnace. His first year's business amounted to thirty thousand dollars; the third year's to fifty thousand dollars. In 1858 he built a new factory at a cost of thirty thousand dollars, and, in 1860, a second one at a cost of seventy-five thousand dollars. He then carried on both, and did a business amounting to three hundred thousand dollars per year. The latter establishment, known as the Green Point Glass Works (in Brooklyn, E. D.), he still owns, and leases to E. P. Gleason. Mr. Dorflinger conducted both factories until 1863, when he sold the one first built—the Long Island works, and, with a view of partial retirement from business and of establishing a summer retreat, came to the picturesque banks of the Lackawaxen, and bought of Captain Fowler the three hundred-acre tract of land east of White Mills, which formed the nucleus of his present estate of about one thousand one hundred and fifty acres. This step, taken with a view of seeking rest, resulted in larger activity, and ultimately in the great establishment of to-day. He came out to his farm-home again in 1864, and in the spring of 1865 began building a glass-factory, in which an industry, entirely new to this half-wild region, was begun in the fall of that year. The story of the development of the works, from the first pot-furnace to their present extent, has already been told. It is a story involving the persistent applications of thorough, practical knowledge and of business acumen. But Mr. Dorflinger's energies were not confined to the management of the works and their improvement. He built seven dwellings the first year that he carried on business here, erected a hotel in 1867 and his present dwelling (suggesting by its appearance the easy hospitality for which it is widely known) in 1870. Altogether, he has built in the vicinity of the factory seventy-five houses, and he has aided many of his operatives to make houses by advancing them money. He now owns about fifty houses. His interest in the welfare of his employees has been manifested in various ways, and he liberally aided local institutions for their benefit.

Mr. Dorflinger is not pronounced in politics or dogmatically assertive in religion, yet holds intelligent and thoughtfully-constructed opinions on these and other topics of vital interest. His energies have been largely absorbed by the building up of what is probably the largest glass-works of the kind in America, if not in the world. There is a generous proportion of domesticity in his nature, and he has found relief from extensive and intricate business cares in the comfort and cheer afforded by his family, the oldest members of which have been for several years his aids as well as companions. He was married in Brooklyn, April 25, 1852, to Miss Elizabeth Hagen, a native of New York. Their children are William F., Louis J., Charles H., Mary E., Nellie J., Katharine and Lottie.

CHURCHES AND SCHOOLS.—It is very difficult to determine when and by whom the first religious services were held, as the gatherings were very informal, no records were made, and most of those who participated have passed to another world. Among the early workers in the field were (presumably) Rev. Joseph Seely, the Methodist clergyman first to set foot in Seelyville, Elder Peck, of Mount Pleasant, Elder Curtis, of Clinton, and Elder Chase, of Damascus. The three latter gentlemen were frequent visitors at Daniel and Walter Kimbles', and Cornelius Corryelle's, and on pleasant Sunday afternoons a handful of hardy men and women assembled to hear the Word of God, and listen to exhortation to a higher, holier life. Before 1811, the old plank school-house at Indian Orchard was built, and after that, meetings were held once in two months, or oftener. Mr. Henry Bishop, of Berlin, who is now in his ninetieth year, says that the meetings here were the first that he can remember, except those held in private houses. This was the first school-house in the territory now included in the limits of Texas township, and Robert Beardslee was one of the first teachers employed there. This school was supported by private subscription, and under the school law passed in 1809, the county commissioners were obliged to return the names of all the children whose parents were too poor to pay for their schooling, and have them taught in the regular subscription schools. The bills were made out by the teacher for the stationery he had supplied, as well as the tuition, and when this had been approved by the trustees, if there were any, otherwise by three citizens, subscribers of the school, and duly sworn to, an order for the amount was drawn by the commissioners. One of the first bills presented under this law was that of Robert Beardslee. It is for the schooling of Abraham, Altram and Roger Haynes, and tuition and board together bring the amount to $12.91. The bill is approved by Ben. Kimble, Walter Kimble and Thomas Schoonover. It is an interesting fact, attested by this signature, that both names have undergone orthographic change since that time. Walter Kimble signed himself Kimbale, and Mr. Schoonover wrote his name as Schoonhover. In 1835 or 1836, the old school-house on the road to Bethany was built on land that is now included in the Seely orchard, at Seelyville. Who first taught there is not now known, but a number of men who have since become prominent in the county, sat on its pegged seats and wrestled with the three R's. The school-house at Leonardsville was built in 1839, and has since been the place at which occasional religious meetings are held.

Until 1857, a district school was the only educational facility afforded to the people of Seelyville. This was first held in the old log school-house that stood in Col. Seely's orchard, and, in 1842, was moved to a frame building, now occupied by Mrs. Margaret Bissle as a residence. The latter building was used until 1858, when the present graded school was completed. Seelyville was made an independent district the preceding year, and Prof. W. G. Trim, now of Jermyn, was the first teacher. After serving faithfully for fourteen years, he gave place to Miss E. J. Avery, who in turn was succeeded by Mr. W. T. Butler, the present incumbent. In 1885, about one hundred scholars were enrolled.

The early records of Texas school district have not been preserved, and few details of the early history of free education are known. The first election return on record is that of 1839, two years after the erection of the township, and no school directors appear in the list. The following were elected after that time:

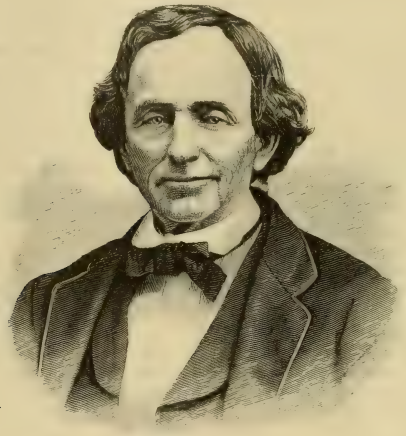
1864.—Gilbert White, Henry Winter, John Hennigan (one year).
1865.—John Hennigan, William Dodge.
1866.—Lewis M. Sears, Walter Beardslee.
1867.—James C. Birdsall, Samuel Saunders.
1868.—John Hennigan, John Schriner.
1869.—Lewis M. Sears, J. E. Mandeville.
1870.—John Hennigan, John Gallagher.
1872.—Jacob Laus, Richard Bryant.
1873.—Eugene Dorflinger, Gilbert White.
1874.—John Hennigan, Samuel Saunders.
1875.—Robert E. Bailey, Albert B. Ward.
1876.—Wyman Kimble, Andrew Coar.

The Texas school district has nine buildings, and last year five hundred and forty pupils were enrolled. The tax levied amounted to $3,310.80, of which amount, one thousand dollars was for building purposes. Twelve teachers are employed, and the township will bear a fair comparison with others in the county. The present directors are Philip Ryan, president; Michael Heermann, Treasurer; J. Adam Kraft, secretary; Samuel H. Brown, Lawrence McGuiness and Fred. Horst.

BIOGRAPHICAL.



DAVID BUNNELL.

David Bunnell (1783–1855), a native of Middle Smithfield, Monroe County, Pa., came from Wallpack, N. J., in 1804 and settled at Bethany, Pa. on the place now owned by William Stephens, where he erected the residence found there in 1886. On March 5, 1805, he married Parthenia Kellam (1786–1875), of Palmyra, Pike County, and removed to his new home at Bethany, Wayne County. He was a blacksmith by trade, and is said to have been the first of that trade to settle at that place. He cleared much of the timber from his farm, and carried on blacksmithing in the shop which he built in settling there, while he resided at Bethany. There being meager accommodations for strangers visiting the place at court-time, Bethany being then the county seat, he used to accommodate boarders at his house on these special occasions. For many years he served as justice of the peace. Both himself and wife were members of the Baptist Church at Bethany, and their generous hospitality, intelligence and support of every good work, are remembered by those now surviving, who were their neighbors. In 1839 he sold his property at Bethany, and, with his sons (Henry, Pike and John K.), bought some seven hundred and fifty acres, mostly a wild tract of land, partly in Dyberry, and partly in Texas townships, upon which he settled. For one summer he resided on the most improved part of it, where his son, Pike, afterwards resided, in Dyberry township, and he erected in 1840, the present residence of his son John K. Bunnell, at Bunnell's Pond, on another part of this tract in Texas township, to which he removed, and at the outlet of this pond with his sons, the same year he erected a saw-mill, and began lumbering and clearing off their land, and fitting the soil for crops. Fifteen years after this David Bunnell died. His wife survived him twenty years, and died at the residence of her daughter, Eunice B., at Bethany. Both were interred at Honesdale. Their children are as follows: Rockwell, born April 2, 1806, survives in 1886 and resides at Prompton, Pa.; Eleanor (1807–1843), was the wife of Isaac Olmstead and resided at Bethany; Eunice B., born January 6, 1810, now deceased, was the wife of Brooks Lavo, of Bethany; (1811–1872); Zebulon Montgomery Pike (1813–1856); Charles F. (1815–1868), resided in Oxford, N. Y., where he died; John Kellam, born January 14, 1817; Sarah E., born December 11, 1820, is the wife of Rev. Gilbert Bailey, D.D., of California; David S., born November 19, 1821, is a contractor in Philadelphia; Harriet A., born May 21, 1824, died a young woman; Abigail Jane, born October 9, 1826, is the widow of William Stockdale, who was a merchant of Springfield, Ill.

Henry Bunnell, second son of David, was born at Bethany, October 17, 1811, had the usual opportunities for an English education, with other boys, at his native place, but was taught in early life that industry, economy and a purpose in life, are necessary elements of character to succeed in business and to make a good citizen. In 1836 he married Amanda Page, at Harford, Pa., and for some time after his marriage resided at Montrose, Pa. About 1839 he joined his father and brothers in the purchase of the large tract of land herein referred to, and from that time until his death made his home on a portion of it, at Bunnell's Pond. He was more largely engaged in lumbering than farming, and in 1860, after the great freshet that swept away the old saw-mill, he built another upon the same site, also a tannery, and he also erected the pleasant residence now occupied by his widow, adjacent to the saw-mill grounds. Many years ago he purchased a timber tract in Oregon township of five hundred acres, upon which he erected a saw-mill, and, after carrying on the lumber business there for several years, he sold the property to William Penwarden, giving him ample time for payment. Mr. Penwarden was then a man without wealth, and, by the timely aid of Mr. Bunnell, got a start for his present large fortune. During Mr. Bunnell's life-time the families were very intimate friends.

Henry Bunnell was a man of large business capacity, a friend to the poor man, and always ready to lend them any assistance that would better their condition, and he sought to fulfil the full duties of the citizen. He was a member of the Baptist Church at Honesdale, to which he gave liberally, and was active in the work of the church. His wife died in 1853. Their children are David Montgomery, residing at Bunnell's Pond, owns the saw-mill, and, in 1869, built a grist-mill near it on the site of the tannery, which had been built by his father about 1860, and was burned in 1869; Louise Priscilla, died at the age of twenty years; George F., deceased; Mary E., wife of Romain Bump, of Kansas; William H., deceased; Calvin P., resides at Tanner's Falls; and Amanda (1853–1880), who was the wife of John Bellamy.

Henry Bunnell married for his second wife, in 1855, Lydia A. Schofield, who died in 1859, leaving children,— Judson Willard, a merchant of Honesdale, and Irving Washington Bunnell, of Aldenville, Pa. His third wife, who survives him in 1886, and causes his engraving to be placed in this work, whom he married in September 26, 1861, is Mary, a daughter of Gershom Bunnell (1804–1869), and Anna C. Bergstrasser, born in 1808, and now survives, of Wallpack, N. J., to which place Henry, father of Gershom Bunnell, removed from Middle Smithfield, Pa., with his family about 1808. This Henry Bunnell was a brother of David Bunnell, who settled at Bethany in 1804, and their ancestry may be further traced in an account written by Thomas G. Bunnell, editor of the New Jersey Herald, at Newton, N. J., and published in the history of Sussex County, of that State, by Everts & Peck. Mary Bunnell was born in August, 1834, and, by her marriage to Henry Bunnell, has children,—Edward Elmer, William Fletcher, Ida Belle, Harry Horatio and Elory Pike Bunnell.

John Kellam Bunnell, fifth son of David and Parthenia (Kellam) Bunnell, was born in Bethany, Wayne County, Pa., January 14, 1817, and was the youngest of the three sons who joined their father in the purchase of the large tract of land in 1839, herein described.

In common with all the children of this large family, he in early life became inured to hard work, and learned from the best of tutors—his parents—that those who succeed in life must lay the foundation for success in their industry, correct habits, energy and good judgment. All these things John K. Bunnell observed in boyhood, and added to them such an education from books as the school of his native place afforded.

J. K. Bunnell

He succeeded to one hundred and eighty acres of land of this purchase at Bunnell's Pond, upon which is the residence built by his father and sons in 1840. Besides engaging in the general clearing up and improvement of this farm, and in the construction of suitable buildings thereon for farm purposes, he has for over twenty years past given his attention to dairying, selling the products of his dairy, in milk, in Honesdale and vicinity.

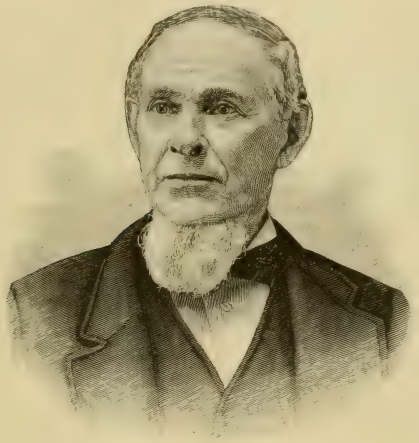
He averages to keep on this farm from twenty-five to thirty-five well-bred dairy cows, and by excellent care of his stock, and good quality of fodder supplied them, he has been able to furnish his patrons the richest quality of milk. It is safe to class Mr. Bunnell along with the intelligent farmers of Wayne County in everything that pertains to agriculture and dairying. He has served his township (Texas) as supervisor and been otherwise officially identified with its interests, and he has for many years served on the board of trustees of the Methodist Church at Honesdale, of which both himself and wife have been members for over thirty-five years. He married in 1841, Ann S., a daughter of John and Joanna (Spettigue) Bronscombe, who is a native of Devonshire, near Cornwall, England, born on New Year's Day, 1823. John Bronscombe (1790–1863) and his wife, Joanna Spettigue (1788–1858) came with their family to Berlin township, Wayne County, from England in 1830, resided there eleven years, and then settled at Bunnell's Pond where they died. He was a well-educated man, was a teacher for many years before coming to this country, and here, was almost invariably selected as clerk at the polls on election day, and on other occasions when accuracy, neatness and dispatch in business were necessary. The other children of John Bronscombe are Rev. Henry Bronscombe, an eminent clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church for forty-four years in Pennsylvania, and Elizabeth, wife of Seth G. Whiting, of Colebrook, Conn. The children of John K. and Ann S. Bunnell are Carrie Amelia, wife of Oliver W. Stanton, of Tunkhannock, Pa.; Hattie E., wife of Henry Webb, a farmer at Bethany; Frank C., a farmer in Texas township; Emma E., wife of Charles R. Brady, D. D. S., of Honesdale; and John Kellam Bunnell at home. One son, George G., born in 1844, died in 1863, and another, William B. Bunnell, born in 1847, died in 1860.



WILLIAM L. FERGUSON.

William L. Ferguson was born in Barnet township, Caledonia County, Vt., July 9, 1818. His father, James Ferguson, born in Glasgow, Scotland, August 16, 1771, came to Barnet at the age of thirteen years, with his mother, a brother (Alexander) and sister. The mother married again a Mr. McIndoe, and resided at McIndoes, on the Connecticut River, and died at her son Alexander's, at Lyman, New Hampshire, at nearly one hundred years of age. James was a farmer in Barnet, married Margaret, daughter of Andrew Lackie of the same place, who was born July 12, 1788, and died April 14, 1878. He reached the remarkably great age of one hundred years and nearly six months, dying February 4, 1872. Both himself and wife belonged to the Presbyterian Church, and reared their children under Christian influences. Their children were James, a farmer of Barnet township Vt.; William L.; Alexander, a millwright, went West; and Jennette, wife of Alexander Summers, of Barnet.

William L. Ferguson was reared on the home-farm and became inured to hard work. His early education was confined to the district school. At the age of seventeen he left home to carve out a fortune for himself, and, traveling some two hundred miles to the north of the White Mountains, through a wilderness country, with his pack on his back, reached Bangor, Me., where he was engaged as a carpenter on the Bangor and Old Town Railroad for one summer in building bridges and culverts. He was also engaged, in like manner, on the Boston and Lowell Railroad a few years afterwards. He further prosecuted his book education at Newbury and Concord academies, and by faithful effort was soon found proficient enough to be a teacher, and taught for several terms in Vermont. In 1839 he left his native State, came to Wayne County, Pa., and for several winter terms taught school in various places in the county. As a boy he had made the acquaintance of Miss Laura L., daughter of Oliver T. and Martha (Dutton) Spalding, who was born in Waterford township, Vt., June 16, 1831. Their school-day acquaintance ripened as years went on, and on December 7, 1853, they were married at Lowell, Mass., and immediately settled in Dyberry township, Wayne County. Here he engaged in farming and lumbering. He continued there in the lumber business for five years, rafting his lumber from the headwaters of Dyberry Creek to Honesdale, thence down the Lackawaxen to its confluence with the Delaware, and via that water route to Philadelphia, the great market for the large quantities of lumber of Eastern Pennsylvania.

In 1858 he removed to Cherry Ridge township, at what is now called Collins' Mills, and was there engaged in manufacturing and shipping lumber for twelve years. In 1870 he settled in Equinunk, and continued for fifteen years more in the same business. He was therefore engaged in the lumber trade in Wayne County for a period of thirty-two years, and is well known throughout this section of the State as an active and thorough-going business man. In 1885 Mr. Ferguson settled at Seelyville and retired from active business. While a resident of Buckingham and Dyberry townships he served several terms as school director, and he also served as supervisor of the former township. Mr. Ferguson was originally identified with the Democratic party, but allied himself with the Republican party soon after its organization. His children are Harvey H., of Mount Pleasant township, and Elmer E. and Flora, at home. Mrs. Ferguson's father died in Waterford, where he had spent his life, a farmer, in 1859, aged sixty-two years, and her mother died four years later, at the age of sixty-one years. Their children are Sophronia, wife of Nathaniel Olcott, of Concord, Vt.; John W., of St. Johnsbury, Vt.; Laura L.; Curtis R., of Lunenburgh, Vt.; and Martha Jane, wife of Samuel P. Kneeland, a civil engineer in the South, who served in the laying out and construction of railroads during the late Civil War; and one son, Oliver T. Spalding, Jr., who died a young man, in 1863.

HISTORY OF PIKE COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

Civil History—Taxables in 1814—Erection of the County—Public Buildings—Effort to Remove Seat of Justice to Blooming Grove—Lists of County Officials.

A VERY considerable portion of the history of Pike County is contained in the first section of this volume—the first seven chapters, which apply to the territory herein treated, as a whole, and in Chapter I. of that portion of the work devoted to the history of Wayne County (of which Pike was an integral part from 1798 to 1814). The county was erected by an act approved March 26, 1814, and then included a portion of what is now Monroe, and which was set off in 1836.

There is some early documentary history pertaining to Pike County which is of interest, and has not heretofore been given publicity.

The old township of Upper Smithfield was practically co-extensive with the county as at present constituted, and, therefore, we present the record of the earliest action tending toward the settling of that township, which contains the names of the most prominent residents in 1750.

Petition for township in what afterward became Upper Smithfield.

"To the whershipful (worshipful) the Judges of the Court of General Sessions, held at Newton, in the County of Bucks, the 4th day Dec., 1750. The petition of the inhabitants of Minisink and others humbly sheweth, That, whereas, your petitioners in general are the remotest livers from the Honorable Court, and on account of the want of a road, not only the inhabitants, your petitioners, are sufferers, when . . . requires them heard down to or above Andrew Dingman's, to whose place on Delaware there is already a road laid out, distant from the upper inhabitants about 15 miles; and whereas, it is evident that a road, although laid out according to law, is little regarded unless included under a township, your petitioners humbly pray that there (their) case may be taken into consideration; that a road be ordered to be laid out from near Tunis Madock's in[1] Delaware, to Andrew Dingman's aforesaid, and a township to be bounded by Bushkill on the south, to which creek there is a township, by Delaware (river) on east, and by land belonging to the . . . the N. and W.—and your pets. (petitioners).

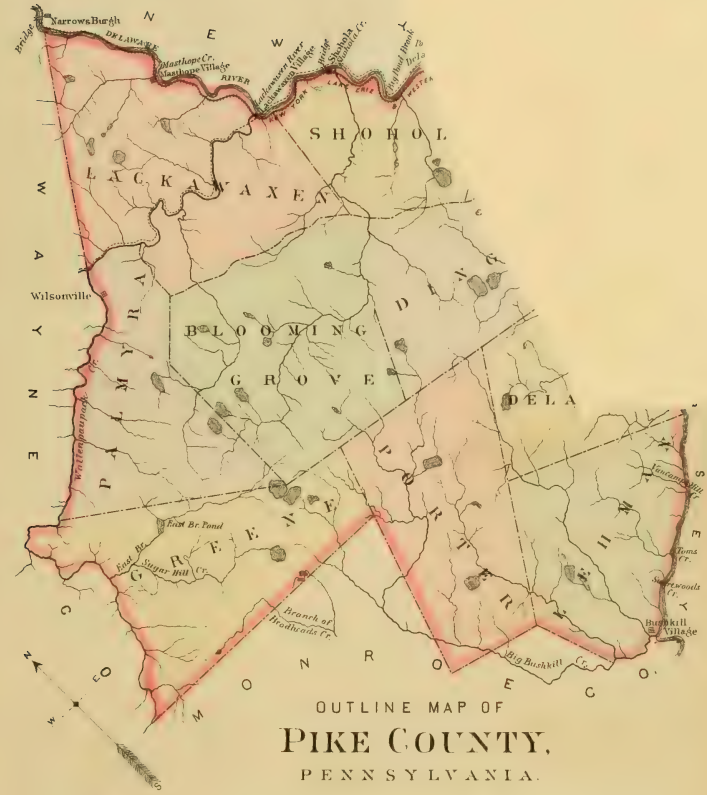
Teman Middagh.	Andrew Dingman.



"As to the twt. (township), it is ordered that the pets. (petitioners) do exhibit a Plan of the twpt., as they propose it to the next court that the court may be better judge thereof."

As Upper Smithfield appears in the list of townships in 1752, it would appear that it was erected about the same time that Northampton county was.

The following petition for the division of Upper Smithfield township, which then included nearly all of Pike County, appears on the Road Book of Northampton County in 1766:

"Upon the petition of divers Inhabitants of the township of Upper Smithfield, setting forth that the said petitioners labor under great inconveniences upon the account of the largeness of the said township, which renders it inconvenient and expensive for the Inhabitants to assemble upon the necessary business of the township: Praying the Court to divide the said township, and for that purpose to appoint proper persons to make such division, whereupon it is considered

These viewers probably favored the division, as Delaware appears among the townships thereafter.

The following is a list of the taxables in Upper Smithfield and Delaware townships (which then included nearly all of that part of Pike County which was then inhabited) for 1781:

ERECTION OF THE COUNTY.—The causes which led to the erection of Pike County have already been set forth (in Chapter I. of Wayne County), and we therefore present here without comment, that it would otherwise need, the act of the Legislature, which brought the county into existence, approved March 26, 1814.

"An ACT erecting part of Wayne County into a Separate County.

"SEC. I. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authorities of the same. That all that part of Wayne County lying South and east of a direct line from the lower end of Big Eddy, on Delaware river, to the mouth of Wallenpaupack Creek and thence up the same to the main forks thereof, thence up the South branch to where the most Southern branch crosses the North and South road, from thence due west to the line of Luzerne County, be and the same is hereby declared to be erected into a county, henceforth to be called Pike.

"SEC. II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the inhabitants of the said county of Pike, from and after the first day of October next, shall be entitled to and at all times thereafter, shall have all and singular, the courts, jurisdictions, offices, rights and privileges to which the inhabitants of the counties of other States are entitled by the constitution and laws of this commonwealth, excepting that there shall be but two Courts of Common Pleas and general quarter sessions held in and for said county of Pike in each year.

"SEC. III. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That from and after the first Monday of October next the Courts of Common Pleas and general quarter sessions in and for the said county of Pike shall be opened and held at such house as may be designated by the Commissioners of said county to be elected at the next general election in the town of Milford, in the county of Pike, until a Court-House shall be erected in and for said county, as hereinafter directed, and shall then be held at said Court-House.

"SEC. IV. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no suit or prosecution which has been heretofore commenced, or which shall be commenced at the Courts of the County of Wayne before the first Monday of October next, shall be delayed, discontinued or affected by this act, but the same shall be completed and carried into execution by the Sheriff and Coroner of Wayne County, as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. V. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all taxes or arrears of taxes laid, or which have become due within the said county of Pike, before the passing of this act, and all sums of money due to this commonwealth for militia fines in the said county of Pike, shall be collected and recorded as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. VI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the county of Wayne, on the second Monday of November next, to make out a statement exhibiting the amount of taxes levied before the passage of this act, and not paid in, and the monies in the treasury, collected for taxes levied as aforesaid, and shall deduct from said amount all debts due from said county at this time, and after ascertaining the surplus funds, shall direct their treasurer to pay over to the treasurer of the county of Pike, when appointed, one-half thereof, deducting therefrom the lawful expense of collecting the same: provided always, that if the said surplus shall not all at that time have been received into the treasury, the said treasurer shall make payment as aforesaid, only on such part as has been received, and shall thereafter render to the treasurer of the county of Pike, within one year, a regular statement of all expenses for collecting, and pay over the one-half thereof, as aforesaid.

"SEC. VII. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the sheriff, coroner and other officers of the county of Wayne, shall continue to exercise the duties of their respective offices within the county of Pike, until similar officers shall be appointed agreeably to law, within said county.

"SEC. IX. And be it further enacted, etc., That John K. Woodward be, and he is hereby authorized and required, to run and mark the division line between the counties of Wayne and Pike, and shall, on the second Monday in September next, commence the said line at the lower end of Big Eddy, on Delaware river, and run thence according to the true intent and meaning of this act, or in case of the death, removal or inability of the said John K. Woodward, then and in such case the vacancy so caused shall be supplied by the Commissioners of the county of Wayne and Pike, for which service he shall be paid at the rate of three dollars per diem, with the necessary expenses, out of the treasury of the county of Wayne.

"SEC. X. And be it further enacted, etc., That when the division line shall divide a township, the part of the township thus divided which shall remain in Wayne county shall be a township, and the part of the township thus divided which shall be in the county of Pike shall be a township, and each part shall retain its original name until the same shall be altered by the courts of general quarter sessions of the said counties respectively.

"SEC. XI. And be it further enacted, etc., That the several election districts which shall be in the county of Pike, which were erected before the passage of this act, be and the same are hereby erected into election districts for the county of Pike, and that the townships of Salem, Palmyra and Lackawaxen be and they are hereby erected into a separate election district, and the electors thereof shall hold their elections at the house of Ephraim Kimble, in Palmyra township.

"SEC. XII. And be it further enacted, etc., That the inhabitants of the county of Wayne, and of the county of Pike, shall elect members of Congress and members of the legislature of this commonwealth, and shall hold their elections in the same mode, under the same legislations, and make return in the same manner as is directed by the laws of this commonwealth, for conducting and making returns of the elections of the county of Wayne; provided always, that the returns from the several election districts in the county of Wayne shall, instead of being transmitted directly to Easton, as heretofore, be, on the Saturday next after such election, forwarded to the Seat of Justice of the County of Pike, there to be received by a person appointed in the same manner and for the same purposes as is at the time of passing this act provided by law for transmitting election returns for the county of Wayne to the Court-House in the borough of Easton.

"SEC. XIII. And be it further enacted, etc., That the governor be and he is hereby authorized and required, after the first day of June next ensuing, to appoint three discreet and disinterested persons, not resident in the counties of Northampton, Wayne or Lehigh, whose duty it shall be to fix upon a proper and convenient site for a Court-House, prison and county offices, within the aforesaid county of Pike, as near the centre thereof as circumstances will admit, having regard to convenience of roads, territory, population and the accommodation of the people of the said county generally, and said persons, or a majority of them, having viewed the relative advantages of the several situations contemplated by the people, shall, on or before the first day of August next, by a written report under their hands, or a majority of them, certify, describe and limit the site or lot of land which they shall have chosen for the purpose aforesaid, and shall transmit the said report to the governor of this shall direct their treasurer to pay over to the treasurer of the county of Pike, in four equal quarterly payments, the sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars.

"SEC. XVI. And be it further enacted, etc., That the judges of the Supreme Court shall have like powers, jurisdictions and authorities within the said county of Pike as by law they are vested with and entitled to have and exercise in other counties of this State, and the said county is hereby annexed to the eastern district of the Supreme Court.

"SEC. XVII. And be it further enacted, etc., That the county of Pike, after the 1st of October next, shall be and is hereby attached to and made a part of the eleventh judicial district, and after the present year the courts of Quarter Sessions and Common Pleas in said district shall be held as follows, to wit: . . . in the county of Pike on the third Mondays of January, April, August and November.[1]

THE COURTS.—The first court "in and for the county of Pike" was held in the house latterly occupied by Mrs. Lee, in a room of good size up-stairs, and the county offices were crowded into the same house. The earliest entry that can be found upon the oldest book of records in existence is that of a court December 6, 1814, Associate Judges John Coolbaugh and Daniel W. Dingman "being present." The case entered was that of James Wallace against John Barnes. The action was made returnable January 16, 1815. A transcript from a justice's docket was entered, showing judgment for the plaintiff of one hundred and ninety-eight dollars.

At the January Term (1815) the first suit entered upon the docket was that of Samuel B. Stickney against William Halbert. Edward Mott, destined to be for many years a practitioner at the courts of Pike (and of whom a biography is given elsewhere), appeared for the plaintiff, and John Cross for the defendant. The case was continued.

A number of eminent lawyers practiced in the court in after-years, and sketches of them will be found in the succeeding chapter.

The Pike County Court was, in many respects a peculiar one. Judge Daniel W. Dingman sat upon the bench as associate judge for a period of twenty-six years, dating from the erection of the county, and his confrere, Associate Judge John Coolbaugh, held his exalted position nearly as long. The latter was commonly addressed by Dingman, both in private and official capacity, by the slightly undignified nickname of "Bub." Dingman was a very eccentric man, of large native intellect and great force of character, but uneducated. Pike County will never see his like again. He belonged to an era that has passed away. Judge Dingman did not hesitate to appear on the bench in the august courts of Pike in his shirt-sleeves and with bare feet. A volume might be written upon his peculiarities, his humor, his whimsicalities and the exhibition of his strength and shrewdness. Some of his decisions and rulings were, to say the least, unique in the annals of American jurisprudence. His action in the celebrated Smithfield election board prosecution case, which arose in 1836 from the alleged fraudulent return of the vote for the location of Monroe County's seat of justice, was one of the most peculiar and characteristic.[1] An often-told story, illustrative of his judicial method, which, as it is true, will bear repetition, is that of the sentence which he once imposed upon a vagabond negro, who had been imprisoned in the jail for some time on a charge of petit larceny. When he was brought into the presence of the judiciary, in the old stone temple of justice, the court and bar, after consultation, requested Judge Dingman to dispose of the prisoner. The judge thereupon, looking severely at the culprit, said,—

[1] It will be found in the Monroe County division of this work.

"Nigger, stand up. You are charged and are guilty of the crime of larceny. You are a bad nigger. I know all about niggers. You ought to be hung, but the sentence of this court is that you be banished from the face of the earth. Go get off the face of the earth."

"Why massa," said the darkey, "how ken I git off de face of dis yere earth?"

"You can go," said Dingman, "to Jersey. The sentence of this court is that you have fifteen minutes to get out of the county of Pike and into the State of New Jersey, and if you ever come back we will hang you."

Thereupon, it is traditionally asserted the offender ran to the bank of the Delaware and swam to the Jersey shore.

Early Affairs of the Commissioners.—The county commissioners first elected—Hezekiah Bingham, Cornelius Case and John Lattimore—held their initial meeting November 2, 1814, and after producing and filing their certificates and qualifications according to law, elected John Cross their clerk, at a salary of one hundred and fifty dollars per year, and Francis A. L. Smith, treasurer.

When they came to the consideration of the probable expenses of the county for the ensuing year, the board resolved to levy a tax of half a cent upon the dollar on all taxable property in the county. They then proceeded to the appointment of assessors in those townships, in which none had been elected according to law, viz.: in Palmyra, Moses Killam, Jr., with Erastus Kimble and Simeon Chapman as assistants; in Lackawaxen, John Crissman, with Mordecai Roberts and Jeremiah Barnes, assistants; in Upper Smithfield, Edward Mott, Jr., with Jacob Quick and George Westfall, assistants; in Delaware, Solomon Westbrook Jr., with Cooper Jagger and Everett Hornbeck, assistants; Middle Smithfield, Alexander Biles, with Daniel Jaynes and Andrew Eighlenbergh, as assistants.

At their meeting of November 23, 1814, the commissioners, with the assessors, under the provisions of the act passed by the Assembly April 11, 1799, made the following schedule of valuations for the purposes of taxation:

"First quality of improved land, per acre...	$20.00
Second quality of improved land, per acre	12.00
All other improved land, per acre	5.00
Unimproved land on seated tracts to be assessed, per acre, at the discretion of the assessors and assistants.
Unseated lands in the 'barrens' to average, per acre	.50
Unseated lands in the 'beech' to average, per acre	1.50
Houses, grist-mills, saw-mills, distilleries, tan-yards, ferries, manufactories of all kinds to be assessed at the discretion of the respective assessors and assistants.
All negro and mulatto slaves, per head	40.00
All middling horses to be valued each one at	40.00
Oxen, per head, middling	25.00
Cows of milking size, per head	12.00
Judges of the court, each one	100.00
Prothonotary, etc	200.00
Sheriff	100.00
Attorneys-at-law	100.00
Justices of the peace, each one	25.00
Treasurer of the county	100.00
Physicians and surgeons, each one who practices	100.00
Carpenters and joiners, shoemakers, masons and bricklayers, tailors, blacksmiths, glass-blowers, coopers, gunsmiths, sawyers, weavers, each one at..	20.00
Tavern-keepers to be assessed at the discretion of the assessors.
Single men above the age of twenty-one years, each one	100.00
Deputy and other surveyors	100.00"

The first improvement which there is any record of the commissioners making or causing to be made was the building of a bridge over Vandermark Creek, the contract for which was let August 23, 1816, to Samuel Churchill.

On October 5, 1817, the commissioners—Cornelius Cox, Matthew Winans and William Nyce—met and proceeded to Bethany—the county-seat of Wayne, where they remained until the 10th to settle with the commissioners of that county the affairs growing out of the division in 1814. They reported a balance due Pike by Wayne County of $640.61, "besides the equal half of moneys which may hereafter be collected on what is termed doubtful debts."[1]

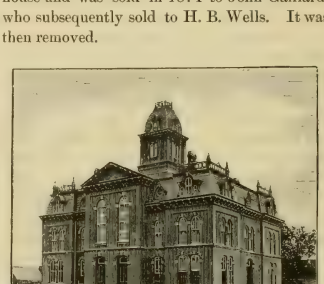
It appears that the commissioner's office was for a period during the early days of Pike a resort for those who would indulge in wine and wassail and ungodly glee. In 1821 an attempt was made to correct this abuse, for on January 4th of that year, the same day that Jesse Olmstead was appointed clerk, the commissioners deemed it necessary to pass the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the clerk, for the time being, shall prohibit all Gambling, Drinking (illegible—probably "carousing"), etc., in the commissioners' office, but in all respects to keep the same in good order."



A second resolution gives a hint as to who were the persons in part responsible for the sin that had crept into the office. It reads:

"Resolved, That the said office shall not be kept as an attorney's office, excepting on business for the county."

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.—As the act creating the county provided that Milford could only be the county-seat on condition of the payment of at least fifteen hundred dollars by her people towards the erection of public buildings, they went immediately to work and raised that sum.[2]

The work of erecting the court-house was begun in 1814 and the stone building still standing and used as a jail was completed in 1815. It was substantially constructed of native boulders hewn square on the outer side, and the thoroughness with which its walls were laid puts to shame much more recent workmanship. The contractors were Dan. Dimmick, Jacob Quick and Samuel Anderson. At first there was no bell upon the court-house, and when the judges and lawyers and persons interrested were to be summoned, the sheriff mounted the cupola and blew most piercing blasts upon a huge tin horn. This was superseded by a huge triangle, upon which the sheriff or a tipstaff dealt resounding blows that were not unmusical, and this, in turn, gave way in 1844 or 1845 to the bell which for many years announced at proper seasons that justice was about to be judicially administered.

This building served as court-house and jail until 1873, when the present court-house was constructed, and the county offices were within its walls until 1851, when a small brick building was erected in front of the site occupied by the present court-house. This was built under contract by George P. Heller. It served its purpose until after the completion of the court-house and was sold in 1874 to John Gaillard, who subsequently sold to H. B. Wells. It was then removed.

PIKE COUNTY COURT-HOUSE.

The present handsome brick court-house, containing all of the county offices and a commodious court-room, was built in the years 1872–73, the first action being taken at the February and September Sessions of court in 1871.

The contract for the foundations was let to S. S. Van Auken, but afterwards rescinded and the work was done by the commissioners and sub-contractors.

The contract for building was let March 2, 1872, to A. D. Brown, for $26,096. He was afterwards allowed considerable sums for extra work. The cost of this edifice as completed has been, after careful computation by competent persons, fixed at about $45,000.

The people of Milford raised about $1000, purchased two town lots adjoining the public square and donated them to the county as a proper site for the building.

EFFORT TO REMOVE COUNTY-SEAT.—The building of the new court-house was violently opposed in various ways. The project afforded an opportunity for the friends of Blooming Grove to inaugurate a movement in favor of making that place the county-seat, and a bill authorizing an election to be held relative to such a change and the erection of new county buildings was introduced in the Assembly in the session of 1871–72. A petition urging the passage of the act was signed by at least seven hundred residents of the county, though it was alleged many of the signers appended their names under the misapprehension that the purpose of the act was simply to put a stop to the erection of the new court-house. As a matter of general interest, the act is here reproduced:

"AN ACT authorizing an election to be held in the County of Pike relative to a change of the County-seat of said County and the erection of new county buildings:

"Whereas, Great dissatisfaction exists in regard to the present location of the county-seat of Pike County, and

"Whereas, Two successive Grand Juries of said county, at the February and September Sessions, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, reported in favor of and recommended the erection of a new Court-House, and

"Whereas, New county buildings must necessarily soon be erected and it is desirable to locate the same in a more central and convenient place; therefore.—

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the qualified voters of the County of Pike shall, at their respective places of voting, on the second Tuesday of October in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, vote for or against the removal of the county-seat from Milford to Blooming Grove, in said County, in the following manner, to wit: All in favor of removal shall vote by a ballot on a written or printed ticket, labelled on the outside 'County-seat,' and on the inside 'for removal;' and those opposed to removal shall vote by ballot with a similar label on the outside, and on the inside 'against removal;' and the tickets thus polled shall be counted out and returned in like manner by the return judge as those for the county officers, and be filed in the office of the Clerk of the Court of Quarter Sessions of the said county, who shall also certify the number of votes polled as aforesaid in the several districts of said county to the County Commissioners, agreeably to the ninth section of the Act of June thirteenth, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and forty, relating to the election of Assessors and Assistant Assessors.

"SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Sheriff of said county to give notice of said election as is now provided for by law for the election of State and county officers.

"SEC. 3. If the majority of votes polled shall be against removal, then it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners named in this Act to locate the county buildings at Blooming Grove, but the county-seat of Pike County to be and remain at Milford, where it now is, but in case a majority of the votes polled shall be for removal, then the county-seat of said county of Pike shall be located at Blooming Grove, in said county.

"SEC. 4. That in case a majority of the votes polled as aforesaid shall be for removal, John Kipp, Marcus N. B. Kellam and Jacob Klienhans, of said county, be and they are hereby appointed Commissioners to select at Blooming Grove, in the said county of Pike, suitable grounds on which to erect the necessary county buildings and cause a good and valid deed or deeds of conveyance in fee simple for the same, without cost or expense to the said county, to be made and delivered to the County Commissioners for the use of said county whereon to erect a Court-House, jail and necessary county buildings, said deed or deeds to be approved by the President Judge of said county.

"SEC. 5. That as soon as the deed or deeds for said site or plot of ground as provided for in section four of this Act shall be placed in the hands of the County Commissioners after the question of removal shall have been decided, they shall proceed without unnecessary delay to erect all the required county buildings on said site selected as provided for in section four of this Act, said Court-House to be built of brick, with the necessary fire-proof rooms or vaults for the safe keeping of papers and records, and large enough to accommodate the wants of said county, and that immediately after said buildings shall be completed and approved by a Grand Jury of said county and a majority of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of said county, the county-seat of Pike County be and the same is hereby fixed and located at Blooming Grove, and the public records shall be removed by the officers in charge thereof from Milford to the new county buildings at Blooming Grove.

"SEC. 6. That the Commissioners of said county are hereby authorized to borrow not exceeding twenty thousand dollars for building purposes, and they are hereby authorized to issue books for the same in sums not less than one hundred dollars each at a rate of interest not exceeding seven per centum per annum, said bonds to mature in twenty years.

"SEC. 7. That in the event the county-seat is removed to Blooming Grove in accordance with the provisions of this Act, then the County Commissioners of the said county of Pike are hereby authorized, immediately after the removal of the county-seat to Blooming Grove, to sell and convey whatever right, title or interest said county of Pike may have in and to the grounds and county buildings now located in Milford, at public sale to the highest and best bidder, after giving due public notice of said sale, and apply the proceeds thereof to the liquidation of the bonds authorized in section six of this Act.

"SEC. 8. That the County Commissioners of said county are hereby restrained and prohibited from enlarging and improving the old buildings or erecting new buildings at Milford unless a majority of the votes at the election to be held under this Act shall be against removal.

"SEC. 9. That if a majority of the votes as provided for in this act shall be for removal, and the County Commissioners shall fail to have the county buildings to be erected under the provisions of this Act under contract within sixty days after the deed or deeds for the grounds shall have been executed and approved according to the provisions of this Act and delivered to them, then the Commissioners named in section four of this Act to procure and select a location for said county buildings are hereby authorized and required to carry out all provisions of this Act enjoined upon the County Commissioners as fully and effectually as the County Commissioners themselves could have done."

CHAPTER II.

THE BENCH AND BAR. — BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE legal profession has had comparatively few votaries resident in the county, a large portion of the court business having been attended to by attorneys from Easton, Stroudsburg, Honesdale and other places in the region. Nevertheless, Milford has been (and is now) the home of some lawyers of prominence and ability.

Most active and well-known among the early attorneys was Edward Mott, progenitor of all of that name now in Milford.

EDWARD MOTT was born in the parish of St. James, Westminster, London, on October 31, 1780, and came to this country in 1798, with his father, Edward Mott, his mother, Sarah (Beckett) Mott, and brother, William B. Mott. His father-in-law, Jarvis Beckett, at that time about seventy-five years of age, was also of the party. This old gentleman, born July 19, 1723, had enlisted in 1744 in the "Second Troop of Life Guards," then commanded by Lord Amherst, and had remained in the service forty-four years, having been discharged on a pension in 1788, as being "unfit for duty and entirely worn out," as his discharge, now in the hands of his descendants, will attest. He died December 23, 1806, and was buried at Easton, Pa.

Edward Mott, the elder, born May 3, 1752, was indentured, January 24, 1763, as an apprentice in the grocer and chandlery trade to one Wm. Horons, of Coventry, England, to which place his widowed mother, Jane (Stiles) Mott, had removed from London a short time before. At the age of twenty-one years he also enlisted in the "Second Troop of Life Guards," and served as a "private gentleman" for seven years and five months. He married Sarah Beckett, October 20, 1776, and had issue but two children,—Edward, the subject of our sketch, and William B., who settled in Philadelphia and left almost as numerous a progeny as his brother. He came to this country possessed of means, and with the intention of forming an agency for the sale of English hardware and cutlery. Remaining in New York until 1803, he moved to Philadelphia, and after a short stay settled in Easton, Pa., purchasing a house at the northeast corner of Second and Northampton Streets. His ancestors can be traced in a direct line from 1622, from entries in an old family Bible which he brought from England and which still remains in a good state of preservation in the possession of Mrs. Henry K. Fox, of Philadelphia, one of his descendants.

Edward Mott studied law in Easton, Pa., and in 1805 married Faithful Slaymaker, of Easton, Pa., and moved to Milford. She died shortly after their child, Jarvis Beckett Mott, was born, March 26, 1806.

About 1810 he married, second, Elizabeth Spering, daughter of Henry Spering, who, from the rank of fifer in the Revolutionary army, rose to the rank of general in the War of 1812, besides holding the offices of sheriff and prothonotary of Northampton County.

By his second marriage he had issue—Sarah Markrina Mott, who died young; Henry Spering Mott, born November 11, 1811, at Easton, Pa., who eventually became one of the most prominent Democratic politicians in the northeastern section of Pennsylvania;[1] Edward Mott, born 1814; William Pitt Mott, died young, born June 28, 1818; Charles Fox Mott, born June 28, 1818; Oscar Harold Mott, born October 8, 1821.

Edward Mott died January 13, 1834, at Milford, Pa. His wife, Elizabeth, survived him until November 25, 1857.

Jarvis Beckett Mott married Isabella Jane Henderson, May 31, 1831, and had issue,—Eliza H. Mott, Fidelia H. Mott, Barton H. Mott (married Sallie Shepherd), Amos Mott, Henry Mott, Harriet A. Mott, Estelle S. Mott, Oscar Mott, Charles S. Mott. He died January 26, 1863, at Jersey City, N. J.

Henry Spering Mott, married, first, Hannah R. Bull, daughter of Crissy and Catharine Bull, of Orange County, N. Y. and had issue,—Sarah Jane Mott (died young), Jarvis Crissy Mott, John Clarence Mott (married Lizzie Ridgway), Mary Eliza Mott (married Jacob Kleinhaus). His wife, Hannah R. Mott, died April 23, 1842, and he married as his second wife, in 1842, Delinda Peters, of Bushkill, Pike County, Pa., and had issue,—Andrew Jackson Mott (died young), Charles Peters Mott (married Marie J. Schimnel), Henry L. Mott (who died young), Samuel Dimmick Mott. Henry S. Mott died June 7, 1877, at Milford, Pa.

Edward Mott married Letitia Ink, daughter of George and Elizabeth Ink, of Northampton County, Pa., and had issue,—Elizabeth Mott (married Levi Smith), Susan Mott (married Alonzo G. Drum), Sarah Mott (died young), Mary Mott (married Thomas McHugh), Edward Mott (died young). He died April 3, 1877, at East Stroudsburg, Pa.

Oscar Harold Mott, married Theodosia Clark, daughter of John and Ann Clark, and granddaughter of James Barton, of Milford, and had issue,—Ann Barton Mott (married Daniel A. Wells), Sarah A. Mott, Milton Dimmick Mott, Edward Charles Mott, Henry Spering Mott, Elizabeth Spering Mott. O. H. Mott was a captain in the One Hundred and Fifty-first Pennsylvania Regiment during the Civil War, and died January 4, 1864, from disease contracted during his service in the field.

Charles Fox Mott married, first, Eliza Smith, daughter of Ludwig Smith and Mary Mechalls, of Bushkill, and had issue,—Amzi S. Mott (married Callie Landis), Agnes M. Mott (married M. S. Smith), Edward Harold Mott (married Mattie N. Valentine), Alice C. Mott (died young), Hannah E. Mott (married John M. Baldwin), William L. Mott, Bessie Mott (died young), Jessie Mott (died young). His wife, Eliza, died January 11, 1857. He married, second, 1859, Deborah A. Hall, of Philadelphia, and died September 20, 1862, at Philadelphia.

Hugh Ross was one of the first members of the Pike County bar and was a Methodist preacher. If his legal ability had been equal to his eccentricity, he would have been a very able man.

John Thompson Cross was an early member of the bar. He was also a land speculator. His wife was Julia Ann Smith, daughter of old Francis J. Smith or De Aerts. His son, John Thomson Cross, was married to Helen M. Wallace, and his daughter was the second wife of C. C. D. Pinchot.

Richard Eldred came to Milford about 1818, and was admitted to the bar in 1820. He married Harriet Baldwin, who is still living, aged ninety. He built a large farm-house near the Vandemark bridge in 1828, which was the finest house in Milford at that time. He continued to practice law in Milford until 1863, when he removed to Warren County, Pa., where he died in 1865. During his practice, if any poor person that could not pay had a case, they brought it to him. He was also a major in the militia. Their children were E. B. Eldred, a lumberman in Warren County;

[1] See Milford history.

Edwin Eldred, who was admitted to the bar in Milford, and practiced law in the western part of the State; Everett Eldred, who died in the army; Captain John Eldred, who organized the Bucktail Rangers in Cameron County (he was the first man that put a buck-tail in his hat; the Bucktail Rangers gained considerable celebrity during the War of the Rebellion; he is now a lumberman in Wisconsin); Henry Eldred is in the Treasury Department at Washington; Miranda was the wife of Dr. John Schunmel.

Dan Dimmick, one of the first attorneys at the Pike County bar, was a son of Deacon Oliver Dimock[1] and Sarah (Gurley) Dimock, of Mansfield, Conn., and was born March 1, 1775. He came to Pennsylvania in 1800, and studied law at Milford, where he practiced the profession, after his admission as an attorney, until his death, in February, 1825. He was a man of unusual strength of character and large ability. During the whole course of his professional life he maintained a high position among the lawyers of his day. Men like Mallery and Woodward, and others of their calibre, admitted his power and ability. Judge Mallery said of him, that he never knew a man so well calculated to impress a jury, and Judge Woodward spoke in the highest terms of his success as an advocate. He was a leading politician, and represented his district many years in the Legislature of the State. He was devotedly attached to the principles of the Democratic party,—a faith, by the way, in which all of his children, and his children's children, remained steadfast. His brother Alpheus thus wrote of him in 1825:

"His calling in life was that of an attorney and advocate, in which character he had served the public about twenty years, and held, during that period, many places and offices of trust and responsibility under the State government of Pennsylvania. He was bold and forward in youth, and took and maintained his station among the young men of his native place while unusually young. In stature he was tall and of large frame. In the latter part of his life he was corpulent and fleshy. His frame was well-proportioned throughout. Being not as successful in his first exertions for himself as he wished, and probably expected, he left his native State when about eighteen years of age, and went, first, to reside in the State of New York, near the Pennsylvania line. He soon turned his attention to the study of law, for the practice of which he soon qualified himself and commenced his professional labors at Milford. . . . He appeared to entertain feelings hostile to the regimen and discipline of his native place. This was probably owing to the checks and restraints laid before him when his youthful ardor could not well brook them. He, however, entertained much regard for the habits of industry and the means of education in his native State. He was liberal and generous, perhaps to a fault. He enjoyed the most explicit confidence in his integrity from all, and was at the head of the bar where he practiced. Not being particularly acquainted with his forensic talents, I can only observe that his manner and mien were well calculated to command attention and respect. He never leaned upon quibbles and hair-breadth distinctions. He generally prepared his causes with much attention, and showed, while discharging his duties as an advocate, that he viewed the whole ground."

He married Jane, daughter of Josephus Jacobus Aerts, better known as Dr. Francis J. Smith,[2] of Stroudsburg. She survived her husband many years, dying in March, 1842. Their children were Lucinda, who was the first wife of Judge Nathaniel B. Eldred; Sally, who married C. C. D. Pinchot; Oliver S., of whom a sketch appears in this chapter; Dan; Milo Melancthon, of whom a sketch appears in the Monroe County bar chapter; Milan; William H., of whom an extended biography is given in the chapter on Bench and Bar of Wayne County; Milton; and Lavinia E.

Oliver S. Dimmick, for many years a leading attorney at this bar and those of the neighboring counties, was the third child and first son of Dan and Jane (Aerts or Smith[3]) Dimmick, and was born in Milford June 11, 1804. He read law with his uncle, Alpheus Dimmick, at Bloomingburg, N. Y., and entered practice at Milford. In 1836 he was elected to the State Legislature, and served in that position for two terms. He was afterwards chosen as associate judge of Pike County, which office he held for several years. He was the founder of the flourishing village of Matamoras, and through his efforts the fine bridge across the Delaware at that place was erected.

He married Maria, daughter of Jacob Hornbeck, February 19, 1826. He died at Port Jervis, N. Y., in October, 1877, his wife surviving him. Their children were Lucinda, wife of S. O. Dimmick, of Port Jervis; Milo H.; Mary, who married Lucien F. Barnes, a lawyer of Milford, deceased (they were the parents of Edward Barnes, who is now an attorney-at-law); Priscilla, deceased; Jacob H., of Port Jervis; and William H., an attorney, living at Honesdale.[1]

Milton Dimmick was born in Milford June 26, 1816, and was the eighth child and sixth son of Dan and Jane (Aerts or Smith) Dimmick. After receiving an excellent education he read law and was admitted to the bar of his native county at the age of twenty-one (1837). He continued in active practice up to the time of his death, April 3, 1851. He was a good lawyer and much-loved man. The Doylestown Democrat, shortly after his death, said of him: "We shall long remember the happy and agreeable hours passed in Mr. Dimmick's society. He was a ripe scholar, a profound lawyer and a kind and affectionate husband and father. He has not left behind him one living soul that recalls his memory with unkind feelings."

Mr. Dimmick married, in 1842, Sarah Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Edward Allen, a Presbyterian clergyman. Their children were Edward C., who removed to Honesdale and later (1862) to Mauch Chunk, where he became an attorney; Alice, who married J. S. Carpenter, of Newark, N. J.; and Kate.

MILFORD BAR.

Nathaniel B. Eldred was admitted November 16, 1816. He moved to Bethany and became presiding judge of the courts.

Jesse Olmstead came from Connecticut and was admitted November 19, 1816. After practicing law a few years in Milford he left the place.

Hon. Benjamin A. Bidlack came from Wilkes-Barre to Milford, where he practiced a few years. He was twice a member of Congress and died in New Grenada, while United States minister to that republic.

Daniel Mifflin Brodhead was a well-known and successful practitioner at the Pike County bar, and one of the best-known citizens of Milford of his time. He was born in 1796, probably at Kittanning, Pa. He went to school at Morristown, N. J., then studied law and began its practice at Milford. He remained there until 1832, and then removed to Philadelphia, and engaged in the lumber trade and real estate business. At one time he owned the American Sentinel, a Democratic newspaper of Philadelphia. In 1842 he removed to Forestburg, Sullivan County, N. Y., and engaged in the manufacture of lumber. He was there offered the nomination as district judge by both parties, but declined office. He was a Douglas Democrat and earnest supporter of the Union cause during the war. From Forestburg he removed to Port Jervis, N. Y., in 1848, and from there he removed to Black Lake, Sullivan County, N. Y., where he had purchased an extensive tract of lumber land. In October, 1864, he died while on a visit to his son-in-law, Col. Samuel Fowler, at Franklin Furnace, Sussex County, N. J. He was buried at Port Jervis, N. Y.

Mr. Brodhead was an able lawyer and a strong man in general intellect. He was both a safe counselor and effective pleader. He was noted for his courtesy and affability. He was a shrewd politician of decided influences and a patriotic citizen. He was a hospitable man, and, particularly while living in Philadelphia, entertained many distinguished men. He held intimate relations with James Buchanan, Governor D. R. Porter, Simon Cameron, Commodore Charles Stewart, of the United States navy, and other prominent Pennsylvanians.

He was twice married. His first wife, to whom he was united just after coming to Milford, was Eliza, daughter of James Barton, Esq., of that place, she being sixteen years of age, and he only about twenty. They were the parents of nine children. These were Catharine Elizabeth; John, a lawyer of Philadelphia;

Barton; Henrietta Laura, who married Col. Samuel Fowler, of Sussex County, N. J.; Edgar, who served through the Mexican War and the Rebellion; George, of Port Jervis; Thomas, of Philadelphia; Henry, an attorney of New York City; and Daniel Mifflin, Jr., who was first lieutenant of the Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and mortally wounded at the battle of the Wilderness. All of these children were born at Milford.

Mrs. Brodhead died at Port Jervis in the spring of 1852, and Mr. Brodhead was married again, in 1854, to Mrs. Margaret E. Clinton, widow of Hon. James Clinton, of Orange County, N. Y. She died about a year previous to her husband, in 1863.

William C. Salmon was born in Montrose, and read law in his native village with Colonel Lusk, where he was admitted to the bar. Shortly after September 13, 1842, he was admitted to the Pike County bar, and immediately entered the active practice of his profession, which he continued until his death, in 1856. During the time covered by his practice he was one of the ablest lawyers in the place, and he was so regarded by the public generally, as he had a good practice. His wife was S. Augusta Clark, a granddaughter of James Barton, who lived adjoining the Sawkill House. Mr. Salmon lived on the homestead, which is occupied by his widow now.

John Strouse, a lumberman from Wilsonville, was admitted to the Pike bar, and was associate judge one term. He subsequently moved to Easton, where he became interested in iron-works and banking, to his pecuniary loss. He died in Easton, and his widow, who was a daughter of Judge Halsey, lives with her brother-in-law, Colonel John Nyce, of Hawley.

Lucien F. Barnes studied law with William C. Salmon, in Milford, and was admitted to the Pike County bar about 1860, and practiced his profession successfully until he died, August 4, 1868. He was considered the most brilliant member of the Milford bar during his practice.

Honorable Daniel M. Van Auken was born in New Jersey January 15, 1826, was graduated at Union College in 1852, and studied law with John B. La Forge, and was admitted to the bar in 1855, and the same fall was elected district attorney. He was elected a member of the Fortieth Congress in 1868, and re-elected to the Forty-first Congress, receiving seventeen thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight votes against ten thousand three hundred and twenty-three votes for John Torrey, Republican. In 1874 he was a candidate from Pike County for presiding judge of the Twenty-second Judicial District of Pennsylvania. The conferees, after balloting several thousand times, finally nominted Van Auken, William H. Dimmick permitting him to be nominated after the Wayne County Herald and the leading Democrats of Wayne County had hoisted the name of Honorable Frederick M. Crane for that office. This action produced a split in the Democratic vote, and insured the election of Charles P. Waller, the Republican candidate, by a small majority over Crane. Judge Waller died after about seven years of his term had expired, and, in 1882, Van Auken again received the indorsement of Pike County Democracy for the judgeship. George S. Purdy, after a severe contest with W. H. Dimmick, received the indorsement of the Wayne County Democracy for the same office. The conferees representing the two contestants, after balloting a great many times, finally disagreed, and, as a result of this division, Henry M. Seely was elected presiding judge by a small majority over Purdy. Mr. Van Auken is the oldest member of the Milford bar now living.

John D. Biddis, son of Chas. R. Biddis, read law with Lucien Barnes and was admitted to the Pike County bar in 1867. He was elected to the office of district attorney and held that position by re-elections for thirteen years. He was elected State Senator in 1882 for a term of four years. After serving in the two regular biennial sessions he resigned in order to accept a position in the International Revenue Department at Washington.

Cornelius W. Bull is a native of Pike County and was born in Westfall township January 5, 1845. His inclinations in boyhood were toward a professional rather than a business life, and, although most of his minority was spent on his father's farm, and attending the district school, both proved in his case, as in the case of many others, a sure foundation for practical ideas and a successful professional and business life. He completed his preliminary education at the "Eclectic Hall," at Milford, and at "Mount Retirement Academy," in Sussex County, N. J. In 1863 he began teaching school and for two terms taught the school in Milford. In the same year he began reading law with the Hon. D. M. Van Auken, of Milford, and, after prosecuting his studies for four years, in connection with his school-work, he was admitted to the bar of Pike County in 1867, and at once entered upon a partnership with his preceptor, which continued until 1871. Mr. Bull then opened a law-office in Milford for himself, where he has since practiced his profession. He has taken an active part in the political arena of his county, has several times been elected a delegate to the State Convention and was once chosen a member of the State Democratic Committee.

His first wife, Julia A., a daughter of John T. Cross, whom he married in 1870, died in 1871. In 1877 he married Anna R., a daughter of George Nyce, by which union he had children—George R. and Jemima Bull.

His father, Rosencranse C. Bull, of Holland origin, was born in Pike County June 10, 1816, and resides in Westfall township. His mother, Jemima Westfall, of French Huguenot extraction, was born June 21, 1817, and is a daughter of Cornelius Westfall.

Colonel John Nyce was born in Sandyston township, Sussex County, N. J., July 22, 1831. His father, Major John W. Nyce, followed the occupation of a farmer, and in early training-days was connected with the militia organizations of the State, where he earned his title. The son followed the routine of farm-life, attending the public schools of the day, where the foundation of his education was laid. He was united in marriage, December 28, 1853, to Martha Allen. He moved to Monroe County, and at Stroudsburg studied law with the Hon. Charlton Burnett. War having been declared, he was active in organizing men to put down the Rebellion, and went into service June 11, 1861, as second lieutenant of Company F, Thirty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves. His first promotion was adjutant of the regiment; June 1, 1862, promoted major; November 9th of the same, for meritorious service, was appointed colonel of the One Hundred and Seventy-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Militia. Mustered out with regiment August 7, 1863, at Philadelphia. The war record of Colonel Nyce was most honorable, and he carried the scars of many battles to his death. At Charles City Cross-Roads he received a sabre stroke across his right arm; at Malvern Hill was shot through right arm and received a shell wound in the knee; at the battle of Antietam was shot through the right lung, and injured his hip by falling from his horse when shot. The soldiers appreciated the worth of their gallant commander and presented him with a valuable chronometer, which he highly prized and always carried.

Colonel Nyce returned to Stroudsburg for a few months, and, in April, 1864, came to Milford with his family and entered the profession of law, having been admitted to practice in the Monroe County courts in February of the above year. He was successful, and enjoyed a large and growing business. In politics he was a Democrat, but accepted the Greenback nomination for State Senator against Hon. Allen Craig, of Carbon County, in 1878. Although defeated in the district, he polled a flattering vote in this county. He was elected chief burgess of Milford a year ago (February), and was re-elected at the last local election without opposition. In the Methodist Church, of which he was a member, he was an active worker, and was superintendent of the Sunday-school until failing health prevented his attending to the duties. He died several years ago.

John H. Van Etten was admitted to the Pike County bar in September, 1870. He came from an old Pike County family. His wife is a daughter of Rev. Peter Kanouse.

J. Augustus Page was admitted December 20, 1876, and died in Milford in 1883.

Harry T. Baker read law with his brother-in-law, J. Sergeant Price, in Philadelphia, and Hon. D. M. Van Auken, in Milford, and was admitted to the bar at May Term, 1876. He has resided in Milford since 1871, where he has a fine residence and office at Third and Ann Streets.

JOHN W. NYCE and HAMILTON ARMSTRONG were admitted to the bar September 24, 1877.

M. M. VAN ETTEN was admitted February 25, 1878. C. A. NEWMAN was admitted to the bar in September, 1880, and is now district attorney for Pike County.

CHAPTER III.

MILITARY—SOLDIERS IN THE WAR OF 1812 AND WAR OF THE REBELLION.

WAR OF 1812-14.—There were a few soldiers from Pike County in the War of 1812, but it is impossible to ascertain the names of all. The following were chiefly from Pike and that portion of Northampton County which is now Monroe. Some whose names are included in the roster were from Lehigh County, but as it is impossible to effect a thorough separation, the entire roll is presented :

"Lieutenant-Colonel Commanding."

SOLDIERS IN THE WAR OF THE REBELLION.—The only full company of volunteers from Pike County in the Union army during the War of the Rebellion (1861–65), was Company B, One Hundred and Fifty-First Regiment, nine months' service.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIRST REGIMENT, COMPANY B.—The One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment (nine months') was recruited and organized in the fall of 1862 at Camp Curtin. The commanding officer of the regiment was Colonel Harrison Allen, of Warren County, and the lieutenant-colonel was George F. McFarland, of Juniata. Companies A and C of the One Hundred and Fifty-first were recruited in Susquehanna County, B in Pike, F in Warren, D in Juniata, E, G, H, K and part of I in Berks, and the remaining part of I in Schuylkill. Company B was mustered into service October 20, 1862, to serve nine months.

The regiment left Harrisburg on the 26th of November, 1862, and proceeded to Washington, and from thence crossed the Potomac into Virginia, first camping at Arlington, and, a few days later, marching to Alexandria and Union Mills, more than twenty miles out, where it was placed on picket and the duty of watching the movements of guerrillas, who then infested that region. In February following, it was transferred from that duty, and marched to Belle Plain, where it was attached to the First Brigade of the Third (Doubleday's) Division of General Reynolds' army corps. The camp which it occupied at this place was a very exposed one, and much sickness among the members of the regiment was the result.

In the Chancellorsville campaign of 1863 the regiment, with its divisions and corps, crossed the river, on the 2d of May, at United States Ford, and at once moved to the battle-ground, to occupy that part of the line from which the Eleventh Corps had been hurled by the terrific onslaught of the forces of Stonewall Jackson. During the heavy fighting on Sunday, the 3d, the regiment was posted between Germania and Ely's Fords, confronting the enemy, and much of the time under a very heavy fire, but not otherwise actively engaged. This position it continued to hold through the remainder of the battle. On Wednesday, the 6th, it moved back to the north side of the Rappahannock, and encamped near White Oak Church.

From this point it moved northward early in June, and marched to meet the columns of General Lee's army in its invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania. It reached Gettysburg on the 1st of July, just when Buford's cavalry opened the battle. The regiment, then under command of Lieutenant-Colonel McFarland, was at once placed in position on the left of the corps line, and soon afterwards moved forward into the conflict. Several changes of position followed, and regiment after regiment was forced back by the withering fire; but the One Hundred and Fifty-first steadfastly held its place till more than one-half its number had fallen, when it, too, was compelled to retire, which it did with deliberation and in order, taking a new position in the rear of the seminary. This position was also found untenable, and it then retreated somewhat precipitately through the streets of the town, losing a number of men taken prisoners on the way, and finally halting at Cemetery Hill, where, on its arrival, its strength was only ninety-two men, though this was soon aftewards increased by the coming in of about twenty men who had been cut off during the retreat from the seminary. In this new position the regiment remained until nearly the close of the second day's fight, when it was ordered to the support of the Third Corps; but, in the confusion of the field, it became separated from its command, and, with the Twentieth New York, which was in a similar dilemma, it moved to the left of the Second Corps and took a position which the two regiments held until the afternoon of the following day, when they moved rapidly in to help repel the final grand charge of the Confederates, which closed the battle.

The services and conspicuous gallantry of this regiment in the great struggle at Gettysburg were thus set forth in the report of the corps commander, General Abner Doubleday:

"At Gettysburg they won, under the brave McFarland, an imperishable fame. They defended the left front of the First Corps against vastly superior numbers; covered its retreat against the overwhelming masses of the enemy at the seminary west of the town, and enabled me, by their determined resistance, to withdraw the corps in comparative safety. This was on the first day. In the crowning charge of the third day of the battle the shattered remains of the One Hundred and Fifty-first Pennsylvania, with the Twentieth New York State Militia, flung themselves upon the front of the rebel column, and drove it from the shelter of a slashing, in which it had taken shelter from a flank attack of the Vermont troops. I can never forget the services rendered me by this regiment, directed by the gallantry and genius of McFarland. I believe they saved the First Corps, and were among the chief instruments to save the Army of the Potomac and the country from unimaginable disaster."

The losses of the regiment at Gettysburg amounted to three-fourths of its total effective strength,—sixty-six men and two officers being killed, twelve officers and one hundred and eighty-seven men wounded and one hundred missing, out of a total of four hundred and sixty-five men and twenty-one officers, who entered the fight. Among the wounded were Lieutenant Benjamin F. Oliver, of Company D, and Lieutenant-Colonel George F. McFarland, whose wound resulted in the loss of one leg (which was amputated on the field) and the severe mutilation of the other.

From the field of Gettysburg the remnant of the regiment moved with the other troops in pursuit of the enemy, on the 6th of July, and reached Williamsport, Md., just as the beaten army of General Lee was commencing the passage of the Potomac into Virginia. Five days later the One Hundred and Fifty-first, whose term of enlistment had then nearly expired, was relieved at the front, and moved to Harrisburg, where, on the 27th, it was mustered out of service and disbanded.

Following is the roster of the Pike County company (B):

Officers.

Oscar H. Mott, capt., disch. March 8, 1863.

Lafayette Westbrook, 1st lieut., pro. to capt. March 9, 1863.

John H. Vincent, 2d lieut., pro. to 1st lieut. March 9, 1863.

Robert M. Kellogg, 1st sergt., pro. to 2d lieut. March 9, 1863.

Herman Frank, pro. to 1st sergt. March 9, 1863; wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Stephen Hezard, sergt.

Henry Cuddeback, sergt.

William A. Salmon, sergt., disch. by S. O. Feb. 10, 1863.

Thos. M. Beardsley, sergt., pro. from private March 9, 1863; killed at Gettysburg.

Henry Smith, sergt., pro. from corp. Feb. 11, 1863; killed at Gettysburg.

William Sutton, corp., captured at Gettysburg.

Ira Pellett, corp.

George W. Kimble, corp.

James Hatten, corp.

Nelson De Witt, corp.

Wesley Watson, corp., pro. Jan. 5, 1863.

Jacob C. Schorr, corp., pro. Jan. 5, 1863.

Charles Bates, corp., pro. Jan. 5, 1863; wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Francis E. Hazen, corp., pro. Feb. 11, 1863; died at Acquia Creek, Va., June 4, 1863.

David Miller, corp.

James S. Smith, corp., disch. on surg. certif. April 14, 1863.

Privates.

Robert J. Andrews.

Andrew J. Appleman.

E. C. Appleman, died at Belle Plain, Va., April 15, 1863.

Jesse R. Burrus.

John Blackmore.

Simeon Brink.

Benjamin C. Bonnell, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

John Buckingham, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Joseph A. Brickley.

George Burrus, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Charles Burrell, died at Union Mills, Va., Dec. 10, 1862; buried at Nat. Cem., Arlington.

Charles Blackmore, killed at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Solomon D. Brink, killed at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

Ira B. Case.

David Canfield.

Janson Cole.

John Cortright, Jr.

Wesley C. Cron.

Peter Cron, wounded and captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.

James P. Crone.

Cornelius Case, disch. on surg. certif. April 13, 1863.

Isaac S. Decker.

George M. Decker.
Benjamin Degroat.
D. W. J. Dingman, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Adonijah B. Drake.
Seley S. Drake.
William F. Fulkerson, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Charles L. Frank, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Nelson Garris.
Christian Grim.
Conrad Happ.
Edward R. Hazen.
John Henry.
Nicholas Hess.
Valentine Hipsman, wounded, with loss of arm, at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Michael Hissam, wounded at Chancellorsville, Va., May 3, 1863.
Rush K. Kellam, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Robert A. Kayser, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Jonas Kettle.
John Kleinstuber.
Levi Labar.
Levi Losey, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Casper Madden.
Enos B. Mapes.
Peter Mager.
Abraham Masker, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Warren Masker, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Mordecai M. Mott.
James W. Morrison, killed at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Samuel McCormick, died at Philadelphia, Pa., August 3, 1863.
Charles M. Carter, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
James Nyce, captured at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
John L. Pearson, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Burnham K. Pellet.
Josiah Perry.
Michael B. Pitney.
George W. Parr, killed at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Nelson Reaser, wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863.
Francis Rolle.
Silas Rosencrance.
Randall D. Sayre.
Charles D. Schmalzler.
Reuben Seig.
Gilbert Shaffer.
Edward Stidd.

Isaac Shearer.
Jacob C. Van Gorden, disch. on surg. certif. Feb. 25, 1863.
Amos Van Gorden.
William M. Watson.
Patrick White.
Ziba B. Williams.
George G. Worzle.
Henry P. Worzle.
Joseph Zeimer, died at Belle Plain, Va., April 1, 1863.

In addition to this company, many men went from Pike County in small squads, some in Pennsylvania regiments, others in those organized in New Jersey, and still others in New York organizations. Of many of them it is impossible to trace or obtain any information. The names of a considerable number of these scattering men, however, in the Thirty-fifth, Forty-fifth, Sixty-seventh, One Hundred and Forty-second and One Hundred and Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Regiments have been procured and are here given :

THIRTY-FIFTH REGIMENT (SIXTH RESERVES).

Company C.

John S. Reed, private, must. in May 13, 1861 ; killed at South Mountain Sept. 14, 1862.

FORTY-FIFTH REGIMENT.

Company A.

Peter Roach, drafted; must. in Nov. 12, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.

Company D.

Daniel V. Drake, drafted; must. in Nov. 12, 1864; disch. March 27, 1865, by order of War Dept.
Conrad Gumble, drafted; must. in Sept. 22, 1864; disch. by S. O. June 7, 1865.
Josiah Hinzey, substitute, must. in Dec. 15, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.
Milo S. Hobbs, drafted; must. in Nov. 11, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.
Daniel W. King, drafted; must. in Nov. 11, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.
Orlando Kindred, substitute, must. in Dec. 16, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.
William L. Marcy, drafted; must. in Nov. 11, 1864; must. out with company July 11, 1865.
Robert M. Martin, drafted; must. in Nov. 12, 1864; died June 16, 1865; buried at Alexandria, Va.; grave 3235.
William M. Watson, drafted; must. in Nov. 12, 1864; must. out with company July 17, 1865.

Company I.

Dwight Blackmore, drafted; must. in Sept. 22, 1864; disch. by S. O. June 7, 1865.

Theodore Halter, drafted; must. in Sept. 22, 1864; disch. by S. O. June 7, 1865.

SIXTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

Company C.

(Mustered out July 14, 1865.)

James E. Eldred, 2d lieut., must. in Nov. 15, 1861; pro. from sergt. Co. I Jan. 4, 1862; died at Annapolis, Md., June 17, 1862.

Morris B. Van Auken, 2d lieut., must. in Nov. 23, 1861; pro. from 1st sergt. June 28, 1865; must. out with company; vet.

Francis R. Kellam, sergt., must. in Nov. 25, 1861; died at Annapolis, Md., Sept. 10, 1862.

A. C. Rosencrance, sergt., must. in Nov. 4, 1861.

Francis S. Roys, sergt., must. in Nov. 25, 1861; must. out Nov. 24, 1864, exp. of term.

David B. Swezey, corp., must. in Nov. 14, 1861; disch. on surg. certif. Dec. 28, 1864; vet.

Privates.

David Kelly, must. in Nov. 29, 1861; must. out Dec. 2, 1864, exp. of term.

Dese Knapp, must. in Nov. 14, 1861; must. out Nov. 24, 1864, exp. of term.

Francis R. Killam, must. in Nov. 25, 1861; not on muster-out roll.

Isaac Puderbaugh, must. in Nov. 4, 1861.

George M. Roys, must. in Jan. 4, 1862; died Dec. 2, 1863, of wounds received in action.

William H. Russell, must. in Nov. 15, 1861; killed by guerrillas May 25, 1863, near Winchester, Va.

John C. Thomas, must. in Nov. 25, 1861; must. out Nov. 24, 1864, exp. of term.

Bratton B. West, must. in Nov. 4, 1861; killed at Winchester, Va., Sept. 19, 1864; vet.

George Canfield, must. in Nov. 14, 1861; killed at Cold Harbor, Va., June 1, 1864.

Charles W. Canfield, must. in Nov. 14, 1861; died at Annapolis, Md., Sept. 11, 1862.

Edward R. Campfield, must. in Dec. 12, 1861; must. out Dec. 31, 1864.

William T. L. Houtig, must. in March 2, 1862; must. out with company July 14, 1865.

John J. Quick, must. in Nov. 4, 1861.

John Kilsby.

ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND REGIMENT.

Company G.

George Le Bar, 2d lieut., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; disch. by S. O. Oct. 24, 1862.

Amzi Le Bar, 1st lieut. must. in Aug. 31, 1862; disch. on surg. certif. July 1, 1863.

Peter F. Wagner, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; pro. to corp. Oct. 31, 1864; must. out with company May 29, 1865.

Henry Palmer, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; pro. to corp. May 25, 1863; wounded at Gettysburg, Pa., July 1, 1863; trans. to 3d Co., 2d Bat., V. R. C., date unknown; disch. Aug. 16, 1865.

Matthew G. Allegar, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; pro. to corp. May 25, 1863; died Aug. 6th, of wounds rec'd at Gettysburg July 1, 1863.

James Ferguson, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; died at Washington, D. C., June 23, 1863, of wounds rec'd at Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13, 1862.

N. S. Van Auken, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862; died at Brook's Station, Va., Nov. 25, 1862.

Oliver Pitney, corp., must. in Aug. 31, 1862.

Privates.

Charles Bensley, must. in Aug. 31, 1862; died at Washington, D. C., Jan. 12, 1863; buried in Mil. Asy. Cem.

CHAPTER IV.

RAILROADS— EFFORTS TO CONSTRUCT THEM —ADVANTAGES OFFERED.

It was a writer on the natural history of Ireland who, under the conspicuous caption Snakes of Ireland, wrote a chapter consisting solely of the declaration "There are no snakes in Ireland." So it may be said of the railroads of Pike County —there are no railroads in Pike County—excepting, of course, the Honesdale Branch of the Erie, which cuts off a northern corner, but in no adequate manner serves the people of the county.

Nevertheless, it will prove interesting to examine briefly the advantages which the county offers for the building of a railroad and to review the several projects for providing one which have proved futile, it is true, but may at least afford some suggestion of the final solution of the problem.

The valley of the Delaware River from the Water Gap to Port Jervis affords to the engineering eye a plane upon which some day, sooner or later, the iron horse will draw without breakage of bulk the wealth of the coal fields of Central Pennsylvania to the manufactories of the New England States; returning with the products of the loom, it will distribute the same on their way to the far West. First, because it is the most direct and therefore shortest air line between the East and West, and secondly because the descent from Port Jervis, Orange County, New York, on the east, to Stroudsburg, Monroe County, Pa., on the west, is only one hundred and twenty-seven feet, or three feet per mile of the forty-three miles to be traversed in closing the gap between the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad, with its eastern connections, and the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad and other coal roads running into Stroudsburg.

Again, the wealth of "blue-stone," as it is now known in the market, of which there is an inexhaustible supply in Pike County along the Delaware River, will be a further source of profit to the carrying trade of such a railroad.

Professor J. P. Lesley, State geologist, in his report of 1881, says: "The whole Catskill formation measures 3430 feet in northern and eastern Pike as exposed in the cliffs and slopes of the long canal—like gorges of the Paupack and Delaware." "The flagstone belt is very broad and crosses the county."

Where accessible to the Erie Railroad, quarries have been operated and on an average fifty car-loads are shipped weekly to New York City alone. Should a railroad be opened up the length of the Delaware River from Stroudsburg to Port Jervis, immense quarrying interests would start into being and the traffic in blue stone become a matter of much moment to the railroads.

Blue-stone flagging, worth to-day in Philadelphia from thirty-five to fifty cents per square foot, is worth, on the banks of the Delaware River at Milford ten cents per square foot. All the way up the Delaware River, on the Jersey side, smoke can be seen day and night issuing from the many lime-kilns dotting the hillsides, hardly a farm being without its own kiln, limestone of excellent quality cropping out all along the river.

The abutments of the wagon and foot-bridge crossing the Delaware River a mile below Milford, quarried on the Jersey bank, are a witness to the quality of the stone.

The many mountain streams emptying into the Delaware River for the whole length of these forty miles will afford in the future most valuable water-power for manufactories when once a railroad opens up this county to marts of commerce.

The Paupack stream, on the northern border of Pike County, has already been utilized by the Lambert Silk Company, who have imposing mills and a water-power of the greatest advantage.

This stream is only a sample of the many in the county plunging over cascades from five to sixty feet high, until they accomplish a descent of two hundred and sixty feet in a distance of only one mile.

The next stream flowing into the Delaware, the Blooming Grove, rushes along, making frequent cascades over its rocky bed, falling at the rate of one hundred feet per mile. The Shohola descends at a very rapid rate, falling five hundred and fifty feet in five miles.

Next, the Sawkill enters the Delaware at Milford, rising in the Sawkill Pond, some ten miles back, with a fall of one hundred and fifty feet to the mile. From a score of others on down the valley, which we will not minutely describe, unlimited power can be obtained, and in the near future will be utilized for manufacturing purposes.

The passenger traffic of our ideal railroad will include, beside those who will travel on it as a through line, the many summer tourists who now visit this wild and rugged county in search of health and recreation.

Under the influence of these many advantages by the lumber interest and others, as far back as the year 1848 a charter was sought and obtained from the Legislature of Pennsylvania to build a railroad from Milford to Port Jervis.

The breaking of ground for this early enterprise has been followed up to the present time by plots and counter-plots, by efforts of ignorant and shrewd railroad builders and speculators and by internal dissensions of the boards of directors of the various companies chartered, etc., until it would seem almost a miracle to the inhabitants of Pike County were the project to be taken hold of in earnest by honest men and the gap between the railroads, east and west, now existing, be filled up by the extension of some one of the present lines so as to reach the headwaters of the Delaware River.

By the original route of the New York and Erie Railway, that road was to cross the Delaware into Pennsylvania by a bridge opposite Port Jervis to a little hamlet on the Pennsylvania side known as Matamoras, a town now of some fifteen hundred inhabitants.

In consideration of an annual payment of ten thousand dollars to the State of Pennsylvania, the right to enter the State at that point was granted the company by the Legislature. Finding their proposed route was impracticable, the New York and Erie applied to the Legislature of Pennsylvania for the privilege of changing the place of entrance of the road into the State from Matamoras to Sawmill Rift, farther up the river. This change was disastrous to the projected Milford and Port Jervis Railroad, as it depended upon the bridge to be built by the Erie to cross the Delaware River. But the Erie, in consideration of the change, agreed to construct a wagon and railroad bridge across the Delaware at Matamoras and to maintain the same forever. Failure to keep a bridge across the river at the point named rendered the company liable to a forfeiture of all its rights in Pennsylvania.

The bridge was built in the year 1852. Conflicting interests and jarring directors delayed the building of the Milford and Port Jervis Railroad, the charter allowing twenty-five years for building, etc.

Early in 1870, however, measures were taken looking to an early completion of the road, but in March the bridge was wrecked and destroyed in a terrible gale.

As under the act allowing the Erie Railroad a change of entrance to the State, that company was bound to maintain this bridge, it was supposed it would be speedily rebuilt.

Precious time was lost, and when at last an effort was made to compel the Erie to rebuild the bridge it was found that a company, called the Lamonte Mining and Railroad Company, had been incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of mining in Pike County, and was authorized to purchase all the right, title and franchise of any other company in all bridges, etc., in the county. To this company the Erie Railroad had sold all its rights pertaining to the bridge in question, and claimed that the responsibility of maintaining it hereafter lay with the Lamonte Mining Company.

It was found that the names of the incorporators of the Lamonte Mining and Railroad Company were fictitious, and no information could be obtained of who introduced the bill or anything in regard to it.

In the same year the Legislature of Pennsylvania appropriated to the Milford and Matamoras and Port Jervis Railroad for ninety-nine years the ten thousand dollar annual payment made to the State by the Erie Railroad.

At last another effort was made to build the long-talked-of first ten miles of the railroad which would in the future open up the valley, trusting that time, etc., would remedy the lost bridge, etc.

But internal dissensions in the board of directors, and plots of scheming men, rendered all efforts futile. The original stockholders of the road were pushed aside, and the brother of the member of Assembly from this district, when all the nefarious legislative work was accomplished, was elected president of the road, and was henceforth to look after the State appropriation. The matter was laid before the State authorities by the original stockholders, and before long the act of appropriation was repealed.

Unfortunately, this had its bad effect upon the genuine and honest promoters of the railroad, and the bridge matter had in the meantime undergone further changes.

An incorporated company of New York State, entitled the Barret Bridge Company, had purchased of the Lamonte Mining Company, and a bridge was speedily promised.

Work was immediately begun, and travelers up the Delaware River Valley and inhabitants of the county were gladdened by the sight of the actual work being prosecuted. But lo! in the kaleidoscopic changes which had occurred one could hardly recognize any trace of the former valuable bridge liabilities and franchises. In this instance the soul and living spirit of the matter had departed; nothing was left but what was of value to a "soulless corporation."

The Barret Bridge Company, under its New York charter, built only a wagon bridge, and has since levied a heavy toll upon all passengers. Stock of this bridge is all in the hands of a few Port Jervis capitalists, and pays an enormous dividend.

In the year 1873, the advantages of the plane of the Delaware River for a railroad bed again aroused attention, and a company, known as the Lehigh and Eastern Railroad Company, having a charter for a railroad from Hazelton, Pa., to the Delaware River, at Port Jervis, began operations.

Again a survey was made, ground was broken, fences torn down, etc., and a railroad up the valley was an assured fact; but when the matter of the old bridge at Matamoras, which the Erie should have kept and maintained, was examined, and it was discovered that Credit Mobilier methods were to be used in the construction of the road, the whole matter assumed a new aspect, and the work was abandoned in the hopeless depths of rascality.

Legislative enactments and inquiries, Erie opposition, local dissensions and rascality, etc., wore out the patience of stockholders, and all that remains of the much-talked-of project is, here and there along the line, surveyors' stakes, a culvert or two and graded stretches.

Some three or four years later an abortive attempt was made to carry out the project by the chartering of the Delaware Valley Railroad, but this effort, too, came to naught. It followed in the old ruts and no mind connected with it seemed to have the ability to straighten its affairs out.

Products of the county in this year of grace 1886 are carted fifteen and twenty miles, as in "ye olden time." The Erie at Port Jervis receives the heavier freight of blue-stone, lumber, ties, hoop-poles, etc., whilst farming products are carted to the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad, at Stroudsburg, or cross the Delaware River, either at Milford or Dingman's, to reach the New York, Ontario and Western Railroad, at Branchville, Deckertown or Newton, fifteen and more miles away.

In the past ten years large hotels have been built in Milford, Dingman's, etc., and the necessity of rapid communication with New York and Philadelphia is much more urgent than when, in 1848, the original projectors of a railroad laid their plans, which have been so violently distorted and set at naught.

CHAPTER V.

BOROUGH OF MILFORD.

PIONEER HISTORY AND TRADITIONAL MATTER.—About the year 1733 a Hollander named Thomas Quick emigrated from the Fatherland to the colony of New York, and not long afterwards located on the Delaware, in what afterwards became known as Upper Smithfield, and still later as Milford, Pennsylvania. His circumstances were equal to those of the affluent Dutch immigrants of that period. He pitched his tent considerably in advance of his predecessors, and, according to the testimony of his descendants, was the pioneer settler of Milford. Quick erected a log cabin, cleared land and built a barn, which he stored with wheat and maize, the fruits of his industry. In 1734, Thomas Quick, the Indian killer, was born. He was the pet of the household, and the Indians who frequented Quick's house, where they found a friendly shelter whenever they desired, admired the fine, healthy boy, and often made him presents of plumes of feathers and other articles. As he grew up among the Indians he learned to speak their language, and was also taught how to take the otter, beaver, etc. He thus imbibed a liking for the savage life of a hunter, trapper and fisherman, and could not be induced to follow regularly any other occupation. He had two brothers, James and Cornelius, and two sisters who became the wives of Solomon Decker and Francis Magee. A Dutch school was established in the neighborhood, to which the children were sent, but Thomas had become so much of an Indian in his instincts and habits, that he could with difficulty be induced to attend school, and thus learned but little.

Meanwhile, Thomas Quick, Sr., continued to prosper and erected a saw-mill and grist-mill on a stream entering the Delaware near Milford, probably the Vandemark.

While Tom's brothers were poring over the Dutch alphabet, he was shooting, trapping, wrestling and jumping with the young Indian braves. During these years he roamed over all the region of country in the vicinity of his father's cabin, and made himself familiar with the hunting-grounds and rivers in Minisink, Mamecotink, the Shawangunk, the Wawasink, the Mahackamack or Neversink, the Mangawping or Mingwing, etc. This knowledge afterwards became of great service to him in waylaying and murdering Indians. The Lenni Lenape or Delaware Indians, who inhabited the Minisink, through which ran the Lenape Wihittuck or Delaware River, looked with alarm on the increasing number of white men who invaded their favorite hunting-grounds, and took possession of the ancient home of the Lenni Lenape or original people, by an overreaching policy. During the French and Indian War these jealousies were easily kindled into a flame by French emissaries, who induced the Six Nations and other powerful tribes to make common cause with them against the English. The Quicks had been kind to the Indians, but they were the first to encroach upon them at Milford, and the prospect of plundering an opulent man like Quick was sufficient to weaken any ties of gratitude that might linger in the savage breast. When hostilities commenced, the Quicks and their friends became uneasy. The natives were less sociable and finally withdrew from the Delaware Valley altogether. Each party distrusted the other; the Indians, feeling they had been wronged, determined to drive every Englishman off of their lands. Quiet reigned after the Indians departed until the Quicks and their neighbors became careless. One day the old man crossed the Delaware to procure hoop-poles, others say to grind a grist, Tom and his brother-in-law accompanying him, all unarmed. As they were proceeding leisurely round a point or ridge near the river, they were fired upon by ambushed Indians and the old man fell, mortally wounded. The young men, who were unhurt, endeavored to drag him after them as they fled.

The savages did not make immediate pursuit, probably waiting for the main body to come up. They soon arrived, however, and the young men, who were bearing their father to a place of safety, abandoned him when he could go no farther, even with their assistance, as he exclaimed, "I am dying; leave me and run for your lives!" After much urging they finally left him and on the way across the Delaware, which was then frozen, they were fired upon and young Tom was thrown down by a ball which took the heel off his boot, and the Indians shouted, "There lies Tom Quick," but he was soon up and out of danger, as the savages did not dare to pursue across the Delaware. Tom and his brother-in-law finding that they were not pursued, crept back near enough to hear the scalp-whoop of the Indians. Young Tom was frantic with grief and rage, and swore that he would never make peace with the Indians as long as one could be found upon the banks of the Delaware. From this time forth the demon of unrelenting savage hatred took possession of Tom Quick, and he became more like the savages he hunted than like a civilized man. He did not enter the army, but waged ceaseless warfare upon the Indians wherever he found them, both in times of profound peace and war. He regarded neither age nor sex in his relentless warfare. The time has long since ceased when any such cold-blooded murderer can be exalted to the rank of a hero; but as his reputation as an Indian slayer is far extended, we will condense from a life of "Tom Quick, the Indian Slayer," by James E. Quinlan, a brief account of some of his exploits. It does not appear that he signalized himself in any way during the French and Indian War; but after peace was declared and the hatchet buried, he commenced operations independently. Such of the former inhabitants of the Neversink and Delaware as were living returned to their clearings and possessions. The Indians, too, began to revisit their old haunts, supposing they would be well received by the whites, but the fire and the scalping-knife yet retained a vivid place in the recollection of the settlers, and in the hearts of many of the pioneers there rankled undying hatred. Notwithstanding this aversion, nearly all the settlers were careful to avoid all cause of offense. Among the Indians who came back was a drunken vagabond, named Muskwink or Modeline, who had assisted in murdering Tom's father. About two years after the war Tom went to Decker's tavern, on the Neversink. Muskwink was there, somewhat intoxicated, very bold and talkative, claiming Tom's acquaintance and desiring him to drink with him. Tom refused and bestowed a contemptuous epithet upon the Indian, which caused the snake-like eyes of the latter to glitter with rage. A conversation of an irritating character passed between them, during which Modeline gave a detailed account of the killing of Thomas Quick, Sr., asserting that he scalped him with his own hands, at the same time mimicking the grievances of the dying man, and, to corroborate his assertion, exhibited the silver sleeve buttons worn by his victim at the time. This brutal recital aroused the devil in Tom's heart. He was unarmed, but there was a French musket in the bar-room, hanging on pegs driven into a beam directly over the hearthstone. Tom quickly took this musket from its place, ascertained that it was loaded and primed, cocked the gun and placing the muzzle within a few feet of Modeline's breast, ordered him to leave the house. He arose slowly and sullenly from his seat and proceeded to the door, Tom following after him. He drove the savage into the main road between Wurtsborough and Carpenter's Point. After proceeding about a mile toward the latter place he exclaimed, "Indian dog, you'll kill no more white men!" and aiming the musket, which was loaded with a heavy charge of slugs, shot the savage in the back between the shoulders. Modeline jumped two or three feet from the ground and fell upon his face dead. Tom took from him the buttons which had belonged to his father, drew the body to a tree that the wind had torn up by the roots, and kicking some leaves and dirt over it, left it there. Some say that he severed the head from the body, stuck it on a stake by the road and left it there.

After the assassination of Modeline, Tom returned to Decker's tavern, put the musket in its proper place, drank a glass of rum and left the neighborhood. Several years afterward Philip Decker cleared the land and in plowing turned up the Indian's bones. A pair of bars in the fence at that place are known as Modeline's bars to this day. This transaction caused considerable excitement at the time, some holding that Tom should be arrested and sent to prison, others contending that he had performed a meritorious act. Tom was certainly laboring under great provocation, and we can find greater excuse for this transaction than for many which followed. His next exploit, which occurred shortly after, was the murdering of an Indian family, consisting of a man, his wife and three children, who were in a canoe on the Delaware, near Butler's Rift.

The Indian seemed to be unarmed, and, with the others, was evidently not apprehensive of danger. They were on the same side of the river with Tom, and proceeded leisurely along, the children enjoying the journey and seeming very happy. When Quick saw them he concealed himself in the long reed grass which grew on the shore, and as they approached near he recognized the Indian as one who had visited his father's house before the war, and been engaged in several outrages on the frontier. When within gunshot Tom rose up, and in the Indian tongue, ordered them to come ashore. The Indian turned pale, but dared not disobey. He then inquired where they were going, to which answer was made. He then remarked they had reached their journey's end. The Indian answered that it was "peace time," that "the hatchet was buried." But Tom replied that there could be no peace between the red-skins and him, and that he would wage eternal war with them. He then shot the man and tomahawked the squaw and her children. The two eldest "squeaked like young crows," so Tom said. He had proceeded thus far without compunctions of conscience, or feeling that he was committing a most horrible massacre. But as he raised the tomahawk to give the fatal blow to the youngest, the babe—for it was nothing more—looked up wonderingly into his face and smiled. The innocence and unconsciousness of danger beaming from its sunny childish eyes caused him to relent. His arm fell to his side. He could not strike it. But the fact suddenly thrust itself upon him that the child would in a few years become an Indian, and this so enraged him that he dashed out its brains. He sank the bodies in the river and destroyed the canoe. He did not tell of this deed until years afterwards. When asked why he killed the children, he would reply "Nits make lice." The foregoing murders are as well authenticated as any of his numerous exploits.

There are many wonderful stories told of him which have been preserved by tradition and which are firmly believed by the oldest members of the Quick family and other families who lived in the vicinity of his home in Westfall township, at Rosetown, where he now lies buried on part of the old James Rosenkrutz property.

Among the improbable stories is the one concerning rail-splitting. It is alleged that seven Indians caught him splitting rails and told him he must go along with them. He said he would if they would help him get the log split in two. They put their fingers in the crack on either side to assist him and he knocked the wedge out, and as their fingers were all fast in the log he knocked their brains out at his leisure. The buck with seven skins is more like Tom. On hunting with an Indian with the understanding that he was to have the meat, while the Indian had the skins, they killed seven deer. Tom fell behind the Indian, who had the skins on his back, shot him and took the skins, along with the meat, which was hung up in the woods, saying that he had shot a buck with seven skins.

Tradition says that on his death-bed he claimed to have killed ninety-nine Indians and begged them to bring an old Indian who lived in the settlement that he might kill him before he died and thus make an even hundred. After participating in the murder of Canope at Handsome Eddy, he had no more Indian adventures. His last episode was with the panthers. He and his dogs killing two old and two young ones in one day. His headquarters in the summer were generally at the house of Showers, near Mongaup Island, or at a hut near Hagen Pond, where he hunted and trapped. He never married. He was outlawed by the government, it being an understood thing that no Indian who killed him would be held accountable by the whites.

In his old age he was looked upon as a hero by the pioneer hunters and trappers. He died at James Rosencrance's, in the year 1795 or 1796, and was buried on his farm.

During his last illness he never expressed a regret that he had killed so many Indians, but was sorry he had not killed a greater number. Those who knew Tom in his latter days say he had carried his favorite rifle until the stock where it rested on his shoulder was worn through, so that the ramrod was visible at the place.

The Indian slayer, weather-beaten, with worn-out accoutrements and dogs in keeping, would have formed no bad subject for the pencil. It would be difficult to find a parallel to the life of Tom Quick. Waging a relentless warfare against a savage foe, outlawed by his own government, he still continued to murder his victims until his name became a terror to his foes, and at last died unrepentant and handed down to posterity by contemporary frontiersmen as a hero.

EARLY SETTLERS.—Among the pioneers at Milford before the town was laid out or named were the names of Wells, Newman, Seely, Harford, Vandemark and Brodhead. The place was known as Wells' Ferry during the Revolutionary struggle, three Wells brothers having come from Connecticut. Their names were Jesse, James and Israel. Jesse Wells built a grist-mill on the Sawkill, where Jacob Klaer's mill now is, the people from across the river fording the creek below the mill; hence it became known as Mill-ford. General Samuel C. Seely is sometimes mentioned as having been connected with this mill, which is denied by others. He may have had an interest in a grist-mill at this point for a short time. There was also a saw-mill near the grist-mill. The Sawkill and Vandemark Creeks furnish good water-power, and saw-mills and grist-mills were erected on these streams from the earliest settlement of the place. Even old Tom Quick is said to have had a grist-mill and a saw-mill here in 1733–54. We find traditionary history and documentary evidence have alike connected the pioneer history of Milford with grist-mills. The reader must not infer they were very extensive enterprises, but simply little "Tub Mills," as they were called, with a single run of native stone, capable of grinding about as much as a good-sized coffee-mill. Even this slow process was better than beating it with a pestle and mortar. The Wellses undoubtedly had a ferry here. Old people remember that Jacob Kittle was a ferryman at Milford in the year 1808. James Wells lived at Panther Brook or Shohola. Israel Wells was drowned in the Delaware, below Moses Dietrick's place, about 1803. He lived on the hill south of the Sawkill, on the farm now owned by Mrs. John Heller and John Wallace. His children were Benjamin, Abram, Jesse, Lydia, Nathan, David, Peter, Harriet and Sally. Abram and Jesse lived on the turnpike on farms, and raised large families, who have since departed. Nathan was a cabinet-maker and lived in Milford. He invented the Wells Fanning-Mill, and established a factory, which is now operated by Henry Wells. Nathan Wells married Ann Rockwell. Of their children, Edgar is ticket agent and Frank is baggage-master on the Erie Railroad at Port Jervis; Peter is a merchant in the same village; Mary lives on the homestead, opposite the Sawkill House, with her mother, who is now eighty-eight years of age.

David Wells married Caroline Austin, and was a cabinet-maker and undertaker in Milford. His children were Helen, wife of Charles Biddis and mother of Senator Biddis; Halstead, who remained at home until his death; Caroline, wife of William H. Armstrong, attorney-at-law, who had been in the Internal Revenue Department at Washington for eighteen years, and resigned when the Democrats came into power (John D. Biddis, his brother-in-law, now has the office). David A. Wells represented Wayne and Pike in the Legislature of Pennsylvania one term. He finally kept the Glen House, where he died.

Isaac Newman came from Connecticut about 1765, located on a meadow just below the spot where James Pinchot is now building, and engaged in farming. His children were Asa, Isaac, Thomas, Ira, Susanna, Rebecca and Hannah. Of these, Asa and Isaac went to Montgomery County; Thomas removed to New Jersey; Ira married Mary Bross, a sister of Abram Bross, one of the old settlers of Lackawaxen. She lay in the lap of her mother in a swamp about three miles from the Delaware, in New Jersey, when the Indians raided that vicinity. Mrs. Bross muzzled the dog when the savages passed, who were in sight of the anxious mother, but did not see her and her infant daughter. Mr. Newman built a house in Milford, where Archie Brink now lives, in 1807. He was eighty and his wife eighty-six, when they died. His children were Laura, who married William Brink, and lived in Dingman township, where she still resides with her son, aged eighty-eight. Nancy married John M. Heller; their son, Martin V. Heller, is a railroad superintendent. Solomon Newman lived in Milford; his son, John B. Newman, now has a store in the place.

Thomas Newman lives in Milford, and served as constable for forty-four years, in which capacity he has been called into all parts of Pike County to serve processes. Living at the county-seat, he was called before justices of the peace in various parts of the county. Among others he often appeared before Mason Dimmick, Esq., who then kept tavern at Mellener's Eddy, where William Place now has a stand, and there Thomas Newman secured for his life partner Dimmick's only daughter. Their son, Charles B. Newman, is now district attorney of Pike County. Mr. Newman is nearly eighty years of age, and has a distinct recollection of many of the old residents of Milford who now sleep in Milford Cemetery. Ira B. Newman lived in Milford, and taught school until he died, when a middle-aged man. Catharine married David Howell and lives in Lehman. Malenna was unmarried.

One of the early settlers of what is now Milford was Samuel C. Seely. He obtained warrants for and located two tracts of land, one in his own name and the other in that of his wife, Patience Seely. These tracts included both sides of the Sawkill Creek, from the "river flats" up-stream about a mile, covering the sites for water-power on that creek for that distance. Soon after the surveys were made he settled upon the land and erected a grist-mill, which is said to have been on the site of the Klaer mill, that Wells' mill is said to have occupied. It is probable that one of these parties had the mill for a short time and then sold it to the other. Seely's residence was on the old "Wilderness Road," which was opened through to Wyoming by Connecticut colonists in 1762. Old people say that he had a store here, it being the first store in all this region of country. His wife was Miss Patience Morrell, of New York, a woman of refinement and possessing property.

When he brought his wife to the wilderness home, at Minisink, their dwelling was a log cabin, and their oven out of doors, being built upon a level-topped rock of suitable height to form the oven floor. The first time the young wife heated the oven for baking, she was greatly startled, while at her work, by the sight of six or eight large rattlesnakes, that crawled out from under the rock as it had warmed by fire. Samuel C. Seely was one of the four judges commissioned to hold office during good behavior, shortly after the act of 21st March, 1798, erecting Wayne County. Samuel Preston, John Ryerson, Samuel C. Seely and John Biddis, although not lawyers, were commissioned to hold Courts of Common Pleas. Judge Ryerson was removed March 30, 1803, and Richard Brodhead the next day commissioned as judge in his place. Judge Seely resigned May 13, 1803, and was the same day admitted to the bar as an attorney-at-law. It does not appear that he ever practiced before the courts.

These early judges were of about the same mental calibre as an ordinary justice of the peace, and their decisions were based upon the principles of natural justice, as it appeared to men of good common sense. They held the first courts in Wayne County at Milford, Wilsonville and Bethany, during the long controversy, ending in the permanent location of the seat at the last-named place, and finally in the erection of Pike into a new county, in 1814.

Samuel Seely, son of Rev. Christopher Seely, was born in 1756, probably at Morristown, N. J. Though only a boy at the outbreak of the Revolution, he early bore an active part in the conflict. His name appears for the first time in the list of officers and men of the militia of Elizabeth Town, who entered on board a number of shallops, January 22, 1776, in order to take the British ship "Blue Mountain Valley."

He held commissions in the three successive organizations of Continental troops, known as First, Second and Third Establishments. His final rank was first lieutenant of the First Regiment of the New Jersey Line. In this he served to the end of the war, and was honorably discharged with the brevet rank of captain. He probably obtained the title of general from some militia organization. General Seely had his slaves, in common with the prominent early settlers in the Minisink, and drove with his coach-and-four in much style, but during the latter part of his life lost his property and lived with his son-in-law, Judge Dingman, who had married his daughter, the Widow Burrell, for a second wife. He died September 28, 1819, aged sixty-three, and is buried in Delaware Cemetery, at Dingman's Ferry. He had a large family of children. Of these children, Samuel and Christopher and Charlotte, wife of John Thompson, lived in New York; William went to sea; Cornelia and Maria were twins (Cornelia was the wife of Paschal Wells, of Brooklyn, and Maria married John Ennis, who lived just across the river from Dingman's Ferry); Harriet married Isaac Burrell, and resided in Sandyson, N. J.; Sarah H. Burrell, the oldest daughter, was the wife of Abram Decker, who lived in Delaware township; Daniel Burrell is there also; Rev. William H. Burrell is a Methodist preacher; and Charles S. Burrell resides in Chicago.

John Biddis, Sr., a resident of Philadelphia, of Welsh descent, bought the land where Milford now stands, in the year 1793, or thereabouts, had the town laid out into building lots, etc. He built a grist and saw-mill, and carried on an extensive business. His children were Catharine, wife of Hugh Ross, an eccentric preacher and lawyer. Edward, a graduate of West Point, and in the Seminole War. Sarah Biddis, married James Barton, who built the first Milford water-works, the upper or Barton's grist-mill, now owned by Jervis Gordon, and the Biddis mill, which was on the old Wells & Seely mill-site, and is owned by Jacob Klaer. Barton had three daughters. Ann, who was the wife of John Clark, who furnished the Pike County House and kept tavern there a number of years. Of Clark's children, Theodosia was the wife of Oscar Mott, and Augustus the wife of William E. Salmon, Esq. George Biddis and John Biddis were in partnership in the mill and a store, which they established in Milford, until John Biddis died. George Biddis was a bachelor. John Biddis' wife was Martha Britton, and his children were George Biddis and Britton A. Biddis, who are deceased, and Charles Ross Biddis, who has been sheriff of Pike County one term, and county treasurer three terms. Charles R. Biddis is one of those irrepressible men who, if put down at one point, will rise at another. His predecessors had used up in one way or another nearly all of the ancestral inheritance, so that Charles, left to his own resources, took the contract for carrying the mail from Milford to Hamlinton, by way of Blooming Grove and Hawley, making a round trip of one hundred miles once a week. He carried this mail for eight years and rarely missed a trip. "Uncle Ira Crissman" kindly took his note for one hundred and seventy dollars for a large, iron-gray horse, which Biddis drove for seven years without missing a single trip. Mr. Biddis now lives comfortably, the result of his untiring industry. His wife was Helen R., a daughter of Caroline Wells. His only son, John D. Biddis, is a clerk in the Internal Revenue Deparment at Washington. John Biddis, Sr., was one of the first four judges appointed by the Governor to hold a Court of Common Pleas in Wayne County.

THE TOWN LAID OUT.—As already mentioned, it was John Biddis, Sr., who planted the town of Milford and placed its lands in the market. It appears that he entered upon this project in 1793, but that it was not consummated until 1796. His plan involved the operation of a lottery, which he advertised widely, together with a description of the town site. Following is the advertisement which he issued:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"Proposals for establishing a town on the River Delaware at the distance of 120 miles from Philadelphia.

"The proprietor of that noted situation in Upper Smithfield township, in the county of Northampton, bounded on the River Delaware and Saw creek, generally known by the name of Wells Ferry, having laid out a town, consisting of five thousand and thirty lots, where the road from Wyoming, Shoholy and Lechawaxen to the northward and to the Eastern States intersect on an elevated situation and commanding eminence, so that it is effectually secured from inundation when there are freshes in the river, added to which, its fine, level surface or plain of a very considerable extent, over the whole of which, or town-flat, a never-failing supply of most excellent water can be introduced from a neighboring spring, the expense of which will be but trifling. Fronting the town, the River forms a natural cove or Eddy, possessing singular advantages for the sheltering of Boats and Lumber. Its prospects also of forming a capital seat for trade with the interior parts, as well of the State of New York and New Jersey as of Pennsylvania, to a very considerable extent, and the measures adopted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania for rendering the Delaware a safe navigation will, of course, turn those advantages of commerce which have heretofore proceeded to New York, to the city of Philadelphia. The streams which nearly form the boundaries of this Town on the northwest and southeast are well known for their regular supplies of water, and must have their influence to prove the eligibility of situation for almost every manufacturing purpose. Its central situation renders it almost evident that whenever a division of the county north of the Blue Mountain shall take place, which period cannot be far Distant, it will become the Seat of Justice. The peculiar advantages in erecting Buildings at this place must be obvious, when the saw-mills already erected on the above-mentioned stream are taken into consideration. By taking the whole of the above into a general view, it is conceived that there are few situations on the River possessed of so many natural advantages, and for the Better promoting the same, the Proprietor offers the following advantages: To erect one paper-mill, on an extensive plan, for the manufacture of Sheathing-Paper and Paste Boards, and all such kinds of paper as shall be deemed most advantageous, agreeable to a late important discovery of his own, and also to add five hundred dollars in Stock for carrying on the said manufactory for the term of seven years, for the benefit of the subscribers who shall appoint a Superintendent for the same, and also a factor to Reside in the city of Philadelphia to receive and dispose of the productions thereof.

"By referring to the annexed certificate, the Proprietor presumes that there needs nothing further to convince Subscribers of the advantage that may arise from the said Manufactory, but to assure them that the materials for the sheathing-paper is only Bark and hair, and that of Paste-board, Saw-Dust and Bark, with a small proportion of Junk.

"To each Town Lot there will be a proportion of two acres. This land lies situated without the Town, as will appear by referring to the plan to be seen at the City Tavern, and at the Dwelling of the Proprietor, adjacent to the premises. The number of Lots will be considered as so many Shares, for the disposing of which a subscription is opened at twenty Dollars per share, to be paid in four quarterly installments, and, previous to any money being advanced, vouchers shall be produced for the performance of every matter. And all that would wish to promote the progress of Settling the Unimproved Lands North of the Blue Mountains, and also become instrumental in preserving the advantages of Commerce of a Large Scope of Country, to the City of Philadelphia, 'tis hoped will become Subscribers.

"The Mode for Settling the Town in Deeds will be given to the Subscribers for the holders thereof to make choice of any vacant Lot, whenever they shall be ready to erect tenantable Buildings thereon, and the out Lots to be numbered 1, 2, 3, &c., and whoever erects the first Building on a Town Lot takes No. 1 of the former, and so on in rotation.

"JOHN BIDDIS.

"We, the subscribers, being well acquainted with the Situation of the Premises of the foregoing Publication, do hereby certify that the description therein given is founded on truth,—

"Subscriptions will be received by Peter L. Barbier Duplesis, No. 86 Chestnut Street; Edward Bonsall & Co., at their office, in Fourth, near Walnut Street; B. Johnson, No. 147 Market Street; John Jarvis, No. 126 North Third Street, and by the Proprietor."[1]

The following is a copy of one of the lottery tickets or certificates:

"This certificate shall obligate the Subscriber, his Heirs, Executors, or Administrators, to convey to the Holder such Lot, with its Improvements, in the Town of Milford, laid out in the county of Northampton and State of Pennsylvania, as shall be drawn against its number agreeably to his Proposals. Set forth to the Public the 12th day of January, 1796.

"JOHN BIDDIS.

"No. 402."

This particular certificate or ticket drew lot 51, near the mouth of the Vandermark Creek, on which was a saw-mill.

A large portion of the town plat passed into the possession of John Crosby, and, in 1797, was sold by the sheriff in accordance with the following announcement:

"By virtue of two certain writs of Venditioni Exponas to me directed, issued from the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, will be exposed for sale at the house of John Shock, Inn-keeper, in Easton, on Friday, the 26th day of May instant, at 12 o'clock of the day, 137 lots in the town of Milford, situate on the river Delaware, in Upper Smithfield township, with two acres of land attached or pertaining to each of said town lots; on lot No. 51, agreeably to the plan of the town, is erected a dwelling-house and saw-mill, and on No. 375 a water grist-mill, seized and taken in execution as the property of John Crosby.

"HENRY SPERING, Sheriff.

"May the 9th, 1797."

The first house on the site of Milford borough was built by Robert Harford, on the east corner of the lot now owned by Mrs. E. A. Lewis. It is the house in which Dr. Francis Al. Smith died, and in which Lewis Cornelius formerly kept tavern. The second was built by Johnson, a New Englander, is a part of the house in which George Bowhanan died, and in which a part of his family now live. The third was commenced by —— Lee, and was a hemlock frame, raised and abandoned, near where the barn of Jacob Klaer, Jr., now stands. A part of the house in which D. M. Van Auken now lives was an old dwelling many years ago. Frederick Vandemark occupied it. He, his wife and one son died there.[2]

The Vandemark house referred to in McCarty's recollections is now within the borough limits, the old house being used as a kitchen by Van Auken. The boards of the ceiling are fastened with wooden pins instead of nails. But little is known of Vandemark. The creek near this house is named in his honor. John H. Brodhead, father-in-law of D. M. Van Auken, thought the house existed before the Revolution, and it is claimed that bullet-marks have been found on the door. William McCarty, who made the statements preserved by Jenny Bross, said that "time began to count with him in 1791." He was a son of old Philip McCarty, one of the first settlers in Dingman township.

[2] Recollections of William McCarty, father of John McCarty, constable, July 11, 1878, in presence of Jenny A. Bross, of Morris, Grundy County, Ill.

It has generally been claimed that a man by the name of Vandemark was the first settler on the present site of Milford. The Vandemarks are found early in the Smithfield settlement. At an Orphans' Court, held at Easton, July 19, 1766, Benjamin Vandemark, of Upper Smithfield, petitioned for an inquest on the estate of Garret Brink, who had died about eleven years before intestate, leaving sundry lands in Upper Smithfield and five children,—Sarah, wife of petitioner; Charity Van Gorden, widow of Peter Van Gorden; Mary, Lydia and Jannicha. Benjamin Vandemark sold land in Lower Smithfield to John Vandemark, August 1, 1771, adjoining John McMichael and John Drake, which was near Stroudsburg. Joseph Rider, of Upper Smithfield, sold one hundred and three acres and one hundred and fifteen perches of land to Frederick Vandemark, of the same place, bounded on one side by the Delaware River, May 10, 1784. Rider claims to have patented the land that year. This land was evidently the site of Milford. Frederick Vandemark and his wife and child died, according to McCarty's recollections, and probably whatever title he had was lost.

Later Settlers.—John Brodhead, son of Garret Brodhead and brother of Sheriff Richard Brodhead, was born March 3, 1766, at East Stroudsburg. He married Catharine Heiner, and moved to Milford at an early day. He was the first clerk of the courts on the organization of Wayne County, September 10, 1798. This court was held at first in George Bowhanan's house, in Milford. At that time the offices of prothonotary, register, recorder and clerk of the courts were held by one person. He studied surveying under Colonel William Wills, March 27, 1792, and was a member of the Legislature in 1812. He died September 15, 1821. His children were Dan M. Brodhead,[1] who is the father of Edgar Brodhead, of Port Jervis, and John Heiner Brodhead, who was born at Milford, January 5, 1802. On the 3d of April, 1833, he was appointed prothonotary, recorder, etc., of Pike County, and served three years. In 1839 Governor Porter made him one of his aides, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1841 he was elected a member of the Legislature. In 1843 Governor Porter appointed him associate judge for five years. In 1843 he was elected county treasurer; in 1856 elected associate judge, and appointed collector on the State improvements at Harrisburg in 1858–59. From 1860 to 1867 he was clerk in the Interior and War Departments at Washington. President Johnson appointed him one of the commissioners to locate the county-seats of Carbon and Wyoming Counties. In 1878 he was a clerk in the Treasury Department at Washington. His wife was Louisa Ross, their children being Louisa, wife of Dr. Carpenter, of Brooklyn; Rev. Dr. Augustus Brodhead, who has been a missionary to India twenty years, and is now preaching the gospel at Bridgeton, N. J.; Mary G. Brodhead, of Milford; John F. Brodhead, who married a daughter of Dr. Avery, of Honesdale; Ross Brodhead, who went to China, or it was so supposed, and was never heard of afterward; Maria, wife of Hon. D. M. Van Auken; Mark Brodhead, a merchant in Washington; and Catharine, wife of Senator Van Wyck, of Nebraska.

Constantine Pinchot was a merchant in Bretielle, an inland village about sixty miles from Paris, where Cyville Constantine Desiré Pinchot, the subject of this sketch, was born in the eighth year of the republic. When a mere lad, he espoused the cause of Napoleon Bonaparte, and wished to enlist in the army of the "Man of Destiny," but was too young. After Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo, his adherents were hunted down by the Bourbons, who had assumed control. Party spirit ran high and ties of kindred found no protection. Cyville's cousin, a Bourbon, reported the zealous young Bonapartist to the authorities, when Cyville and his father thought it politic to leave France, which they accordingly did in 1816, bringing their stock of goods with them to New York, from whence they came to Milford, and built a house and store where Oscar Mott's widow now resides. Mr. Pinchot cleared the ground where he built his house, his store being a long building, part of which is still standing. Constantine Pinchot had purchased four hundred acres of land in Dingman township, still known as the French lot, while he was in New York, which first led him to Milford, although he never occupied the farm, but lived in Milford. He had one daughter, Hortense, born in Milford, who married George Stoll, son of Judge James Stoll, of New Jersey, who died, when she became the wife of John I. Westbrook, of the firm of Westbrook & Stoll, of Port Jervis. Constantine Pinchot did not long survive his settlement in Milford, and, upon his death, young Cyville took charge of his business, which he conducted with energy and untiring industry until he had acquired a competence, when he gradually retired from active life and gave his four sons an interest in the store. Cyville D. Pinchot was active in all matters that interested the public. He believed that farming could be made to pay, and spent some thirty thousand dollars on the property known as the "Stone House Farm," in Dingman township. He was passionately fond of a good horse, and his stable contained some of the finest specimens of that noble animal to be found in the county. The only pastime he allowed himself was to occasionally hold the reins on one of his fine horses. He was a Huguenot, and, consequently, a Calvinist. He, accordingly, identified himself with the Presbyterian Church of Milford, while in its infancy, in August, 1832. From that time forward, for forty years, he was an earnest working member of the church and one of its most liberal supporters. He is remembered as an honest, enterprising man, whose success was the just reward of his untiring industry and fair dealing. His first wife, a daughter of Dan Dimmick, Esq., of Milford, died young, without issue. His second wife, a cousin of the first, was a daughter of John T. Cross, Esq., also a member of the Milford bar. Both were grandchildren of De Aerts, whose father was Lord of Opdorf and Immerseele, in Belgium. Their children were Edgar, James W., John F., Mary A. (wife of George W. Warner, a lawyer at Bridgeport, Conn.) and Cyville (now dead.)

Edgar Pinchot and, in fact, all the sons were engaged in business with their father for a time, and John F. Pinchot still continues the mercantile business at Milford, there being a continuous succession in the family since the business was first started, in 1816, till the present time. Edgar Pinchot was a merchant from the age of nineteen until 1875, being twenty-five years in New York City, in the wholesale drug firm of Pinchot & Bruen. He retired from active business in 1875, returned to his native place and built an elegant brick residence on the corner of Fifth and Ann Streets, which he now occupies. He was appointed associate judge of Pike County by Governor Hoyt, and resigned to act as Presidental elector for James A. Garfield. He has been a member of the State Central Committee, and chairman of the Republican County Committee a number of times since he came to Milford. His wife is a daughter of Darius Maples, of Delaware County, N. Y.

James W. Pinchot was a wholesale manufacturer and dealer in wall paper, in the firm of Pinchot, Warren & Co., until he became wealthy, and retired from the firm a few years ago. He married a daughter of Amos R. Eno, and is one of the wealthy men of New York City. He is erecting an elegant stone castle on a commanding eminence overlooking the beautiful town of Milford and the noble Delaware River, as it winds through the historic Minisink Valley, with its rocky encarpment of abrupt bluffs that support the highlands of Pike County on one side and the receding and cultivated hills of New Jersey on the other. Ascending the hill-side a short distance above the building by a forest path through pine and oak, the ear catches the sound of the falling waters of the beautiful Sawkill Falls as they tumble over rocks a distance of ninety feet into the deep gorge below.

The castle is built after a Norman-Breton model found in the Scottish highlands. The main building is eighty-one by fifty-two feet, and the wing twenty-seven by fifty-seven. There are three turrets or towers on three corners of the main building, each twenty feet in diameter and sixty-three feet high. The building is of native stone and is two stories high, with an attic. It contains twenty-three fire-places, a large dining hall and easy stairway to numerous cosy rooms finished in imitation of the old baronial style. The Delaware and the distant mountains rising in the background form a magnificent landscape as seen from the castle.

James Wallace came to Maryland from Scotland and thence to Milford at an early day and built a house where De Behrle's hotel now is. He was evidently poor, commenced mercantile life as a pack peddler and soon opened a store in Milford. He was an enterprising man and by strict integrity and fair dealing gained a good trade and became a wealthy man for his day. He was modest and unassuming in his demeanor, and, although not a church member at the time, was elected the first superintendent of the Presbyterian Sunday-school, organized in Milford in 1823, and was one of the organizers and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, organized in 1825. During his life he was one of its main pillars and supporters. He was very strict in his Sabbath observance and had rather entertain a traveler over Sunday, free of charge, than have him travel on that day. He frequently stopped strangers Saturday nights and either kept them at his own house or sent them to the Sawkill and paid their bills. The wayfaring man ever found a lodging-place with him when he needed shelter and food. Sometimes his family would remonstrate with him for keeping so many wandering travelers, or tramps, as they are now called, when he replied: "Entertain strangers, for thereby you may entertain angels unawares." "But," said his family, "you may sometimes entertain devils." Once he sheltered a boy for a number of days. Meantime a man came whom Mr. Wallace sent to the hotel for lodging, which he often did, and paid his bills. During the night the boy whom he had befriended stole the man's satchel and his benefactor's overcoat and fled. Next day the man tried to secure a warrant for the arrest of Mr. Wallace for stealing, but could not find an officer who would grant it. They replied that Mr. Wallace would pay him if he owed him anything, and he did give the man ten dollars for what there was in his valise, which was probably more than it was worth. Another boy set the mountain on fire and the whole village turned out to fight the fire and save their homes. Notwithstanding all this abuse of his generosity, Mr. Wallace never ceased to be kind to the poor and wayfaring man, and doubtless entertained many who were worthy of his kindness. His house was the home of the preachers. He was one of the most substantial Christian business men in Milford. He left his children a good business start in life and an honest name. His wife was Elizabeth, a daughter of Dr. De Aerts Smith, of Smithfield. His children were John H., Amanda, James S., Matilda, William, Francis B. and Helen M. John H. Wallace was a merchant in Milford and a very substantial man. His son, John C. Wallace, is a merchant and one of the leading men of the village, and his daughter, Helen M., was the wife of Judge Geo. P. Heller. James S. Wallace died in 1884, aged seventy-four. His life was one of strict integrity and unblemished honor. His charities were so manifold that, though unostentatious, they could not fail to be known. His moral character was a shining example. His first business venture after a long clerkship with the old firm of Pinchot & Manclere was mercantile partnership with James Bassett at Paupack Eddy (now Hawley). In 1836–37 he entered into partnership with John H. Wallace, his brother, in the store (now moved away) nearly opposite the Sawkill House in Milford. Both were successful. He afterward built and for a number of years kept store in the building on Harford street, lately occupied by N. Revoyre as a hotel, during a portion of which time he was postmaster of Milford. Afterward, for a long period, he continued the mercantile business in a quaint old store on the corner opposite the Crissman House, where now stands the handsome stone building of James W. Pinchot. After that he occupied a building on Centre Square, opposite the court-house. In 1881 he removed to his handsome brick residence nearly opposite the Sawkill House, and almost on the site of his first store in Milford, where his estimable wife, who was a daughter of Jeffrey Wells, now lives. Matilda Wallace was the wife of Benjamin Alden Bid-lack, attorney-at-law in Wilkes-Barre. He came to Milford for a short time with his wife and finally died while United States minister, resident at Bogota. His widow subsequently married Charles S. Miner, the careful historian of Wyoming Valley, who died October 26, 1865, aged eighty-six. His widow still survives at an advanced age in Philadelphia. Francis B. Wallace was a broker in New York City. Helen M. Wallace was the wife of John T. Cross.

Jabez Rockwell, a Revolutionary soldier and shoemaker by trade, came to Milford about 1797. He was sheriff of Wayne County one term. His son, Lewis Rockwell, was sheriff of Pike County one term, lived to a great age and died in Palmyra township. Polly Rockwell, one of Jabez Rockwell's daughters, was wife of James Watson, one of Pike County's most popular sheriffs. William Watson, a carpenter, is the only descendant now living in Milford. Anna was the wife of Nathan Wells, and John B. Rockwell was a merchant in Milford.

Andrew Armstrong came to Milford shortly after 1816. He was followed by his brothers James, Thomas and John, lastly by William, who came in 1833. The Armstrong brothers were masons and contractors, and in that capacity, as first-class mechanics, have worked on or built most of the important buildings in Milford, Port Jervis and vicinity, besides doing work in New York City. The brothers all died in Milford, with the exception of William who survives. Among the descendants living in Milford are Andrew and John Armstrong, masons, and Hamilton Armstrong, a schoolteacher and member of the bar. Lancelot W. Armstrong and Thomas Armstrong are builders in New York and were contractors on the Produce Exchange, the art gallery in Central Park and Orlando B. Potter's eleven-story building in Park Row. The family originally came from the north of Ireland.

Thomas O. Hazen, who was an early settler of the vicinity of Milford, died in July, 1885, and was then the oldest resident of the place. He was born in Orange County, New York, December 4, 1793, and died July 6, 1885. He enlisted in the War of 1812, at the age of nineteen, for which service he drew a pension at the time of his death. Mr. Hazen moved to Pike County in 1824, on a farm near the Sawkill Pond, and followed the pursuit of farming all his life until declining health prevented him from performing work. He had five children, of whom two survive,—Mrs. Julia A. Crawford and Daniel Hazen, of Sparrowbush, New York.

Who the male residents of the village were in 1806 is shown in the following fall list taken at the general election of that year, held at the house of Samuel Grandin on October 14th:

Thomas Newman.	Jacob Dewitt.
John Brodhead, Esq.	Henry Van Campen.
James McKean, Sr.	Mathew Clark.

John F. Waggoner.	Robert L. Traues.
Edward Cohean.	James McCarty.

HOTELS.—Thomas Newman, Sen., kept tavern near where Le Clerc now is in 1800, and Samuel Thrall presided there in 1821. Thomas Clark had a tavern on the same site in 1825, and James Barton built the house now occupied by Le Clerc. Tobias Hornbeck had a tavern where Mrs. Page's house is located as early as 1790. The George Bowhanan house was used as a hotel for a number of years and is claimed by his descendants as the first tavern in Milford. The first courts in Milford for the county of Wayne, in 1798, by Judge Samuel Preston and associates were held in this house which is still standing and occupied by Louisa Bowhanan, one of [1] George Bowhanan's daughters. Manual Brink built the house where Dr. Emerson now lives, which was once used as a hotel, and John Randolph had a hotel called "Flat Roof House," where Mrs. Eldred now resides.

The frame to the Crissman House was raised about 1820 by Timothy Candy and the building completed by John Clark. The Crissman House was originally called the Pike County House. It is well located for business, being on the corner where the road from Port Jervis and the main road leading into the country intersect each other. Clark ran the hotel for a while and sold it to Col. H. S. Mott, a noted politician in his day. In 1853 Col. Mott sold the property to Cyrus Crissman who enlarged and otherwise improved the house. After the latter died his widow continued the business through Ira Crissman, her brother-in law, who is still living at the hotel, aged seventy-eight. John Jones, Henry Bull, her son-in-law, and Parmer had the house until Frank Crissman, a son of Crissman's, took charge in 1876. The Crissman House, in common with other hotels in Milford, is largely patronized in summer by boarders from the cities of Philadelphia and New York. The house will accommodate sixty guests comfortably, and one hundred have been fed at their tables. The Crissman House is now the Democratic headquarters and is much frequented by local politicians. During the long winter evenings the Crissman House is the resort of the villagers. Ira Crissman sits there, as complacently as ever, although his dog Cæsar no longer bears him company. Uncle Ira was elected justice of the peace until he refused the honor longer. He is now a retired veteran, living on the honors and emoluments of the past. Frank Crissman is a popular landlord. His table contains all that one desires and the comfort of the guests is well considered.

Mason Dimmick came to Milford first and taught school. Samuel Dimmick arrived next and built the Dimmick House. He first commenced hotel-keeping in the house now occupied by Mrs. Pinchot, and while there, in 1828–29, built the house on the corner opposite the Crissman House, now known as the Dimmick House. Mr. Dimmick was an enterprising man and bought an interest in the stage line on the Milford and Owego turnpike. These stage lines were important in their day, and took the place of the railroad. The old Milford and Owego line made connections with Newburgh by stage and from thence to New York by boat, persons traveling West taking this line; but the Erie Railroad superseded the stage lines and the turnpike. When Dimmick abandoned staging he had forty or fifty horses and a number of coaches which were sent farther West. During these staging days, about 1840, while Greeley was visiting Pike County in connection with the Sylvania Phalanx Society, which he and others had established in Lackawaxen township to test Fourierism, an occurrence happened which has often been alluded to in the newspapers and which we give in the language of Charles F. Rockwell who was an eye-witness to the whole transaction. He says: "The exact year I do not remember; it was somewhere in the forties. Horace Greeley had money invested in the Sylvania Society and was on his way to that point. The Erie Railroad then ended at some point east of Port Jervis—either Middletown or Otisville; from that point travel was continued by stage. I think the time was in the spring; at all events it was very wet and the roads were muddy. The stage broke down out of town between the William Brodhead and James Wallace farms and the passengers walked into town, Greeley among them, with his pants tucked in his boots and valise in his hand. The Dimmick Hotel, then called the 'Centre Hotel,' was kept by Samuel Dimmick, father of Milford's present postmaster, C. W. Dimmick, and was the stage-house.

"Mr. Dimmick was in the bar. The fire-place,

[1] For full account of Bowhanan's family, see Dingman township.

I remember, was an open stove, called in those days a Franklin stove, and behind it was a long covered wood box, with lids. Greeley set his valise and himself on the wood box until those at the bar had got through, when he told Mr. Dimmick that he would like to have the mud washed off his boots. Dimmick answered that he could accommodate himself at the pump-trough, which then stood at the centre of the intersection between Broad and Harford Streets. Greeley had hardly begun when he was recognized by Cornelius W. De Witt from his store across the way. De Witt knew him, for he was then the head and front of the Whig party, which consisted of about one hundred and forty voters. De Witt went over, shook hands with Greeley and, when told by him of the situation, at once ordered a halt, and taking Greeley by the arm, led him back to the bar-room, and bringing him face to face with Dimmick, he said, 'Mr. Dimmick, I will make you acquainted with Horace Greeley.' Dimmick was dumfounded for a moment, but after recovering from his confusion said, 'Is it possible—and it was Horace Greeley I sent to wash his own boots.' It is needless to add that Greeley's boots were taken off, washed and a pair of slippers were furnished and a place in the sitting-room given to him."

The Dimmick house burned down about 1856, when it was rebuilt with brick. After the death of Samuel Dimmick, in 1866, the business was continued by the family until 1879. It still belongs to the estate, but has been rented for a number of years. Abram Bronson now has it. The house will accommodate about fifty guests comfortably. Chief Justice Sharswood, of Philadelphia, and Horace Greeley have made this a stopping-place in years gone by. Samuel Dimmick's son, C. W. Dimmick, is postmaster, and Fannie Dimmick, his sister, assistant postmaster at Milford.

The Sawkill House, which is named after the beautiful falls of that name near Milford, was built by Lewis Cornelius, about 1823. Mr. Cornelius first commenced hotel-keeping in the old Harford House, and during that time built what is now the parlor and sitting-room and a portion of the dining-room. He was an energetic business man, soon added a store-room to the hotel, got in a stock of goods and engaged in merchandising along with hotel-keeping, but later abandoned store-keeping and used a portion of that room for a bar-room. Since then a three-story building, containing a Masonic Hall, public hall and sleeping-rooms, has been added. The Sawkill House has always enjoyed a well-deserved reputation for good accommodations and skillful cooks. It was formerly patronized by wealthy Philadelphians, such as Anthony and Frank Drexel (bankers) James Smith, Dr. Neidhard and many others. Allen Cuthbert came to the house for forty years. George H. Boker, the poet, also made it his headquarters. Judges Waller and Seely always stop here, and George G. Waller, Esq., has made it a stopping-place for twenty-five years. The rooms were let in advance. Of late years, New Yorkers have been patrons of the Sawkill. After Lewis Cornelius' death, in 1841, his sons—James, William and John—and his daughters—Catharine, Maria, Emily and Martha—continued the business. James Cornelius had principal charge, while John Cornelius was more of a politician—and sheriff of Pike County for three terms. After James' death, John gave up politics and attended to the hotel, where he became a popular landlord.

The sons are all dead and the three living sisters—Maria, Martha and Emily—have since 1882 continued the business. The Cornelius sisters are noted cooks and the Sawkill House is second to none in Milford, for genteel entertainment and home-like quietness. The Sawkill House will accommodate about sixty boarders.

The Bluff House was built about 1876, by H. B. Wells, on the banks of the Delaware. It is beautifully located and commands a fine view of the Delaware and surrounding hills. It will accommodate about one hundred and fifty persons.

Walter Mitchell is building a house that will accommodate one hundred persons.

The Fauchere House is on the site of the old Van Gordon and La Bar stand. It accommodates about forty guests.

The Vandemark House has a capacity for about twenty-five persons and is kept by Ernest Beck. Many jurymen stop there.

There were fifteen licensed hotels in the place a few years ago, but there are not as many at present.

Milford is a desirable summer resort, a fact which is appreciated by city people.

Business Men of Milford.—Albert Sherman had a tannery on the site now occupied by A. D. Brown, which the latter has converted into a saw-mill. Jesse Belknap had a tannery on the Vandemark above Van Auken's, as early as 1800. He was succeeded in the tanning business by Josiah Foster and Franklin Brodhead. Among the early grist-mill owners may be mentioned John Biddis & Sons and James Barton. Among the early merchants were James Wallace & Sons, Pinchot & Mauclere, who were succeeded by C. C. D. Pinchot & Sons, John Lafarge, John B. Rockwell, Edmund Power, Lewis Cornelius, Thomas Newman, Sr., and others elsewhere noticed. The present business men of Milford are William & George Mitchell, John F. Pinchot, John B. Newman, Ryman & Wells, John McCarty, C. P. Mott, Geo. Dauman, A. D. Brown, Lewis Rushitt, Clinton O. Armstrong, druggist; T. R. Julius Kline, tinsmith; L. F. Hafner, harness-maker; James Hutchinson, tailor; Jervis Jordan and Jacob Klaer, grist-mills; A. D. Brown, saw-mill; Van Camp & Newman, carriage-painters; Herman Kholer and John Dagon, barbers.

Silver Watch-Case Factory.—Desire Bournique established a silver watch case factory in Milford in June, 1864. He commenced in a kitchen, with two or three hands, and developed the business until it required fifty-five men and boys, and made four hundred cases per week. These cases ranged from two or three ounces in weight to sixteen-ounce cases. The cases were made and engraved ready for use. He made two thousand one hundred cases one year. In the fall of 1884 Mr. Bournique died and the factory closed shortly after.

Mr. Bournique was born at Abushville, Loraine, France, December 26, 1833, and came to America when young. October 10, 1855, he married Emily, daughter of Remy Loreaux, of Milford, and reared a large family. He was respected by all classes as a quiet, industrious, progressive, generous-hearted man, devotedly attached to his family, and a consistent member of the Roman Catholic Church. He would never consent to move his factory from Milford, though flattering offers were made by other towns.

Gold Watch-Case Factory.—Ferdinand Berthoud and J. F. Courvoisier were in partnership for five years, from 1878 to 1883, and established the Milford Gold Watch-Case Factory. Since 1883 Ferdinand Berthoud has carried on the business alone. He employs about twenty-eight men and uses thirty-six thousand dollars' worth of gold per year. He makes only gold cases to order, from fourteen carats to eighteen carats fine, using silver and copper alloy. It requires complicated and delicate machinery and careful manipulation to do the work required. The turning and engraving is all neatly and handsomely done at this factory. They make no filled cases, all their work being solid gold from fourteen to eighteen carats fine.

THE PRESS.

The Eagle of the North was published in 1827, and its first issue must have been about the 1st June. In a copy of the paper, Vol. I., No. 27, issued December 21, 1827, it is stated that the paper is "printed for the proprietor by T. A. Wells, for two dollars per annum, payable in advance." Who the proprietor was is not stated; possibly B. A. Bidlack or Francis Al. Smith. It was a four-column folio, eleven by seventeen inches, with a motto from Shakspeare, "O, that estates and degrees and offices were not derived corruptly, and that clear honor were purchased by the merit of the wearer!" The first printing-office was in Francis Al. Smith's house, when he lived at the old Harford place, on a corner of the lot now owned by Colonel Lewis. This issue of December 21, 1827, is severe on John Quincy Adams, and publishes documents to show that he was educated a monarchist, etc. One dollar reward is offered by C. B. Seaman, sheriff, for the return of two debtors, who had escaped from the Milford jail, fifty cents for either of them, but will pay no charges. He also issues his court proclamation for the Eleventh Judicial District,—Judge David Scott, presiding judge, and John Coolbaugh, and Daniel W. Dingman, associates. Samuel De Puy appears as clerk of the court, and Joseph Miller, sheriff of Wayne County, advertises land in Sterling township. Jacob Hornbeck, treasurer, gives the list of retail merchants in Pike County, as follows :

Delaware township.—John Hall and John Lodee.

Lackawaxen.—James R. Keen, Frederick Billinger, Charles Cook, Philips & Tigue, Morris & Henderson, John Le Forge and John Armstrong.

Middle Smithfield.—John Malvin.

Upper Smithfield.—Lewis Cornelius, Joseph A. Bonnel and Horace E. Denton, J. Brink and John B. Rockwell, John Leforge and John B. Leforge, John Leforge, Jeffrey Wells, Pinchot & Manalure.

Palmyra.—James Philips, Leonard Lebar.

James Barton offers firewood for sale. John B. Rockwell offers a farm of two hundred and sixty-eight acres, two miles from Milford, with eighty acres cleared and a log house and frame barn. James Broas advertises tailoring and Moses Bross shoemaking.

Samuel J. Brodhead appears as commissioner's clerk, and B. A. Bidlack as agent for eight hundred acres of land in Middle Smithfield. The editorial comes out strongly in favor of General Jackson and a celebration on the 8th of January, the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans.

At a large and respectable meeting held at the house of Daniel W. Dingman, Esq., in Delaware township, John Nyce was called to the chair, and William Mapes and Jacob Westbrook appointed secretaries, when the following resolution was passed :

"Resolved, That the friends of General Jackson in the county of Pike, or elsewhere, are invited to meet at the house of Daniel W. Dingman on the 8th of Jan. next, to celebrate the glorious victory of Gen. Andrew Jackson over the British at New Orleans."

William Hooker, Nathan Emery, Jacob Westbrook, William C. Jagger, Benjamin Frazer, Garrett Brodhead, Jr., and James Nyce were appointed a committee to carry out the proposition. Administration meeting. The friends of John Q. Adams met at the house of John Clark, in Milford. John Leforge was appointed chairman and Edward Mott secretary. James M. Porter, delegate from Northampton, was chosen to represent Pike in the convention to be held at Harrisburg, January 4, and instructed to support Adams for the Presidency. Richard Brodhead, Esq., Moses Killam, Jr., Esq., Samuel L. Roberts, John Leforge, Mason Dimmick, Lewis Rockwell, Samuel Darling, Esq., and Samuel S. Thrall were appointed a committee of correspondence, and it was resolved that the proceedings of the meeting be published in the Eagle of the North, Belvidere Apollo and Democratic Press.

The following editorial appears, headed, "Characteristic coincidence":

"On the 4th of January, 1815, the enemies of our country assembled below New Orleans, under the direction of Packenham. On the 8th of January following they were overwhelmingly defeated and confounded. On the 4th of January, 1828, the enemies of Jackson in Pennsylvania met at Harrisburg under the direction of John Binns. On the 8th of January following they will be overwhelmed, defeated and confounded. Packenham had his Jackson and Adams may profit by his example. If this be treason, make the most of it."

After continuing for a year or more as the Eagle of the North, the name of the paper becomes The Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor, under the editorship of Benjamin A. Bidlack, in 1828.

The Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor of December 11, 1829, is a five-column folio published by Francis Al. Smith. It contains an account of a public meeting of citizens of Pike residing in the northwest part of Upper Smithfield, held at the house of Nicholas Wheeler, for the purpose of protesting against the methods by which appointments are procured, showing there were "rings" in Pike County at an early day. The meeting organized by choosing Roger Allen chairman, William Bowhannan secretary and David Kerby clerk. After an interchange of sentiment as to the manner in which appointments from the Governor are procured and candidates elected to office, a committee was appointed, consisting of Isaiah Hazen, Samuel Thomas, Nicholas Wheeler, Nathan N. Carey and Edmund Power, to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting. In these resolutions they say "that the few in this county have adopted means to control the many. That appointments are procured and the appointed in the actual execution of their offices before it is known to the people generally that an appointment was to be made." They complain of "a well-organized Intrigue."

The Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor of July 23, 1830, Vol. III., new series, No. 47, with Francis Al. Smith still editor, says: "A gentleman who recently passed through Honesdale, a small village at the termination of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, informs us that it is in a thriving condition, and bids fair to be a place of considerable business and importance. He likewise stated that he saw forty cars in one connected chain loaded with one hundred and thirty tons of coal and carrying quite a number of passengers. We do indeed wish our sister prosperity and hope she will reciprocate the feeling towards us with regard to our contemplated railroad."

The Eagle and Monitor appears in 1831 with J. H. Westfall printer and publisher. The eagle is taken down and the motto is "The union of the States and the sovereignty of the States." The issue before us is Vol. V., No. 2, Milford, Pa., October 14, 1831 (whole No. 210). The paper is a five-column folio, printed on good paper and much improved in appearance. It contains the October elections, which show that Upper Smithfield had 184 voters, Lackawaxen 44, Palmyra 39, Delaware 95, Lehman 80, Middle Smithfield 151, Price 36,—total, 629. The paper claims that two-thirds of this vote is Democratic and that the Democratic majority would have been larger had there not been sickness in Palmyra and Lackawaxen to prevent one hundred voters from going to the polls. (This was the year of the great epidemic or fever that prevailed in the Paupack settlement.)

The Eagle and Monitor was strongly in favor of General Jackson for a second term, and approved the course of Governor Wolf. It was opposed to the Anti-Masons, who had just nominated William Wirt, an unrenouncing Mason, for the Presidency, and Amos Ellmaker, an Anti-Mason of Pennsylvania, for the Vice-Presidency. This paper was continued for a time and possibly changed hands. At any rate its publication was discontinued. The next newspaper venture in Pike was made by C. W. De Witt, who was at that time the leader of the Whig party in Pike County. The Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor was no longer published, and there was no paper in Pike County to publish sheriff sales or to do any other advertising. At this juncture several Whigs of Pike and Monroe Counties organized a joint-stock company, and Richard Nugent came down to Stroudsburg, from Honesdale, to issue the first number of the Jeffersonian, January 15, 1840. A number of copies were dated Milford, with C. W. De Witt's name added as one of the editors, and circulated as a Pike County paper, which, by permission of Judge Jessup and the Pike County bar, became the medium of the legal advertising of Pike County. This condition of things continued for about four years. Richard Nugent removed to Nova Scotia, published a paper and got into difficulty for reflecting too severely upon some of Queen Victoria's subjects. Theodore Schoch commenced to publish the Jeffersonian February 24, 1841, and is still its veteran editor.

In 1846–47 there was no paper in Pike County, and James J. McNally, a young printer working in Newton, N. J., believing the field a good one, purchased the material of the Goshen Sentinel office and moved it to Milford, where he started the Pike County Democrat July 14, 1849. It was a seven-column folio, of the same size as the present Milford Dispatch, and McNally claimed in his introductory editorial that it was the largest paper published in the State outside the city of Philadelphia. Ed. Mott says: "It was a very superior journal, few local papers equaling it in ability." He also announced in his salutatory that "this paper will support the principles of the Democratic Republican party." He changed the name of the paper, in 1852, to the Milford Herald. Shortly after the office was purchased by John M. Heller. He placed the paper in charge of John B. Adams and Harvey Heller, his son. This paper was remarkable under the management of Adams & Heller for the amount of labor bestowed upon it, both mental and material. Its editorial columns were characterized by a sprightliness, dash and clearness that gave the paper a wide reputation. Harvey Heller soon withdrew from the management, and Mr. Adams continued to edit and publish it alone. The late Lucien F. Barnes, of Milford, was then editing the Tri-States Union at Port Jervis, and the personal newspaper war that was waged between him and Adams for several weeks in 1853 is still remembered by the oldest residents of the county. Adams ran the Herald until 1855, when he removed to the coal regions, and the paper passed into the hands of John A. Daniels, a son-in-law of the late David Van Gordon, one of Milford's prominent old-time residents. Daniels, although a man of good education, was not fitted for journalism, and, in 1856, the printing-office having passed into the possession of the late Henry S. Mott, his brother, Oscar H. Mott, became the editor. The Herald, under his administration, was one of the neatest and ablest local papers in the State. He continued as editor until May, 1861. Oscar H. Mott held views as to the conduct of the paper on questions growing out of the late war different from his brother, Colonel Mott, the owner of the paper, who was then representing the Wayne, Pike, Carbon and Monroe District in the State Senate. These differences resulted in the resignation of the editorial chair by O. H. Mott and the employment, by Colonel Mott, of Charles B. Colton, a veteran Pennsylvania journalist, to edit the Herald. Mr. Colton conducted the paper with ability until April, 1865, when E. H. Mott, a nephew of Colonel Mott, assumed charge and edited it until January 1, 1866, when the office was purchased by F. A. & J. H. Doney, of Wayne County, and J. H. Doney soon afterward became sole proprietor. He ran the Herald with unvarying success until January 1, 1878, when M. D. Mott, the present proprietor, who is a son of O. H. Mott, its former editor, took charge and changed the name to the Milford Dispatch. The following is his salutatory:

"As announced, this office has changed proprietors, and the undersigned will hereafter assume control. Although from boyhood we have been connected with the typographical art, this is our first venture as journalist, and it is with diffidence we undertake the editing of the Dispatch. We shall do our utmost, however, to give a readable paper, and, by attending strictly to business, look for a support that will enable us to enlarge and improve this journal.

"Instead of the familiar faces of the Herald coming to its subscribers in the future, its successor, the Dispatch, will take its place, and we trust will prove as welcome a visitor. For various reasons, which are immaterial to here mention, the name of the paper has been changed. While this change has taken place, it will not affect the patrons of the Herald in the least; the volume and number will remain the same, and all who have paid up subscriptions will receive the Dispatch in place of the Herald; all advertising contracts will be carried out the same; and likewise all accounts owing to the Herald will be by us collected.

"In politics, it is hardly necessary to say, the Dispatch will be Democratic. The use of its columns will be open to that party, and it will work, at all times, for the principles and nominees of the Democracy.

"Our chief aim will be to give a first-rate local family paper, so that it will be needless for any to take outside papers to get home news. With the help of good correspondents there is no reason why the local page of the Dispatch should not be made to suit the most critical, and it will be gotten up with that object.

"In conclusion, we return sincere thanks to many friends, in and out of the county, who have wished us success, assuring them that we shall always endeavor to merit their fullest approbation.

"M. D. Mott."

M. D. Mott still continues proprietor, and Colonel Charles N. Pine, a veteran editor of Philadelphia, is editing the paper and acting as Milford correspondent of the Port Jervis Gazette.

The first number of the Northern Eagle, a paper in the interest of Lincoln's administration and the Republican party, was issued February 6, 1864, by Dr. Edward Haliday and Pettit, editors and proprietors. Dr. Haliday at that time was a wealthy man of Milford, and spared no pains or expense to make a success of the paper. His object was to convert this stronghold of Democracy to Republicanism. To that end he sent a paper to every voter in the county, and the veteran soldiers were all to have it free. He thus worked up a circulation of one thousand copies. It was printed on the first quality of sized and calendered paper, costing at that time nine dollars a ream. Some of the best metropolitan writers were employed to contribute to its columns, George Arnold, Charles Dickson (now editor of the Binghamton Republican) and others of note writing its stories and poems. Colonel Thomas Picton, at that time the best general editorial writer on the New York press, wrote its leading editorials. Dr. Haliday was that year Presidential elector for Mr. Lincoln for this Congressional district. He was a large, fine-looking man of considerable ability, and waged a lively warfare against the Pike County Democracy while his paper lasted. He inaugurated a Republican mass-meeting in Milford; had Horace Greeley present to make a speech; hired every livery equipment in Port Jervis, and brought men from a distance to swell the numbers, and paid the whole bill himself. He had fully adopted the views of the late Horace Greeley about Pike County, "That it was a land of Democrats and the home of the rattlesnake, and that it contained ten gallons of whiskey to every Webster's Spelling-Book," but in his warfare against Pike County Democracy he was overcome by Pike County whiskey. The paper, after an interval of rest, in May, 1865, was secured by Britton A. Barnes. The paper, having no county patronage, languished and was discontinued about January 1, 1866. It was printed in the building which had formerly been used as a law-office by William Smith, where William McCarty has his store.

In 1872 E. H. Mott, who was then interested in the Port Jervis Gazette, but lived in Matamoras, printed a paper called the Pike County Democrat. It was popular, but with the sale of the Gazette to other parties it was discontinued. The editors of the Milford papers were T. A. Wells, Benjamin Alden Bidlack, a son of Rev. Benjamin Bidlack, of Wyoming, a lawyer, twice a member of Congress and afterwards appointed minister resident at Bogota, to the republic of New Granada, now United States of Columbia, by President Polk, in 1845, and there he died. His son, Dr. Bidlack, lives in Milford.

One of the best known men ever connected with the Milford press is Edward Herold Mott. He was born in Milford, Pike County, Pa., in 1845, son of Charles F. and Eliza Smith Mott. Went to Piqua, Ohio, when nine years old, and in 1856, after the Presidential election, sold on the streets there the first New York papers ever sold by a newsboy west of Cincinnati—the Tribune and the Herald. He got his copies from a subscriber who had finished reading them. He attended the common schools of Piqua for two years. After his mother's death, in 1857, returned to Milford and learned the printer's trade in the Milford Herald office. In 1862 entered St. John & Malvin's foundry in Port Jervis to learn the moulder's trade. He worked five weeks, then ran away, went to Easton on a raft down the Delaware; in Mauch Chunk got a place in the Carbon Democrat office, worked six months, went to Philadelphia and learned the job printing business; after staying there three years he returned to Milford and edited the Milford Herald until January, 1866, then went to Scranton and became city editor of the Scranton Register; he next joined the staff of the Honesdale Herald, bought an interest in the Port Jervis Gazette and conducted the Pike County Democrat until after the Presidential election of 1872. Left the Gazette in that year. Meantime he had been sending articles to various New York papers. His first humorous sketch of special merit was "Taylor's Shot at a Ground Hog," published in the New York Sun in 1874; it made a hit.

In 1876 started the Honesdale Morning Chronicle. Discontinued it to devote his time to other literary work, chiefly for the Erie Railway Company. Remained in the company's employ for seven years, during which time he also occupied a confidential position in the office of John D. Rockafellow, president of the Standard Oil Company, and continued his general newspaper work. In 1881 he resigned his position with the Standard Oil Company to take the general management of the Erie Railway Company's advertising and literary bureau, which place he left in 1883 to give all his time to more congenial work as a writer. In 1879 he had hit on the idea of Cockwood's dialect stories and carried it out in the New York Sun by the "Tales of the Old Settler." The large circulation with which they met gave to Pike County and Milford a wide reputation. Some of these sketches were published in book-form in 1883. The book was republished in England, under the title of "Cream of American Humor." His drunken dialect stories, "His name was Johnson" and "He wanted a Webster Punch," convulsed the town. Dialect is natural to him. His education is desultory, being self-acquired. In his field he is a genius. He has done all kinds of writing for the Sun, besides much important special work by assignment for the World, Times and Herald.

Colonel Charles Newbold Pine, the present editor of the Dispatch, was born in Camden, N. J., November 5, 1822, but his family belonged to Evesham, Burlington County. He was connected with the Philadelphia Saturday Evening Post, when published by Deacon & Peterson, 1850–51. He served three years in the post-office at Philadelphia and in 1854 started the Jersey Blue, at Camden. In September, 1855, he removed to Illinois, and on the 28th of March, 1856, issued the first number of the Bureau County Democrat, at Princeton. He was appointed postmaster at that place by President Pierce in June, 1856. In August, 1858, he started the Chicago Daily Herald in the interest of Buchanan's administration, and in September, 1858, was appointed United States marshal of the Northern District of Illinois, his commission dating just three years from the day of his arrival in that State. He returned to Philadelphia in spring of 1862, edited the Democratic Leader, a campaign paper for that year, Honorable Francis W. Hughes being chairman of the Democratic State Committee. Edited also the Philadelphia Evening Journal, owned by Albert D. Boileau and wrote Boileau into Fort McHenry in February 1863. Boileau recanted, repented and capitulated to the enemy, came home and resumed publication of the Journal with another edition, eating dirt for some six weeks, at the end of which time "the subject of this sketch" bought the establishment and ran it as long as pecuniary circumstances would permit—about a year. He then wrote for the Sunday Dispatch, Sunday Mercury, and during the gubernatorial campaign of 1865 edited the Camden Democrat. In November, 1869, he was chosen editor-in-chief of The Day, a new morning paper published by a company of gentlemen, Alexander Cummings (who established the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin and the New York World) Benj. Harris Brewster, James L. Freeman, Thomas L. Scott, Lewis C. Cassidy and others, until it was bought by Mr. Cassidy and changed to an evening paper, and for several years after was editor-in-chief of the Philadelphia Record. In a year or two after, Mr. Swain sold it to Singerly, Cassidy and others, editing The Evening Day for some time also. He left Philadelphia in June, 1881, and had nothing to do with newspapers till October, 1883, when he was induced to go to East Stroudsburg on an unwise venture. Then Mr. Mott, of the Milford Dispatch, having been elected to the Legislature, wrote Colonel Rine, asking him to edit his paper during his absence. He has remained in Milford and continued to edit the Dispatch, believing Milford to be the most healthful and charming spot in America.

CHURCHES OF MILFORD.

Bartholomew Weed, a blacksmith, was the first praying man in Milford. He lived below the court-house, on the opposite side of the street, in a house with two rooms. He established a family altar and kept sacred the Sabbath day, much to the astonishment of his neighbors, occasionally holding services at his house, where he talked to the people as best he could, which provoked derision manifested by hurling missiles at his house and singing songs. He lived here about 1813, and three or four years later moved to Philadelphia, where he was licensed to preach by the Methodists, which calling he pursued for sixty-two years, until his death in 1879, at Newark, N. J., aged eighty-six. Milford, in Weed's time and for a number of years afterward, was a godless, prayerless, Sabbath-breaking village.

The Dutch Reformed Church of Minisink, established in 1773, was just across the Delaware, in what is now Montague, N. J., but there was an illiberal jealousy existing between the comparatively new settlement of Yankees, as they called them at Milford, and the old Dutch settlers, who were strongly entrenched in the Minisink, and who looked upon this new town, peopled by Philadelphians, Yankees, etc., as an invasion of their ancient rights. These invaders did not take pains to allay the feeling of disquiet produced by their presence; on the contrary, they lured the negro slaves across the river, gave them liquor and induced them to run away from their masters. With such a feeling engendered between the communities there could be no religious communion among them, and to this day there is but one living member of the Dutch Reformed Church on this side the river at Milford,—Mrs. Caroline Wells, now aged eighty-four, who was converted, however, under the preaching of Rev. Phineas Camp, a Congregationalist, who passed through about 1814, and preached among the Dutch Reformed Churches. Mrs. Wells united with the Dutch Reformed Church when Rev. C. C. Elting was pastor, and it is proper here to state that, as the result of the labors commenced by Rev. Phineas Camp,[1] and carried on by Elting, there were one hundred and seventeen members gathered into the Reformed Churches along the Delaware. Twenty members were received into the Minisink Church, just across the river, the first communion after Mr. Elting came to the place, and among these converts was Moses Bross, who moved to Milford in 1823, and became one of the founders of the Presbyterian Church at Milford. In 1823 Moses Bross established a prayer-meeting in the court-house by permission of the authorities, and out of this movement a Sunday-school was started.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.— On September 1, 1825, so the church records runs, the citizens of the town of Milford, desirous of having the gospel statedly administered, assembled according to previous notice. Of this meeting James Wallace was chairman and Moses Bross secretary. It was resolved to apply to the Presbytery of Hudson for the organization of a Christian Church. Moses Bross was appointed to make the application. Sept. 16th the Presbytery of Hudson appointed one of their number, Rev. Thomas Grier, to organize a church in Milford, Pike County, Pa. In compliance with the request, on September 23, 1825, the congregation was assembled in the old stone court-house and proceeded to organize. The original members were eight in number, viz.: Moses Bross and his wife Jean, Samuel Depuy and his wife Eliza, Mitty Watkins, Elizabeth Westfall and Jacob Quick; James Wallace united with them also on profession of faith.

The name by which the members wished the organization to be known was the "Church and Congregation of Milford." September 24th the first ruling orders were elected, and on the 25th ordained. The elders were James Hallace, Moses Brossand Jacob Quick. December 26, 1825, Daniel Judson, John Cox, Silas Aber, Roger Allen, Thomas Hagger, Mary Watson, William Cox, Huldah Cox, Dr. Francis, Al. Smith and Margaret Smith were received into the church. April 8, 1826, Samuel Depuy, Daniel Judson and Roger Allen were chosen additional elders. The first had been a ruling elder at Middle Smithfield. The others were ordained April 9th. November 3, 1826, there were admitted to the church on profession of faith, Olive Rockwell, Ann Cole, Jane Freele, Jacob Van Auken, Daniel M. Brodhead, Oliver S. Dimmick, Solomon Newman, John Aber, Lewis Cornelius, Jonas Cartwright, John Heller, Thomas Newman, Sarah Barton, Sarah Decker, Samuel Cox, Elizabeth Shower, John B. Rockwell, Maria Quick, Hannah Crawford, Nancy Newman, Maria McCarty, William McCarty, Elenor Brink, Emeline Cole, Sarah Barns, Katy I. Brink, Harriet Smith, Jas. Newman, Abraham Van Auken, Margaret Winfield, Samuel Duterow, Sarah Newman, Jas. P. Barrett, Hannah Bull, Julia

[1] Rev. Phineas Camp was born at Durham, Conn., February 18, 1788. He graduated from Union College in 1811, and studied theology at Princeton. After completing his studies he taught a classical school in Orange County. July 15, 1817, he was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of North River, and was sent into Wayne County about 1818, where he labored for a time at Bethany and Salem. He labored within the bounds of the Presbytery of Erie part of the time as an evangelist and part of the time as settled pastor; then he moved to Dixon, Ill., where he died January 30, 1868, aged eighty.

Winfield, Sarah Beecher, John I. Smith, Elenor Wainwright, Joseph A. Bonnel.

After the close of Rev. Thomas Grier's pastorate a considerable interval elapsed before the church was supplied with a minister. In the month of April, 1832, arrangements were made by the congregation with the Rev. Edward Allen, recently pastor of the Presbyterian congregation of Wantage, New Jersey, to supply them for the space of one year. He commenced his labors, the 1st of May following.

July 7, 1832, Stephen Rose, Eliphalet Rose and Catharine A. Watson were received into the church. "In view of the low state of religion in this congregation and vicinity, it was resolved that a protracted meeting be held in this place. For this important meeting the necessary arrangements were made. A day of fasting and prayer was solemnly observed and God was pleased in a remarkable manner to own His word by a most copious effusion of the Holy Spirit. The meeting was continued for nearly two weeks, in which three services were attended daily in the church, besides frequent prayer-meetings and meetings for anxious sinners. Business in the village was nearly suspended, and every day appeared as a Sabbath of the Lord. The church became humbled. Backsliders were reclaimed, and many were hopefully brought to submit to Christ."[1]

As a result of these meetings, most of the leading business men of the village were brought into the church. August 28, 1832, twenty members were added, among them Abram T. Seely, Lucius D. Baldwin, Richard Eldred, Ducian Roys, John H. Westfall, Cyrill C. D. Pinchot, Samuel Dimmick and wife, Wealthy Dimmick. August 29, 1832, twelve persons were admitted to membership, among them William Bross, Josiah H. Foster and John P. Darling. During the whole of the year 1832 additions were made to the church until the principal men of the village were members. Then followed a number of years in which the session had considerable work, in enforcing church discipline. Several members were cited to answer for unchristian conduct, such as hunting and fishing on the Sabbath, profane swearing, becoming intoxicated, etc. A committee was also appointed to look after members who had engaged in dancing at a public ball. It would appear, however, that a large part of the members walked uprightly; otherwise they would not have escaped the vigilance of this faithful session. January 3, 1847, Theophilus H. Smith was ordained an elder. On November 20, 1854, three additional elders were elected, and on the 23d ordained, viz.: Samuel Thrall, John H. Wallace and Stephen Rose. On March 4, 1872, Samuel Detrick, Ebenezer Warner, John C. Wallace and William Mitchell were elected and ordained elders. On January 27, 1884, George Mitchell and Dr. I. S. Vreeland were added to the eldership. John H. Wallace died January 1, 1872, Samuel Detrick died May 14, 1876, and Theophilus H. Smith died July 6, 1881.

Rev. Edward Allen supplied the pulpit from 1832 to 1834 and again from 1841 to 1843. He was at the same time principal of the Milford Academy. After Mr. Allen, Rev. Peter Kanouse was an occasional supply. Mr. Kanouse was a man six feet tall, and of commanding appearance. He afterward preached in the West. Rev. William Townley was stated supply from August, 1834, to August, 1835. From 1836 to 1840 Rev. Ralph Bull was stated supply. Mr. Bull went from this place to Weston, Orange County, where he died. He was very popular. Next to Mr. Bull was Rev. E. Allen, stated supply in 1841–42. Rev. William Beldin preached as supply in 1843–44. From 1844 to 1846 there is no record. Rev. Charles Miln preached as supply 1846–47. No record from 1847 to 1849. In 1849, Rev. T. S. Bradner was called as pastor and continued till 1852. From May, 1853, Rev. Isaac Todd occupied the pulpit until 1861.

Rev. Isaac Todd was born near Morristown December 2, 1797. He united with the Presbyterian Church of Morristown in 1818, was prepared for college by James Johnson and Rev. Asa Lyman, while Dr. Barnes was his pastor, and although he never indorsed Dr. Barnes' theological views, he always bore testimony to his Christian character and ability. He graduated from Hamilton College in the class of 1827, and at Princeton Seminary in 1830. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Susquehanna, at Athens, Pa., September 19, 1833. He labored at Gibson, Pa., Tunkhannock, Pa., Orwell and Troy, Pa., until 1853, when he came to Milford, where he acted as stated supply and filled the pulpit till 1861, when he took charge of a church in Hollmanville, Ocean County, N. J., where he labored until the very day of his death, which occurred April 12, 1885, when eighty-seven years of age. His last words were, "Tell my people.—In Christ is our everlasting portion; without Christ, eternal death."

In July 1861 Rev. R. R. Kellog was installed pastor and so continued till September, 1866. On the 25th of that month he died suddenly at his residence. His funeral sermon was preached on the 27th by Rev. S. W. Mills, of Port Jervis. In January, 1867, Rev. Robert N. Beattie commenced his labors as stated supply and continued until June, 1870, when he accepted a call from the Reformed Church of Bloomingburg. Rev. Cyrus Offer next became stated supply for one year, 1870–71. In March, 1872, Rev. Mr. Johnson preached. In April arrangements were made with Rev. John Reid, of Princeton Theological Seminary, to supply the pulpit during the summer months. He has since been pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Yonkers, N. Y. In December, 1873, Rev. L. C. Lockwood was engaged as a supply for four months. In January, 1874, Rev. E. H. Mateer was ordained and installed pastor. Rev. E. H. Mateer was born near Altoona, Blair County, Pa., August 24, 1844. On his paternal side he is of Scotch-Irish and on his maternal of pure Scotch descent. He entered Washington and Jefferson College in 1867, remained there to the end of the sophomore year, when he entered Princeton at the beginning of the second term of the junior year and graduated in 1871. The same fall he entered Princeton Theological Seminary and graduated in April, 1874. Having received and accepted a call to Milford Presbyterian Church before graduating, he was ordained and installed pastor by the Hudson Presbytery June 25, 1874. Having received and accepted a call to McVeytown Presbyterian congregation, he resigned, in February, 1884, the charge at Milford, after a pastorate of nine years and nine months, the longest in the history of the Milford Presbyterian Church. In the summer of 1884 Rev. Abraham Sylvester Gardiner received the unanimous call of the Milford Presbyterian Church and is the present pastor. He was born at Sag Harbor, Suffolk County, N. Y., July 19, 1824. His father was Rev. John D. Gardiner, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Sag Harbor from 1812 to 1832. His mother, Mary L'Hommedieu, was a daughter of Hon. Samuel L'Hommedieu, of Sag Harbor, who was a grandson on his mother's side of Nathaniel Sylvester, proprietor of the Manor of Shelter Island, N. Y., under whose hand the persecuted Quakers of Massachusetts found protection, and on his father's side of Benjamin L'Hommedieu, one of two brothers who were driven from France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, October 18, 1685. They first found refuge in Holland, then in America. The first ancestor of the subject of this sketch on his father's side was Lion Gardiner, who came from England to Boston, Mass., and afterward to Saybrook, Conn., in 1634–35. He was a soldier, civil engineer and a lieutenant in the British service in Holland. At the request of Lords Say and Seal and Brook and others, he built the fort at Saybrook, Conn., for the protection of their interests and took a prominent part in the Pequot War. Lion Gardiner's son Ward was the first white child born in the colony of Connecticut, and his daughter Elizabeth, born on Gardiner's Island, the first white child of English parents born in the colony of New York. This island contains thirty-four hundred acres and was purchased by Gardiner of the Montauk Indians in 1639. Rev. A. S. Gardiner attended Clinton Academy in 1842–43, and the University of New York 1843–47, was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of New York in 1848, having read law in the office of George Wood, Esq. He practiced law at East Hampton, L. I., and Fond du Lac, Wis. During the spring and autumn of 1850–51 he was licensed to preach and ordained by the Presbytery of Milwaukee, since which time he has ministered at Greenpoint a short time and at Cold Springs twelve years. He removed to the West, settled in Rockford, Ill., in 1867, and preached at Prospect (now Dunlass), Peoria County, Ill. In 1871, returning to the East, he accepted a call to Jamaica Plains, Boston, where he was installed pastor of a church of which, under direction of Presbytery, he was founder. After preaching three years he ministered two years for the Congregational Church at Essex, Conn.; from thence, in 1877, he returned West and took charge of Lena and Winslow Churches, Stephenson County, Ill., for three years. Educational considerations led him East again, to the Litchfield (N. H.) Presbyterian Church, but the loss of his daughter Julia Evangeline so disarranged his plans that he remained but a short time. He is now preaching at Milford and also supplying the old Dutch Reformed Church across the river. His wife was Caroline P. Williams. Their children were Maria, Charles H. and Julia Evangeline.

The first Presbyterian house of worship was begun during the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Grier, and stood where the present Presbyterian parsonage now stands. The first parsonage, on Ann Street, was built in the time of Rev. Mr. Bradner, about 1850, and the present one during the pastorate of Rev. E. H. Mateer, the corner-stone of the building being laid September 18, 1874. The church is of brick, manufactured by John C. Wallace, and measures over all forty-four by eighty feet. Symmetrical towers rise from the four corners, and the main tower, when completed, will be one hundred and twenty-five feet high. For several years the congregation have worshipped in the basement, a room capable of seating two hundred and fifty persons, adjoining which are two smaller rooms, used for the infant class and Sunday-school library.

The first religious service held in the building was a prayer-meeting, held on the evening of December 30, 1875, and the first Sunday service was held Sunday morning, January, 2, 1876. Mr. Barton was architect, Edwin McWilliams carpenter and John Armstrong mason.

Rev. Benjamin Collins was senior preacher and Rev. John K. Shaw assistant on Hamburg Circuit, which then included the western part of Sussex County from Newton to the Delaware. They crossed the river and preached at Milford occasionally. On one of these occasions Rev. John K. Shaw organized the first Methodist class in 1827–28, at the court-house probably, and, according to the recollection of old people now living, it consisted of six members, viz.,— Mrs. Mary Olmsted, Mrs. John Brodhead, Mrs. Eliza Mott, Mr. and Mrs. Hand and Mrs. Sutor. David Hand was the first class-leader. Shortly after, John Brink and wife, Benjamin Drake and wife, Jonathan Doolittle and wife, Mrs. Guild and Hugh Ross (who preached occasionally and could be heard one-half mile) joined the church. The first authentic records commenced August 12, 1849. Henry Bean is mentioned as leader of the Sunday class, and among the members are Ellen Bean, Matilda Bowhannan, James Bostler, Louisa Brodhead, Emeline Brink, Marietta Burrell, Emily Blizzard, Andrew, Adrian, William and Prudence Christiana, Webb Courtright, Julia A. Crawford. Silas H. De Witt, Jonathan Weeks and James Honeywell were also class-leaders. The McCartys and Newmans, Mary and Nancy Olmsted are mentioned. Henry Wells John Dietrick, William Angle and John Aldrich are among the prominent workers at present. They have had many Methodist preachers in Milford since the days of Bartholomew Weed, who upheld the standard of the cross alone in 1813–15. Doubtless other zealous and worthy men have ministered to this people, but their stay was so transient, and the records so imperfect that we are unable to notice many of them. Rev. Manning Force was presiding elder of this district for four terms of four years each. He traveled down the river on one side and up on the other. Mrs. Sophia Sutor is worthy of mention. She lived across the river on the Jersey shore, and was a mother in Israel in the Milford Methodist Church. She had been a school-teacher, was an intelligent woman, and took an active part in church work. Her house was the home of the preachers in the early days of the church.

Rev. George Winsor married Harriet Olmstead, of Milford, where he preached in 1841–43. During his time over one hundred persons professed conversion and many were added to the church. Rev. George Winsor was born in Devonshire, England, November 13, 1813, and died in Milford, Sunday, December 28, 1884, in the seventy-second year of his age. Descending from a pious ancestry, he was early trained in the principles of the Christian religion; and learned to prize in future years the holy shrine of a mother's knee. Two years subsequent to his birth his parents moved to Bound Brook, N. J., where he toiled on the homestead with his brother and attended the village school and academy. Supplementing this instruction with private tuition he obtained some knowledge of the Classis. In 1839 he was converted at Somerville, under the preaching of Rev. George Hitchens. The same year, with much fear and trembling, he gave his name to the New Jersey Conference, and commenced his life-long work. For forty unbroken and successive years he responded to the Conference roll. He was seldom depressed to an eclipse of faith or overjoyed by outbursts of transitory feeling. Dignified without austerity, sociable without levity, he mingled with his brethren, giving lustre to his calling, and was never known to lower the dignity of the pulpit by unseemly remarks, but on every occasion was the affable, courteous, Christian gentleman. As a result of his earnest ministrations, one thousand nine hundred souls were hopefully converted. In 1882 he asked for supernumerary relations, returned to Milford and built a residence, now occupied by his widow. There is one son living, an attorney-at-law in New York.

There are about one hundred and thirteen members in the Methodist Church. The first church edifice was erected near the Delaware River, about one mile from Milford, at a point sometimes called Bridgeport. John Brink and some others thought it the probable site of a village, and it was through his and Mrs. Sutor's influence that the building was thus placed. It was erected about 1827–28, and moved up to the present site about 1836. Since then the present church has been erected.

The Episcopal Church.—The Church of the Good Shepherd was organized April 3, 1871. The corner-stone of the edifice was laid in June, 1871, and the church consecrated September 14, 1877. It was organized by the election of Edgar Pinchot, senior warden; Edgar Brodhead, junior warden; and John C. Mott, D. M. Van Auken, W. C. Broome, C. W. Dimmick, Sidney A. Hanes and M. M. Dimmick, vestrymen. The church has had the following rectors: Rev. W. B. Hooper, November 25, 1872, served three and one-half years; Rev. A. H. Gersner, about three years; Rev. Samuel Edwards, between two and three years, and Rev. D'Estang Jennings, two years. There is a Sunday-school in connection with the organization.

Saint Patrick's Roman Catholic Church was built in 1877, principally for the use of the workmen in the silver watch-case factory, and since that industry has declined, services are seldom held.

Sunday-schools and Early Secular Schools.—According to the recollection of Mrs. Caroline Wells, the Presbyterian Sunday-school was organized in the old stone court-house, June 3, 1823. There were present at the first organization James Wallace, Samuel Depui, William Freel (not a professor, but a good man), Louisa Ross (a daughter of Hugh Ross, a Methodist, afterward the wife of Colonel John Brodhead, and a member of the first Methodist class), Miss Jane De Puy, Miss Caroline Wells. James Wallace was the first superintendent. There were more than fifty children present the first Sunday. Miss Austin had the Bible-class, consisting of twenty-five pupils. The Methodist school was organized after the Presbyterian, perhaps as early as 1824. The sessions were in the afternoon, and many attended both schools. Miss Austin taught in both for a number of years. John Wallace had a Bible-class of boys. The books used were the Bible and Noah Webster's Spelling-Book. The Presbyterian Church has eighty members and one hundred and fifty Sunday-school scholars. The school, as at present organized, has George Mitchell as superintendent; Miss Hannah P. Nyce and John Warner, librarians;

John C. Wallace, Bible-class teacher; Miss Hulda Bull and Miss Mamie Dietrick, infant-class teachers; and Miss Blanche Crissman, Miss Lizzie Bull, Miss Kate McCarty, Mrs. Hannah Williamson, Mrs. Josephine Bensell, Mrs. J. H. Van Etten, Miss Bettie Cornelius and Miss Lizzie Finley are the other teachers. The Methodist and Episcopalians have Sunday-schools in connection with their churches.

Mrs. Caroline Wells, now eighty-four years of age, was one of the first teachers in this region, and we shall give her account of these schools nearly in her own words, and in connection therewith reminiscences of her life. She is the only member of the Dutch Reformed Church of Minisink, on this side of the river, in Milford. Caroline Austin was born in Montague, N. J. Her father was a New Englander, and her mother of Dutch descent. "I lived with my grandmother Mullin, who was Dutch to the foot, and an excellent woman. She was eighty-seven years old when she died. He used Webster's Spelling-Book, the American Preceptor, Columbian Orator, the Bible, Daboll's Arithmetic and Murray's Grammar. Lemuel Thrall is the first teacher I went to, in 1805, at Hainesville, when I was four years old. He was a good man, and meant well. He taught me 'Now I lay me down to sleep.' I told him I didn't want to go to sleep. I told him I could learn 'Our Father' as well as the older ones. My next teacher was Mr. Hyde. I went to school to Mr. Hamlin, in Walpack, in my tenth year. There I first heard the gospel preached by Rev. George Banghardt. He was a shouting Methodist, but I liked him because he was handsome, and he knew it. He could sing, and he knew that, too. He told stories. He would name persons that he said went to hell, and that the devil stood ready to take them. He used to scare me. We moved up to the 'Brick House,' and I went to school to Erastus Starkweather. He wrote my name and date in my geography June 10, 1810, and I said, "I thought the price was fifty cents, and here you have it 1810;" then he told me that was the date, which was the first time that I ever knew what a date was. I went to Mr. Drake to school in 1808–9, in Milford. He taught in a little house opposite the old court-house. My husband went to school to a Mr. Jackson, upon a hill back of the cemetery, as early as 1805–6. The early teachers were all Yankees but one, that I went to, and he was a coarse, ugly man. Some of my teachers were terribly cross and brutish. It was ignorance that made them so. The people were very ignorant, but they were worse on the other side of the Delaware than this. Mason Dimmick was an early teacher. We had to pay two dollars per quarter for schooling. I went through Daboll's Arithmetic, commenced to teach when I was fifteen years old, and taught seven years. The last year I taught on this side, down by Dietrick's, and I had a school in Milford when I was married. Iva Burral Newman taught select school in the De Berble house, where Mrs. Wm. Cornelius lives, for about ten years. Edward Allen and Philetus Philips taught in the academy. Mason Dimmick's nephew taught here when the free schools were first started, in 1835.

"In 1815 Bartholomew West tried to preach in Milford. He went to Philadelphia afterward, and became a full-fledged Methodist preacher. Rev. Phineas Camp preached here in 1815, and his sermon from 'The Prodigal Son' and 'Mary hath chosen that better part' convinced me, and at fifteen years of age I joined the Dutch Reformed Church at Montague, when Rev. Cornelius C. Elting was preacher, and he was one of the old-fashioned kind. He believed in predestination, was strict in Sabbath observances and about amusements." Mrs. Wells imbibed these doctrines and believed them fully.

Public Schools.—Milford since 1877 has been a special school district. It has three school-houses, all in good condition and seated with folding chairs and desks. There are in the two primary schools eighty-four pupils, in the intermediate sixty-six and in the grammar school forty-six, making a total of one hundred and ninety-six scholars in attendance. The principals since the formation of the district have been as follows: 1877–78, J. S. Freeman; 1878–79, William Van Sickle; 1879–83, Hamilton Armstrong; 1883–84, G. R. Smith;

1884–85, I. C. Taylor; 1885–86, Mrs. C. M. Blanchard.

PHYSICIANS.

Dr. Francis Al. Smith, oldest son of Josephus Jacobus Aerts, or Dr. Francis J. Smith, as he called himself, was born in France or the Netherlands, and probably he came to America with his father in 1877, a full account of whom will be found in the history of Monroe County. Dr. Francis Al. Smith lived and died in the old Harford house, where he was interested in the publication of the Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor for five or six years. He was the first druggist in the place and one of the earliest resident physicians. He taught his wife, Margaret Quick, midwifery. Dr. Smith appears to have been something of a politician also, as he filled the office of high sheriff of Pike County in 1821. He believed, as do some of the descendants, that there is an estate in Brussels, or near it, which belongs to the descendants of De Aerts, who claimed that his father was Lord of Opdorp and Boom, and from letters of Dr. Francis Al. Smith it appears that he made an effort to obtain his rights in 1821, as cited in a letter written partly in French and partly in English, a copy of which is in the possession of Helen M. Cross and from which the following extract is taken: The letter is written from Brussels, dated April 26, 1821, and addressed to the United States Minister at Madrid, Spain. Dr. Smith complains that his uncles, James De Aerts and Canton De Aerts, had taken all his grandfather's and Uncle Jean Baptist De Aerts' property. He wants the minister to make some search in relation to his uncle Jean, who was a soldier in the Royal Gardes Walones. He says his father, Josephus Jacobus Aerts, made the acquaintance of Dr. Franklin, and being recommended by him to Congress, was made a major in the service of the United States, and that he died in the State of Pennsylvania in 1802. He gives as a reason why he cannot go to Spain to investigate the matter, that he must return to his family in the United States, "and as it is absolutely necessary that I must attend our August court in Pike County, Pa., being the high sheriff of said county." His children were Hannah, wife of Jeffrey Wells, who was at one time tavern-keeper at Salem Corners, Wayne County, and afterwards moved West; and Jane, wife of Thomas Clark, hotel-keeper in Waymart, Wayne County, Pa.

Dr. George F. Shotwell was one of the early physicians in Milford. He lived on Hartford Street and practiced medicine from about 1827 till 1841. His wife was Catharine Clarke, granddaughter of James Barton. Sheriff Williamson married one of his daughters.

Dr. Du Frene practiced medicine in Milford for a number of years and finally moved to Port Jervis, where he died. Dr. A. A. Lines was a practitioner in Milford for a number of years and then removed from the place. He was a skillful physician.

Dr. John Schimmel was born near Frankfort-on-the-Main, in Germany, July 11, 1811. He graduated at Wurtzburg University and took the medical course connected with the university. He came to America in 1833 and continued his medical studies at the medical college at Fairfield, Herkimer County, N. Y., where he began the practice of medicine with the late Dr. Stewart. Dr. Schimmel settled in Milford in 1837, remaining there until 1847, when he accepted a position as professor of modern languages in the Randolph Macon College, Virginia. In 1848 the development of the disease which ultimately resulted in his death, forced him to give up this position, when he returned to Milford. In 1854 he filled a responsible place in the United States Custom-House at Philadelphia, where he remained four years. In 1856 he returned to Milford and again commenced the practice of his profession, where he lived until his death, in 1882, aged seventy-one years.

He was one of the founders of Milford Cemetery, of which he was secretary and treasurer for sixteen years. In 1843 he married Miranda H., a daughter of Richard Eldred, who is now residing in Milford, and one daughter, Jeanette M., wife of Charles P. Mott, a merchant in Milford, resides with her.

Dr. Vincent Emerson was born near Dover, Delaware, June 1, 1822. He studied medicine in Pennsylvania College (Medical Department), graduated in 1848 and commenced practice April 1, 1848, at Willow Grove, Del., remaining there until May 1, 1859, when he removed to Milford. Here he has since been actively engaged in the practice of his profession. He was one of the examining surgeons during the draft in the War for the Union. The Emersons were originally Friends, and came to this country in 1720. John Emerson, from whom Dr. Vincent Emerson sprang, settled near Frederica, in Kent County, Del., in a rich agricultural region.

Dr. Emerson's first wife was Elizabeth Marvel, of Willow Grove. Their son, Dr. Gouverneur Emerson, was born in Delaware township, Pike County. "Following in the footsteps of his father, he began the study of medicine at an early age and passed a most excellent examination shortly after he reached his majority. He was a painstaking student, in love with his profession, and, as a result, he became a skillful physician and his services were in constant demand." He was kind-hearted and had a facility of making and keeping friends. He died in the flower of his manhood in the thirty-third year of his age.

Dr. I. B. Craft came to Milford township from New York in 1865, and died in 1880. He was succeeded in his practice by his son, Dr. Walter B. Craft, who died in February, 1886. He had an extended practice and was very charitable to the poorer class of patients. Stephen D. Wells, of Shohola, married one of Dr. I. B. Craft's daughters. Another son is a Catholic priest, or doctor, in Dakota.

Dr. John Sims was assessed as a physician in 1819. A number of young physicians have practiced medicine in Milford and vicinity for short periods, but the oldest physicians practicing here lived in Port Jervis and across the river in New Jersey. Among these may be mentioned Drs. Hornbeck and Van Deusen, and Drs. Rosecrans and Hunt, who lived opposite Dingman's Ferry.

Dr. W. W. Bidlack, son of Hon. B. A. Bidlack, was with his father at Bogota, United States of Columbia, S. A., when he died. He returned to the United States, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1852 and commenced practice in Luzerne County. He then traveled in Europe and Africa, where he spent two years, most of the time in Africa. From there he returned to Philadelphia and practiced medicine from 1856 till the outbreaking of the Rebellion, when he entered the army as a surgeon. After the war he went to Mississippi, attached to a negro regiment during the reconstruction period. Returning to Philadelphia and Stroudsburg, he practiced medicine for a short time at each place, and next went as a surgeon under General Crook's command in 1872, when the latter was sent to Arizona to repulse the Apache Indians. In 1874 he removed to California and practiced medicine at San Francisco and Santa Barbara. In 1883 he returned to Milford, where he is now in practice.

Milford Lodge, No. 82, F. and A. M., was the first lodge in this county or Wayne. The warrant for this lodge was granted April 25, 1800. Samuel C. Seely was W. M.; John Brink, S. W.; Eliphalet Kellog, Jr., J. W. The charter for the lodge was lost and the lodge became extinct. Years afterward the charter was found in New Jersey and when the present Masonic lodge was organized in Milford they petitioned to be restored to their former number, but the Grand Lodge would not permit it and the old charter was surrendered to them.

Milford Lodge, No. 344, F. and A. M., was organized December, 18, 1862, the following persons being present at the organization of the lodge: John C. Westbrook, John Canfield, Jeffrey Wells, Horace St. John, John Dekin, Henry S. Mott, George Wiggins, Erastus Slauson, John Mahon, Philip J. Fulmer, John Schunell, William Cornelius, Alexander Reviere, John C. Mott, Daniel M. Van Auken, Eli Fuller, Jacob Kleinhaus, Thomas J. Ridgway, Philip Lee, Thomas Sharpe, Henry Stewart, John Leforge, George P. Heller, Giles Greene and others.

The following were the first officers: D. M. Van Auken, W. M.; George P. Heller, S. W.; John C. Mott, J. W.; Eli Fuller, Treasurer; William Cornelius, Secretary; Desire Culot, S. D.; A. Reviere, J. D.

John B. Newman was also a charter member.

The lodge meets every Wednesday night, on or before the full of the moon, in the hall at the Sawkill House. There are now fifty-six members.

VANDERMARK LODGE, No. 828, I. O. O. F., was organized in the Masonic Hall, at three P.M., April 24, 1873. For the above purpose the following grand officers were present:

William Stedman, M. W. G. M.; John W. Stokes, R. W. D. G. M. pro tem.; James B. Nicholson, R. W. G. S.; John Sharp, R. W. G. W. pro tem.; Ira Olmsted, R. W. G. T. pro tem.; Daniel Romaine, R. W. G. C. pro tem.; S. A. J. Conkling, W. G. C. pro tem.; Tunis Rowland, W. G. M. pro tem.; Oliver E. Wheat, W. G. G. pro tem.; George Norris, W. G. H. pro tem.

The applicants, nineteen in number, having presented themselves, were duly constituted a Lodge of I. O. O. F., after which the following officers were elected and installed:

N. G., James H. Dony; V. G., Thomas Armstrong; Secretary, Henry M. Beardsley; A. S., Frank Cooley; Treasurer, Vincent Emerson.

The following officers were appointed and installed:

C., Thomas L. Armstrong; W., Henry Beam; I. G., John McCarty; O. G., John Reasor; R. S. S., William Wood; L. S. S., Jacob De Witt; R. S. N. G., M. W. Van Auken; L. S. N. G., W. H. Courtright; R. S. V. G., Frederick C. Almer; L. S. V. G., Russling De Witt; Chaplain, Rev. Theo. D. Frazee.

Highly interesting and appropriate remarks were then made by the Grand Master, William Stedman, John W. Stokes, P. G. M., James B. Nicholson, G. Sec'y and P. G. Sire, and Brother Romaine, of Ustayantha Lodge, No. 143, after which a recess was declared for the purpose of refreshing the inner man.

The Cornelius Brothers proved themselves equal to the occasion, and about seventy of the order sat down to one of those suppers for which the Sawkill House is so justly famous.

The lodge meets every Thursday night in the hall over Wallace's store, has about seventy members, and is financially in good condition.

DELAWARE POST, G. A. R., was brought into existence in February, 1884, chiefly through the efforts of R. B. Thrall. The following soldiers enrolled their names and were the charter or original members:

E. G. Loreaux, Co. B, 179th Regt. Pa. Vols.
James Bosler, Co. B, 142d Regt. N. Y. Vols.
R. B. Thrall, Co. B, 2d Regt. N. Y. Vols.

COLORED PEOPLE IN MILFORD AND VICINITY.—The old Dutch pioneers of the Minisink brought their slaves with them, and the leading families on both sides of the Delaware were slaveholders. There are about fifty negroes in Milford, and in Port Jervis many more. They are the descendants of these former slaves and have generally left the country districts and congregated in the towns, where they serve in hotels and are ready to do odd jobs of work, but they are seldom thrifty or frugal. Some of them are more than half white. Of this character are Richard Piggery and his wife, Rosanna, an aged couple who have a very vivid recollection of the old settlers and a very quaint way of expressing their opinion of them, views which our researches verify most strikingly. Michael Scott is their preacher here and Lewis Milligan in Port Jervis. Sister Minor, a negress from Port Jervis, sometimes talks to them.

"Old Black Jerry" lives in Delaware township with the Widow Angle. He was born a free man, near Richmond, and when eight years of age was brought to Delaware by Colonel Brodhead. When Brodhead left, "Black Jerry" went to live with Cornelius Angle, where he stayed for forty years, and has lived twenty years with one of his sons. "Black Jerry" has never been married and is quite a character in his way. He says "he don't want no woman to be bossing him around." He can be seen in his shirt-sleeves, with his breast exposed in cold winter weather. He is a very respectable old darkey and is now about eighty years of age.

BROSS'S RECOLLECTIONS OF PIKE COUNTY AND MILFORD.[1]

"My father, Moses Bross, moved to Milford in 1821 or 1822, the precise date I cannot determine. At that time Milford was a small but prosperous town. The turnpike came in from the west, and the road from Carpenter's Point from the north, and the two met, as now, where Pinchot's store and Dimmick's Hotel are situated. In the town they were dignified with the name of streets, which names they still retain. Besides these there was a street diagonal most of the way from the top of the hill, above Bidde's Mill, to the old Court-House. The fish on the top of it did duty then, as now, as a weathercock, from which for more than three-score years it has never been relieved. My father lived on the point, at the Upper Eddy, immediately above the mouth of the Vandermark Creek, and S. S. Thrall on or near the high point on the banks of the Delaware at the Lower Eddy. Both these houses were hotels devoted almost exclusively to the entertainment of raftsmen, and in the rafting season were filled to overflowing. Nearly all the residences and stores were on the two streets above named. In the triangle between them, where the academy used to stand, there was quite a depression, rocky as possible, and covered with scrub oaks wherever they could find room to take root. The people were mainly from New England and the surrounding districts, and, like most men who settle new countries, were intellectual, enterprising and very energetic,—just the men to achieve success wherever they might settle.

"WHENCE WAS THE PROSPERITY.—It has been said the town was prosperous; for this there were reasons not difficult to find. The ridges west of it for scores of miles were covered with a dense forest, much of the timber being white pine of an excellent quality. The inhabitants scattered all over these ridges, and in the valleys manufactured the pine forests into boards, planks, scantling and shingles, lath, etc., which were in due time carted to Milford and traded with the merchants. At that time the farmers in Sussex, Morris and perhaps other counties in New Jersey had become, if not rich, at least possessed of a surplus of farm products, and these they handled at Milford, and exchanged with our merchants for lumber to build barns and more elegant homes for their families. Any surplus that might remain was rafted down the Delaware for a market. The Milford merchants thus selling goods to the lumbermen, and also lumber to the Jersey farmers, realizing in this way a double profit, became rich, and the town was of course prosperous. The building of the Delaware and Hudson Canal and the Erie Railway up the Delaware also made large demands upon Milford for supplies. As in the distant past the rich trade of Asia meeting at Palmyra, Venice and Genoa with the demands and wants of Europe, made them great and prosperous, but when the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope changed the traffic of the world and diverted it from its ancient channels, these great cities sank into insignificance, so, when the canal and the Erie Railway had been built and diverted from Milford the sources of its wealth, it suffered severely. It had not then been discovered that it was one of the most beautiful and healthy summer resorts in the whole Union, and since then it has grown and prospered wonderfully, as its fine hotels, splendid streets and elegant dwellings abundantly testify. Having compared its situation with most of those in every other State of the Union, I am sure it cannot be deprived of the proud position it has attained among summer residents from New York, Philadelphia and other cities. The high, beautiful plateau on which it stands, the noble Delaware laving its eastern bluff; the scores of miles of unequaled drives, the bluffs to the north of the mountains, and the hills that surround it, and withal the large spring that supplies the town with water, sweet and pure as crystal, all secure Milford in the enjoyment of every enduring prosperity.

MORALS.—"While the town was very prosperous in all its early history, the morals of the people were at a very low ebb. When my father moved there from New Jersey, in 1821 or 1822, there certainly were not as many righteous men in the town as there were in Sodom. The stores were all open on the Sabbath, and the streets were full of teams loaded with lumber from the back districts, or with those from New Jersey exchanging their produce for lumber. In fact, Sunday was the great market and gala day of the week. Horse-racing, gambling and drinking were rife, and at general trainings, elections and other public occasions, personal encounters and black eyes were only too common. Fortunately for myself, at least, I was too young, and had too good an example and instruction at home to be anything more than a valiant spectator on all such occasions.

"Our politics are now thought to be bad enough, but they are decency and honor compared with what was everywhere seen in the early days of Milford. Candidates were plenty, and as King Caucus had not yet moved upon the polls—at least he had never been heard of in Pike County—each one boldly nominated himself. Standing on the counter, notably, of the old French store was a bottle of apple-jack, old rye brandy, in fact, that could not fail to suit the tastes of the multitude, with the name of the candidate who furnished the liquor. These bottles were kept full, and the candidates, ever watchful, would meet each arriving voter, and with the choicest blandishments, lead him by the arm to the counter and his bottle. The quality of the fluid being high—brandy, for instance in proportion to the dignity and the profit of the office-hunter's seeking—so it was that the man that had the longest purse and shortest conscience was sure to be elected.

"A CHANGE FOR THE BETTER.—From this sad and truthful—perchance, disgusting—picture, as presented to me when a boy, more than sixty years ago, let us turn to the great changes for the better that, a few years later, came over the town, and the causes that produced them. Before my father moved to Milford there was not a male church-member in the town, certainly not one that made himself known and his influence felt as a Christian. There was not a church of any kind whatever. My father was a man who had the courage of his convictions, and coming from the Dutch church across the river, presided over by Dominie C. C. Elting of blessed memory, his first move on the forces of the enemy was to establish a prayer-meeting, by permission, in the court-house. As a new thing it attracted attention, and my father often told of his embarrassment, and how his knees smote together, when a few of what he called the 'tall sons of Anak,' for the want of amusement, came to the meetings. In these efforts he was cordially and ably seconded by James Wallace, a leading merchant, but not then a member of any church—a most excellent Scotch-Irishman. Out of the prayer-meetings soon grew a Sunday-school, the first in all that country. This writer was one of its first pupils, and during his membership Matthew, Luke and John were all learned by heart, a valuable acquisition during all his subsequent history. These Christian efforts, and the success following them, induced other friends to canvass the prospect of engaging a minister. What controlled the selection I do not know, but it certainly proved to be a most excellent one. How the parson was obtained is worthy of note. My father, then and never after, being blessed with much of this world's goods, borrowed a horse from Mr. Wallace, as I remember, a harness of some one else, and a buggy of another, and he and my mother went over to Westtown and presented the matter to Rev. Thos. Grier. The subject was laid before the Hudson Presbytery, and it was agreed that Mr. Grier might be spared from that town one Sabbath in three, giving one-third of his services to the town of Milford. Mr. Grier was a man of splendid presence, an excellent preacher, whose earnest discussion and application of gospel truth had a marked effect upon the community. The services were held, as were all other public meetings, in the court-house. As an illustration of the habits of the time, it is here mentioned that every Friday morning, when he was expected to arrive, my father would say to me, 'William, take the decanter and go to La Forge's store and get a quart of his best brandy,' and before every meal the brandy and a bowl of eggs would be on the table, and the Dominie would take an egg and some brandy for the good of his health.

"My father and mother both being companionable people, they for years kept the ministerial hotel. It should be here mentioned that when the 'Temperance Reform' was first agitated, Mr. Thrall, my father and many others banished liquor from their homes forever.

"The ministrations of Mr. Grier were greatly blessed and the Sunday-school of which this writer was one of the first members was large and successful, and on the 25th of September, 1825, the Presbyterian Church was organized. James Wallace, Jacob Quick and my father were the first elders, with my mother and three or four other ladies as members. The court-house soon became too small for the congregation, and I well remember the earnest conferences in regard to the building of a new church. Finally, Mr. Grier preached a sermon from the text 'Go up to the mountains and bring wood and build an house and I will take pleasure in it, and I will be glorified saith the Lord.'—Haggai i. 8. As a result, to the mountains did the people go, and a church very respectable in size and appointments was built on the spot where the Presbyterian parsonage now stands, and as a lad of a dozen years I, with others, held the studs at 'the raising' while the frame was going up. To me it was always one of the most interesting buildings in Milford, for there I heard the gospel preached in its power and there was an almost constant revival, when, on the 29th of August, 1832, this writer became a member of the church. This was probably the controlling act in his personal history, for though short-comings have marked my life-work, to it I owe the small measure, morally and otherwise, of success the Lord has granted me. This remark is specially commended to all young people who may chance to read these lines.

"During the time above referred to nearly all the leading people of the town had become members of the church. A more complete reformation was, perhaps, never effected, and most happily the influence of those early movements has continued down to the present. About 1830 or 1831 Mr. Grier removed to some other charge, and Rev. Edward Allen came from New Jersey, and besides supplying the church, took charge of the Academy, the building of which had followed that of the church. Under his preaching and that of his most faithful associates, George and Peter Kanouse and others, nearly all the remaining citizens were gathered into the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches, the latter having been built a few years before. Many of his pupils also joined the church, and under Mr. Allen and his excellent brother-in-law, Dr. Alexander Linn, commenced a classical education. As to one of them, it is here remarked, it is charged that he went through Williams College a charity student. To some extent this is true, and for this purpose Milford furnished exactly one dollar and credit for a suit of clothes. For that dollar he handed a leading lady of the Milford Church a ten-dollar bill for benevolent purposes, and the clothes were paid for in a month or two after he graduated, in 1838. But the society to which Rev. Mr. Allen, one of the ablest teachers and preachers, and in all respects one of the best of men, introduced me and some of his other students, loaned me just $305. In addition to this, I taught school in Massachusetts every winter, and yet I found myself $600 in debt when I graduated. One-half of this was secured by a policy on my life, and the other was loaned me by Eastern friends. This was all paid with interest in two or three years, and the $305 were paid with compound interest, amounting to some $2800, by consent of the society that loaned it, to two of our colleges. I hope to be able to give two or three times that sum to our Christian benevolent and educational institutions every year during my life. For these reasons I am thankful that I was educated at all, and have no regrets or false modesty to own that I was educated as a charity student.

"In 1834 Mr. Allen had removed with his school to Libertyville, New Jersey, and in the opening of that year, with my small wardrobe tied in an old bandanna handkerchief swung on a stick across my shoulder, I crossed the mountain on foot and spent the summer completing as best I could my preparation for college. Of course I reluctantly bade good-by to Milford as a home forever.

"THE BAR.—The bar of Milford at this early day was composed of very able and eloquent men. Judge Scott, of Wilkesbarre, presided over the court with great dignity, with Associate Judges Dingman on his right, and Coolbaugh on his left. Judge Dingman was an active, wiry man, and generally held a political meeting during court-week, at which resolutions were passed thoroughly commending the national and State administrations.

"Judge Coolbaugh was a large, portly man and, so far as is now remembered, was very dignified and unobtrusive. Among our Milford lawyers D. M. Brodhead stood first, a man of splendid presence, able, eloquent and commanding the respect and confidence of the bar and the public. He afterward figured largely among the leading men of the State. Richard Eldred, O. S. Dimmick, Edward Mott and some others deserve more extended mention. Bethany sent us N. B. Eldred, one of the most valuable, eloquent and successful lawyers of the time. Wilkes-Barre sent us several of her most distinguished lawyers. First in learning and, it is believed, in substantial character and clear judgment, was Garret Mallory, afterward a leading judge in Pennsylvania. Then there were Fuller & Cunningham (probably Conyngham), and perhaps others should be mentioned. Notably among them was Benjamin F. Bidlack, a splendid man in presence, learning and ability. He was captured by the second daughter of Deacon James Wallace, and settled among us. Being ambitious to become widely known, he established the first newspaper ever published in the county. It was called The Northern Eagle and Milford Monitor. Between the first two words there was a villainous picture of an eagle, which the boys, by a very easy mental process, called a 'crow.' My father was a great friend of Bidlack's and secured the position of carrier for his eldest son. As he wended his way from the house of one Milford nabob to another, with a bundle of papers under his arm, he would hear the cheerful salutation, 'There comes the Northern crow.' This would often produce a belligerent state of society between the sturdy carrier and his fellow-urchins, and not seldom there were blows to take as well as slang to hurl at him. From this humble position he found himself half-owner of a paper in Chicago in 1849, and for more than a third of a century he has been connected with the daily press in the city of Chicago. Mr. Bidlack was very successful. He became member of Congress, and died as United States minister resident in Columbia, in South America.

"PERSONAL SKETCHES.—Perhaps some personal sketches of the leading men of Milford sixty years ago may be of interest.

"I will begin at the lower end of the town, where, upon the bluff, lived Samuel S. Thrall. He was a large, portly man, very kind and benevolent, and in all respects a good citizen. He stopped the objectionable part of the hotel business, as did my father, viz., selling liquor, when temperance principles were agitated. He became an elder in the church, and was ever considered one of our best citizens. James Wallace kept store nearly across the way from Mr. Thrall, where the streets fork at the top of the hill, as one then went west from Biddis' mill. He was an example of all that was dignified and good in human character. A man of medium height, sturdy frame and benevolent expression, he was a man to command the respect and the confidence of the entire community. He spent the latter years of his life on a fine farm now occupied by Mr. Bull, some two miles north of Milford, on the Port Jervis road. He had considerable wealth, which he used as such a man is most likely to do, for the wisest benefit of his family and his fellow-men. His two sons, John and James, were always leading men in Milford, and Frank, the youngest, became a very successful and wealthy broker in New York. Colonel John N. Brodhead was a leading merchant, dealing largely in lumber, whose house was on the first corner west of that of Mr. Wallace. He was a kind and most excellent gentleman, to whom this writer was indebted when a boy for some favors that were never forgotten. He filled for many years of his later life an important position in the Treasury Department at Washington. His youngest daughter is the wife of Senator General Van Wick, of Nebraska. Next west, on the south side of the street, ever to be found on his work-bench, was Henry Barnes, an industrious, pleasant, honest man, with a never-failing fund of kindly feeling which made a chat with him always agreeable and instructive. Westward, on the right-hand of the street, the nearest house to the Cornelius Hotel, lived James Barton, a marked figure among the denizens of Milford. Tall and commanding in figure, with a fine, open, benevolent countenance, and head as white as snow, easily approached by the humblest of the people, he was always popular. He was wealthy and very enterprising, building Barton's grist-mill, at the west end of the town, and taking an active interest, if, indeed, he was not the projector and father, of the Milford water-works. These facts made the people forget, if it was ever true, that he received a pension from the English Government for services rendered during the Revolutionary War. Be that as it may, he always used his money for the good of the community among whom he lived. His family of daughters were very intellectual and accomplished women, and whose husbands were among our leading citizens. Probably the most widely-known man Milford had was Lewis Cornelius. He kept both store and hotel in the house his family still occupy. Honest and socially an agreeable man, he was always popular. His hotel attracted custom from far and near. The first and most important requisite was that his wife and her daughters were among the very best cooks and housekeepers that could be found in the whole country, and Mr. Cornelius himself attracted the travelling public by his great size.

"At his death he weighed, as I remember, six hundred and seventy-five pounds—probably considerably less than he would tip the beam at when in good health. But if people wanted to see him, they must give no sign that they came for that purpose, or he would at once become invisible. In spite of his immense size, he always kept at the head of his business, and no one could ever complain of negligence when stopping at his hotel. His son John, now dead, became sheriff of the county, and his sisters have continued the business down to the present day. Across the road lived Hon. D. M. Brodhead, above referred to, and opposite, on the main street, was the residence and drug-store of Dr. Francis A. L. Smith. With his father, then living in Belgium, near Brussels, he escaped during the early wars with France, and, after many startling incidents and hair-breadth escapes, they arrived in America. Being of a leading wealthy family, they did not wish their friends at home to know where they were, and so changed their names De Aerts to Smith, the nearest possible to being anonymous. He was an accomplished scholar, speaking German and French fluently, and, being a man that everybody liked, he was always a leading man in the community. On the same side of the street, and opposite from Port Jervis, was the hotel of Samuel Dimmick. His active habits and close attention to business, and withal his great courtesy and kindness, made him a popular landlord and a good citizen. Opposite, on the northeast corner, was the residence of C. C. D. Pinchot, his house being in the rear and his store in front. He was a man of great energy and enterprise, and accumulated a large fortune. As a member of the Presbyterian Church, he was as earnest and his influence was as widely felt in religious as in the business interests of the town. Of his sons, one has been judge and another is a leading New York manufacturer and capitalist of that city. West of the corner, on the opposite side of the street, lived Theophilus H. Smith. He was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, a good business man and an excellent citizen. On the west side of the street (Harford, I think it is) was the hotel of George Bowhannon, still occupied by his daughters. Opposite was the store of John B. Le Forge. He was a large, fine-looking gentleman, and had the reputation of keeping the best and choicest goods in town. Taciturn, yet polite and dignified, he always held a leading place among his fellow-merchants. Of course he was prosperous. Sheriff James Hatson occupied the court-house. He was popular and an excellent officer. As to the old court-house, there it has stood, to my certain knowledge, for more than sixty years. Not a change outwardly, and I presume internally, has come over it, while those eloquent men who once waked the echoes within its walls have all passed away. Such is life.

"Northward still, and on the same side of the street, was the 'Old French Store.' The firm was first Pinchot & Muclare, but, both these dying, it fell under the direction of Madame Pinchot and her son Cyrille. The firm from the beginning was managed with all the tact, energy and shrewdness always manifest in the French character. It had a marked success from the beginning, and it was believed did a larger and more successful business than any other store in Milford. Madame Pinchot was a courteous, excellent woman, whose memory is cherished by all who knew her. An only daughter, Hortense, the wife of J. C. Westbrook, of Port Jervis, a most accomplished and excellent woman, still survives her. Westward, on the same street, lived Richard Eldred. He was a successful lawyer and a good citizen. No man ever had a better wife 'whose price is far above rubies.' I say this entirely without regard to the fact that she was the woman that handed my father the dollar to assist me in getting my education. Westward still, the house standing directly next to the bridge below and across the Vandemark Creek, stood the house of my uncle, Daniel Beecher. His wife was my mother's oldest sister. He was a well-known character, for he utilized, to the best possible advantage for himself, the tax deeds of the back ridges of Pike County by trading them off for goods, cattle, horses, almost anything, with the New England people anxious to become proprietors of Western lands. Scarcely any one of them ever occupied those lands, and hence the population of the county was not specially increased by his efforts. Directly below was the expensive wagon manufactory of Roys & Benton, two enterprising Yankees from Connecticut. They did a large and successful business. It was continued by John M. Heller, who afterward moved his establishment to Port Jervis. He was one of the best of men, the father of Judge George P. Heller, for many years a leading politician and judge in the county. I should have said in the proper place he married Helen, one of the best of her sex, the daughter of John H. Wallace, and lived nearly opposite and near the Cornelius Hotel, a righteous judge and an honest man. Directly across the bridge, to the left hand, lived Hugh Ross, a lawyer and always a man of mark. The house is now occupied by Hon. D. M. Van Auken, whose wife was his granddaughter.

"My father lived, as above stated, on the point just above the mouth of the Vandemark Creek. He was a tall, spare man of great energy and wide intelligence in all matters derived from books and newspapers. His knowledge of the Scriptures was accurate, and embraced nearly every fact brought out and principle stated in Bible history. A thoroughly honest and sincerely religious man was Moses Bross. He lived a life of toil and devotion to his large family and the best interests of the church which he loved so well. Regarding the church he helped to organize, it has often been a matter of discussion in my own mind whether all his sons put together can ever have a tithe of the influence for good to which he is justly entitled. He left Milford somewhere in the sixties, and moved to Panther Brook, a mile above Shohola, where he lived till 1865, when his oldest son moved him and his blessed mother to Morris, Ill. The mother died February 22, 1868, and he lived on in peace and comfort till August 19, 1882, when he peacefully passed away, lacking but two months and twelve days of being ninety years old. Many others might and perhaps ought to be mentioned, and it may be asked, 'Had you no bad men in those early days?' True, we had; but 'speak only good of the departed' is a good rule, old as history and morals. Most of those that were worth saving, as above stated, reformed and were gathered into the churches between 1826 and the few subsequent years. 'Their works do follow them,' and the doctrines of heredity are fully illustrated in their children, while I make no invidious comparisons among them; yet as their fathers were, so are they—the leaders of the people among whom they live; granting that their morals are good, so will they continue to be. May I be permitted the remark, in closing, that I always visit Milford with the greatest pleasure. Alas! the old house on the hill, where my father lived, and where all his younger children, but one, were born, was burned a few weeks ago, and the church which in my boyish days, I helped to build, and in which I joined myself with the Lord's people, have passed away, but in one heart, at least, their memory is precious.

"Though Milford now contains, perhaps, ten times as many people as when I first knew it, and the residences are many, and not a few of them large and elegant, there will not be a man sixty years hence who will have a more interested and pleasant memory of it than the writer of this sketch.

HON. WILLIAM BROSS is one of the founders, editors and proprietors of The Chicago Tribune. He is among the earlier graduates of Williams and one of the distinguished alumni who have reflected lustre upon their alma mater. He was born in New Jersey, November 4, 1813, and was reared to manhood at Milford, Pa. His paternal and maternal ancestors were excellent people. He graduated with high honors from Williams with the class of 1838. In 1866 he delivered the alumni address, and has received numerous evidences of the high estimate in which he is held by the friends of that institution, which has conferred upon him its higher degrees. After graduating he taught an academy in Orange County, New York, for nearly ten years, with decided success. He was a thorough classical scholar, and a student of the arts, sciences and of history. He came to Chicago in 1848, engaged in the book trade for a time, and bought out the then Prairie Herald, and continued it two years, when he united with John L. Scripps in establishing the Democratic Press, a daily and weekly newspaper, Democratic in politics up to the time of the organization of the Republican party, when he championed that cause, and was one of its ablest and most eloquent advocates, and has been since. He was the first man in the West to indorse the nomination of John C. Fremont for President. In 1859 he consolidated his paper with The Tribune. In 1860 he was a prime mover in securing the nomination of Lincoln for President, and was among the foremost in planning and executing the remarkable campaign which resulted in his election, and was one of his trusted and confidential advisers during his Presidency. In 1864 he was elected Lieutenant-Governor of Illinois, and served four years with great credit to himself and satisfaction to the people, and as presiding officer of the Senate was the first official in the United States to sign the resolution passed by the Illinois Legislature ratifying the amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery, Illinois being the first State to take action. In 1868 he visited the Rocky Mountains, and the miners on a then nameless peak, near Mount Lincoln, named it Mount Bross, in honor of him and his visit, and it bears that name to-day, made permanent by the map-maker, by official action, and by the artist.

Mr. Bross has led an active, useful, and beneficent life, as teacher, journalist, statesman and citizen, and there are few men whose personal history is so inseparably connected with the history of Illinois during his time, the annals of which he has so conspicuously illustrated. He will transmit a fortune and an example of how a guided mentality can assert a mastery over difficulties and even adverse circumstances in shaping the character and destiny of a man, if balanced by a true manhood and a high moral purpose. His life work is written in the history of his time. All attempts to assail his integrity have been fruitless. He has led the life of a Christian gentleman in private and in public. He has traveled extensively in this and in foreign countries, and the chronicles of his intelligent observations have graced the columns of his own paper and other publications.

In 1839 he married the only daughter of the late Dr. John T. Jansen, of Goshen, N. Y., a most estimable lady. They have had much affliction, having buried four sons and three daughters, the last resting-place of the mortal remains of whom is marked by a beautiful monument in Rosehill Cemetery. Only one child survives, Mrs. Henry D. Lloyd, a lady of rare mental endowments, whose presence adorns polished society. Before the recent death of his father, four generations, on both sides, were represented in a group at one time,—an isolated instance of the kind, so far as is known.[1] [1] The following is inserted, as it contains a condensed history of Gov Bross' family.

To My Wife.

MRS. MARY JANE BROSS,

DAUGHTER OF THE LATE DR. JOHN T. JANSEN, OF GOSHEN, N. Y.

On Her Sixtieth Birthday.

Bright and blessed be the coming
Of thy sixtieth birthday morn,
Thankful that through joys and sorrows
By my side thou'st stood so long.*
'Mid old Orange hills I found thee,†
There our wedded love began;
'Mid Chicago's surging progress,
Pass we most of life's short span,

Scourgings oft have been our portion,
Toils and sorrows bitter, deep;
Seven sweet babes in mercy sent us,
Safe in Abraham's bosom sleep.‡
From our happy home in fire §
Drove us, life to start anew;
Worse than all the loss we've suffered,
Faithless friends have stung us, too.

But from sorrows look we, cheerful
Down the rapid stream of time,
And whate'er the Father sends us,
Bowing to His will divine;
Thankful that our darling Jessie ‖
Lives to bless our waning years,

An angel to th' poor and erring,
To soothe their cares and dry their tears.

Joy we then to hope and labor
On, while life and strength may last,
Striving ever to make better.
Those with whom our lot is cast.
And when toils and cares are ended,
With our dear ones may we sleep
Side by side, until th' Archangel
Wakes us never more to weep.

Chicago, January 2, 1873. W. B.

* Married October 7, 1839.
† Orange County, N. Y.
‡ Interred at Rosehill.
§ October 9, 1871.
‖ Now Mrs. Henry D. Lloyd. Has two sons, William Bross Lloyd, in his eighth, and Henry Demarest Lloyd, Jr., in his fifth year.

Cemetery.—The beautiful Milford Cemetery, purchased and laid out by an association, was dedicated on May 26, 1868, with appropriate exercises in the presence of a great concourse of people. The address was delivered by Lucien F. Barnes, who died not long afterwards and was the first person buried in the grounds he had done so much to provide. A poem was read by John D. Biddis, Esq., addresses were delivered by Rev. R. H. Beattie and Rev. C. S. Rymall and a choir sang several selections and a hymn composed especially for the occasion. Following is Mr. Biddis' poem:

For half a century back our fathers' bones have slept
In the old orchard, where the little knot
Of cluster'd pine trees have their vigils kept,
Lonely, but watchful o'er the sacred spot.

Nought marks the grave but the rude mound of earth,
Or tott'ring slab of marble or rough stone;
No epitaph to tell us of their worth—
That to their deeds and time is left alone.

Deserted now, this first old burying-ground;
Uncared for now, decaying with its dead;
But many a chiseled shaft and tell-tale mound
Cluster about our churches in its stead.

Children and friends have fallen, one by one;
Father and mother rest beneath the sod;
Their joys and sorrows felt, their journey done,
And their immortal spirits with their God.

But now within the small allotted space,
Scarce room is left for mourning friends to tread,
Who fain with loving hands would gladly grace
With flowers the turf that closes o'er their dead.

The cheerless wind sweeps, howling, bleak and drear;
The spectral army, only, points the sky;
And no protecting tree or hill-side's near
To make the wind's loud roar a gentle lullaby.

Is there nought left, when in the narrow cell
We've laid our hallowed dead and o'er them weep,
But for a mourning season in our hearts to tell
To our own selves their past, and let them sleep?

How doubly dark, how fearful would seem death,
If we, who living, look beyond life's end,
Were doomed to chain unto our parting breath
All that in love, to life its beauties lend.

Such love as that which in a mother dwells,
When weeping o'er the pillow of her child;
Or from the wife's devoted bosom swells,
When her dear ones are toss'd by tempests wild.

The memory of a gentle sister's thought,
The fond regard that lights the lover's eye;
If with the loss of these the tomb were fraught,
Our graves were all left of us when we die.

We've met to-day to consecrate the spot
Where some of us must find our future home;
Where each of us may choose the little lot,
Wherein to rest when death shall come.

Here, where yon mountain lends its grateful shade;
Here, by the side of yonder gentle river;
Where Nature's self a resting-place hath made;
Here let our loved ones rest in peace forever.

Here, through the pines the summer showers will weep,
And through their branches birds will chirp and sing;
These hills as sentinels their vigils keep;
And from the ground will sweetest violets spring.

With all that's cheerful here a solemn grandeur blends;
The stillness of the scene, yon rocks of sombre grey;
And through the winding paths the funeral cortege lends
A sadness fitting to the burial day.

When once loved forms are mouldering to dust,
Let ties of love that made their lives so sweet
All centre here, and, faithful to our trust,
Let us keep tenderly their last retreat.

'Tis meet that wand'ring spirits here should dwell,
And through these trees the wind in sadness wail;
The gentle dove her mournful story tell,
And with soft music fill the echoing vale.

How better far, to feel that we and ours
May sometime slumber in this lovely place,
Than in the crowded churchyard where no flowers
Or trees or birds our final couch can grace.

There are buried in the cemetery the following soldiers, viz.:

Col. John Nyce, 174th Regt. Pa. Vols.
Seth Williamson, War of 1812.
John Westfall, 4th Regt. N. J. Artillery.
Gen. Dan Brodhead, Revolutionary War.
Capt. O. H. Mott, Co. B, 151st Regt. Pa. Vols.
George Royce, private, Co. C, 67th Regt. Pa. Vols.
Major Richard Eldred, War of 1812.
Capt. J. Everett Eldred, Co. C, 67th Pa. Vols.
Jacob Scott, private in a colored regiment.

MILFORD BOROUGH — CIVIL ORGANIZATION.—The first election, under the borough charter was held February 16, 1875, when the following officers were chosen:

Chief Burgess.—John C. Wallace.
Town Council.—John Gaillard, Henry B. Wells Jacob Klaer, Peter A. L. Quick, Desiré Bournique.
School Directors.—Charles D. Loreaux, Vincent Emerson, John Nyce, F. H. Palmer, David A. Wells, Frederick C. Almer.
Overseers for the Poor.—Emanuel B. Quick, John B Newman.
High Constable.—Thomas J. Newman.
Assessor.—Chauncy W. Dimmick.
Auditors.—Abram D. Brown, Benjamin F. Bennett, Edward Quick.
Judge of Elections.—James H. Doney.
Inspectors of Elections.—Oscar M. Brink, George Slawson.

February 23, 1875, the first meeting of the Town Council was held in the house of John C. Wallace, burgess, who presided. Harry T. Baker was elected secretary of the Council and Samuel Dietrick was appointed treasurer. The following persons have held the office of chief burgess since that time:

1876. Desiré Bournique.	1881. J. R. Julius Kline.
1877. W. K. Ridgway.	1882. C. W. Bull.
1878. H. B. Wells.	1883. M. D. Mott.
1879. John Nyce.	1884. Geo. E. Horton.
1880. John Nyce.[1]	1885–86. J. Hutchison.

SCENERY AND SURROUNDINGS.—The rich and varied scenery in the region round about Milford has made the town famous and brought it into favor among artists, lovers of nature, tourists and summer sojourners in general. Pike County is a district in which nature is still fresh, wild, untrammeled, unbroken by the works of man, which, often endeavoring to increase beauty, only mar it. Large portions of the county are in as rude and rough a wilderness state as they were a hundred years ago, and this wildness forms one of the chief charms of the county. Yet some portions of Pike are highly cultivated and afford a marked contrast with the wild-wood, mountainous, rocky and ravine-cleft regions.

There are refreshing elements of beauty almost everywhere in the county, from the level well-titled Delaware bottom lands to the wilderness-clad mountains in the interior. Perhaps the boldest and most picturesque scenery in the vicinity of Milford is formed by the cliffs which sharply mark the valley of the river, and form, in fact, a wall for many miles along the bottom lands. The cliff is most rugged and reaches its greatest height at a point about three miles below Milford, known as "Utter's Point."[1] The road leads along its base, and the sight-seer cannot, without leaving it and going toward the river, obtain a satisfactory view of this towering rock wall. A very fine view is to be had from the farm-house of Mr. Warner.

Of all the varied scenes of loveliness in mountain, stream and lake, there is perhaps no single feature so remarkable and popularly pleasing as the waterfalls. Of these there are many in the county (elsewhere spoken of), but those of chief importance in the vicinity of Milford are the Sawkill and Raymondskill, the former only a mile and a half distant and the latter about three miles. It is not too much to say of these that they are among the most picturesque in the United States. Of the Sawkill Falls further mention is made, under the head of "Geology." Of the "incomparable Raymondskill," Edmund C. Stedman has written a highly poetical account, which we here abridge,—

"The cockney tourist, whose first inquiry on landing at New York is, 'Have you any cataracts near by?' is guided to Trenton Falls, or Watkins Glen, when he might so easily reach Milford, just off the line of travel, and satisfy to the full his

'hunger for the living wood,
The laureled crags, the hemlocks hanging wide,
The rushing stream that will not be withstood,
Bound forward to wed him with the river's tide.'

"Close against the mountain wall is built the valley turnpike, a natural 'Macadam,' for the shale thrown upon it from the roadside packs down as hard and even as a mosaic floor. Far above rise the oak, maple and chestnut, birch and pine, and at intervals of every league, I say, dark gaps open like doorways in the hillside, through which the trout streams are plunging, as yet unstained and free. A land of streams,—

'Some, like a downward smoke;
Slow, drooping veils of thinnest lawn did go;
And some through wavering lights and shadows broke,
Rolling a slumbrous sheet of foam below.'

"But here is no swooning of the languid air, and no seeming always afternoon. It is a Morning Land, with every cliff facing the rising sun. The mist and languor are in grain-fields far below; the hills themselves are of the richest, darkest green; the skies are blue and fiery; the air crisp, transparent, oxygenated, American; it is no place for lotus-eating, but for drinking water of the fountain of youth, till one feels the zest and thrill of a new life that is not unrestful, yet as far as may be from the lethargy of mere repose.

"The speckled trout of this region, though not so large as their Long Island kindred, are more in number; growing in weight as the fisher wanders down the current, and leaping at his fly with a lusty mountain vigor—a spring like the quiver of a sword-blade.

"The Vandermark and Sawkill flow through the village of Milford; lower down, and at intervals of a league, are the Raymondskill, Adams', Dingman's and the Bushkill, each with attractions peculiar to itself. The Sawkill Falls are somewhat widely known; their grace is the despair of the painter and delight of young and old. Sawkill Glen is another beauty-spot, in the heart of Milford.

"But the Raymondskill is the acknowledged monarch of our Milford fluviarchy. It rises miles above them all, in a vast wilderness, where the springs outlast the summer drouth and winter cold, and yield a constant torrent for its craggy bed. I have never fished upward to its source, choosing rather to think of the wild wood as perpetual, stretching into trackless westering regions, the cover of mysteries and snares. I am told that venison and bear's meat repay the hunters who strike boldly out from Blooming Grove Park at fall-tide of the year. But let my reader make his first acquaintance with the Raymondskill, where it is a swift, full stream, coursing through farmers' meadows on the upper plateau. Drive thither at sunrise of a bright, June morning, and spend a golden day, angling, if you like, along its banks. In an hour you reach the cataract and ruined dam at 'Goosey's,' below which a series of the loveliest swift-waters and miniature cascades will tempt you, by another hour's journey, within sight of the spray and sound of the roar of the greater Raymondskill Falls.

[1] It was in this vicinity that Squire Brink, who, as a boy, was brought up by Judge John Brink, fell a distance of one hundred and sixty-nine and one-half feet and rolled sixty-three feet farther, almost incredibly sustaining only slight injuries. He was fourteen years of age at the time, and lived to be an old man. His portrait hangs in the Sawkill House.

"Here is a cleft in the mountain, wide and deep, where the brook takes its grandest leaps from the higher to the lower world. The upper fall is a double cataract, higher than the broad, magnificent fall. The two are so near each other as to form one picture to the eye. I do not know the exact height of the upper or lower fall, but it is not the dimensions of a cataract that make it poetical and inspiring. All these matters are relative, and, for one, I have had more pleasure in gazing at the Raymondskill Falls than at Niagara itself.

"From the cliff, on the left of the dark pool below, is shaken down the filmy transparent 'Bridal Veil.' Every waterfall has a Bridal Veil, but this is the Laureate's veritable "slow-dropping veil of the thinnest lawn.' Here I will leave my angler to meditate awhile, and drink his fill of that beauty in which Weir and Beard Whittrege have loved to dip their pencils. He has still before him a mile of devious windings—filled with witching nooks—ere he can gain the river-side, and set his feet toward Milford."

GEOLOGY OF THE LOCALITY—MILFORD AND DINGMAN TOWNSHIPS.[1]

Milford township lies directly west from Westfall, and, like it, is bordered by the Delaware River on the south. It drains into the Delaware through Sawkill and Vandemark Creeks.

Between the mouths of these streams at Milford there is a wide and beautiful terrace, whose top comes one hundred to one hundred and twenty feet above the level of the Delaware River, and makes the site of Milford the county-seat. It is a great bed of rehandled morainic débris, and is seen along the river in an almost vertical mass one hundred feet high, in which occur boulders of Oneida conglomerate, Corniferous limestone, Hamilton sandstone, Chemung and Catskill rocks, together with much fine sand and gravel.

The Drift has exerted a not inconsiderable influence on the topography of this area, since a great dam of moraine thrown across the ancient channel of the Sawkill near Mr. G. Hamilton's, two and a half-miles above its mouth, caused it to seek a new outlet to the Delaware over the cliffs of the Hamilton sandstone, and thus resulted in producing the "Sawkill Falls," where the stream passes over the high escarpment of the Delaware hills.

In pre-glacial times the Sawkill waters, instead of going over the present falls, passed by a channel now buried with Drift, which runs from where the Milford and Owego pike crosses that stream, southeastward to the old valley in which the Milford water-works are situated, and then continuing along this old valley it received the Raymondskill near Milford, the combined streams finally emptying into the Delaware directly under the present site of that town.

This is known to be true, because the "divide" of Drift which now separates the Sawkill from the old valley is only twenty-five feet high, and because the only water carried in the old valley comes from two or three springs, and yet this valley is cut down more than one hundred feet below the level of the top of Sawkill Falls, through the same series of rocks, while the bed-rock is still concealed by an unknown thickness of Drift. It is simply impossible that a feeble stream, such as now flows in it, could ever have cut out such a deep, wide, valley; and, on the other hand, it is equally improbable that the large volume of water carried by the Sawkill could rush over its steep descent for untold ages without cutting its channel down to the depth at least as great as that of small streams like Vandemark and Quick Creeks, just above.

In passing up the present channel of the Sawkill, from the Delaware River, three hundred and eighty feet, A. T., there occurs a succession of cascades. The first one is one-quarter mile above the mouth of the stream, and begins at four hundred and ten feet, A. T. The rock is a dark, sandy slate (Marcellus), and a dam thrown across its centre gives a fall of 20 feet for the mills situated just below.

On above this the stream meanders through a dense grove bounded on either side by steep banks of Drift. This part of the Sawkill channel is known as the "Glen," and it forms a delightful retreat for the summer borders who throng Milford every year. At the head of the Glen, and directly opposite the main street of Milford, the Sawkill makes a second plunge of eighteen feet over a dam, and the dark-bluish, sandy slates of the Marcellus, dipping N. 25° W. 13°. The channel below the dam is a gorge only 30 feet wide, with vertical walls of slate, but on above this the channel widens out into a considerable valley, the ancient course of the Sawkill.

About one mile above the mouth of the Sawkill, and just below where the road crosses it, a gray, coarse and somewhat massive-looking sandy rock comes down, dipping 12°–14° N. 20° W. Its bedding planes exhibit numerous irregular layers with curly or twisted structure, and it belongs to the Hamilton proper, since, just above, many bold, massive beds dip under water at an angle of 15° N. 25° W.

One mile and a quarter above the mouth of the Sawkill the base of the third fall is reached at an elevation of five hundred and ten feet, A. T., or one hundred and thirty feet above the Delaware. This is a constant succession of cascades one to twenty feet high, through a vertical distance of fifty feet; and, seen from below, is one of the most fascinating views on the stream. At the top of this "Bridal Veil" fall, as it is called, the stream has cut a narrow channel through the rock 10 feet deep, but only 5 feet wide at top, so that one can easily step across the channel, even when it is much swollen.

[1] From the Second Geological Survey of Pennsylvania.

About one and three-quarter miles from the Delaware one comes to the Sawkill Falls proper, the level of the water in the pool at the base being six hundred feet, A. T.

The structure of this fall is sufficient evidence to any one that the Sawkill has not always flowed over its walls.

Beginning one-quarter mile up the stream from the main falls, we find the Sawkill flowing between banks of Drift, which it here cuts through, and rapidly excavates a long, narrow canon out of the Genesee shale. This trench is 110 feet deep where the falls begin, only about fifty feet wide at top and ten to fifteen feet at the bottom.

The first descent is a fall of twenty feet in two cascades over the fossil coral bed at the base of the Genesee; then the stream spreads out on a broad, gently-sloping platform of gray Hamilton rock, to fall into the great abyss below in a vertical plunge of sixty feet. Leaving the pool at the base of the huge amphitheatre here excavated, the water passes through a channel only two and one-half feet wide, with a fall of fifteen feet down into a chasm only two feet ten inches wide, but overhung with rocky walls seventy-five feet high.

The fossil coral bed at the top of the large fall is a dark-blue slaty rock filled with corals, and also many fossil shells.

In Dingman township the effects of the Glacial moraine in changing the course of streams is also plainly marked in for the evidence proving that the Raymondskill once emptied into the Sawkill above Milford is complete.

The Raymondskill Creek now empties into the Delaware three miles below Milford, but in pre-glacial times it left its present channel 2½ miles west from the Delaware, and going northeastward, descended the present valley of Mott's Run, uniting with the ancient Sawkill somewhere under the present site of Milford. That the Raymondskill once took this course is certain, because an old drift-buried valley leads across from the Raymondskill near J. Brink's to the Sawkill at Milford, and at no point does it rise higher than 20 feet above the bed of the Raymondskill at Brink's. The character of the present Raymondskill channel below Brink's, is also proof of its recent origin, for it descends about 450 feet in two miles, being a constant succession of rapids and falls, with one grand leap (at Raymondskill Falls) of 125 feet.

In ascending the Raymondskill from its mouth to the foot of the Raymondskill Falls, one mile above, the ascent of the stream is only one hundred feet above the Delaware. The stream, however, has cut a deep, narrow canon out of the soft Marcellus slate all the way from the foot of the falls until its channel debouches into the Delaware valley.

The Raymondskill Falls is a spot of surpassing scenic beauty. The stream has there cut a deep, narrow gorge through the Hamilton ridge, and at the bottom of this it descends through a vertical distance of one hundred and twenty-five feet in two successive leaps, excavating a beautiful glen, overhung with vertical walls of pine-clad rock two hundred feet high, into whose depths the sun never shines. The upper is known as "High Falls" and the lower as "Bridal Veil." The water first makes a plunge of eighty feet over the "High Falls" into a deep pool, and passing out of this in a narrow channel worn into the rock, descends forty-five feet vertically over the "Bridal Veil."

The bed rock is hard, bluish-gray Hamilton sandstone, and dips N. 25° W. 15°–17°. Owing to its delicious coolness in the hottest weather, this locality is a favorite resort of pleasure parties, and many thousands visit it during the heated term.

From the top of the Raymondskill Falls up to where the road crosses it the descent of the stream is quite rapid, and cascades are frequent, the elevation at the bridge being six hundred and seventy-five feet (A. T.) a fall of three hundred and ten feet in the one mile and a quarter from this point to the Delaware.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

HENRY SPERING MOTT.

Henry Spering Mott was born at Easton, Pa., September 23, 1811, and died in Milford June 1, 1877. His father was Edward Mott, and his mother a daughter of General Spering, who was a general of militia in the War of 1812, and was prothonotary of Northampton County for twenty-five years.

The Motts removed to Pike County when Henry was a young man, and he became justice of the peace in Lehman township in 1834. In 1838 he was elected sheriff of the county, but the Governor (Ritner) issued the commission to John W. Heller. In 1839 he was appointed prothonotary by Governor Porter, and was elected to this office in 1842, but declined a re-election in favor of John C. Westbrook. In 1852 he was elected to the Lower House of the General Assembly, and again in 1853. In 1854 he was nominated by the Democrats as land commissioner, against George Darsie, one of the most respected and popular Whigs in the State, and was elected by an unprecedented majority—190,743—the whole poll being less than 375,000 votes. James Pollock, the Whig candidate for Governor at the same time, was elected by a majority of 37,007. Mott received more than three times as many votes as were given to his opponent, the whole vote being,—for Mott, 274,074; for Darsie, 83,331. Darsie being a foreigner, the Know-Nothings preferred Mott, a fact which subjected the latter to the unjust suspicion that he was secretly affiliated with the Know-Nothing organization.

Mr. Mott was twice married, his first wife being Hannah Bull, whom he married January 31, 1832; and his second, Delinda Peters, daughter of the late Henry Peters, of Bushkill, and sister of Samuel G., Charles and William N. Peters, and of Mrs. Henry M. La Bar, who still survive. By his first marriage he had four children, only one of whom survives,—Mrs. Jacob Kleinhans, of Milford. By his second wife he also had four children, two of whom survive,—Charles Peters and Samuel Dimmick Mott. Among the nephews of Mr. (usually called Colonel) Mott are Milton Dimmick Mott, publisher of the Milford Dispatch, and Edward H. Mott, at present connected, editorially, with the New York Sun,—the author of "Pike County Folks," and of a great number of amusing hunting, fishing and "old settler" stories connected with the Pike County region.

This suspicion, however, was not entertained by the Democrats of his own county, who elected him to the State Senate in 1860, and to the Constitutional Convention of 1873. In both branches of the Legislature Mr. Mott was conspicuous and effective, by reason of his strong common sense and native force of character. During the sessions of the Constitutional Convention he was in feeble health, physically, and unable to exert himself to the extent of his natural inclination and intellectual ability.

Colonel Mott was, in many respects, a remarkable man. Without early advantages of education, such as are now enjoyed by young men of his class, he was able, by reason of his natural ability, force of character, pleasing presence and winning address, to outstrip many of his compeers, whose circumstances of fortune in early life were far more favorable than his. He was a man of imposing appearance, personally,—both tall and broad, of pleasing countenance, suave manner and graceful action. He was jolly and generous, grave and gay, as occasion required; kind to the distressed; socially agreeable to all classes, and, of course, unenviably popular. He was Pike County's favorite citizen, and his merits eventually became known throughout the State, in which but few men were more widely or more favorably known than was Colonel Mott during most of the second half of his life. At Harrisburg, when he was a member of the Legislature, and ever after, he was held in the highest respect, and had a host of warm friends and admirers in Philadelphia. His great vote in 1854 made him a marked man; but it was soon learned that he was not a mere creature of accident, but a man of naturally broad gauge and genuine merit, who well deserved his "big majority." His official conduct as canal commissioner fully justified that majority; and in every office he held he performed his duties with the utmost integrity, as well as intelligence and efficiency. In his private business and affairs he was both generous and just, though perhaps not always just to himself, his generosity often prevailing over prudence or proper regard for his own interest. He was noted for kindness of heart, and his politeness was more than "skin deep," being naturally prompted by good feeling for all.

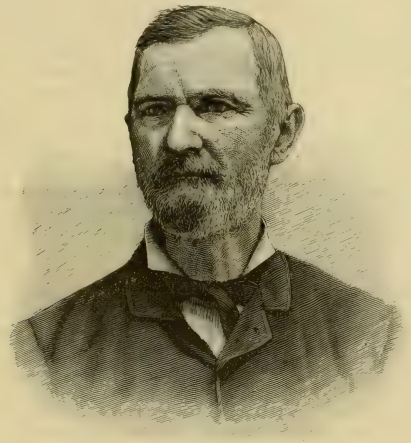
Colonel Mott was a natural gentleman, and all who knew him instinctively recognized this fact. He was utterly free from hypocrisy, in every respect, and heartily despised it in others. He did not profess Christianity, but practiced it in all his dealings with his fellow-men. He was a manly man and a true man, and, consequently, a Christian man. He fulfilled his duty in both private life and public life, and never betrayed a trust, great or small.



Colonel Mott was an honor to Pike County, and it is but proper that he should be pronounced and set down as such in this history.

JOHN C. WESTBROOK.

John Coolbaugh Westbrook, Prothonotary of Pike county, Penna., was born in Delaware township in the same county, where the homestead of the family has been for nearly a century on May 24, 1820. He is fifth in regular line from Anthony Westbrook, who came from Ulster County, N. Y., about 1737, and settled in Montague township, N. J., and was a large real estate owner along the Delaware and on Minisink Island. He was a justice of the peace and left a record of the earliest marriages in the Minisink valley. He had one son Jacob, who married Lydia Westfall, March 24, 1746, by whom he had a son Solomon, (1762–1824) who married Margaret DeWitt, and crossed to the Pennsylvania side of the river, settling in Delaware township, where he owned some seven hundred acres of land. On this property he built a stone house, which was his residence and that of the family for nearly a century. He is assessed with one hundred and fifty acres of improved land in 1801, and was also a justice of the peace. The family was well-to-do, and owned slaves in the early days. Solomon and Margaret Westbrook's children were:—Jacob, (1786–1847), who resided on a part of the homestead and was the father of John I. Westbrook of Port Jarvis; Colonel John born in 1789, resided on a part of the homestead and was a member of Congress in 1841–43; Solomon (1794–1852; Soferyne, and Margaret who was the wife of William H. Nyce; of these children, Solomon was the father of John C. our subject. He married Hannah Coolbaugh (1790–1874) a daughter of Judge John Coolbaugh of Middle Smithfield township, then Pike County. He was a man of large business capacity and well known in the Delaware Valley. He served as sheriff of Pike County in 1822–25 for one term.

In 1819 he sold his farm to his brother Jacob, and purchased a farm in Middle Smithfield where he removed, and remained until about the year 1829, when he sold his farm to John V. Coolbaugh and removed to Philadelphia. He returned the following year, and for five years thereafter conducted the hotel owned by Judge Dingman at Dingman's Ferry. He also opened a store there in 1832, and besides carried on mercantile business at Bushkill in 1830–31, at Tafton in 1835–36, besides the lumber business at Blooming Grove. In 1835 he removed to the old stone-house in Delaware township. In 1837 he had a paralytic stroke, while yet in vigorous manhood, which largely incapacitated him for business, being deprived of his speech. In 1842 the family removed to Blooming Grove where his sons carried on the lumber business for many years, and where both himself and wife spent the remainder of their lives. Their children are:— Margaret, widow of the late John B. Stoll of Branchville, resides in Newark, N. J.; John Coolbaugh Westbrook, subject of this sketch; Hiram, a dealer in real estate of Ridgewood, N. J.; Lafayette, for many years a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, carried on the lumber business at Blooming Grove until 1882, and removed to Stroudsburg; Moses C. a farmer on the homestead in Blooming Grove; Susan widow of the late Theodore Grandon of New Jersey, resides also in Newark.

John C. Westbrook obtained his early education in the district school of his native place, and completed it at Milford, under Rev. Mr. Allen. At the age of fifteen he became a clerk in his father's store and upon the sudden illness of his father, he took charge of the store at Dingmans, assisted by Colonel H. S. Mott, and of the lumber business at Blooming Grove, which he continued to conduct until 1845, when he was elected on the Democratic ticket Prothonotary of Pike county. After serving in this capacity for six years—two terms—he returned to Blooming Grove and engaged in the lumber business and in clearing up a farm. He remained there for twelve years and during this time built a saw-mill and a grist-mill. He was again elected prothonotary in the fall of 1863, and leaving his business in the hands of his brother Lafayette, he removed to Milford, and served six years more. In 1870 he removed to Branchville, N. J., and during the first year of his residence there, procured the land of various individuals for the Blooming Grove Park Company in Pike county.

In 1872 he went to Berks county, and for three years acted as foreman in the construction of the Boston & South Mountain Railroad, which was laid out to run from Harrisburg to Poughkeepsie. In the fall of 1875 Mr. Westbrook returned to Milford, was elected prothonotary, and by re-election continues to hold the same office in 1886, and is now filling the twenty-third year in the same office, his present term expiring January 1, 1888. He has been county auditor for several years and has served in several other minor offices.

On December 29, 1850, he married Jane Wells of Milford, by whom he has the following children:—Alice, widow of the late Dr. Gouverneur Emerson, who died February 4, 1886; Hannah, widow of the late John Williamson of Branchville, N. J.; Frank, Brodhead (1856-1877) and Lafayette Westbrook.

THOMAS ARMSTRONG.

A careful research made by Leonard A. Morrison, and published in The Massachusetts Magazine, shows that the Armstrongs of Pike County are descended from the Armstrong clan, once one of the most numerous and powerful in the Lowlands of Scotland. As early as 1376, says M. Morrison, their names are identified as belonging to Liddesdale, in the "Debatable Country." In 1377 Robert Armstrong and Margaret Temple, his wife, were in possession of part of a manor, being the town and land of Whithaugh, in Thorpe, England. The original deed to the family having been lost or destroyed, the town and lands were re-granted to Lancelot Armstrong on the 9th of October, 1586, and remained in possession of his descendants till about 1730. Among the Armstrongs of that early period was Johnnie Armstrong, sometimes called "Gilnockie," a celebrated border chieftain, who, with thirty-five of his men, were treacherously captured by King James V., of Scotland, and hanged at Carlenrig. His name is still a familiar one on the border and in border poetry. Of the immediate ancestors of the Pike County Armstrongs of whom anything definite is known, we find the name of Lancelot Armstrong, who was born in Gortin, County Tyrone, Ireland. His children were Andrew, Thomas, William, Mary and Sarah. Andrew, the eldest, emigrated to America about the year 1787, and soon after settled in Milford, Pike County, Pa., where he erected some of the first buildings. William married Miss Elizabeth Graham in 1834, and the day he was married started for America. He also settled in Milford, and worked at his trade (a mason) until 1876. He had the reputation of being one of the best workmen in the county and, in fact, in that part of the State. He was a Democrat in political belief, but was never a politician. He was not a member of any church, though a believer in the doctrine of the Presbyterian Church. He died at Milford, May 21, 1886. His wife still survives him and resides in Milford. Their children were Catherine, Lancelot, Thomas, Eliza, Catherine, Sarah, May, Annie, William and Wilhelmina.

Thomas, the subject of our sketch, was born in Milford, above-named, April 11, 1844. His education was obtained at the schools of his native borough, which he attended until he was sixteen years old, when he became a "printer's devil" with the intention of becoming a printer. He changed his mind, however, and in 1861 went to work with his father, with whom he remained until he had mastered every branch of the mason's trade. March 1, 1865, he enlisted as a private in Company I, One Hundred and Forty-third New York Regiment of Infantry, and was sent to his regiment, which was stationed at Raleigh, N. C., and with his command marched with Sherman through the Carolinas and to Washington, D. C., where he participated in the grand review of the armies in May, 1865. The next month he was mustered out, when he returned to Milford and at once commenced business as a mason and builder. For a number of years he did most of the building in Milford, meeting with unvarying success. In 1876 he joined the firm of Moran & Armstrong, of New York (Armstrong being his brother, Lancelot W.) and as workman and foreman became thoroughly conversant with the business of building as carried on in the metropolis of the country. As foreman and superintendent of Mr. O. B. Potter's fine building at Broadway and Astor Place, he won the esteem and confidence of that gentleman, who, in 1883, gave him the entire supervision of the erection of the Potter building on Park Row, corner of Beekman Street, one of the finest business blocks in the city. It is eleven stories in height and has a frontage of one hundred and forty-four feet eight inches on Beekman Street, ninety feet on Nassau Street and ninety-six feet ten inches on Park Row, and is built in the most substantial and complete manner known in modern building. Its successful completion speaks volumes for Mr. Armstrong's skill and ability as a builder, and proves that a man of talent and ability, when possessed with energy and perseverance, will come to the front whether his birth-place be among the mountains of Pennsylvania or in a great city. He is a Democrat, but not an active politician, and in the fullest sense of the term he is a temperance man, as he has yet to taste beer or liquor. Mr. Armstrong is a member of Milford Lodge, No. 344, Ancient York Masons, and was one of the charter members of Vandemark Lodge, No. 828, I. O. O. F., and is a Past Grand Master. On the 22d day of November, 1870, he was joined in marriage to Miss Olivia, daughter of Henry and Ellen (Cartright) Bean. She was born in Milford, November 27, 1850. There have been born to them children as follows: Lanty, Harry, Kittie and Harry, all deceased but the youngest, who was born December 1, 1883.

CHAPTER VI.

WESTFALL TOWNSHIP.

WESTFALL TOWNSHIP was set off from Milford January 31, 1839. It is named in honor of the Westfall family, who were among the pioneer settlers within its limits. Westfall is the eastern township of Pike County, and is inclosed on the northeast and southeast by the Delaware River, which makes a decided bend at Carpenter's Point, changing its general course from southeast to southwest. New York State lies northeast across the Delaware, and New Jersey bounds it on the southeast, Milford township borders it on the southwest and Shohola on the northwest. Across the Delaware, below Port Jervis, stands the Tri-States Rock, at the point of a rocky peninsula, lying between the Delaware and the Neversink. This rock is the corner of the three States, New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The distance from Matamoras, situated on the Delaware just across from Port Jervis, to Milford, is seven miles, which is traveled by stage-coaches. The valley from Matamoras varies from a mile to one-fourth of a mile in width, having a high bluff on the right, over which the little Buttermilk Falls descends during a part of the year. The valley up the Delaware from Matamoras is narrow, and traversed by the Erie Railway from Saw-Mill Rift to Pond Eddy. The interior of the township is a rocky pine barren and generally uncultivated.

The pioneer history of Westfall township dates from the Revolution, and like most of the old settlements along the Delaware, is largely lost or preserved only as a tradition. The Quicks, De Witts, Westfalls, Van Akens and Rosecrances were the pioneers of Westfall township and the Middaghs and Carpenters were there at an early day. According to ex-Lieutenant-Governor Bross, who is a descendant of the Quicks, on his mother's side, Thomas Quick came from Holland and settled near Milford, Pa., in 1730–35. He was the father of Tom Quick, the Indian killer, and James Quick. Thomas Quick had a grist-mill on the Vandemark before the Revolution, in Milford township. Peter Quick, probably a brother of his, located in Westfall township and built a grist-mill and saw-mill either just before or after the Revolution.[1] He took up a large tract of land in the vicinity of Quicktown. His children were Jacob; John; Margaret, wife of Dr. Francis Al. Smith, who lived for some time on part of the old Quick property; Elias Quick, who emigrated to the West; Cornelius, who lived in Milford; and Roger, who resided in New Jersey; Jane married Cyrus Jackson and Maria became Mrs. Cornelius Cox.

Of these sons, Jacob Quick, Esq., an enterprising man, had a grist-mill and saw-mill on Quick Creek, at Quicktown, a blacksmith shop and lived in a large house. Of his children, John married Maria Middagh and resided on part of his father's property. His widow, aged eighty-eight years, still lives on the property with her son, Charles Quick. She is a lifetime resident in this vicinity and remembers many anecdotes of the pioneers. She says her stepfather related that on one occasion eighteen persons were in a flat-boat and the Indians shot every one that handled the oars. Finally a negress took the oars and was likewise shot in the mouth and killed. All were slain with the exception of one child, who was taken prisoner and did not escape until he was nineteen years of age. (This same story has come to the writer in a little different form from other sources.) This happened down on the Delaware, opposite Lehman.

"Sally Decker was taken prisoner by the Indians on the place now occupied by Soferyne Vannoy, where the old orchard was located. She came over with her brother to milk a cow, bearing with her a gun, for she could shoot. The Indians secured her, however, and encamped near by for the night. Her Indian captor was very unkind, but soon sold her to an old Indian, who was good to her. He one day asked her if she would like to return home. She said she would, but she did not expect to find any of her family alive. He took her to Philadelphia and sold her to a person who purchased her ransom. He dispatched a man on horseback to her father to inform him of his daughter's liberation. He sent a span of horses to bring her back, and, on her arrival, all the neighbors gathered to see her. They call the locality Saunches Clofee or Sally's Hollow, to this day. It is just below Quicktown." Mrs. Quick says "it was a very common thing to see people dressed in buckskin clothes. They used wooden trenchers, and later pewter plates." Gen. Samuel Seely had a store many years ago near the present Klaer mill. Mrs. Quick remarks, "I have heard my grandmother tell about buying coarse earthenware dishes there. His store and the one Benjamin Carpenter started at Carpenter's Point were the first stores in all this region of country, as I have heard from my grandmother. I never saw but one light wagon in my life when I was young, and that was owned by Dick Westbrook. He was lame, and, being wealthy, he had a two-wheeled light wagon and a negro to wait on him. About sixty years ago Courtright Middagh bought a light wagon with wooden springs. His lines were ropes."

John B. Quick, the second son of Peter Quick, married one of Jacobus Rosecrans' daughters, and remained on the homestead. He was a farmer, lumberman, and first started the "Half-Way House," and lived to be eighty-five years of age. He was an enterprising man. In 1824 he purchased twelve hundred acres of anthracite coal lands at Hyde Park, in Luzerne County, Pa. He and others got a charter for a railroad from Milford to the Lackawanna Valley, but the representative from Pike wished the road to go lower down, and, by inserting words to that effect in the charter, killed the road.[1] "He burned the first anthracite coal used in New York, at the Orange County Hotel, on Cortlandt Street." He took Gilbert L. Thompson into partnership with him in the coal business, afterward sold a three-fourths interest to other parties, and a company was formed which undertook to mine coal, but they did not, however, succeed. The company agreed to give Quick fifteen thousand dollars for the three-fourths interest, but only paid him six thousand dollars. Quick held possession until 1841, when an ejectment suit was brought against Jacob R. Quick, one of John B. Quick's sons. Peter A. L. Quick, another son, who also had an interest, was not notified, and the project failed. Peter A. L. Quick took up the matter, which had been pending in the courts for thirty years. On carrying it to the Supreme Court, Judge Alfred Hand, attorney for the Susquehanna and Wyoming Valley Railroad Company, settled with him for forty thousand dollars. This arrangement left Quick's lawyers unpaid, as they were to have a certain amount providing they were successful with the suit. Quick claimed that he took ten thousand dollars less than he otherwise should have done, with the understanding that Hand should pay them. His attorneys brought suit aginst him, and after three years' litigation, Quick compromised the matter. John B. Quick's sons are Martin C. Quick, James R. Quick and Peter A. L. Quick, who now owns the Newman property in Delaware township.

Jacob De Witt before the Revolution owned the land along the Delaware River from below Milford to the Half-Way House. He had a log fort on the Simeon Cuddeback farm, and remained there during the conflict, until taken prisoner by the Indians and carried to Canada. He was kept there for three years. Cornelius, his son, settled near the Half-Way House, where he cultivated a large farm. He dressed in buckskin throughout, and was dubbed "Buckeyhout," which means "buckskin" in Dutch. The De Witts were friendly with the Indians and great hunters. His son, Lodowick

De Witt, owned about one thousand acres of land. Cornelius, one of his sons, lives on the hills in Westfall, and Jacob P. De Witt resides near the "Half-Way House."

Jacobus Van Aken and Herman Rosen Krantz,[1] father of Jacobus Rosencrans, settled before the Revolution where Rosetown now is, then known as Upper Smithfield. Jacobus Van Aken owned a good farm on the Delaware flats. His son, Garret Van Aken, was born there in 1770. He was a militia captain and generally called Captain Van Aken. John Van Aken, another son, moved to Ontario, N. Y. Of Garret's children, Margaret was the wife of Levi Middagh, and Sally married John W. Middagh. Benjamin Cole Van Aken lived on part of the homestead and Frederick A. Rose purchased a portion of it. Benjamin C. had a family of nine children, of whom William B. Van Aken was track supervisor on the Erie Railroad for twelve years, when he removed to Wisconsin and died there. John M. Van Aken lives at Matamoras. He has been treasurer of Pike County, and is now collector of internal revenue for Wayne, Pike and Monroe Counties.

Herman Rosen Kranz's name appears on a petition for a township in what afterwards became Upper Smithfield in 1750. His son, Jacobus Rosencrans, was probably born in what is now Westfall township, and lived neighbor to old Jacobus Van Aken, Esq., and his son Garret. He owned a large farm near the Delaware, now the property of the Roses. His farm was divided among his five daughters, reserving a piece in the centre for himself. His daughters were Betsey, who married Manual Brink and lived at Chocopee; Lena, married Matyne Cole, who resided in the Clove, N. J. (Judge Martin V. Cole, of Montague, is a grandson); Catharine, married to Daniel Decker, her first husband, who reared a family of children. Crissie Bull, her second husband, lived on part of the Rosencrans farm. They had two sons and two daughters. The first son was named James, in honor of his grandfather, and in accordance with the plan of all the sisters to name one child James. As a result, they were each presented with a yoke of oxen. James Bull died in youth, and the next son, who was named Rosencrans Bull, married Jennie Westfall. They resided on a farm in Milford township until recently, when, on leaving it in charge of his son, he moved to Milford, his present residence. Hannah Bull was the wife of Colonel Henry S. Mott, of Milford, and Maria Bull, another daughter of Crissie Bull's, married Eli Van Inwegen, of Port Jervis. Anuchy Rosencrans was the wife of Saunders Ennis, of New Jersey, and Polly was the wife of John B. Quick.

Simon Westfall located at Carpenter's Point in 1755, and was among the first settlers. He built a stone house or fort, and had also a grist-mill on the Clove Brook. It was an important position and the Indians tried many times to surprise the place. This family were first attacked by Brandt in 1779. Simon Westfall moved his household back farther in New Jersey and laid up on the hills with three loaded guns to watch his buildings. He saw the Indians firing his barn. Firing his guns at them, he fled, but they succeeded in burning all his buildings. His marriage is kept in the records of the old Dutch Reformed Church, among those whose banns had been published, as follows:

"1743, March 13. Simon Westfael,[2] young man, born in Dutchess County, dwelling in Smithfield in Bucks County, to Jannetje Westbroeck, young woman, born at Mormel, dwelling at Menissinck, married the 17th day of April, by Peter Kuyckendal, justice of the peace."

This shows that he was a resident of Pennsylvania in 1743, but he appears to have built across the river at Carpenter's Point in 1755. He died 1805, aged eighty-seven. He had five children, of whom Simeon was the only one who settled in Pike County. He built a stone house after the Revolution on the Delaware River at a point called Sims Clip, where there was formerly a reef of rocks in the river at that place, about opposite the Tri-States Rock. He was a farmer and also kept a public-house. His wife, Sally Cole, was a daughter of Benjamin Cole, of Deckertown. She buried her work-basket in the corn-field when the Westfall family left their homes on account of the Indians. After they returned she dug up the basket, which contained, among other things, a pair of shears that were in great demand in the neighborhood, as they were the only pair in the vicinity. She lived to be ninety-five years old, and often talked with her descendants about the Indian depredations. Their children were Simon, who settled in Deerpark (now Port Jervis), and kept a tavern, and David Westfall, who owned a farm of about two hundred acres where Matamoras now stands. His house stood on a knoll in "Old Matamoras," back from the Delaware about three hundred and fifty yards. He was a farmer and lumberman. He married Jemima, a daughter of Captain Cuddeback, of Deerpark. His children were Abram, Simeon, Cornelius, Wilhelmus and Jacob, sons, and the daughters Esther, who moved West, and Sally, wife of James Bennet, of Carpenter's Point. She is now eighty-four years of age, a clear-headed, well-preserved old lady, who is familiar with the Westfall pedigree from old Simon Westfall to the present generation. Simon Westfall (2d) was a farmer and blacksmith. He lived and died at Matamoras, August 22, 1878, aged eighty-six. His wife was Sarah, daughter of Jacob Cuddeback. Their children were Abram, Sarah J. (wife of James W. Quick), Peter G. (who was killed in Canada while serving as fireman). Simeon C. Westfall inherited the property where the village of Matamoras now stands, and where he at present resides.

Cornelius Westfall married Huldah Cuddeback, and lived on the Delaware River in Westfall township. He was justice of the peace, and died at the age of eighty-three. His children were Jemima (wife of R. C. Bull, of Milford), Elizabeth (wife of P. G. Canfield, who lives in Sullivan County), Sarah (unmarried). Jacob C. Westfall, the only son, lived on the homestead and took his father's place as justice of the peace. George Westfall, a son of old Simeon, Sr., lived on the homestead for many years, and later sold to Jacob Cuddeback, when he removed to the West.

Tri-States Rock and Carpenter's Point.—No history of Pike County would be complete that did not include some account of Tri-States Rock and Carpenter's Point. Tri-States Rock is located at the point of a rocky promontory formed by the junction of the Neversink with the Delaware River. At this point a granite rock has been established by commissioners appointed for that purpose, where the States of New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey converge. A little south of the Tri-States Rock is Carpenter's Point, so named in honor of the Carpenter family. The oldest Carpenter of whom any definite knowledge can be obtained was Benjamin, who lived on the New Jersey side of the river and kept a store, as also the ferry which bears his name. The village of Carpenter's Point, half a mile above the mouth of the Neversink, now linked to Port Jervis by a suspension bridge, held, until the opening of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, in 1828, the position at present occupied by Port Jervis, as the most important place in the district, and was the centre of business for the surrounding country. Here was the post-office, the store, the mill, the blacksmith shop and the comfortable inn, where the traveler, after his tedious journey over the old turnpike, found good entertainment for man and beast. We have been thus particular to describe Carpenter's Point, although it is on the Jersey side of the river, because this ferry was the crossing-place of the old pioneers who settled in Pike and Wayne. The Connecticut Yankees, in particular, came to Newburgh, where they crossed the Hudson and bore west until they reached the old "Mine Road," which they followed to Carpenter's Point. Here they were ferried over by the Carpenters or Courtright Middagh and his sons, who had the ferry for many years, to the Pennsylvania side. They were then driven to Milford. John Biddis had a mill and store near the present Klaer's mill. Here they took the old "Wilderness road,"[1] then crossed the Sawkill, passed up to Frank Olmstead's present home and thence through Blooming Grove to Major Ainsley's, on the "Dolph Bingham" place, where it crossed the Wallenpaupack near the Marshall Purdy place. Thus on through Purdy settlement, Little Meadows, in Salem, and Cobb's Gap to the Lackawanna and Wyoming Valleys. Afterward a turnpike was built, as also a turnpike from Milford to Carbondale, in Pennsylvania, and Oswego, in New York. Those were halcyon days for the tally-ho stage-coach and this was a thoroughfare of travel en route for what was then the great West. Courtright Middagh, a large, coarse-grained, bony man, who lived on the Pennsylvania side, was kept busy ferrying travelers over the Delaware with his flat ferry-boat that would carry one loaded wagon with two teams attached, propelled by paddles and shoved by poles. All is now changed. There is a suspension bridge above the old ferrying-place that connects Port Jervis and Matamoras and the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad carries the passengers with mighty steam-power, in place of the old "tally-ho" to Western lands never dreamed of by our ancestors. Port Jervis, with its eleven thousand inhabitants and constant puffing of engines, has superseded Carpenter's Point, and Matamoras, which is in Westfall township, just opposite, is a village of some seven hundred inhabitants. In 1844 Gabriel Mapes built a hotel where Matamoras now is. Oliver S. Dimmick, son of Dan. Dimmick, purchased the hotel and ferry in connection with it in 1846. The ferry was first started by Simeon Westfall, about 1830. Mr. Dimmick laid out the town about the time of the Mexican War, which accounts for its name. Besides keeping a public-house, he carried a stock of goods and was the first postmaster of the place. He represented his district twice in the Assembly of Pennsylvania and was associate judge of Pike County for five years. He married a daughter of Major Hornbeck, and had five children. Of these, Jacob Dimmick, a lumber dealer in Port Jervis, has represented his district twice in the Assembly of New York, and William H. Dimmick is an attorney-at-law in Honesdale.

The first bridge was built above the present location about 1850, and after its destruction by high winds the present suspension bridge was built. After Dimmick, Adolph Kessler had a small store. There are now three stores, three hotels and a school-house that cost about five thousand dollars and embraces four departments. It is too near Port Jervis to be a business centre, and is therefore more a place of residence for the Port Jervis overflow.

A Philadelphia company[1] had a glass factory on the Delaware, above Matamoras, about 1800. This was before the days of anthracite coal, their object in settling in the wilderness being cheap fuel. It was less expensive to transport material for glass and the manufactured article back again than to buy fuel near Philadelphia. They blew window glass principally and operated the factory for a number of years, but the use of coal, and the improved means of travel consequent thereon, changed the conditions under which this factory was operated, and it was abandoned. They transported their glass to Philadelphia with horse teams. There was some communication with Philadelphia up the Delaware by means of Durham boats, these boats being propelled by paddles or shoved by poles. Merchandise has been brought to Carpenter's Point and vicinity in this way. Benjamin Carpenter had a son Benjamin, who succeeded to his father's home, and another son, John, who lived on the Pennsylvania side. Not even a road leads to the old ferry now, and nothing but a lane is seen, which goes past some very old apple-trees and the old foundation of a house. Just above the old ferry, on the old Pahaquarry road, is the burying-ground where the early Dutch pioneers who dwelt in this vicinity sleep, with rude, unlettered stones, in most cases to mark the spot. Not far away was the old log church where Johannes Casparius Fryenmoet gave his people strong Calvinistic doctrine in pure, unadulterated Dutch, as he stood perched on a single post, with a sounding-board over his head. This rude beginning has resulted in the present elegant brick Reformed Church in Port Jervis, with the proud inscription over the entrance, "Founded in 1737." The people on the Pennsylvania side attend church in Port Jervis; consequently there are no church edifices in Matamoras. It is known that a blacksmith by the name of William Tietsort, or Titsworth, lived among the friendly Indians near Carpenter's Point as early as 1690. Here the early Dutch pioneers came down from Esopus on the Hudson, and settled on the flatlands near the Delaware. Their implements were rude, their wagon wheels being entirely of wood. The felloes were clumsy wooden pieces, pinned together, without any tire. Four trips to Esopus and back was considered good service for one of these wagons, and a pail of water often answered for a mirror to the traveler. These early settlers appear to have cultivated friendship with the Indians, and had no particular trouble until the "French and Indian War" of 1755, when there were not a great many inhabitants in the valley.

The Lenapes ravaged the country lying along the line of the Blue Ridge from the Delaware to the Susquehanna. The war-path of the Minsis lay along the frontier of New Jersey and Orange and Ulster Counties, N. Y. In 1758 the hatchet was buried and the pipe of peace smoked by the Delawares and the pale faces of the Minisink country. Thus this war, which had been brought on by the rapacity of the English proprietaries, but whose terrors had been felt by the peaceful Dutch settlers as well, was brought to a close and the latter were again permitted to resume the pursuits of peace. During the Revolutionary War the Dutch settlers were inclined to live as peaceably as possible with the Indians. Not in the sense of being Tories, but because they looked upon the Revolutionary War as a Yankee and English struggle in which they had no interest. Their friends and ancestors in some instances, perhaps, had been compelled to submit to English authority in New Amsterdam, and these Yankees were but descendants of the English. This was a perfectly natural view for the Minisink settler, and that many of them kept as neutral as possible we have abundant evidence. But the Indians looked upon this as an opportunity to expel the white man, and the Minisink Valley became one continuous frontier line from Port Jervis to Delaware Water Gap. The Pennsylvania side, in particular, was exposed and raided by the Indians until there were but few settlers remaining within the present bounds of Pike County. This valley was raided in 1778, when Count Pulaski was sent with his cavalry for its protection and was engaged in that service during the winter following. In the spring of 1779 hostilities were renewed, and all the mills, stores and houses at Carpenter's Point and vicinity were burned. The schoolteacher, Jeremiah Van Auken, was killed, but the little girls were saved by Brant, who had painted a sign on their aprons which the savages respected. July 19, 1779, the fatal battle of Minisink was fought opposite the mouth of the Lackawaxen River. The following petition, which has been preserved in the correspondence of Captain James Bonnel, shows the condition of the Pennsylvania frontier in 1782:

"MINISINK, 10th December, 1782.

"His excellency, Governor Livingston, and the Honorable Legislative Council and General Assembly of New Jersey.

"Gentlemen, we, the inhabitants of the frontier of the County of Sussesx, beg leave to present our petition to the Honorable Legislature of the State. The Inhabitants who formerly lived on the Pennsylvania Side of the river opposite to us have Principally left their Farms and moved into Jersey and other places to escape savage cruelty. These Inhabitants was formerly a considerable guard to us, but there is nothing to stop the Enemy but the river, which is Fordible in a grate Number of Places a considerable part of the year, Particularly in Harvest and other times when the Enemy can do us the Gratest Damage. The Situation of this country and the manner the Savages Carry on the War like a Thief in the Night, renders it impracticable to depend on the Malitia for Security, for before they can be collected the Mischief is done and the Enemy secure in the Wilderness. Numbers of us have friends and near relatives who have been torn from their familys and connections and are groaning under cruel Savage Captivity. These labour under the sad remembrance of having experienced the Truly Shocking Spectacle of Seeing there Dearest Connections Brutally Murdered and Scalped before there Eyes, and we have grate reason to fear that we shall share the same fate unless some move be adopted for our security. We therefore most earnestly pray that a Law may be passed by the Honourable Legislature before they adjourn for raising a company of about Eighty men, Properly officered and to be Stationed here for our Protection the Ensuing Campaign."[1]

The signatures of the petitioners do not appear in the record that Captain Bonnel has made of this petition. Such, then, was the condition of the pioneers in Westfall (then Upper Smithfield) and all the townships bordering on the Delaware in Pike County, or Upper Smithfield and Delaware townships. Among the later settlers of Westfall are Benjamin Van Inwegen, who located on the river road, not far from Matamoras, about 1830. He was a very conscientious man, and descended from an old family just across the Delaware. Eli Van Inwegen, a son of his, is the vice-president of the First National Bank of Port Jervis, and his son is cashier of the same bank. Benjamin Van Inwegen, a descendant of Benjamin Van Inwegen, the first, occupies the homestead, and Andrew and Solomon Van Inwegen live in Matamoras.

Baltus Nearpass, a descendant of Jacob Nearpass, who located in Montague, about two miles below Carpenter's Point, in 1750, settled at Saw-Mill Rift, which lies up the Delaware in Westfall township. (The Nearpasses are of German origin.) Jacob Nearpass went back to Germany, expecting to get a large amount of gold and silver; but, instead, he returned only with two guns, one of which was used by his son Baltus in the battle of Minisink, where he was killed. Baltus' son John raised a large family of children, most of whom settled in Westfall township. They were Baltus, of Saw-Mill Rift; Michael; William; Jacob; Rachel, wife of Wm. K. Stone, who lived at the glass factory; Polly, wife of Benjamin Westbrook, who lived near Quicktown; and Catharine, wife of James Sawyer, of Saw-Mill Rift. Wm. H. Nearpass, one of Michael Nearpass' sons, is editor of the Port Jervis Gazette, is much interested in the history of the Minisink, and has collected valuable information which is accessible to the writer. His labors in translating and publishing old Dutch church records, have shed much light on the early history of the Minisink.

[1] The above is a literal copy of the petition.

Among others, we find that the De Witts were in Upper Smithfield in 1754, as evidenced by marriage records. Saw-Mill Rift at present contains about a half-dozen houses. The Erie Railway crosses from New York to the Pennsylvania side near this place. The flat between the Delaware and the mountain is narrow from Matamoras to Pond Eddy. The inhabitants are chiefly engaged in quarrying along the Delaware, above Saw-Mill Rift.

Frederick A. Rose was born in Hartford, Conn., in 1789, and was a descendant of one of the early settlers of the New England States. At the age of four years he came with his parents to Montague, N. J., and eleven years after the family settled at Pond Eddy, shortly after removing to Masthope, where they engaged extensively in the lumber business. In 1813 they repaired to the mouth of the Mongaup River, and remained until 1828, when Frederick A. Rose, who was then married, purchased the old Rosencrans' farm, in Westfall township, and removed to the same. Here he remained until 1839, when he again went to Pond Eddy, and engaged extensively in the lumbering and rafting business. In this he was very successful. He was well known in all the lumber regions along the Delaware River, and noted as a bold lumber speculator. After a few years he returned to his farm, one of the finest in the valley, where he remained until his death, in his eighty-eighth year. His children were Benjamin H. Rose (of Rosetown), Elijah Rose, Mrs. Isaac Cuddeback and Mrs. E. P. Gumaer. The Rosetown property, which consists of the greater part of the old Rosencrance farm and a portion of the Van Aken farm, is held by the descendants of Frederick A. Rose.

William Brodhead, a son of Richard Brodhead, lived in Westfall township, just out from Milford, a number of years, when he sold the property to Simeon Cuddeback, who died recently, aged nearly eighty.

Soferyne Vannoy lives by the river, on a farm formerly occupied by Mr. Van Gordon.

The public schools of Westfall township are those of "Saw-Mill Rift," Stairway," Matamoras Graded School and Quicktown School.

CHAPTER VII.

DINGMAN TOWNSHIP.

DINGMAN TOWNSHIP was taken from Upper Smithfield April 17, 1832. It is bounded on the north by Shohola and Milford; on the east by the Delaware River and New Jersey; on the south by Delaware and Porter, and on the west by Blooming Grove. The Sawkill Creek, which flows into the Delaware near Milford, forms part of the boundary between Dingman and Milford. The Raymondskill is the outlet of the Log Tavern Ponds and breaks over its mountain heights in the beautiful Raymondskill Falls, which consists of three parts, a fall of about twenty-five feet, a steep rapids of about one hundred feet, and another fall, flowing onward through a deep gorge to the Delaware. The scenery along the Raymondskill, as also along the Delaware, is grand. There is a river road running along the Delaware from Milford to Bushkill. The Minisink Valley consists of the river flats on both sides of the Delaware, from Port Jervis to the Delaware Water Gap. These flats are from a quarter of a mile to a mile wide. There are several islands in the river at this point. On the Jersey side the hills recede in gentle slopes, but on the Pennsylvania side the cliff rises abruptly from the flat land, forming a rock-capped bluff about one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet high, from Milford to Bushkill. These rocks have crumbled, leaving a steep side-hill of thin stone clippings banked against their base to within twenty feet of the top, which makes excellent material for roads, the river road being one of the best in the State. In some places the river hugs the base of the bluffs so closely that the roadway is dug out from the hillside, and in others there is fine fertile flatland varying from a few rods to a half-mile in width.

These flatlands were eagerly seized and first occupied by the Holland immigrants.

A ride from Port Jervis to Bushkill is exceedingly pleasant, with the abrupt bluffs of Pike County, whose steep slopes are covered with scrub oak and pine, on the right, and the Delaware River, flat land and receding slopes of Jersey on the left.

The purest of mountain spring waters gush from the hillsides, and the Sawkill, Raymondskill, Conashaugh, Adams, Dingmans, Hornbeck, Mill, Tom's and Bushkill Creeks, break through the bluffs that support the highlands of Pike County, in many cascades and rapids through deep gorges, forming grand mountain scenery, into the Delaware River.

Laura Brink, aged eighty-six, says that Cornelius Cole, or Case Cole, as they then called him, built a house under the mountains in Dingman township, where Foster Howell now lives, as early as 1750. He owned the Delaware flats from the Raymondskill to the Sawkill, his wife being a daughter of Peter Decker, who first settled in Deckerstown, N. J. An old squaw camped on the land every summer and fished in the streams. She claimed the land and told Mr. Cole he must pay her for it. He replied that he had already paid for his land. Mrs. Cole advised her husband to settle with her and he finally concluded to do so. She demanded two Dutch rose blankets, five gallons of whiskey and one sheep. These rose blankets were woven of a long nape-like wool, with roses interwoven. One day, after he had procured the things, she appeared with about thirty Indians and secured all that she had demanded, being very particular not to have the sheep killed until she had received the blankets and whiskey. The sheep was killed, the whiskey distributed and a noisy pow-wow was held all night. Mr. Cole, expecting the Indians to become drunk and attack him, said to his wife, "Now, Maria, you see what trouble we have got into." The old squaw, however, left with her friends and returned to her home in Wyoming Valley and never troubled him more. They made a rude picture of a horse in Mr. Cole's cellar, which other Indians seemed to understand, and during all the Indian wars that followed, his property remained untouched, although the battle of Conashaugh was fought within half a mile of his place. Nothing was disturbed that belonged to Case Cole, because the Indians said he had paid for his land. There is an old stone fort still to be seen on the Jersey shore about one-half mile below Cole's old house. Cornelius Cole's son Abram had the lower part of his father's place, or what is now the Howell and Warner farms. His children were Hugh, Budd and James. Aunchy had the upper part of the farm, now owned by Moses and John Dietrick. She was the first wife of Judge John Brink, who lived on part of the Cole property, and William, his only son by her, was the husband of Laura, a daughter of Ira Newman. She is still living in Dingman township with her son, James Brink, aged eighty-six years. Judge Brink afterward married Nancy Drake, and Dow, Howard, Lydia, Sarah and Ann Eliza were their children. William McCarty, Sr., settled in Dingman township in 1750 or earlier. He had two sons,—William McCarty, Jr., who married Margaret Buchanan, sister of George and Arthur Buchanan, and James McCarty, both farmers. Philip McCarty was a brother of William McCarty, Sr., and lived just across the Raymondskill, adjoining Case Cole's on the south. Cornelius, one of his sons, was a merchant at Dingman's Choice, and one of his sons, Bernardi McCarty, lives on the old Philip McCarty place.

Joshua Drake had a log tavern near the centre of Dingman township, about one mile from what afterwards became known as the Log Tavern Ponds. He was one of the first settlers in that part of the township. His four sons—Stephen, Benjamin, Ephraim and John,—located in the neighborhood of their father. Redmond Drake, a son of Stephen Drake, now an old man, is still living in the vicinity. Robert Travis was an early settler near the centre of the township. His son, Jesse Travis, aged eighty years, is still living in Dingman's. The Aldriges are another old family. Richard Huffman is a farmer near the Sawkill Pond, and was justice of the peace for a number of years. Tony Healer, David Case and the Retallicks lived in the vicinity of Union School-house.

George Buchanan, corrupted to Bowhanan, was born in 1763, and came to Milford from Orange County when he was about twenty-five years old. His first wife was a sister of Nathaniel B. Eldred, and his second wife a sister of Frederick Rose, of Rosetown. He kept the first hotel in Milford and had the brush cut out of Broad Street and opened that road. He was also a lumberman and tanner. He owned a tannery in Milford, on the Valentine Kill, in 1838, which was destroyed by fire after being in operation seven or eight years. He owned about fifteen hundred acres of land in Dingman township, where a number of his children lived. He died when eighty-two years of age.

Jesse Olmstead, a lawyer, from Connecticut, came to Milford in 1815 and married Mary, the eldest daughter of George Bowhanan. The Olmstead family moved into Dingman township, on part of the Bowhanan property. George Olmstead, a farmer, was for many years a justice of the peace. Frank Olmstead, a man of considerable ability, has been sheriff and associate judge of Pike County. Harriet is the wife of Rev. George Windsor. Nancy resides with her brother, the judge.

Sally Bowhanan, another daughter of George Bowhanan, was the wife of William Quinn, a farmer in Dingman. Theodore Bowhanan had a tannery in Dingman township. Harry Bowhanan is in the paper business in New York. John, George, James and Louisa Bowhanan live in Milford. Jane married William Freel, who was one of the first merchants in Milford. Emily is the wife of Ebenezer Warner, a farmer in Dingman.

Arthur Buchanan,[1] a brother of George Buchanan, lived at Shohola Farms in 1797. His only son, William, died in Dingman township. Olive, one of Arthur's daughters, was the wife of John P. Rockwell, a merchant in Milford, and the father of Charles F. Rockwell, of Honesdale. Mary was the wife of Edwin Power, a merchant in Milford and Honesdale. C. E. Power, merchant in Honesdale, is a son.

A number of Frenchmen formerly lived in Dingman, but most of them have removed from the township. Among them was Ramie Loreaux, who built a large brewery, stone houses, sheds, etc., on part of the old McCarty property. He carried on an extensive business and was a prominent man in the township from 1832 until about 1872, when he left. His daughter was the wife of Desiré Bornique, who had a watch-factory in Milford and was an active business man until he died, in 1884, when the enterprise declined. Joseph Rigney, another Frenchman, has a large summer hotel in the vicinity of Raymondskill Falls that is annually patronized by his countrymen.

Judge Olmstead says that some of the best lands in Dingman township for agricultural purposes are in the western part, about Rattlesnake Creek, and remain as yet unoccupied. There are seven schools in the township,—the Franklin, River, Union, Sawkill, Rattlesnake, Dark Swamp and German. There are no churches; the Methodists occasionally hold services at the Franklin and Union School houses. There is a Sunday-school at the Franklin. The first school-house in the township was at Brink's, on the river road. The population in 1880 was five hundred and eighty-six. The highest point on the Dingman bluffs is called Utter's Point, and is often visited by summer boarders in Milford, a good view of the valley being obtained on a clear day from Port Jervis nearly to the Delaware Water Gap. The battle of Conashaugh, or Raymondskill, which occurred in Dingman township, in which thirteen of the settlers were killed, will be mentioned in the general history. John Greening was the first settler on Rattlesnake Creek, in the western part of Dingman township. His sons were John, Jerry and Hubbard Greening. Jerry Greening remained there and has a farm and a family of children. He figures conspicuously in Ed. Mott's "Pike County Folks," and in his articles for the New York Sun. During the War of the Rebellion Jerry Greening and one or two of his boys were drafted; he stayed in his house and resisted twenty United States cavalrymen for some time, until at last he was compelled to surrender. A neighbor gives the following account of the affair: "One night one of Jerry's boys came to my house and said, What shall I do? the United States troops are after me.' I had lost a boy down in Virginia myself, and had other sons drafted, one of them in three different townships, and they had gone West; so I got Jerry's boy a blanket and told him to go out in the barn and crawl into the hay-mow. During the night I heard guns go off in the direction of Jerry's. Next morning I went down. The snow about the house was trampled and covered with blood and the window-lights were shot out of Jerry's house. Mrs. Greening sat by the fire with her head down. She would cry and then she would swear. Her husband and Charles Bates, both of whom were drafted, had a shanty where they slept, but had come home to butcher hogs, and there the cavalrymen found them. Jerry was well armed, and when the cavalrymen came up he fired on them, and a younger son of his helped him in the shooting, but Bates did not take any hand in the firing. They hit one of the cavalrymen in the neck. A ball that had about spent its force hit Jerry on the bone of the hip, flattened out and fell down into his boot. The soldiers forced their way into the house and captured Jerry. Mrs. Greening threw a straw bed over Charles Bates in the hall, but they found him and took them both down to Philadelphia." Jerry had not been in the barracks in Philadelphia more than two hours before he got into a fight with another man about who should use the fire first to cook his dinner; but fortunately for Jerry he had made a friend in the backwoods who did not forget him in his extremity. Mr. Cuthbert, a gentleman of influence in Philadelphia, stopped at the Sawkill House a number of summers. In his hunting and fishing excursions he often went out as far as Rattlesnake Creek, where he became acquainted with Jerry, who was a guide to him in that region. He bailed Jerry out and saved him from receiving any further punishment for his belligerent attitude towards the cavalrymen.

CHAPTER VIII.

DELAWARE TOWNSHIP.

Delaware township appears in the list of Northampton County townships continuously after 1766, but the record of its erection cannot be found. Old Delaware township, which extended west from the Delaware River to the Luzerne County line, was bounded on the south by Smithfield (now Middle Smithfield) and extended north from the mouth of the Bushkill, up the Delaware River to the lower end of the Minisink Island. The present township of Delaware is bounded on the north by Dingman township, on the east by the Delaware River and New Jersey, on the south by Lehman township and on the west by Porter. The first settlements on the Delaware River were made on the New Jersey side; but in or about the year 1735, Andreas Dingerman, or Andrew Dingman, as it is now written, crossed the Delaware and chose a place in the wilderness for his home, which he called "Dingman's Choice," a name which it still retains in local usage, although the post-office is called Dingman's Ferry. When Andrew Dingman first crossed the river to make his habitation on the Pennsylvania side, he had an opportunity to make a choice, as he was the pioneer settler of Delaware township. If he was not the first, he was among the first, and is the first of whom we have authentic account. He certainly made an excellent choice of location for his future home, judging from present developments, for here the Delaware River flows close to the New Jersey hills and leaves a wide flat of rich bottom land on the Pennsylvania side. Here Dingman Creek bursts through the mountain bluffs after dashing over the rocks at the factory in a fall called the Factory Falls, and lower down is the "Bettie Brooks" or "Fulmer Falls." Still farther down are the "Deer Leap" and "High Falls." Near the foot of the "High or Dingman Falls" a small rivulet comes seething down in rapids and waterfalls a distance of one hundred and fifty feet between perpendicular rocks standing from six to eight feet apart. The surging and foaming of this little rivulet, as it dashes along between the rocks, led the natives to call it "The Soap Trough," but recent visitors have named it "The Silver Thread." As Dingman Creek approaches the Delaware River, the deep mountain gorge through which it has been flowing grows wider, the hills separating like the letter V, making the flat nearly a mile wide, and inclosing it in a peculiar manner. Here, then, with a broad expanse of fertile river bottom land under his feet, with a creek that would supply water-power for grist and saw-mills flowing through it, surrounded by mountain bluffs, "rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun," which environ it on two sides, he feasted his eyes upon the lavish bounty of Nature, in her primeval grandeur and magnificence, and inhaled the pure, health-giving air which floated around these mountains, "yet gorgeous in their primitive beauty, forest-crowned," and intersected with gushing streams of limpid waters, which burst through the rocks from the highlands above in bold and beautiful waterfalls, where for ages they have been wearing deep and still deeper the steep gorges and rocky glens in her riven sides.

Here, amid so much grandeur and beauty, Andrew Dingman made his choice and cut the first bush, built the first log cabin on the river-bank and put the first ferry-boat on the Delaware at what is now known as Dingman's Ferry. Andrew Dingman was born at Kinderhook, New York, in the year 1711, and settled at Dingman's Choice in the year 1735, or about that time. His first log cabin was down by the river-bank. About 1750, or some time previous to the French and Indian War, he built a stone house not far from where the Dingman "Reformed Church" now stands, on the site occupied by the house Fannie Dingman's farmer occupies. He had two sons, Isaac and Andrew Dingman, Jr., who was born September 19, 1753, in the old stone house which was destroyed during the French and Indian War, in 1755. Dingman immediately rebuilt another house. Mr. Dingman was endowed with a dauntless spirit and had now a farm, with orchards and barns. He was assisted in his labors by his two sons and four slaves. He established a traffic with the Indians, who often visited him, and from his friendly intercourse and dealing with the natives he derived considerable pecuniary advantage. In 1744 he obtained a warrant for the tract which now comprises a part of the M. W. Dingman estate, and in 1750 one for that lot on which the saw-mill at Dingman's now stands. He subsequently took up, as it is termed, three other lots of land, the last in 1775.

There were twenty-seven log and stone houses in Delaware as it was then, including Lehman and other territory west, contemporaneously with that of Andrew Dingman, Sr.

Among these pioneers were Captain Johannes Van Etten, who had a fort on the river road about four miles above Dingman's Choice. Benjamin Decker and Daniel Courtright each had cabins or houses about one mile north of Dingman's. There was a stone house below the ferry, built by Colonel John Rosenkrans, of New Jersey, which was unoccupied some two or three years during the war and was not burnt or destroyed (probably where M. V. C. Shoemaker now lives). There was also a fort about three miles below Dingman's Choice, at a place called Deckertown, where Jacob Hornbeck afterwards lived. Below Deckertown there was a log house with two rooms, owned and occupied by Hendrickus Decker, who had married Hannah Carmer, sister of Andrew Dingman's wife. Jacobus Van Gordon lived about two miles farther down, in what is now Lehman, and two miles farther still lived Eliphaz Van Auken.

William Allen, of Philadelphia, sold one hundred and ninety-three acres of land to Peter Van Aken for two hundred and forty-six pounds and seven shillings and one pepper-corn a year, if the same shall be demanded, the deed bearing date September 18, 1749, for land in Bucks County, afterwards Delaware, now Lehman township. Peter Van Aken made his will in Dutch, commencing: "I, Peter Van Aken, of Bucks County, in the province of Pensilvania, being advanced to a great age, etc., etc." He first makes provision for his wife Russie as long as she remains his widow. Then his oldest son, Eliphaz, is to have all the property if he lives, which shows that old Peter Van Aken was possessed of the old feudal idea that the eldest son should inherit the estate. If Eliphaz should die, then the other five sons were to share equally in the estate, no mention being made of any daughters. It so happened that Eliphaz lived and occupied the property for many years. This will was probated and translated from the original Dutch in Ulster County, N. Y., July 8, 1757, which was several years after Northampton County was erected. The whole transaction shows that the sturdy old Dutch pioneers did not care to acknowledge the authority of the province of "Pensilvania," unless compelled to do so. This probate commences as follows: "Sir Charles Hardy, Knight, Captain, General and Governor-in-Chief in and over the province of New York and the territories depending thereon in America, and Vice-Admiral of the same, etc."

David Van Auken occupied the next house, about one mile below Peter Van Aken's, and John Emmons had a log cabin about one-half mile farther down. The next house below was a fort occupied by Johannes Brink, called Brink's Fort. The next below Brink's was a log house occupied by Thomas Swartwood, and the next a stone house occupied by Benardus Swartwood. Another was occupied by old William Custard. The next below was a log house on the bank of the river, occupied by James Mullen. About one-half mile farther on was a stone house owned and occupied by Captain Emanuel Hoover, who also owned a house across the river, on the Jersey side, at a place called by the Indians Walpack, around which house was a stockade. The next house below was at Bushkill, owned by Manuel Gunsalus or Gonzales.

Andrew Dingman built a flat-boat for ferrying purposes with a hand-axe, and it is probable that he built a grist-mill and saw-mill on Dingman's Creek. An old grist-mill, with one "run" of native stones, stood near the present grist-mill. Judge Dingman used to tell his children about turning the bolt by hand while the miller ground the grist.[1]

The early settlers appear to have secured the friendship of the Indians up to the time of the French and Indian War, when the savages committed some depredations on the settlers in the Minisink, burning houses, taking prisoners and otherwise annoying them. During the Revolutionary struggle they conspired with the Tories to drive the hated pale-faces out of their hunting-grounds.

One of Andrew Dingman's sons, Isaac, when

[1] Most of the above facts are taken from Judge Dingman's papers, which he prepared for the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

about nineteen years of age, was riding a horse up the road to the barn and when a little north of the old Dingman Hotel (now Fulmer's), an Indian, who was secreted in the orchard, shot him and ran away. His mother, who happened to be standing in the door holding the future judge, who was then four years of age, by the hand, exclaimed, "Law me, Isaac is shot!" He was mortally wounded, but they started across the river with him in a flat-boat. While they were going over he asked for a drink of water and shortly after died before they reached the Jersey shore, where there was a fort with one cannon. He was buried on the Jersey side, near the abutment of the old bridge.

The next morning the Indians attacked the house of Hendrikus Decker, who lived a little below Deckertown, as before mentioned. The family fled for their lives to Fort Decker, which was about one-fourth of a mile north, at Deckertown. Six of the family reached the fort in safety, but two of the sons, Henry and David, were killed and one of them was scalped.

Andrew Dingman, Jr., "Foddy Dingman," as he was called, was born in the old stone house September 19, 1753. He married Jane Westbrook, a daughter of Daniel Westbrook, who lived across the river in New Jersey, and had three daughters, each of whom he gave a farm on the flats in Walpack township. Andrew Dingman took the upper farm, and here Daniel Westbrook Dingman was born April 14, 1775, on the Daniel Smith place, in a house that stood opposite Barney Swartwood's. Subsequently Andrew Dingman, Jr., sold this property and bought on the Pennsylvania side again, near where John Whitaker lives.

Before the Revolutionary War the nearest justice of the peace was Benjamin Van Campen, who lived twenty-two miles from Dingman's Choice. The county-seat was at Newtown, near Bristol, and there Andrew Dingman attended court.

In 1793 Daniel W. Dingman was commissioned as lieutenant of a company of militia by Thomas Mifflin, Governor of Pennsylvania. On the 2d of August, 1800, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the One Hundred and Third Regiment Pennsylvania Militia by Governor McKean. In 1801 he received a commission as high sheriff of Wayne County, by the same Governor. He was the second sheriff of Wayne County, his term extending from 1801 to 1804. The court was held at Wilsonville from 1799 to 1802, when it was removed to Milford for a short time; consequently he commenced at Wilsonville and closed his term at Milford. At one of these places he lived in a log house, the jail being similar to his dwelling. He had two prisoners in this jail. One morning, on arising, he found both his prisoners and the jail were gone. During the night the jail was torn down and the building reduced to saw-logs, while the prisoners were nowhere to be found. About that time he was visited by some gentlemen from New Jersey on business, and "Black Feen" overheard some very uncomplimentary remarks about such a dwelling for a sheriff to live in, good enough, however, for a county-seat that was liable to be removed any day. He was a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania from 1808 till 1813, and when Pike County was set off from Wayne and Northampton, he was commissioned associate judge by Governor Simon Snyder, October 10, 1814, and continued in that office twenty-six years, when his term expired by limitation under the new Constitution. John Coolbaugh sat with him for twenty-two years and until Monroe was erected. They were both large, stoutly-built men, and weighed over two hundred pounds each, while Judge Scott, the presiding judge who sat between them, was a tall, spare, intellectual man of great legal attainments. His associates seldom interfered, unless in relation to something of a political nature. Dingman was once Presidential elector and cast his vote for James Monroe. During Jackson's campaign he cut a tall hickory pole and floated it to Easton, on a raft, when it was raised on Mount Jefferson. When taken down it was made into canes, one of which was presented to General Jackson and another to Judge Dingman. Solomon Dingman, his grandson, now has the cane. In 1846 he was corresponding secretary of the Pennsylvania Historical Society. Daniel W. Dingman was an active business man and a successful politician of the old Jacksonian Democratic school. He built a hotel which has since been enlarged by Philip Fulmer, until it will accommodate one hundred guests. He also built the Dingman grist-mill, and being given his choice whether he would have an academy or a county-seat located at Dingman's Ferry, chose an academy. In all public matters relating to Pike County, he was a leading man. While in the Legislature he secured an act making Blooming Grove the county-seat, but the commissioners of Wayne County refused to levy a tax for public buildings and the county-seat was finally fixed at Bethany. He and his friends then had the county of Pike erected. He was also influential in getting State appropriations for roads over the barrens of Pike County. Towards the close of his life he built a house in the wilderness, by Lake Teedyuscung or Nichecronk, where he lived a retired life for a number of years. He finally came back to his old home, and died April 12, 1862, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years, and was buried in the Delaware Cemetery at Dingman's Ferry. Towards the close of his life he seemed to desire posthumous fame and took pride in the fact that he belonged to the Pennsylvania Historical Society. He was thoroughly identified with the early history of Pike County. Dingman's Ferry, Dingman Creek and Falls were named in honor of the family, and Dingman township was named in honor of the judge. He was kind to Revolutionary heroes and Indian fighters, and General Seeley, Sam Helm, Mapes and Wagdon found a generous stopping-place with him. His only sister, Cornelia, married John Van Etten, and lived where William Courtright now lives at Dingman's Ferry. She was eighty-six years of age when she died. Daniel W. Dingman married Mary Westbrook. His children were Cornelia, wife of Garret Brodhead; Jane, wife of Franklin Brodhead; Margaret, wife of Abram Coolbaugh. Daniel Dingman lived on the river road.

Martin Westbrook Dingman, who was born in 1798 or 1799, and married Belinda, a daughter of Major Hornbeck, lived for some years on the farm afterwards owned by Jacob Hornbeck. From thence he moved to Dingman's Choice, bought the farm and hotel of his father, and carried on both for nearly thirty years. In connection with this he also did considerable lumbering and business in the grist-mill. A man of scrupulous honesty, vigorous health and untiring energy, he soon became comparatively wealthy. About 1858 he rented the hotel to Daniel Decker, bought the residence built by W. F. Brodhead, moved into it and carried on farming and milling until his death. His children are Solomon H. Dingman, who married Elizabeth Beemer, and lives on the old Adams farm; Margaret Jane, unmarried; Leah E., wife of Albert S. Still; Mary D., wife of Rev. Gilbert S. Garretson, for many years pastor of the Dutch Reformed Churches at Dingman's Ferry and Peters' Valley, and now settled at Franklin Furnace (they have two children, Henry and Fanny B. Garretson); Frances C. Dingman, lives on the homestead at Dingman's Ferry; Andrew Dingman (3d), who is still living, aged eighty-one, married Caroline Sayre, who recently died, being nearly eighty years of age—he lived by the river, kept Dingman's Ferry for many years and had the reputation of being a good ferryman, being succeeded in the same business by his son-in-law, John Kilsby. Dr. Daniel W. Dingman, of Hawley, is one of his sons, and Alfred Dingman, of Milford, is another.

John Van Etten and Margaret, his wife, sold three parcels of land, containing about sixty-eight acres of land, lying below Namenock Island, in the Delaware River, to Johannes Van Etten, August 22, 1767. This John Van Etten, Daniel Brodhead and John Atkins were judges of the Orphans' Court in Northampton County in the year 1754. Captain Johannes Van Etten, who lived in Delaware township, above Dingman's Ferry, was a prominent character during the Indian wars.

The Van Etten family were among the early settlers of the township, coming here about 1750. They were far earlier in New York and New Jersey. Some time prior to 1660 the progenitor of the Van Ettens, Van Nettens, Van Attas, Van Nattens (the name appearing in early records variously spelled) came to this country from Etten, in the province of North Brabant, Holland, and settled at Kingston, Ulster County, N. Y. In the earliest records of the Reformed Dutch Church at Kingston is recorded the marriage of Jacob Jansen Youngman von Etten, in Brabant, to Anna Adriance, from Amsterdam, in the year 1665. He resided in the town of Hurley until his death, about 1690, and left surviving him his widow, five sons—John, born 1665; Peter; Arien, born 1670; Manuel, born 1681; Jacobus or James, born 1685—and four daughters.

In 1718 the property of Jacob Jansen Van Etten was divided among his children by conveyance from his wife to each of their children, and from about that time the sons, with their families, began to seek new homes in the then sparsely-settled country along the Hudson, and a little later the Delaware Valley.

Peter and James, with their families, crossed the Hudson and settled in Dutchess County about 1720. John, the oldest son, married Jane Roosa, daughter of Arien Roosa, about 1692. He resided until his death in the towns of Hurley and Rochester, Ulster County, N. Y., and had a large family of children, mostly girls. One of his sons, Jacob, born 1696, is the immediate ancestor of the numerous family that settled in the Delaware Valley. April 22, 1719, Jacob married Anna Westbrook, who was born in Kingston, and they lived at Knightsfield (the name being written "Nytsfield" in the Mahackkemack church record), in the town of Rochester, Ulster County, until 1730, when Jacob, with his family and some of the sisters who had married, following in the footsteps of many who migrated over the old Mine road to the fertile valleys of the Neversink and Delaware, came to the Delaware Valley and settled at Namanoch, along the river on the New Jersey side.

He was prominent in the early history of the Minisink Church, which was organized in 1737, and his name, together with those of his sons, appear among the officers and those aiding in the work. His oldest daughter, Helena or Magdalena, born 1721, was the wife of the Rev. John Casp. Fryenmoet, the first regular pastor of the Minisink, Walpack and Mahakkemack Churches, their marriage being among the earliest recorded in the records of these churches in 1742.

John, the oldest son of Jacob, was born in 1720, others of the family being Cornelis, born in 1723; Anthony, born in 1726; Jane, born in 1728; Johannes, born in 1730; Sarah, born in 1736; Richard, born in 1739.

In the year 1745 William Allen, merchant of Philadelphia, conveyed a tract of land in Delaware township, opposite Namanoch Island, in the Delaware River, to Jacob Van Etten, of the county of Morris, in the eastern province of New Jersey. Through four generations the title and possession has remained in members of the family; three great-granddaughters of Jacob now hold it, and reside within a stone's throw of the house of the first one of the name who settled in the county. This was Johannes Van Etten, a son of Jacob, who was born at Namanoch, in New Jersey, about 1730. Upon his marriage, which is recorded in the Reformed Dutch Church at Nopenoch, Ulster County, N. Y., in 1750, he probably located in Pennsylvania. He was the progenitor of a large family. He was twice married, his first wife having been Maria Gonsoles, of Ulster County, N. Y., by whom he had eleven children. After her death he married Rachel Williams, widow of Daniel Decker, by whom he had four children,—three sons and one daughter. That these sons, following in the footsteps of their father, obeyed the Scriptural command, "to multiply and replenish," is evidenced by the fact that each had eight children; many of them still reside in the county and along the Delaware Valley.

John settled very soon after Johannes, near Easton, probably about 1760. In 1767, in a deed to Johannes, he is located in Fork township, Northampton County. He married Margaret Westfall in 1738. Their children were Helena, born in 1738; Jacob, born in 1740; Daniel, born in 1742; Catharine, born in 1744; Maria, born in 1746; Simeon, born in 1748 (?); Margaret, born in 1748; Samuel, born in 1750; Margreeta, born in 1752.

Johannes' children, by his first wife, were Magdalena, born in 1751; Manuel, born in 1754; Rymerick, born in 1756; Johannes,

Jr., born in 1759; James, born in 1763 (some say Anthony); Elizabeth, born in 1762; Catharine, born in 1771; Simeon, born in 1776.

Two of these sons were wounded in a fight with the Indians, near Philip McCarty's, and his son-in-law, Ennis, killed.

On June 14, 1780, John Chambers asked, in a letter to President Reed, for arms and ammunition for a volunteer company, to be placed in the care and charge of Captain Johannes Van Etten. And on July 4, 1780, Lieutenant Samuel Rea wrote to President Reed that he had filled up a commission of Captain Johannes Van Etten,[1] and that the Indians had taken a Mr. Dewitt, near Captain Van Etten's, on the Delaware.

In Penna. Archives, vol. ii. p. 720, in a letter from Captain John Van Etten to Governor Morris, dated at Fort Hyndshaw, July 24, 1756, mention is made of Johannes Van Etten having a conversation with some Indians, during which a disagreement arose, and the Indians carried away, as they thought, a load of swan-shot, while one of his companions received nine charges and lost his scalp.[2]

The fight between Captain Johannes Van Etten's company and the Indians, in which the captain, with three of his sons and son-in-law, Benjamin Ennis, were engaged, was near McCarter's, just below the Raymondskill, on the banks of the Delaware. The actual engagement is reported by the old inhabitants to have been fought near or on lands now owned by Ira Case, in Dingman township, and John H. Van Etten, Esq., has heard his father say that, when a boy, in company with his father (Cornelius, son of Johannes), he visited the battle-field, and they found, in the crevices of the rocks, human bones, a skull, etc.

The children of Johannes by his second wife were Daniel, born 1780; Cornelius, born December 8, 1782; Solomon, born February 12, 1789; and Dorothy, who married John Lattimore.

The sons of Daniel were Samuel, John, Oliver and Cornelius; and daughters, Rachel, Jane, Phebe and Cornelia.

The sons of Cornelius were Amos, Solomon (father of Attorney John H. Van Etten, of Milford, and of Mathias M. and Cornelius S.) and Robert K.; and daughters, Catharine, Rachel, Margaret, Mary and Amanda.

The sons of Solomon were Emanuel, Solomon, Daniel, John I.; and the daughters, Julia Ann, Dorothy, Huldah, Hannah and Eliza Jane.

The first saw-mill was built at Dingman's about 1800, and the grist-mill, where Mollineux lives, was erected about 1827; the grist-mill at Dingman's was built a few years later. Andrew Dingman states that his father built the tavern where Fulmer now is, about 1810; that a man by the name of Winans carried the mail on horseback from Easton to Milford, about that time, and that one Jackson was the first postmaster he remembers. Jacob Hull was the first merchant, as early as 1810, and Franklin Brodhead followed. Joseph Ennis was a ferryman in 1805.

The first school-house was a log school-house, near Shoemaker's, and Mason Dimmick taught the first school remembered. Three bridges have been, at various times, erected at Dingman's Ferry, but the wind, ice and floods have destroyed them and made it necessary to resume the ferry-boat. Judge Dingman chose an academy, rather than the county-seat, though this was not the origin of Dingman's Choice, as has been shown. When the matter of location and site had been concluded upon, Judge Dingman gave one and one-half acres, by deed bearing date July 15, 1813, to John Nyce, John Westbrook, John Lattimore, Matthew Ridgway and Daniel Jayne, trustees of the Delaware Academy. The deed states "that for good causes and considerations, and the sum of five shillings to him in hand paid, hath given all that messuage, etc., beginning at a cedar standing near the main road." This cedar, which has remained an enduring monument for more than seventy years, still stands erect, the winds wailing a requiem over the pioneers of the Minisink, who sleep the silent sleep of death in the Delaware Cemetery, near by. The instrument was signed in the presence of Daniel Dimmick and Samuel Anderson. One of the corners of the plot is the State road, which once passed below the site of the Reformed Church. When the State withdrew its aid from academies this property was turned over to the school directors, and is now used for public school purposes.

The Dutch Reformed Church was organized in four places in the Minisink as early as 1737. Although the first churches were on the Jersey side of the river, the congregation was drawn from both Pennsylvania and New Jersey. We find the name of Andries Dingenman as a member of the consistory in 1748, in the following action:

"October 22, 1748.—We, the undersigned, lawfully and ecclesiastically assembled, have resolved to sell the present residence of the Dominie, with its appurtenances, to the Dominie, provided we can agree with the Elders and Deacons, who are now absent, at the approaching meeting in November next.

Rev. George Wilhelmus Mancius, pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Kingston, first preached the gospel here and organized churches both along the Neversink and Delaware. There were four churches organized, probably about the same time, viz.: Machackemech (now the Reformed Church at Port Jervis); Menissinck, at Montague, N. J.; Walpack, with which Dingman and Bushkill were connected; and Smithfield, in Monroe County. The consistory minutes of these churches commence August 23, 1737. Mancius came regularly twice a year, in May and November. June 1, 1841, at the age of twenty, Rev. Johannes Casparus Fryenmoet was chosen as the first regular pastor of these four churches. He was found among the people here, a lad of but sixteen, of much promise, a native of Switzerland, who had received a partial education for the ministry before coming to this country. In the scarcity of ministers they desired him to become their spiritual teacher, though only a boy and his education imperfect, while the regulations of the churches are very strict in requiring an educated ministry. As there were no schools of theology in this country, the churches raised money sufficient and sent young Fryenmoet to Holland to complete his studies and receive ordination from the Classis of Amsterdam, upon which the Reformed Churches in this country were then all dependent. Four years later he returned and began his work among them. He labored for fifteen years in the churches, during which time a large number were added to their membership. He received seventy pounds in equal proportion from these four churches and one hundred schepels of oats for his horse (a schepel is three pecks). They all paid in New York money, except the Smithfield Church, which tendered him "Proclamation Money." The next year two of the churches agreed to pay forty pounds if he married and thirty-five pounds if he continued unmarried. He was married to Lena Van Etten, by Justice Abram Van Campen, July 23, 1742. Rev. Thomas Romeyn was their next pastor, from 1760 till 1772. After this they were for thirteen years without a pastor. Rev. Elias Van Benschoten, or Van Bunschooten, as he usually wrote it, had charge from May 11, 1785, till about 1800. He preached in Dutch and English. Mr. Van Benschoten's labors were greatly blessed. He was a man of some eccentricities, many excellencies and was held in high esteem. He was remarkable for his frugality and strict honesty.

He gave seventeen thousand dollars, which has since increased to twenty thousand dollars, to Rutgers College, and over one hundred and twenty-five Dutch Reformed ministers have been educated by this fund. It should have been mentioned that in 1753 Smithfield Church withdrew and Mr. Van Benschoten was the last minister who supplied the pulpit of the three remaining churches.

Rev. James G. Force, who came in 1808, was the fourth minister at Walpack and vicinity. In 1827 a division arose and the Lower Church of Walpack, as a result, was organized. Rev. Isaac S. Demund was the fifth pastor of these churches, in 1827, the only church being at Flatbrookville. The other places of worship were school-houses at Peters' Valley, Pleasant Valley, the academy at Dingman's Ferry, Hornbeck's barn near his tavern, at Mr. Schoonover's house at Bushkill and at Peters' Tavern. Rev. David Cushing, the next minister, was settled in 1831. During his brief stay a deep religious interest manifested itself in the congregation and one hundred and four were added to the church. Prominent among those engaged in the good work were John Nyce, Esq., Jacob Westbrook and Daniel Schoonover. They were greatly assisted by the faithful and devoted Rev. C. C. Elting, of Port Jervis, who spent days and weeks laboring among them. One man eighty years of age and one tavern-keeper were converted. Rev. Garret C. Schenck succeeded Mr. Cushing, a devoted young man, who left in 1835. Immediately after the relations of the church were changed from the Classis of New Brunswick to the Classis of Orange. Rev. James B. Hyndshaw was installed pastor January 17, 1836. In 1841 Rev. Robert Pitts became stated supply and remained as such until 1860. October 17, 1855, Upper and Lower Walpack were divided. Upper Walpack has the two congregations at Dingman's Ferry and Peters' Valley respectively, and Lower Walpack has the two congregations at Bushkill and Walpack. Rev. Alexander McWilliam was the first minister of Lower Walpack, in 1861. In 1870 he was succeeded by Rev. John F. Shaw, and Rev. Henry Rex is the present pastor. Rev. Nathan W. Jones was the first minister of Upper Walpack under the new arrangement in 1861. He was succeeded by Rev. Gilbert S. Garretson.

Church Farm.—On May 24, 1752, James Alexander, by direction of the Council of Proprietors of the Eastern Division of New Jersey, conveyed to Abraham Van Campen and Garret Brink, for the use of the Reformed Church of Walpack and Pahaquarry, professing the doctrines of Calvin, two hundred and ten acres in Sandyston, the consideration being "six pence and a pint of spring water yearly" from the large spring on the premises, "if demanded." The income from this farm was to be devoted to the support of the preaching of the Gospel in the church. The farm has been sold for twelve thousand five hundred and six dollars and the proceeds invested for the benefit of the church. The first movement towards erecting a church edifice at Dingman's Ferry which we find on record was on May 1, 1837, but this project seems to have slept for over twelve years, when it was revived, and Rev. R. Pitts and John I. Westbrook were appointed to raise money for this purpose. The effort was successful, and the church was erected in 1850, at a cost of one thousand three hundred dollars. The building committee consisted of John I. Westbrook, Albert S. Stoll and John Van Gorden, W. F. Brodhead being contractor.

The Methodist Church at Dingman's Ferry.—Rev. John Retallick, a Methodist local preacher, aged eighty-four, says, when he first came, in 1830, Rev. Bromwell Andrews and another man preached in Sandyston, N. J., Milford and Dingman's Ferry. The first Methodists at Dingman's were Andrew Adams, who lived on the place that Solomon Dingman now owns, and his wife and two daughters. His house was a home for preachers. The strongest class was at Milford. Benjamin Drake, John Drake, William Watson, Judge John Brink, Jonathan Doolittle and wife and Mrs. Suter were prominent. About 1830 John Westbrook and wife joined the Dingman class. Daniel Buckley and wife, William Hooker and George Reese have been prominent members since. Joseph Buckley is now superintendent of the Sunday-school.

There are seventy members, and the Sunday-school numbers about forty attendants. The church edifice was erected in 1870. Rev. John Retallick came to Dingman's Ferry from England in 1830, and has preached for fifty years, during which time he has performed the marriage office for fifty couples and attended one hundred and eighty or more funerals. Mr. Retallick, who lives with his son John, on the homestead farm, in summer, and with his son-in-law, S. L. Sarles, at Dingman's Ferry, in winter, is an intelligent, well-preserved old gentleman. Thomas and John Gustin were among the old residents at Dingman's. Joseph Brooks, an Englishman, bought three hundred and twenty-seven acres of land of the Gustins, on the Dingman Creek, in 1820, and built a woolen factory of stone in 1822. It is forty by sixty-five feet, and three and one-half stories high. He employed a number of hands and operated the factory until he died, in 1835. The children being young, the works were closed. Bettie Brooks, his widow, who is still living, aged ninety-eight, retains her faculties to a remarkable degree. She says her father, whose name was Holding, helped put up the first machinery for manufacturing purposes in Yorkshire and Lancashire, England. She could ride the swiftest horse when a girl, and received many compliments for her graceful appearance on horseback.

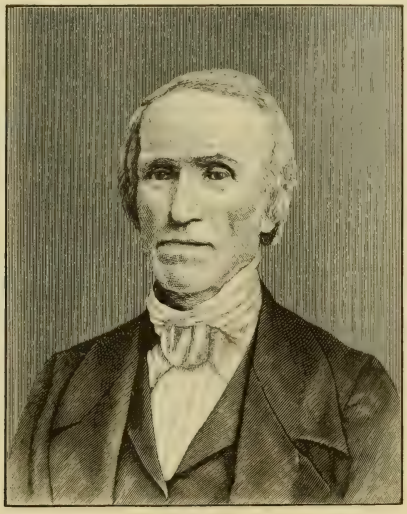
There is a water-fall at the factory called the Factory Falls. The Brooks, or Fulmer Falls are near by and the Deer Leap Falls are just below, so-called from the fact that a deer leaped from the rocks above the falls when pursued by a hound and broke his neck. The next falls below are the Dingman, or High Falls. These falls were very beautiful when the writer saw them, in winter, covered with a white robe of snow and ice, while the rocks were lined with a frosty incrustation and the trees and bushes were drooping with frost-petals, hanging pendant from every branch and glowing resplendent in the morning sun. Just below the Dingman Falls a little stream flows over the gorge between perpendicular rocks about six or eight feet apart, in a series of cascades and rapids, a distance of about one hundred and fifty feet, and enters the Dingman Creek. It rolls and tumbles between these rocks in such a manner as to gain the name of the "Soap Trough," but since summer visitors have visited the spot it has been called the "Silver Thread." It is a very unique and beautiful fall. John Fulmer built a sole-leather tannery on Dingman Creek in 1851, and operated it till 1866, when it was sold to William Bell, who soon closed the business. They tanned about twenty thousand sides per year while in operation. The Fulmerville post-office was established in 1853. John Fulmer is still living, aged ninety-five. Dr. Philip F. Fulmer, his son, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1852. He was superintendent of the schools of Pike County from 1852 to 1863, and is the first resident physician at Dingman's Ferry. He also purchased the old Dingman Hotel and enlarged it until it has a capacity for two hundred guests. Randall Van Gordon has the Delaware House, and a Frenchman has the Bellevue. These hotels altogether will accommodate one hundred and fifty guests. The natural beauty of some parts of Pike County is making it a favorite watering-place. The Hornbeck Creek has a dozen falls in succession, which, like steps, have led to their being termed the "Indian Ladder." There are also beautiful falls on the Adams' Creek, but they are dangerous to visit. In fact, every stream that rises in the highlands of Pike County has a fall of about two hundred feet before it reaches the level of the Delaware; consequently there are falls on all the streams that enter the Delaware. Cornelius McCarty built the house and store now owned by Judge Evart Hornbeck, in 1849. Thomas Courtright, who was postmaster for many years at Dingman's Ferry, is descended from an old New Jersey family. Dr. Fulmer has the post-office now, and William Brooks, son of Joseph Brooks, is his deputy.



According to Dingman's papers, John Rosencrance, of New Jersey, had a stone fort just below the ferry. This property was subsequently owned by Solomon Westbrook, grandson of Antony Westbrook and son of Jacob Westbrook. Moses V. C. Shoemaker lives on the property now, and recently tore down the old stone house.

Colonel John Westbrook, as he was generally addressed was born in Sussex County, N. J., January 9, 1789, and departed this life

October 8, 1852, in the sixty-third year of his age, near Dingman's Ferry, having removed to Pike County, Penna., with his father when three years of age, where he resided until his death.

When nineteen years of age, February 14, 1808, he married Sarah, daughter of Judge Richard Brodhead, and sister of United States Senator, Richard Brodhead, all of Pike County, she then being sixteen years of age, having been born February 12, 1792. She survived her husband twenty-seven years, departing January 21, 1879, aged eighty-seven years, having been the wife of Rev. John Lee, of Newark, N. J., for a few years, whom she also survived. Four of Colonel Westbrook's descendants reached adult age, and three still survive; Hannah, widow of William T. Wilson, being in her seventy-eighth year; Jacob B., died in 1852 of pneumonia in the thirty-sixth year of his age; Richard B., resides in Philadelphia, and Jane B., wife of Dr. Vincent Emerson, resides in Milford.

The business of Colonel Westbrook was farming though at times he engaged in mercantile pursuits and in lumbering. In his twenty-sixth year (1817), he was elected sheriff of his county. Before he reached twenty-one, he held office in the State militia which at that time was in a flourishing condition, inspired by the war of 1812. At one time he was Colonel of the regiment, in which his brother Jacob was major, and his brother Solomon a captain. The annual "General Training-day," and the occasional parades and drills are well remembered by many still living. In these "Field-days," he was always a conspicuous figure, and was distinguished for his commanding manners, his perfect knowledge of military tactics, and his dashing horsemanship—the latter being an accomplishment for which many members of the family have been noted for several generations.

J. Westbrook Col

In 1833 he was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, and while at Harrisburg made the acquaintance of James Buchanan and other men who have become noted in history. Thaddeus Stevens was a member of Assembly at the same time. It was then that the great "Anti-Masonic" controversy took place which was followed by the well remembered "Buck-shot War," at Harrisburg. Colonel Westbrook was a mason of "high-degree," and a Jeffersonian Democrat all his life. He was proud of his personal acquaintance with Major-General Andrew Jackson, and often made eloquent speeches at the "Jackson Feasts," that were held January 8th, in memory of the battle of New Orleans. He was accustomed to tell amusing stories of his conversations with President Martin Van Buren, in Low-Dutch, to the great discomfiture of surrounding politicians.

In 1840 he was elected to Congress, where he served with faithfulness and acceptance. While in Congress his health broke down, and though he lived for ten years afterward, he was never quite himself again. He was the first person ever elected to Congress from Pike County, and declined a second term because of failing health. James Buchanan was United States Senator when Colonel Westbrook was a member of the twenty-seventh Congress, and a strong political friendship grew up between them, to which Mr. Buchanan referred when President of the United States in a letter to a member of the family, carefully preserved as a relic. Two incidents only connected with Colonel Westbrook's Congressional career can here be noticed.

Northampton County was then in the same district with Pike. The postmaster of Easton died. While the politicians were getting their petitions ready to fill the vacancy, Colonel Westbrook had influence enough with President Tyler, to secure on his own personal recommendation the appointment to the vacant office of the widow of the deceased postmaster, whose daughters continued the management of the office under their mother as they had done under their father. The disappointed politicians grumbled, but the people were pleased and were as well served as before. It is very common now to appoint women postmistresses, but forty years ago, it required some courage and political independence to favor such an appointment in a place like Easton. The writer to whom this case was related by President Tyler himself, is not informed how many, if any, women were appointed to post-offices, before the widow Horn of Easton, Penna.

The Morse telegraph was publicly inaugurated while Colonel Westbrook was in Congress, and the first appropriation to further this enterprise, was advocated by him, though a plain farmer from Pike County, while Cave Johnson, a learned lawyer and judge from Tennesee, and afterward a member of President Polk's Cabinet, ridiculed the telegraph by moving an amendment that one-half of the proposed appropriation should be given to a showman, then giving experiments in Mesmerism at Washington. General Samuel Houston, afterwards United States Senator, proposed from his seat in Congress, that a portion of the appropriation should be given to the Millerites, who at that time (1843) were predicting the near end of the world. Twenty-two members voted for the amendment! The Pike county farmer was not one of them.

What would the congressional sceptics of 1843, now say of the triumph of telegraphy?

Colonel Westbrook had very small opportunities for school learning, yet he kept fully up with the progress of his times. He never saw a grammar until his children carried one home from school, and yet he had a wonderful knowledge of the English language, though his vernacular was Holland Dutch. This was the language used in common in his father's family. An oration delivered by him July 4, 1816, when in his twenty-seventh year, is now before the writer. It is truly an able production, full of historic illustrations, and philosophical reflections, with frequent bursts of true patriotism and impassioned eloquence. There is not a single grammatical error in the composition. It shows a wonderful command of language. Even the punctuation is strictly accurate, and all quotations are marked as such, and there is not an i without its dot, nor a t without its cross. It is a MS., of which his children are proud. His perceptions were quick and clear, his judgment excellent, and his intuition truly remarkable. He was a natural lawyer, though never engaged in litigation. He probably wrote more legal documents than the average lawyer in the county. People came from many miles and even from New Jersey to have him write their wills, deeds, etc., and county justices of the peace, wrestling with legal questions, were accustomed to consult him instead of the regular lawyers. For these services he made no charge. He was not a money maker nor a money hoarder. Benevolence was his distinguishing characteristic, next to his uncompromising honesty. No man ever suspected, much less charged him with a dishonest act. He often gave and loaned money which he could ill spare. His disposition to oblige was excessive. It was hard for him to say no. He confided in everybody, endorsed the paper of too many of his friends, and was cheated and deceived by men from whom better things might have been expected. He died a poor man, but left his children a rich legacy, in his high sense of honor and undoubted integrity. He was baptized by the celebrated Dominie Van Benschoten, of the Reformed Dutch Church, but he joined the Methodists, while a member of the Legislature in 1833, of which church he was a member until the close of life.

THE WESTBROOK GENEALOGY.

The subject of the above sketch was the second son of Solomon Westbrook, who was born October 6, 1762, and died March 30, 1824. He married Margaret DeWitt, September 24, 1782. They had five children; Jacob, John, Solomon, Margaret and Sofferine. The family residence, a large stone house, was located on the stage road two miles below Dingman's Ferry, Delaware township, Pike county, Penna. He located there in 1792 upon a tract of land, of about seven hundred acres situate upon the western bank of the Delaware River.

The father of Solomon Westbrook was Jacob Westbrook. He occupied a large tract of land on the eastern bank of the Delaware, about eight miles below Port Jervis, in what is now Montague township, N. J. His substantial stone house was often used as a fort, in troublous times as was the stone house of his son, Johannes, which was located three miles further down the Delaware River. Jacob Westbrook married Lydia Westfall, March 24, 1746, and they had six children, named Blandina, Johannes, Sofferine, Solomon, Maria and Jane. It seems strange that so beautiful a name as Blandina has not been perpetuated in the family, and also the names Magdalena and Helletie, found in early Westbrook records.

The father of Jacob, was Anthony Westbrook. He resided in Minisink, and seems to have been a leading man in this pioneer settlement on the Delaware. In 1737, he was a justice of the peace, and an elder in the Reformed Dutch Church. The maiden name of his wife was Antie Van Etten. Nothing is known of their children, except Jacob and Johannes above mentioned. Anthony Westbrook came from Guilford, Ulster county, N. Y., and settled in Minisink, and became a large land owner. He was preceded by his brother Johannes who became an influential man in the settlement. Here we lose the line of direct descent, but there is abundant evidence that the Westbrook family on both sides of the Delaware were descendants of the family of the same name in Ulster county, New York. Several members of that family early joined the train of emigration through the Mamakating valley, to the rich flat lands of the Minisink region. Some of them served with distinction in the Indian wars and in that of the Revolution.

The name Westbrook has long been recognized as one of the representative pioneer names of this country. It is of pure Anglo-Saxon origin, and the representatives of the family though early associated with the Dutch, have continued to manifest the Saxon characteristics. As early as 1630 those bearing the name were at Albany, having come over with the Dutch from Holland where they had fled for the sake of religious freedom, to settle on the manor-lands of the patroon Van Rensselaer. John Westbrook was at Portsmouth, N. H., October 9, 1665, and Job and John were there in 1689–90. In 1721 Colonel Thomas Westbrook said to have come from Stroudwater, Gloucestershire, England, was a large land owner and ship builder in the State of Maine, and the town of Westbrook in that State, is named after him. In that year he commanded the expedition against Norridgewock, which broke up the settlement of the famous Jesuit priest, Father Ralle, and captured his papers. In 1723 he was appointed by Governor Dunmore chief in command of the eastern frontier.

Many existing records show that the distinguishing characteristic of the Westbrook family has ever been love of liberty and resistance to tyranny.

Brodhead Westbrook, as he was always called in youth, is a son of the Hon. John Westbrook, whose biography, with a genealogical sketch of the family, may be found in this volume. He was born February 8, 1820, near Dingman's Ferry, in Pike county, where he lived with his parents until his twentieth year. His early educational advantages were limited to the common district schools and the old Delaware Academy. He became practically familiar with farming and horsemanship in his boyhood, and cannot remember the time when he was not expected to make himself useful about the wood-pile, the barn and the farm. He taught a common district school and "boarded around" before he was seventeen, and soon after taught in the Delaware and Milford Academies. About this time he commenced the study of theology under the preceptorship of the Rev. Alexander Gilmore. He received license to preach on September 6, 1839, and was admitted on trial as an itinerant preacher in the New Jersey Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Burlington, N. J., April 18, 1840. He was appointed by the Conference within the next ten years to serve at Parsippany, Hackettstown, Stillwater, Plainfield, Bloomfield, Elizabeth and Mount Holly, all in New Jersey. He was ordained a deacon in the spring of 1842, at Camden, by Bishop Waugh, and an elder or Presbyter in the spring of 1844, at Trenton, by Bishop Morris, after passing the usual four year course of study, credentials of which he still holds clean and unimpaired.

On January 27, 1852, he withdrew from the Methodist Church in consequence of a change in his views on certain theological dogmas and questions of church polity and usage. The following, so highly creditable to two great denominations, will not be out of place here:

"TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

"Whereas, the Rev. Richard B. Westbrook has signified to me his intention to withdraw from the Methodist Episcopal Church, for the purpose of connecting himself with the Presbyterian Church. This is to certify that the said Rev. Richard B. Westbrook is an ordained Minister in good and regular standing in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and also a member of the New Jersey Annual Conference of said Church, and as such we recommend him to all where his lot may be cast by the Providence of God.

"RICHARD W. PETHERBRIDGE,
"Presiding Elder, Burlington Dist.

"January 27, 1852."

In addition to regular credentials, the above certificate and several letters of recommendation, voluntarily furnished by ministers of the Conference were presented to Presbytery; and after due examination, the following minute was adopted.

"The Rev. R. B. Westbrook having made application to be received as a member of this body, exhibiting his credentials as a minister in good standing in the New Jersey Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the validity of whose ordination we most cheerfully acknowledge; and having satisfied the Presbytery as to his piety, his literary and theological attainments, and his accordance with the principles and polity of the Presbyterian Church; and having also answered affirmatively the questions propounded to candidates in our Confession of Faith, it was unanimously voted that he be received and enrolled as a member of this body.

"The Presbytery also resolved, that it highly appreciates the courtesy and fraternal spirit manifested by our brethren of the Methodist Church, in their dismission and full recommendation of the Rev.

R. B. Winthrop.

Mr. Westbrook, which courtesy we hold ourselves ready when occasion offers, to reciprocate."

This is probably the first case in which a Methodist minister was in such an orderly manner, transferred to the Presbyterian ranks.

Mr. Westbrook's first and only pastorate among the Presbyterians was in Burlington, N. J., the very city in which he had been received into the Methodist Conference twelve years before. While pastor of this church in 1853 he received the honorary degree of A. M. from Princeton College.

In 1854 he received an appointment to a secretaryship from the American Sunday-school Union, and removed to Philadelphia where he remained until the spring of 1861. In 1860 he received the honorary degree of D.D. from Washington College upon the nomination of Rev. William S. Plumer, D.D., then professor in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny City. The following notice from the pen of Editor John S. Hart, LL.D., afterward professor in Princeton College, appeared in the Sunday-School Times,—

"THE RESIGNATION OF DR. WESTBROOK.

"The friends of the Sunday-school missionary work throughout the United States, we are certain will sympathize with us in the feeling of profound regret and sorrow with which we announce that the Rev. R. B. Westbrook, D.D., has resigned his office as secretary of missions of the American Sunday-school Union.

"The missionary work of this beloved and honored institution has never in its whole history been administered with more marked ability, or with more decided and signal success, than during the period that Dr. Westbrook has been entrusted with its executive control.

* * * * *

"His pulpit services are much in request, his preaching being of that earnest, practical and instructive character, combined with a rich gift of popular eloquence, which, together, soon build up a congregation. The Board of Managers in accepting Dr. Westbrook's resignation, 'bear their unanimous testimony to the ability, energy and large measure of success which has marked his labors in the service of the Society.'"

In retiring from this secretaryship Dr. Westbrook decided that whatever others might be able to do, he could not be a successful investigator and advocate of truth, while dependent upon those to whom he might minister for daily bread. Before leaving Philadelphia he received a unanimous call from the Fourth Presbyterian Church of that city, and also from the State Street Church of Albany, N. Y., and overtures from several churches in other cities.

While not intending to entirely abandon the office of a public moral teacher he entered the law department of the New York City University, and received in due course the degree of LL.B. He pressed ahead of his class, and before graduation was, in 1863, admitted to the New York bar after a rigid examination of several hours, under the judges of the Supreme Court. In 1869 he was admitted as attorney and counsellor in the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington, D. C. His practice was mainly in the New York Supreme Court. Through the persuasion of Judge George R. Barrett and the late Colonel Henry S. Mott, he was induced to make an investment in Pennsylvania coal lands in the Clearfield region, and he afterward purchased five thousand acres of coal land in Cambria county, Pa., and to develop and improve these lands, it became necessary to abandon his law practice, as the work was done under his personal supervision. Here his Pike county experience in boyhood came to his assistance. The "natives" were astonished to find that a city lawyer and clergyman understood all about lumber and saw-mills, and knew how to drive oxen, mules and horses. In 1882 he sold these lands, fully developed, and retired to his Philadelphia residence, "free from worldly care and avocations." It is a fact worthy of note that while actively engaged in secular business he diligently pursued his studies in ecclesiastical history and polemic theology. In 1864 he was arraigned by his Presbytery on the charge of "abandoning the ministry and engaging in a secular profession," and was suspended "until he should give evidence of repentance." The suspension was removed in a few days, as Dr. Westbrook signified his purpose to preach as opportunity might offer. After this he supplied a Presbyterian pulpit for a year, and at the same time pursued his law practice in New York City, refusing to accept any pecuniary compensation from the church, whereupon he was requested by the Presbytery to which the church belonged to receive some pecuniary compensation or surrender the charge, and he accepted the latter alternative, and in a short time (1866) voluntarily withdrew from the "ministry and communion of the Presbyterian Church," receiving a certificate of his good and regular standing, since which time he has maintained a position of ecclesiastical independence.

In 1870 Dr. Westbrook published a work on Marriage and Divorce; in 1882 he published a work entitled The Bible, Whence and What? and in 1884, a work entitled Man, Whence and Whither? He is now engaged upon a work of profound research relating to the origin of Christianity and Comparative Religions. In the preface of his work on the Bible he says "The writer is a firm believer in the existence and moral government of God, in the continuance of human life beyond the grave and in present and future rewards and punishments." His books, published by Lippincott, Philadelphia, have been very favorably noticed by the newspaper press generally, and extensively circulated, and are well known as able defenses of the essential principles of true religion and morality, while dissenting from some of the dogmas of the prevalent theology. The honorary degree of LL.D., was received by Dr. Westbrook from the Wagner Free Institute of Science January 1, 1885, of which institution he is trustee and treasurer.

He has recently established a Free Religious Lectureship, in Philadelphia—receiving no pecuniary compensation for his lectures and paying all incidental expenses out of his own pocket.

Dr. Westbrook was married when twenty-one years of age to Sarah H., third daughter of Judge John H. Hall, of New Jersey. Four children were born to them,—Nathan Bangs, John Hall, Charles Kingsbury and Caroline Armstrong, all of whom survive. The mother departed this life, November 16, 1882. The present wife of Dr. Westbrook was Henrietta Payne, M.D., eldest daughter of Rev. Ara Payne, of Rhode Island. She is a graduate of the Woman's Medical College of Pennsylvania, located in Philadelphia.

The Deckers were an early family in Delaware township. They were located along the river road both above and below Dingman's Ferry, but the largest settlement of Deckers was at a place called Deckertown, on Decker (now Hornbeck) Creek, where they had a fort during the wars. August 8, 1768, Broer Decker sold forty-three acres of land in Delaware township to Hendrikus Decker, being part of one hundred acres which Broer Decker had purchased of William Allen, June 16, 1768. The deed to Hendrikus Decker was acknowledged before John Van Campen, justice of the peace for Northampton County, in 1773. In 1763, Henry Decker was appointed constable of Upper Smithfield township. Hendrikus Decker lived just below the creek, and lost two sons in the Indian troubles, as has been elsewhere shown. The Deckers of Delaware township appear to have been squatters generally, and laboring men. They are among the pioneer settlers of Pike County. It is impossible to tell when they first crossed the Delaware, but it is probable that they were there as early, if not earlier, than Andrew Dingman. In the 1781 assessment of Delaware township Elias Decker, Cornelius Decker, Ezekiel Decker, John Decker, Henry Decker and Jacob Decker are assessed, and among the single freemen Ezekiel Decker, Abraham Decker and Isaac Decker are mentioned. In 1800 the names of Elisha, Benjamin, Samuel, Levi, Emanuel and Daniel Decker also appear. Notwithstanding there were so many of the name in Delaware township in its early history, they all disappeared years ago with the exception of Affe, daughter of Hendrikus, who married Garret Brodhead, a Revolutionary soldier. After the war he purchased one hundred and seventy-eight acres of land on the hills west of Dingman's Ferry, of David Litch, who had built a log cabin and made a small clearing. Mr. Brodhead added to this purchase and increased the clearing until in 1801 he is assessed with thirty acres of improved land and two hundred and seventy acres of unimproved land. Affe Decker, his wife, made her escape from her father's house, when her two brothers were killed, by jumping from the window and fleeing to Fort Decker. Garret Brodhead and his wife are buried in Delaware Cemetery. He died in 1835, aged seventy-nine, and Affe, his wife, in 1840, aged eighty. Nicholas Brodhead, his son, lived on the homestead, which is now in the possession of his son, David O. Brodhead, who cultivates the old farm. Garret Brodhead had two daughters—Hannah (wife of John Brown) and Cornelia (wife of Nathan Emery), who lived at Dingman's Ferry. The Deckers were large, tall men, who preferred border life to the comforts of civilization, and most of them went West. John Hecker contracted for a place of sixty-seven acres above Dingman's Ferry. He made a clearing and built a cabin, but being unable or disinclined to make payment, he traded his improvement to his brother-in-law for a barrel of whiskey, which shows the value some of the early settlers placed upon their possessions. The old grist-mill on Decker Creek was probably built by William Austin, a bachelor miller, as early as 1775. It was the oldest grist-mill in the vicinity and is assessed to John Frazier in 1800 at a valuation of three hundred dollars. It has long since fallen into decay and the site of the old mill is known only to a few persons. There was also an old saw-mill at the same place. John Frazier's children were John, Benjamin, Peter, Jane (wife of Isaac Van Gordon), Phœbe (wife of William C. Jagger), Betsey (wife of David Sayre) and William. Benjamin was county commissioner in 1844 and justice of the peace in Delaware township for twenty-two years. His son, John W. Frazier, owns the homestead and is justice of the peace in Delaware township now. Cornelius Angle came to Delaware township in 1823 and bought eight hundred acres of land of Nicholas Livengood. He was an enterprising man and the first of the Delaware farmers who raised his bread on the mountains. His sons Charles, Jacob, John and William all remained in the township. George W. Donaldson, a Scotchman, came from New York recently and purchased the old Angle homestead. He has expended a large sum in the erection of buildings, fences and in otherwise improving the property.

Jacob Angle recollects that Philip Reser had a large family of boys, none of whom remain. The same may be said of Henry Steele, with slight exception.

Cooper Jagger was an old settler on the hills, but his descendants are nearly all gone. The Deckers owned all the lands adjacent at one time, but never improved it. Elias Decker was an old Revolutionary soldier, and about ninety years of age when he died. One of his sons, Elisha, lived and died here; another son, John, did business in New York and lived to a great age. Abraham Courtright resided here years ago and some of his children are still in the township. Adam Bensley used to live in the neighborhood, his father having died here, and some of his descendants are still in the township. Gabriel Layton, who died recently, was justice of the peace, his brother, John Layton, having been superintendent of the schools of Pike County for nine years.

Jacob Hornbeck, a son of Joseph Hornbeck, lived on the river road in Delaware township, near the mouth of the Decker or Hornbeck Creek, where he had a tavern. He was a major in the militia and apparently a man of some influence in his day, being both a merchant and hotel-keeper. His daughter Maria was the wife of Oliver S. Dimmick, who kept a hotel a short time, then moved to Milford and from thence to Matamoras. Belinda Hornbeck was the wife of Martin W. Dingman and lived near Dingman's Ferry. Robert Hatton, an Englishman, came to Pike about 1810 and settled on the hills of Delaware township. He was noted for his wonderful stories, which were told with the utmost gravity and apparent candor. His wife lived to be one hundred and one years of age. He had two sons, James and Charles, county surveyor for twenty years, and knows more about Pike County land than any one else in it.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

PHILIP F. FULMER, M.D.

PHILIP F. FULMER, M.D., physician at Dingman's Ferry, Pike County, Pa., was born at Stewartsville, Warren County, N. J., June 19, 1830. He obtained his early education at the academy of his native place, and at the age of fifteen years entered Lafayette College, from which he was graduated in the class of '48. He began reading medicine with his uncle, Dr.

Philip F. Fulmer

William Wilson, of Bethlehem, Pa., after some preliminary study with Dr. James C. Kennedy, of Stewartsville; attended his first course of lectures at the New York Medical College, followed by two courses of lectures at the Pennsylvania University, and was graduated from the latter institution in the spring of 1853. The same year of his graduation in medicine, on account of his father's large business interests at home and in Pike County, Pa., Dr. Fulmer came to Fulmerville, Pike County, and managed the tannery and store of his father at Fulmerville until 1866, the time of the sale of the property. He began the practice of his profession upon his settlement at Fulmerville, which gradually extended until 1861, when he gave it his special attention. His field of practice rapidly increased; his quick perception, good judgment and correct diagnosis of disease made his name familiar throughout the country, and soon gave him reputable rank among the first in that part of the State. He has continued a successful practice since, adding annually to his already large field. In 1866 he bought the "Way-Side Inn" at Dingman's Ferry, then known as "Dingman's Choice Hotel," the only house for the accommodation of travelers in the place at that time. On May 25, 1865, Dr. Fulmer had married Miss Ella Bennitt, of Elmira, N. Y., a woman of culture and refinement. They took up their residence at Dingman's upon the purchase of the hotel, and built the present commodious and elegant "High Falls Hotel," which for many years has been a popular summer resort for people from New York, Philadelphia and other places, seeking rest, quiet and beautiful scenery on the Delaware. The "Way-Side Inn" was said to be one hundred and three years old when Dr. Fulmer made the purchase, and only capable of affording accommodations for a few people. He at once set about remodeling the building and beautifying the property, which, by making its value known to people seeking a home away from the busy scenes of city life, has done more to give Dingman's a wide name than had been done during its entire existence before. His hotel will accommodate some two hundred guests, and "stands in the centre of most of the wonderful and interesting natural features with which this region abounds. It may be safely stated that a radius of ten miles in any direction will embrace a greater variety of sublime and lovely scenic attractions than can be found elsewhere in the country in the same space. All about it the mountains give birth to brooks and rills that in their descent leap down in falls almost without number, and in shapes weird and lovely."—Editorial Correspondence, Home Journal.

Another newspaper, in speaking of the hotel and its proprietor, and of the attractions of the locality, says that "the High Falls Hotel, with a single exception, is the largest in the county; . . . that it will accommodate two hundred guests, is well supplied with clear spring water, has bathing-houses and boats in the river for the use of its guests;" . . . and adds that "the village has two mails daily, one from New York and the other from Philadelphia," while "during the season a line of special stages runs between Dingman's and Milford."

The same writer says:

"Trout and black bass fishing is fine. Trout-fishing in six mountain streams. The hunting in the neighborhood of the village is excellent, and game—during the hunting season—is taken in abundance. The principal streams near the town are Dingman's Creek, Adams' Brook, Conashaugh Brook, Tom's Creek, Bushkill Creek and the Raymondskill. The Dingman Creek is noted for its great natural beauty as well as its fine trout, which, though not so large as their Long Island kindred, are more in number, growing in weight as the fisherman wanders down the current, and leaping at his fly with a lusty mountain vigor—'a spring like the quiver of a sword blade.' The Adams' Brook, near by, is one of the most beautiful streams in the Delaware Valley.

"It is here that the lover of nature meets with the perpetual and delicious laughter of the waters, the picturesque, gloaming recesses, the thousand leaps and eddies, the rock-hung pools, the shady glens, and 'the forest-laced sunlight and shadow, where the bobolinks make music, and the grass is still spangled with dew.'

The walks and drives within a radius of ten miles are delightful, the principal walks being to the 'High Falls,' 'Tower Falls,' 'Soap Trough,' 'Suspension Cave,' 'Lookout Rock,' 'Fossil Hill,' 'Echo Glen,' 'Fathomless Cave,' 'Fairy Glen,' 'Emerald Cascade,' 'The Vestibule,' 'Maple Grove' and the 'High Knob.'

"The drives comprise 'Conashaugh Valley,' 'Raymondskill Falls,' 'Bridal Veil Falls,' 'Sawkill Falls,' 'Utter's Peak,' 'Indian Ladder,' 'Iris Grotto,' 'The Wild Gorge,' 'Silver Lake,' 'Fern Bank,' 'Hanging Rock' and 'Laughing Waters.' Silver Lake is a fine sheet of water about a mile and a half in length and well stocked with pickerel, perch and other gamy fish.

Reverting to the proprietor of the house, it may be said that since his residence in Pike Co., Dr. Fulmer has taken an active interest in all matters of importance relating to his immediate locality or the county. He was superintendent of the common schools of the county from 1857 to 1866, and has been a school director since the latter date. He was postmaster at Fulmerville from 1854 to 1866, and has been, for the past two years, one of the directors of the Northampton County Bank, at Easton, Pa.

His father, Judge John Fulmer, born in Richmond, Northampton County, Pa., in 1793, settled at Stewartsville, N. J., his present residence, soon after his marriage, where he carried on a store and tannery until 1858, and a tannery and store at Fulmerville until 1866. He is a man of large business capacity, was one of the incorporators of the old Phillipsburg Bank, and one of its directors for fifteen years. He was postmaster at Stewartsville from 1822 to 1861, an associate judge of the Warren County, N. J., courts for twenty-five years, one of the founders of the Stewartsville Academy and one of the founders of the Lutheran Church.

Dr. Fulmer's mother, Barbara Ann (1799–1882), was a daughter of Mathias Brakely, of Warren County, who was of German descent. The children of Judge Fulmer are Brakely, who was a merchant in the home store until his decease; Andrew J., a merchant at Stewartsville in the same store; John, deceased, assisted in conducting the business at Fulmerville; Dr. Philip F. Fulmer, subject of this sketch; William, a merchant at Bloomsburg, N. J.; Mary, widow of Jacob Strader, of Washington, N. J.; Emma, wife of David Clark, cashier of the Danville Bank, at Danville, Pa. Dr. Fulmer's parental grandfather, John Fulmer, came from Germany, and was a tanner and farmer in Richmond, where he settled and resided during his life.

Mrs. Dr. Fulmer's father, Wilson W. Bennitt (1801–1861), resided in Elmira, N. Y., and was the son of Platt Bennitt, a native of Connecticut, who settled at Elmira and was the founder of the first Episcopal Church at that place. Platt Bennitt's wife was a Wheeler, of Horseheads, N. Y. Wilson W. Bennitt's children are Frances, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., widow of the late Edward Hubbell, of Bath, N. Y.; Zibah, died in 1881, resided at St. Louis and was superintendent of the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad; Henry is a banker at Newbern, N. Y.; and Mrs. Dr. Fulmer.

Mrs. Dr. Fulmer's mother, Mary Tuttle (1806–1858), was a native of Elmira, N. Y., whose mother was a Cantine, a native of France, and whose father was an Englishman, who came from Long Island; was one of the first settlers at Elmira, was one of the first Masons there, and one of the founders of the first Presbyterian Church in that city. Dr. Fulmer's children are Frank, died at the age of five years at Richmond, Va.; Nana B. and Philip F. Fulmer, Jr.

CHAPTER IX.

LEHMAN TOWNSHIP.

LEHMAN TOWNSHIP was erected August 19, 1829, from Delaware. The most southern township in Pike County, it is bounded on the north by Delaware, on the east by New Jersey and the Delaware River, on the south by Middle Smithfield township, in Monroe County, and on the west by Porter township.

The physical features of Lehman are similar to those of Delaware, though the bluffs are not as precipitous and more broken and irregular. The falls are beautiful, particularly the Bushkill Falls, which are on the Little Bushkill, about two and one-half miles from the village of Bushkill. The first fall, which is in Rocky Glen, is about eight feet high. After flowing through the glen a distance of about two hundred and fifty feet it falls about six feet on a rock shelf or step about ten feet long, when it takes a perpendicular plunge of eighty feet into a circular basin, whose rocky sides are two hundred feet high, and flows onward through a deep gorge into the Big Bushkill. Josephine Compton, of Philadelphia, fell one hundred and eight feet from the rocks above these falls and recovered from her injuries. The Pell Falls are just above the Bushkill Falls. There are also three falls on Pond Run, which enters the Bushkill just below the falls. One of these falls has a perpendicular descent of one hundred feet over the rocks. There are also five falls on the Saw Creek, that runs through a beautiful gorge and enters the Big Bushkill about three miles above the village. Lehman is undoubtedly one of the oldest settlements in Pike County. The beautiful flat lands along the Delaware are very fertile and the Indians contended for them with vigor. There is hardly an old family from Dingman's Ferry to Bushkill that does not relate traditions of contests with the Indians in which some of the family have lost their lives or been taken prisoners. This region was settled about 1700, as near as can be ascertained. The village of Bushkill lies on both sides of the Bushkill River, and is almost inseparable in its history, although one part is in Pike County and the other in Monroe. The Monroe part is distinguished as Maple Grove. We shall review them together. William Courtright, John Teal, and an old man about eighty years of age, named Maginnis, were taken prisoners at Maple Grove by the Indians. Maginnis being feeble and unable to travel very fast, was killed and scalped a few miles west from Maple Grove, at a place still known as Maginnis' Barrens. Captain Hoover, with a small party of men, started in pursuit. They came to the spot where the Indians were encamped, at "Indians' Swamp," near the headwaters of the Bushkill. They were making preparations for supper when the pursuing party fired on them, killing two of their number and wounding a third. The two live Indians and wounded one escaped and Courtright and Teal were rescued. Courtright, however, was wounded by his friends when they fired on the Indians, so that he used crutches the remainder of his life. The settlers on the Pennsylvania side were more exposed than on the Jersey side, as the Indians who raided the Delaware Valley had their seat of power to the west, on the Susquehanna; as all between the Susquehanna and the Delaware was a wilderness, an Indian could skulk among the rocks or stand on the top of the bluffs and survey the valley below. He could see the farmers coming over from the Jersey side to harvest their grain or care for their stock, and easily attacking them unawares, would carry off men, women and children into barbarous captivity or kill them on the spot. The evening, when the farmers crossed the Delaware to milk their cows, was a favorite time for the savages to acomplish their work, after which they skulked away under cover of darkness over the pine and scrub-oak-covered hills of Pike County westward into the wilderness, where it would be unsafe for any white man to follow them. During the Indian troubles in 1854 stone houses or forts were erected, most of these forts being built on the Jersey side, although it appears that Fort Hyndshaw was on Pennsylvania ground. At the point of a little rise of ground not far from the Bushkill, about three-fourths of a mile from the Delaware, near a spring and near the present road, is an old cellar where was formerly a log fort recently torn down. The oldest inhabitants identify it as the site of Fort Hyndshaw. Some persons place this fort in Pahaquwarry, just across the river in New Jersey, but the reference in Pennsylvania Archives to Fort Hyndshaw favors the conclusion that it was in Smithfield township, on the Bushkill, as above indicated.

Bushkill Village.—Bushkill was first settled by the Gonzales or Gunsaulis, the Smiths, Schoonovers, and later the Hellers, Peterses and others. Manuel Gonzales, a Spaniard, lived in Bushkill as early as 1750, and perhaps earlier. He had two sons,—Manuel and Samuel. A Gonzales is buried at Wurtsboro', and is said to be the first white man buried in Orange County. His name was Manuel, that and Samuel being favorite names in the family.

Old Manuel Gonzales had seven daughters. Among them were Catharine (wife of John Turner) and Elizabeth, who was taken to Canada by the Indians when seven years old. She and her father were hunting for the horses just back of the Bushkill Church, on the Delaware flats. The Indians saw them and started in pursuit. Mr. Gonzales jumped into a washout near the river and was concealed, but little Lizzie ran in a different direction and was captured. They heard her scream when she was taken. The first night of their encampment they wished to kill her, but an old Indian said, "No, she was a smart little girl, and he would take care of her." They took her to Canada, where she lived for thirty-two years, and married an Indian chief, by whom she had two children, who died. An old man afterward came to Bushkill and remarked that if Gonzales would give him a mug of cider he would tell him where his daughter was. The man's description was so accurate that Mr. Gonzales and a neighbor went in search of her. They found her as described, but she did not wish to return. Although her husband and children were dead, she was with difficulty prevailed upon to abandon the life she had so long followed. She remembered that she had lived beside a large river, that a horse jumped over the fence and killed itself, and certain apples that she used to eat. She also remembered that her name was Lizzie, but she had forgotten her other name. She married Peter Quick, of Belvidere, after her return.

Manuel Gonzales married Betsy Overfield, and lived and died in Lehman. He had one son, Manuel, who married Sarah Courtright, and lived in Smithfield, a little below Bushkill. His children were Betsey (wife of Barney Decker, a farmer in Smithfield), Ann (wife of George Kintner), Margaret, Susan (wife of Martin Overfield), Sarah (wife of Jacob Cortright), Heister Gunsaulis (married Elizabeth Trach and lived near the homestead), William (married Mary Kirwan, and lived near the former), James and Samuel moved to New York, and Mary married Andrew Fritchee.

Samuel Gonzales married Elsie De Witt, moved from Bushkill to Smithfield and lived on a farm; Catharine was the wife of Jacob Miller, a farmer, who lived in Smithfield; Mary married John Shoemaker; Sarah was the wife of Henry Peters, a merchant in Bushkill. He was appointed postmaster in 1812. It is not certain that he was the first postmaster, but he was the earliest official remembered. Israel Bensley lived in the log house where Mrs. E. E. Peters' hotel now stands. That is also the old Manuel Gonzales place. Henry Peters was a son of Peter Peters, of Philadelphia. He was a merchant, hotel-keeper and postmaster until 1857. His widow resides with her children, and is in her ninetieth year. She possesses a retentive memory and has furnished the writer with most of the facts in relation to the Gonzales family.

Henry Peters' family all lived in Bushkill and vicinity and are among the most enterprising people of the place. The children were Elizabeth, Elsie G., Delinda, Charles R., Maria L., Catharine M., Samuel G. and Wm. N. Peters. Samuel G. Peters was appointed postmaster in 1857, and still holds the office. The store was first started by Henry Peters, Solomon Westbrook and William H. Nyce, under the firm-name of Peters, Westbrook & Nyce. After Westbrook and Nyce retired Henry M. La Bar succeeded as member of the firm. Mr. La Bar married Elsie G. Peters and was associate judge of Pike County one term. Charles R. Peters (now deceased) married Elizabeth E. Coolbaugh, the gifted daughter of Judge Moses Coolbaugh, and kept the hotel on the old Gonzales homestead site. Mrs. Peters and her sons now conduct one of the most attractive summer resorts in the Delaware Valley. Delinda was the wife of Colonel Henry S. Mott, of Milford.

Catharine M. Peters was the wife of Frank Eilenberger, a merchant in Bushkill. William N. Peters married a daughter of Judge Mackey and lives at Bushkill.

Eliza Gonzales was the wife of Melchior De Puy, a farmer in Smithfield. Manuel Gonzales (3d) married Susan De Puy, and lived in Smithfield. He had one son, Samuel, who died in the army. Susan Gonzales, the last of Samuel Gonzales' family, married Martin Mosier, a farmer in Smithfield.

George Peters, a brother of Henry Peters, married a daughter of Philip Miller. His sons are John, Daniel and Philip, who have fine residences in Maple Grove or Bushkill. Henry, Jane, Margaret, Delinda and Susan are the remaining children.

Rodolphus Schoonover married Hannah Hyndshaw, and lived just across the Bushkill, in Smithfield, where Charles Wallace now resides. He was one of the old pioneers and, like Gonzales, no one recalls the date of his arrival, though it was probably years before the Revolutionary War. His sons were Daniel, Benjamin, James and William. His daughters were Hannah, Dorothy, Sally, Susan and Mary. Daniel married Cornelia Swartwood, and lived on the old place. Their children were Barney, Franklin and Rima. Benjamin married Elizabeth Swartwood and lived in Smithfield. His children were Samuel, Simeon, William, John and George, Jane, Sarah and Hannah. James Schoonover married and settled in the vicinity. His children were Rachel, Mary, Cornelius, Daniel, Hyndshaw, Elijah, James, William and Rodolphus. Cornelius lived to be ninety years of age. William, of the original family, moved to Ohio. Sarah Schoonover was the wife of William Clark, a farmer in Smithfield. Their children were Hannah, Mary, Jane and Elizabeth, John Daniel and Robert, who settled near home. William Clark came from Kentucky, his sister riding all the way on horseback to visit him. She brought with her silverware and a little slave. He accepted the silverware, but refused the slave. Susan Schoonover was the wife of Simeon Swartwood, who lived and died in Lehman.

Old Rodolphus Schoonover had a grist-mill on the Bushkill, the oldest grist-mill in this vicinity. It was built before the Revolutionary War and received bullet-marks during that conflict which were to be seen years afterward. It had one run of stone. Henry Peters built a fulling-mill which was burned, when he erected the present Peters grist-mill.

Benjamin Schoonover built the first foundry on the Bushkill, in 1824. It was the earliest foundry between Lehigh and Newburgh. He cast plows, and obtained his own price for them, receiving eight and ten dollars for coarse, rough plows. He was also the first blacksmith. Simeon Schoonover, his son, succeeded him in the business and rebuilt the foundry twice after it burned. John M. Heller conducted the first wagon-shop. Afterward Simeon Schoonover built a wagon-shop in connection with the foundry. The earliest wagons made in the Minisink Valley had cumbersome felloes pinned together without any tire. Simon Heller and William Clark built the grist-mill now owned by Jacob H. Place, and William Place the hotel now owned by his son, H. J. Place.

John L. Swartwood erected the blacksmith and wheelwright-shop now occupied by his son-in-law, William B. Turn. Webb Wallace and Thomas Newman built the house now occupied by William Turn. Oren Sanford and Chauncy Dimmick built the fulling and carding-mill now occupied by Proctor. Adam Overpack had a tannery in Bushkill in 1812, and Frederick Vadican, from Connecticut, conducted a store at the same time. John Heller built a tannery on the little Bushkill, where upper leather is oak tanned. In 1880 Frank Denegri purchased the property, which is in full operation with twenty vats. Charles L. Heller says that his grandfather, Simon Heller, bought the property of his great-grandfather, whose name he thinks was John.

Simon Heller married Sarah Carpenter, their children being Sarah, wife of Simeon Schoonover, who lives in Maple Grove, and is nearly eighty years of age; Mary, wife of Samuel G. Schoonover; Amos Heller, who lived in Philadelphia; and Susan, who married Conrad Kinter and moved West. John Heller lived on the homestead; was justice of the peace for twenty-five years, county treasurer and associate judge of Pike County, and an honest business man. He built the tannery and carried on the business for many years. His wife was Julia A. Smith. His son, Mahlon G. Heller, resides in Fort Wayne, Indiana, and was twice a member of the Legislature; Amos Heller was killed by the cars; Charles L. Heller lives on the homestead, and is by trade a printer and harness-maker; Mary E. married Oliver Smith, and lives in Smithfield; Ella J. married G. O. Carmichael; Sarah E. married Webb Quick, who was a partner in the tannery when he died; John M. Heller, who had the first wheelwright-shop, afterward conducted a carriage-works in Milford, and later still in Port Jervis.

Of John M. Heller's children, George R. Heller, who lived in Milford, became associate judge, and Martin V. Heller is an Erie Railroad agent at Port Jervis; Ira B. N. Heller was a printer, a trade which he learned in the Milford Herald office.

David Smith lived in Lehman, was a lieutenant in the War of 1812, and a lieutenant-colonel of militia. He married Mary Stackhouse. His son, Jacob J. Smith, lives on the homestead, and is remarkably well-versed in the early history of Lehman. James S. Smith was sheriff of Pike County; Oliver Smith, a millwright, lives in Smithfield; Elenor was the wife of James Schuman.

Peter La Bar was an old settler in Bushkill. He was a weaver, kept two looms in his house, and wove cloths for the settlers. He had a large family, all of whom are dead.

Jeremiah Fleming lived near where the present bark-house now stands, and perished in a snow-storm about one mile from Bushkill.

John Heller kept the first log tavern where Mrs. E. E. Peters is now located, and was succeeded by Henry Peters. The first tavern-sign was a little brown jug hung up in the attic. Israel Bensley had this tavern for a short time. Joseph H. Place also has a hotel in Maple Grove. Samuel G. Peters succeeded his father in the mercantile business. Bushkill is an independent school district, including Maple Grove, in Middle Smithfield township. The building is located across the Bushkill, in Maple Grove.

Old Simeon Schoonover says "the first school that he can remember was on top of the Hog Back Hill, which is on Smithfield side. The school-house was made of logs, and one side of it tumbled down so that the sheep used to occupy it with us. They would take possession, and we had to drive them out. I think Jack Robison was teacher." There is a Dutch Reformed Church[1] in Bushkill, organized in connection with the church across the river, in 1737. The first church edifice erected for the congregation worshipping at Bushkill was in 1832 (the year of the great revival), the lot for which was given by Henry Peters. It was commenced in the spring of 1832, while the Rev. David Cushing was preaching, and completed in 1833. It is said to have been due to his efforts in no small degree that the house was completed. He assisted in cutting timber for the frame, on the church farm in Sandyston, and helped raft and run it down the river. Out of ninety dollars received at this point for his services, he subscribed fifty dollars towards the erection of the church. Its cost was a little over two thousand dollars. The building committee were Simeon Schoonover, John M. Heller and James Nyce. The new church is sixty feet long, with tower projection and pulpit recess seventy feet, and thirty eight feet wide. Henry M. Labar, John M. Swartwood and P. J. Guillot were building committee until the building was inclosed, and Jacob Nyce, William Schoonover and John Heller at the time of its completion. Cost of edifice, $5359.95. Dedicated January 13, 1874, by Rev. S. W. Mills, of Port Jervis, who preached the historical discourse in the morning, and Rev. E. P. Rogers, D.D., of New York, preached the dedicatory sermon in the afternoon.

Walpack Bend, Bushkill. — Walpack Bend, at Bushkill, on the dividing line between Monroe and Pike Counties, has never received that notice from the press which its merits deserve. Its curious conformation and natural beauties will, when fully known, make it a desirable point for summer tourists.

The Delaware River, rising in the State of [1] See church history of Delaware.

New York, runs nearly south until it strikes the Blue Range, at Carpenter's Point, near Port Jervis. Having no other course to take, the Delaware turns nearly at a right angle and runs along the base of the mountain in a westerly direction. The Blue Mountains, at this point, is nearly a solid mountain, but a small stream here starts out westerly, parallel to the Delaware River, and but a short distance from it. This stream, known as Flat Brook, increases in size as it flows on, until it appears to have worn a deep valley, dividing, as it were, the mountain into two different ranges. When the waters of the Delaware reach the village of Bushkill, in Pike County, it receives the waters of the Bushkill Creek, a large stream made up of various streams which run from the highlands of Pike and Monroe Counties.

Receiving then the waters of the Bushkill, the Delaware turns back on itself, as it were, and runs nearly east for some distance and there meets the waters of the Flat Brook, which has been paralleling it from Carpenter's Point, a distance of nearly thirty miles. In thus going north the Delaware runs along the south side of the northerly range of the mountains formed by the Flat Brook and known as Godfrey's Ridge. Then receiving the waters of the Flat Brook, the Delaware makes another short turn, and flows along the base of the main range of the Blue Mountains to the Delaware Water Gap, where it again turns to the south, flows through the well-known gap and passes on to the sea. The bend thus formed at Bushkill is known as Walpack Bend. From a point just above the village of Bushkill, a long-range rifle will throw its charge three times across the Delaware. The scenery about the Bend is beautiful, and the fishing for black bass is reported to be the best on the Delaware River. The summer tourists who patronize the summer resorts at Bushkill enjoy the beauties of the Bend; but what is wanted are large and commodious hotels or boarding-houses on the high points of Godfrey's Ridge in New Jersey, or on the corresponding highland on Hog Back, which is the euphonious name given to that same range in Monroe County. When this is done, Walpack Bend and its beauties will be known to, and enjoyed by, thousands who have never heard of it before.

Among the prominent men of New Jersey was John Cleves Symmes, who lived just across the Delaware from Bushkill in Revolutionary times. Under the new Constitution of New Jersey he was the first councilor. He was one of the County Committee of Safety that held a session at a court-house in New Jersey the 10th and 11th of August, 1775, about eleven months before the Declaration of Independence, and in the fall of 1776, Colonel John C. Symmes repaired with the battalion under his command and formed a part of the brigade of Colonel Jacob Ford. On the 14th of December in that year, while quartered at Chatham, charged with the duty of covering the retreat of Washington through New Jersey, Colonel Ford received intelligence that eight hundred British troops, commanded by General Leslie, had advanced to Springfield, four miles from Chatham, and ordered Colonel Symmes to proceed to Springfield and check the enemy, if possible. Accordingly, Colonel Symmes, with a detachment of the brigade, marched to that village and attacked the British in the evening. This was one of the first checks Leslie met with after leaving Elizabethtown, but others soon followed, and his further progress in that direction was effectually stopped. Colonel Symmes being soon after made one of the judges of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, his judicial duties compelled him to retire from the field. A few years after the independence of the United States was established Colonel Symmes removed to Ohio and became the pioneer settler on the Ohio between the Miami Rivers. Here, at North Bend, Judge Symmes laid out a town to be called the City of Symmes, but Cincinnati having been selected for the station of the government troops and location of Fort Washington, emigrants flocked thither on account of the protection afforded by the fort. Judge Symmes repurchased most of the land he had sold and abandoned the project of a city.

Soon after the organization of the Northwestern Territory, Judge Symmes was appointed (February 19, 1788) one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territory and attended the sittings of the court at Detroit and Marietta. In the year 1808 he built a large and costly house at Great Bend, which was destroyed by fire, the work of an incendiary, whose aspirations for the great office of justice of the peace the judge did not encourage. Colonel Symmes was educated to the law, but never practiced that profession. About 1760 he removed from Long Island to Walpack, Sussex County, N. J., where he became the owner of several hundred acres of choice land in Flatbrook Valley, including the present site of the village of Walpack Centre. In this neighborhood he erected a dwelling and planted an orchard. On the opposite side of Flat Brook he built a grist-mill on a mountain stream. In this secluded valley home, nestled between the mountains, Symmes brought his accomplished wife, Anna Livingston, whose father, William Livingston, became, in 1776, the patriot Governor of New Jersey. Sarah Van Brugh, another of Governor Livingston's daughters, became the wife of John Jay, president of the first Congress, Governor of New York and chief justice of the United States Supreme Court. Mrs. Symmes died July 25, 1776, and was buried in the old Shapanack burying-ground, but a few hundred yards from the banks of the Delaware, near the ruins of the old Shapanack Dutch Church, which was erected before the Revolution, being built of logs of an octagonal shape. On a plain marble slab which marks the spot is the following inscription :

"In Remembrance of
Mrs. Anna Symmes, who was born October, 1741, married to Honble Jno. C. Symmes 30th Oct., 1760, and died 25 July, 1776, leaving two daughters, Maria and Anna."

Maria married Major Peyton Short, of Kentucky, and Anna married William Henry Harrison, afterwards President of the United States. The following letter explains itself :

"BETHLEHEM, Pa., Aug. 14th, 1871.

"MY DEAR SIR :—Circumstances, partly beyond my control, have prevented an earlier reply to your letter relative to the graves of Mrs. John Cleves Symmes, in Shapanack, Sussex County, N. J., and I now have the pleasure to say that about 1851 my son Charles had his attention called to the unprotected condition of the grave by Miss Dinah Wynkoop, then a resident on the Dewitt farm. My son wrote to Mrs. Annie Harrison, one of the daughters of Mrs. Symmes, and widow of President Harrison, residing at Cleves, Ohio, who immediately authorized him to secure the title to the property and have a wall erected around the grave. My son, who resided at Easton, Pa., immediately communicated Mrs. Harrison's wishes to me and I had them carried out, except the purchase of title. About the same time Mrs. Harrison had Gustav Greenewold, an artist of Bethlehem, Pa., to visit the spot and make a painting of the place, which was done in a very handsome manner, and to the satisfaction of Mrs. Harrison. The painting was sent to her at her residence in Cleves, a short distance below Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Truly Yours, &c.,
"A. G. BRODHEAD.

"To Thomas G. Bunnell, Esq., Newton, N. J."

John Cleves Symmes died February 26, 1814, in the seventy-third year of his age, and was buried at North Bend. The Symmes family trace their descent from Rev. Zachariah Symmes, who was born at Canterbury, England, April 5, 1599, and came to New England in 1634, in the same ship with Ann Hutchinson and John Lathrop.

He became pastor of the church at Charlestown, Mass., which position he held until his death, February 4, 1671. His son William came with him to this country. He was a sea-captain, and died September 22, 1691, leaving a son Timothy, who was born in 1683. He was a farmer, and lived near Scituate, Mass. His son Timothy was educated for the ministry, having graduated at Harvard College in 1733. His first wife was Mary Cleves. In 1742 he went to River Head, Long Island, where his two sons,—John Cleves Symmes, the subject of the above sketch, and Timothy Symmes, who was an active man during the Revolution, and a judge,—were born. Timothy's son, John Cleves Symmes (2d), gained considerable notoriety by advancing the novel theory that the earth, like an eviscerated pumpkin, was hollow, that its interior was habitable, and that an orifice to enter this terrestrial ball would undoubtedly be found at the North Pole. This theory attracted great attention throughout the United States some forty years ago, more especially as a very eloquent lawyer, named Reynold, became a convert to Symmes' views, and made addresses in support of their soundness in all of the principal cities. Poor Symmes wearied out his existence in a vain effort to procure means for fitting an expedition to explore the under shell of the earth. He gained, however, more kicks than coppers, and only succeeded in furnishing the wags and wits of the land a theme to exercise their waggery upon. "Symmes' Hole" not only figured in the newspapers, but grog-shops bore it upon their signs, with various devices to illustrate it. One was the representation of a hollow watermelon with a tiny mouse peeping out of the orifice at its polar extremity to see if Symmes' expedition had come in sight.

William Custard settled on the river road, two miles north of Bushkill, in or about the year 1790, and bought of Ezekiel Schoonover and others. He was a farmer, his wife being Elizabeth Van Campen, a daughter of John Van Campen. His children were Benjamin, who lived in Smithfield; William, who lived on part of the homestead; Susanna, the wife of William Place, who built a hotel at Mellener's Cove, in 1838. It was formerly a great stopping-place for raftmen, as there is a wide eddy at this place. Mason Dimmick had a hotel here years ago. He was one of the first schoolteachers at Milford and Dingman's Ferry. He was also associate judge, county commissioner and justice of the peace for a number of years. He finally moved to Smithfield, and died there. His only daughter married Thomas Newman. The other children of William Custard were John V. Custard; Elizabeth, wife of John Hannas; Mason D. and Cyrus, twins, all of whom located in the vicinity of the homestead.

Jacobus Van Gordon owned land on the Pennsylvania side of the river during the Indian troubles, kept stock there and cultivated the farm. There was a fort on the Jersey side, opposite Van Camp's Mill Creek. We have documentary evidence as to the ownership of this land since 1742, which is as early as any of Allen's deeds to the settlers. William F. Allen patented all the Minisink lands in 1727, after it was known that they were settled; hence no documentary evidence in the form of deeds can give a clue as to the period when this region was first settled. It, however, indicates the owners at the times named in the deed. From parchment deeds in possession of Randall Van Gordon, we find that Daniel Van Campen and Aunchy, his wife, of Upper Smithfield, Northampton County, for five hundred pounds proclamation money of the State of Pennsylvania, sold to Cobus or James Van Gordon, of Delaware township, a piece of land containing "34 and ¾ acres and 36 square rods," being one-third of land sold by Jan Van Campen and Lena, his wife, deceased, to Abraham Van Campen, also deceased, lying between lands of Garrett Brink, now Isaac Van Campen and Houser Brink, except ten acres, reserved to Abraham Van Campen, the said grantor, said deed from Jan Van Campen and his wife, Lena, being confirmed to Abraham Van Campen in 1742. Jacobus Van Gordon purchased "one-fourth of an acre and twenty-one rods and a half of land," of Daniel Van Campen in 1775, and paid him seven pounds therefor. On a survey of lands to Jacobus Van Gordon in 1784, Van Camp's Mill Creek is mentioned, which indicates that the Van Campens were among the pioneer settlers in Lehman, and that they probably had mills and farms. A number of stories are told about the adventures of the Van Campens and Van Gordons with the Indians. One of the Van Campen boys was taken prisoner by the Indians, and a party started in pursuit. They overtook the savages one and a half miles beyond Porter's Lake, at a place called the "Indian Cabins," which are holes or caves under the rocks. There the Indians halted, camped all night and built a fire, making it a very comfortable place. About sunrise, when the pursuing party arrived at the foot log across the Bushkill, they saw a smoke at this camping-place. Soon they saw an Indian stir the fire, and shortly after another Indian came out, young Van Campen following, with his hands tied behind him. Two of the pursuing party fired, and the two Indians dropped dead. Young Van Campen ran in the direction of the smoke of the guns, while the rest of the Indians fled behind the hills. Old Jacobus Van Gordon had cattle and raised crops on the Pennsylvania side. He was the hero of many narrow escapes from Indians, and on one occasion was rescued while protecting the milk-maids after a fierce struggle.

In those troublesome times the garrisons were on the alert and easily aroused. Once the Indians captured Van Gordon's servant girl, but a pursuing party retook her. The tradition about a boat-load of laborers being shot, with the exception of one child, who was not killed, exists among the families here, the child having escaped by lying flat on its face. The boat floated over to the Jersey shore.[1] There is also the same tradition about several of the Deckers being killed, which doubtless refers to the battle of Conashaugh. Thus did the settlers from Cave Bank to Bushkill live in constant alarm when they cultivated their land or gathered their crops. True, there was Fort Hyndshaw on the Bushkill, and the forts across the Delaware, but it was comparatively safe for the Indians to carry off a defenseless milk-maid or shoot a reaper from some hiding-place in the rocks, an opportunity exercised so frequently that the inhabitants on the Pennsylvania side were nearly all driven across to New Jersey for security.

Jacobus Van Gordon's sons were Moses, Isaac, Abraham and David. His daughters were Susanna, wife of John Van Campen; Mary, wife of Peregrine Jones; Elizabeth, wife of John Henry. Solomon Rosecranse also married one of the daughters. Of these sons, Moses was the only one who remained in Lehman (then Delaware). He married Elizabeth Van Etten, and was a farmer. His children were John, who lived north of the homestead on the river road; James who settled south of the homestead in the old stone house, built by his grandfather. He was for many years justice of the peace. His son Randall had the place a number of years, but finally sold it to Henry C. Bowen and purchased the Delaware House, at Dingman's Ferry, of John Lattimore, where he now lives.

Elizabeth Van Gordon is the wife of James Brisco, who keeps the Half-Way House between Dingman's Ferry and Bushkill. Of James Van Gordon's children, Moses and John settled in Lehman.

Alexander Van Gordon lived in Lehman, where Dr. Linderman afterward resided, before 1800. His children were Benjamin, Joseph, Isaac P. Simeon and Mary. These children all moved to Butler County, Ohio, excepting Isaac P. and Mary. Isaac P. Van Gordon bought the Abram Steele property, in Delaware township, back of Dingman's Ferry, where he lived the life of a farmer. J. Wilson Van Gordon, one of his sons, was sheriff of Pike County one term. Hannah J. is the wife of Jacob Hornbeck, and Isaac W. Van Gordon is a farmer.

Genealogy of the Brodhead Family.—Daniel Brodhead, of Yorkshire, England, was the ancestor of the Brodheads of Pennsylvania. He was captain of grenadiers which were part of the forces which Colonel Richard Nicolls brought over in 1664 by authority of Charles II., King of England, against the Dutch.

After the capture of New Amsterdam (now New York), from the Dutch, in 1664, all the dependencies of the Dutch government, on the Hudson River, also surrendered to Colonel Nicolls. Captain Brodhead was commissioned September 14, 1665, "Chief Officer of the Militia in the Esopus," in Ulster County, where he settled with his wife, Ann Tye, also of Yorkshire. He died at Esopus, July 14, 1667, leaving three sons,—Daniel, Charles and Richard.

The son, Richard Brodhead, born in 1666, married a Miss Jansen, and settled at Marbletown, Ulster County, N. Y., about seven miles west of Esopus. His son Daniel, born April 20, 1693, and named after his grandfather, married Hester Wyngart, of Albany, and, about the year 1738, moved to Pennsylvania and purchased a farm on Brodhead's Creek (named for him), and on which is now located the borough of East Stroudsburg. He called his settlement Dansbury, and as such, it was known for many years. He was one of the first justices for Northampton County, established in 1752, and a son, Charles Brodhead, was on the first grand jury called for the new county. He and his sons were famous in their day as Indian fighters. He died at Bethlehem, Pa., July 22, 1755.

His son Daniel was a surveyor, was colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, on Continental Establishment, from the commencement of the War of Independence until 1781, when he was made colonel of the First Pennsylvania Regiment. From 1778 to 1781 he was, by appointment of General Washington, made commander of the Western Department, with headquarters at Fort Pitt (now Pittsburgh), and was honored by Congress with a vote of thanks for the skill and ability with which he managed his department. After the war he followed his profession as surveyor, and was also one of the State justices. Upon the adoption of the Constitution of Pennsylvania of 1789 and the establishment of the office of surveyor-general, he was made the first surveyor-general of the State, which office he held for several years. He died at Milford, Pa., in 1809, and is buried in the beautiful cemetery at that place, where a handsome monument details his services.

He had only one son, also named Daniel (by his first wife, Elizabeth De Pue), who was also an officer during the Revolution. He was sent to Virginia in 1779, in charge of the prisoners of General Burgoyne's army. He subsequently settled in Virginia and raised a family. Colonel James O. Brodhead, of St. Louis, Mo., who has achieved a national reputation, is a grandson of his.

Garret Brodhead, also a son of Daniel Brodhead, the first settler of the family in Pennsylvania, and a brother of General Brodhead, was a lieutenant in a New Jersey regiment, although a Pennsylvanian, during the Revolution. He married Jane Davis, of New York State, and settled on his father's farm (now East Stroudsburg), where he raised a large family, and died at Stroudsburg in 1804. His children were John, Daniel, Richard, George, Elizabeth (who married Dr. Francis J. Smith), Rachel (who married David Dills) and Samuel. One of his sons, Richard, who was born at Stroudsburg, July 26, 1771, and subsequently married Hannah Drake, of Stroudsburg, was the person who figured conspicuously during his life in the history of Wayne and Pike Counties. He was a man of splendid physique, over six feet high and of stern and serious character.

He took great interest in State affairs, regarding it as a conscientious duty, and he looked upon the civil and political duties of man as matters of serious obligation. When Wayne County was organized, in 1799, although not thirty years of age, he was appointed first sheriff of the county by the Governor of Pennsylvania. In a paper written by himself in November, 1842, he thus enumerates the offices he has held as follows:

1. Sheriff of Wayne. 2. Two years in the Legislature (1802 and 1803). 3. Eleven years associate judge. 4. Collector of United States revenue for Wayne County and Pike during the War of 1812. 5. Appointed State commissioner by Governor McKean, in connection with General Horn, of Easton, to investigate the expeditures of five thousand pounds, granted by the State to David Rittenhouse, to improve the navigation of the Delaware River from Trenton to Stockport. 6. Postmaster seven years. 7. Major of the Second Battalion, One Hundred and Third Regiment Militia. 8. Prothonotary for Pike County. 9. County commissioner. 10. All the township offices, of all kinds, except constable. 11. County auditor. 12. Executor of five estates. And I now, hereby, bid defiance to all heirs, legatees, creditors and others to prove that I have ever wronged any man.

Judge Brodhead, during the greater part of his life, resided on his farm, on the Delaware River, then called Wheat Plains, fourteen miles below Milford, (now owned by Charles Swartout), where he moved about 1791. He had a post-office established at his house called Delaware, which was kept on that spot for nearly half a century. A few years before his death Judge Brodhead moved to Milford, where he died November 11, 1843.

He left quite a large family, and all the sons became quite prominent citizens.

One son, Wm. Brodhead, who recently died in Milford, married Susan Coolbaugh, and was one of the best business men ever produced in Pike County. He was several years commissioner and judge of the courts, and as a land lawyer was probably equal to any lawyer in the State, although not a lawyer by profession. He was a man of sterling integrity, and lived late enough to be yet remembered by the people of the county, whose interests, when entrusted to him, he guarded so well.

Another son, Garret Brodhead, married Cornelia Dingman, daughter of Judge Dingman, and resided in Pike County on a farm near his father's, where he acted well his part as citizen and neighbor. He subsequently moved to Mauch Chunk, where he died.

He left four sons, all living in the Lehigh Valley and connected with the different coal and railroad interests.

One son, Albert G. Brodhead, Jr., is at present superintendent of the Beaver Meadow Division of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and has also been judge of the courts of Carbon County and State Senator from that county.

Another son of Judge Richard Brodhead, Charles Brodhead, married Mary Brown, of Stroudsburg, and located in the mercantile business at what is now called Brodheadsville, on the Easton and Wilkes Barre turnpike. He died young, but his establishment became the nucleus of a thriving and lovely little village. His son, Charles D. Brodhead, remained there in the mercantile business for many years, but later removed to Stroudsburg, where he is still actively engaged in business. He has been Representative, Senator, and is now one of the judges of Monroe County, elected without opposition, and highly esteemed by all.

Albert G. Brodhead, another son of Judge Richard Brodhead, was born at the old homestead, Wheat Plains, Lehman township, Pike County, (then Wayne), August 16, 1799. In 1823 he married Ellen Middagh, and removed to the village of Conyngham, in Luzerne County, Pa. He engaged largely in the mercantile and lumbering business, was elected four terms to the Legislature from Luzerne County, and during his residence there was probably as popular and respected a man as lived in the county. In 1838 he purchased the "Brodhead Homestead," at Wheat Plains, from his father, where he resided, universally respected, until 1865, when he removed to Bethlehem, Pa., where his only son, Charles Brodhead, resided, and still lives, a popular, representative citizen of character and influence. He is the owner of the Moravian Sun Inn, which was established in Bethlehem in 1758, the walls of which he has adorned with old and rare paintings.

Here he resided until July 18, 1880, when he peacefully passed away, and is buried in the Moravian Cemetery in that place.

Richard Brodhead, the youngest son of Judge Richard Brodhead, left Pike County in 1830, to study law with Hon. James M. Porter, then the leading lawyer of Eastern Pennsylvania. After he was admitted to the bar he entered actively in politics.

He was elected three successive terms to the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania by Northampton County. He was elected three successive terms to Congress, by the old Tenth District,—Northampton, Carbon, Monroe, Pike and Wayne,—and in 1850 was nominated and elected by the Democrats of the Pennsylvania Legislature to the United States Senate. He served six years with great acceptability to the business men of Pennsylvania, and with great credit to himself. He entered Congress poor; he served there for twelve years, and returned poor, but with a character for integrity, honesty and purity of purpose second to none. He was succeeded in the Senate by Gen. Simon Cameron.

In 1849 he married Jane Bradford, of Mississippi, a niece of Jefferson Davis. In 1856, after his retirement from the United States Senate, he lived a retired life at Easton, where he died in September 1863.

He left two children,—Richard, who is a lawyer in New York, and David, who studied law with the Hon. John B. Storm, of Stroudsburg, and is now located in South Bethlehem, Pa., where he is achieving an honorable and desirable reputation as an attorney and politician.

Of the other children of Judge Richard Brodhead, Sarah (the eldest), born 1791, married Col. John Westbrook, a member of Congress from Pennsylvania in 1841–43, and an influential citizen of Pike County, whose character and life-work are fully set forth elsewhere; Jane married Moses S. Brundage; Anna Maria married John Seaman; and Rachel married Dr. John J. Linderman, and became the mother of Dr. Henry R. Linderman, late director of the Philadelphia Mint, and of Dr. Garret B. Linderman, of Bethlehem, Pa.

Dr. John J. Linderman purchased the Alexander Van Gordon property shortly after he obtained his license to practice medicine, in 1817, built a house on the place which Father Stack, of the celebrated Stack vs. O'Hara case, now occupies, and practiced medicine for fifty years, being the first resident physician of Lehman township, and one of the best known physicians in Northeastern Pennsylvania. He was a great-grandson of Jacob Von Linderman, who settled in Orange County, N. Y., where he purchased a tract of land and a number of slaves, and built a substantial house after the manner of the German country houses of the time. His son Henry kept the homestead, and of his children, Oliver and Willet were lawyers, who both became judges, and Dr. John Jordan Linderman, who lived in Pike County as a neighbor to Judge Richard Brodhead, whose daughter Rachel he married. He was the only man who voted for Clay's election in Lehman township during the Polk and Clay Presidential contest, for which the Whigs of Easton presented him with a valuable double-barreled rifle, doubtless feeling that one who was able to stand alone in such a contest merited some kind of recognition.

Dr. Linderman had two sons,—Henry Richard Linderman and Garret Brodhead Linderman, who attended school at Dingman's Academy, near their home, from which they entered the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, where they both obtained their degree; there their father had studied before them. Dr. Henry R. Linderman returned to Lehman township, where he practiced medicine for a while, but his surroundings were not congenial, and in 1853 he wrote to a friend saying, "He was sick and tired of the vexations and toils of the medical profession." He was at this time in the mining region, being the only physician to a thousand miners and their families. His uncle, Richard Brodhead, who was then in the United States Senate, secured his appointment as chief clerk of the Mint at Philadelphia in 1855. While in this position, in 1856, he married the granddaughter of Samuel Holland, of Wilkes-Barre. In 1864 he resigned and entered a banking-firm as partner. April 1, 1867, he was commissioned director of the Mint by President Johnson. He was an active Democrat, and attended the convention that nominated Seymour and Blair, which led President Grant to request his resignation, in May, 1869. But it was found that he had made himself indispensable. Having been a devoted student, he had mastered the scientific and financial knowledge relating to his office, and was one of the best authorities in this country on coinage and kindred subjects; consequently, in 1870, he was sent as a commissioner to the Pacific Coast, and in 1871 to Europe as a commissioner to observe the methods of coinage at the different mints. In 1872 he wrote a treatise on the condition of the gold and silver markets of the world, and in it predicted the decline in the value of silver as compared to gold, which predictions have been fulfilled. He called attention to the disadvantages arising from the computation and quotation of exchange with Great Britain on the old complicated colonial basis, and from the undervaluation of foreign coins in computing the value of foreign invoices and laying and collecting duties at the United States Custom-House. He also recommended the adoption of a system of redemption for inferior coins. He was the author of the Coinage Act of 1873, and was again made director of the mints and Assay Office, with his office in Washington. After organizing the new bureau under the act, he projected the trade dollar, which was intended for circulation in China, in order to find an outlet for our large production of silver. In 1877 he published a book entitled "Money and Legal Tender in the United States." In his report of 1877 he presented an exhaustive review of the metallic standard, and of the capacity and production of the mines of the world. The Japanese offered him fifty thousand dollars for one year's services in organizing their mint, but owing to the climate and for other reasons, he refused it. Dr. Linderman's published opinions were received with favor in Europe, as well as in America. His desks were constantly covered with a mass of correspondence from all parts of the world asking for advice, information and instruction from him as a great authority. In person, Dr. Linderman was nearly six feet tall, of fine proportions and scholarly appearance, and possessed of a genial and polished address. He died in Washington in 1879, and is buried in Bethlehem. Dr. Garret B. Linderman removed to Bethlehem and married Lucy Evelyn, daughter of Asa Packer. He became wealthy and was interested in the development of the iron industry there, being one of the owners of the large blast furnaces at Bethlehem. A large and beautiful stone library building has been erected to the memory of Lucy Evelyn Packer Linderman, his wife, in connection with Lehigh University, which was founded by her father. Garret Linderman's sons are among the wealthy iron operators of Bethlehem.

Jacobus Hornbeck married a sister of Joseph Ennis, the old ferryman at Dingman's. Evart and William were his sons. Evart Hornbeck married Jane Van Auken, whose brother was shot by the Indians. He lived on the river road, in Lehman township, and is assessed with three hundred and fifty acres of improved land in 1801, which indicates that he was a farmer of some importance. His sons were Daniel, John G. and Jacob. Evart Hornbeck, a son of Jacob, is associate judge of Pike County, and a merchant at Dingman's Ferry. Margaret, Leah and Jane were the daughters of Evart Hornbeck, Sr.

Solomon Rosencrans lived on the hill and was a blacksmith and farmer. Rosencrans is said to signify "the wreath of roses," and Mr. Rosencrans was a good man for his day and generation. He married a Van Gordon, his children being James, John, Simeon, Sarah, wife of Cobus Van Gordon; Catharine, wife of Solomon Van Etten; and Hannah, wife of James Jagger. Hulda and Dorothea went West, Simeon Rosencrans married Mary Van Etten, and Daniel D. Rosencrans, their son, lives on the homestead. He was a commissary-sergeant in the Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, Company M, during the late war. Forty soldiers made a cavalry charge, at Tierce Point, into the streets of Hagerstown, Md., just after the battle of Gettysburg, and were all killed with the exception of fourteen, who were taken prisoners. One white horse escaped riderless and made its way to the battery. Rosencrans ran into an alley and tried to enter a barn, but seeing it was useless, surrendered. A drunken Confederate leveled his gun at him. Rosencrans expected to be shot, and says he was never in such fear in his life as when his own gun gleamed brightly in the rebel's hands. He exclaimed: "Just one moment; I call myself a man, and no man that is a man and a soldier will shoot a prisoner with his own gun." A rebel major that came up drew his sword and ordered the soldier to "drop that gun or he would run him through, for," said he, "that man is a brave soldier and shall be treated as a prisoner of war."

Bernard Swartwood lived south of "Egypt Mills." His sons were John, Simeon and Leander. John lived on the homestead, and his sons were Jacob, who lives in Falls township; Henry, of Pittston; John, of Smithfield; and Bernardus, who had the homestead, which his widow and children now occupy. The Swartwoods are an old family in Lehman. Part of John Nyce's property was first surveyed to Peter Swartwood in 1774, by him conveyed to William Dunshee, by him to James Swartwood the same year, and by him conveyed to Samuel Seely in 1794, from him to Nicholas Schoonover, and by him to John Cline in 1800, from Cline to Lodewick Lenders, in 1809 to Henry Decker, and in 1814 to John Nyce. The Swartwoudts (Blackwoods) were a Dutch family and noted for their great strength. The annals of Orange County, N. Y., and Sussex County, N. J., contain accounts of the Indian contests of this family. In the Delaware assessment in 1781, which then included Lehman, James, Thomas and Bernardus Swartwood are assessed. Charles Swartwood now lives on the old Brodhead place.

Peter Swartwood, who was one of the first settlers in Lehman township, afterwards moved to Wyoming, but fortunately was on a visit to Esopus at the time of the massacre. He did not return to Wyoming, but went to Cayuta Creek, in Chemung County, N. Y., where his former neighbors when he lived in Lehman, the Ennises, had gone before him. Mr. Swartwood lived to be ninety-nine years of age, and his second wife lived to be ninety-seven. He had eighteen children, and there were one hundred and forty of his descendants living when he died. One of his sons, William Swartwood, became a major-general of militia and a member of the Assembly of New York from Chemung County. Another son, Daniel B., was a member of the Assembly from Tompkins County, N. Y. One of the daughters, Rachel, married Jesse Barnes, son of Abram Barnes, of Lackawaxen. She is now living at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, aged eighty-six. Her son, Peter S. Barnes, is now register and recorder of Wayne County.

William Nyce made his first purchase in Lehman township (then Delaware), April 29, 1779, of Isaac Van Campen, for two thousand one hundred pounds. The first piece of land contained sixty-three acres, and the second twenty-five acres, and is mentioned as a part of the Garret Brink estate. Jacobus Van Gordon's land lies adjoining it. July 12, 1779, he purchased two hundred acres of James Beard at sheriff's sale. May 7, 1784, he purchased forty-three acres of Hendrick C. Courtright, being part of a tract which William Ennis and John Brink purchased in 1741, and which Courtright had secured in 1745, showing that Courtright had lived there for thirty-nine years. The Courtrights were among the pioneers of Lehman. Daniel, Benjamin, Henry, Abraham and Henry Courtright, Jr., are assessed in Delaware in 1781.

William Ennis was an old settler, and Lieutenant Ennis lost his life at the battle of Conashaugh.

The Brinks were also an old family both here in Lehman, where John Brink lived, and elsewhere in Pike. John and Benjamin Brink are assessed in Delaware in 1781.

William Nyce and his wife, Dorothy, sold two hundred and five acres of land, called Nyceburg, to Abraham Howell for three hundred pounds, September 3, 1795. This was probably a portion of his possessions in Lehman, for his sons, William, John and George, appear on the stage of action, and are assessed in 1800. He was of German origin, came to Lehman from Harmony, N. J., and probably returned to that place after he married his second wife. The spot where these three sons of William Nyce, Sr., located obtained the name of Egypt Mills from the grist-mill the Nyces had built, and it is not impossible that Isaac Van Campen had a grist-mill or some other mill before William Nyce came, for Van Camp's Mill Creek is mentioned in a survey to Jacobus Van Gordon, who lived adjoining this tract, in 1784. The extraordinary price of two thousand one hundred pounds for eighty-eight acres of land, in 1779, would seem to be a great price for land unless there was some improvement on it, but Continental money did not have a great purchasing value during those dark days nor afterwards.

"Egypt Mills" took its name from the grist-mill the Nyces built some time before 1800. Many years ago, when Pike County was almost a wilderness, this mill was one of the sole dependences of the "up river people" for bread, and particularly of those residing in and about Purdyville. These pioneer settlers had stated times at which to visit the mill, and would come to the place at regular intervals to purchase flour and meal, which they carried to their homes by means of pack-horses. In time they came to call this place "Egypt," from their knowledge of Bible history and the analogy between themselves and the brethren of Joseph. The mill has been rebuilt since that time and probably resembles but little the one it supplanted. A distillery once stood at or near these mills. The Nyces had a saw-mill and Captain Nyce invented the first carriage that went back by water-power in Pike County. They used to tread the carriage back previous to that.

William Nyce was assessed with a slave in 1800. He died a bachelor in 1819, his property going to his brothers, John and George, who were among the wealthiest men in Pike County at that time. They were members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and elders or members of the consistory. George Nyce's family moved away from Lehman a number of years ago. Daniel, the oldest son, went to New York. Jacob died young. William worked in the Mint in Philadelphia. Hannah Nyce became the wife of Rev. Robert Pitts, a Dutch Reformed minister. She is still living, at Stroudsburg. John Nyce remained in Lehman, and owned the fertile wheat land which is still in the hands of his descendants. It was for this, and similar lands along the Delaware, that the Minsi (or Monsey) Indians so earnestly contested years ago. John Nyce lived to be seventy-five years old, and was a devoted Christian man. During the latter years of his life, when they had no minister, he held meetings in school-houses and churches. He married Lena, a daughter of John Westbrook, who lived on the flats on the Jersey side. Westbrook owned slaves, and gave one to his daughter when she was married. Mr. Westbrook was a wealthy farmer, and gave his property to his two daughters, in equal portions, as long as they lived, with the remainder to the one that had children.

It so happened under this arrangement that Mrs. Nyce got all the property. John Nyce's children were Major John W. Nyce; Judge William H. Nyce; Mary, wife of Moses W. Coolbaugh; James, a bachelor, who was once county commissioner; Lydia, wife of Alfred Wells, of Middletown; Catharine, wife of Dr. John Morrison, of New York; George Nyce, who married Elizabeth, a daughter of William Place, and bought his Uncle George's farm; and Jacob Nyce, who married Linda, a daughter of George Peters, lived on the old homestead, operated the grist-mill and kept the post-office at one time. Both George Nyce and his brother Jacob were elders in the Reformed Church and good men.

Major John W. Nyce, the oldest son above mentioned, was born on the homestead farm at "Egypt Mills" July 23, 1794. After marriage he moved to Sandyston, just across the river in Sussex County, N. J., where he lived for many years. He later removed to Montague and resided there until his death, May 19, 1879. He was a farmer of quiet tastes, to whom the community looked with respect, strictly moral and temperate, and in all things desired to do right. For more than sixty years he was a member of the Reformed Church, and was ever willing to lend an assisting hand in the cause of Christianity. He was the father of ten children, among them Colonel John Nyce, who entered the army as a private and was promoted to the rank of second lieutenant, when he was wounded in the right arm, in consequence of which he was discharged. He re-enlisted, was a major in the Thirty-third Regiment, or Fourth "Pennsylvania Reserves," was severely wounded at the battle of Antietam and lay on the battle-field all night. The ball struck his arm near the former wound, passed through his right lung and struck his spine. He was made colonel of a regiment, sent to North Carolina, but did not see much service, and being mustered out August, 1865, returned to Pennsylvania, where he completed his law studies at Stroudsburg with Hon. Charlton Burnett. He built a fine residence in Milford, opposite the courthouse, and practiced law there until 1880, when he died from the effects of his wounds. He married Martha A. Allyn. His son, John W. Nyce, is cashier of the Stock Exchange Bank in Caldwell, Kansas. Dr. George Nyce, another son of John W. Nyce, is a practicing physician at Muncie, Ind.

Judge William N. Nyce married Margaret Westbrook, lived in New Jersey on the flats and had two hundred and fourteen acres of land, but engaged in the store-keeping and lumbering business, much to his detriment financially. He was twice a member of the New Jersey Legislature, and after his removal to Blooming Grove was an associate judge of Pike County. His son, Colonel John Nyce, of Hawley, is the oldest male member of the Nyce family now living. He was made a colonel of militia in a New Jersey regiment by Governor Pennington in 1843. His wife is a daughter of Judge Halsey, of Sussex County, N. J. He has been an elder in the Reformed and Presbyterian Churches for forty years. The Nyce family is one of the most prominent in the Delaware Valley. They were all strong Democrats, and in religion stanch members of the Dutch Reformed and Presbyterian Churches.

Levi Ladley, an old settler in Lehman, was a hunter and fisherman. He built on the hill where Etta Borland now lives. John Smith, a German, came to Lehman and bought a farm of Manuel Hoover in 1798. There was an old stone house on the place at that time.

He had seven sons, two of whom—Isaac and Lodowick—settled in Lehman. Jonathan Seely built a saw-mill on Pond Run, in Lehman, at an early day. Ladley lived in one of the old saw-mill houses. Daniel Smith is the first man who attempted farming on the hills of Lehman. Henry Bunnell now owns the property. The next farmer on the hills was John D. Lawrence, who commenced on the place now occupied by Wm. D. Courtright. John Henry lived above Brisco, on the hill in 1800. Boudwine Howey lived on the place now owned by Martin Overfield, in 1800. Benjamin Imson was an early settler in the woods, in the rear of Bushkill. John Litch lived back of Egypt, on the hills; his son William also lived and died in Lehman. Jacob Bensley resides on the hills of Lehman, and is a farmer and hunter. He says his great-grandfather was a German, who came to Smithfield about 1750, and his grandfather, Israel Bensley, was a native of the township. He rented the tavern stand of Henry Peters, who had bought of John Heller, and kept public-house in Bushkill for a time. He married Catharine Van Why. His only son, Adam Bensley, was a farmer and lumberman in Lehman. He married a daughter of Benjamin Imson. She had a brother, Robert Imson, who was an Indian doctor. His children were Jacob Bensley; Sarah, the wife of J. H. Jagger; Catharine resides on the Susquehanna; and Daniel, who lives in Lehman. Jacob Bensley has been a great hunter and killed many deer. The last buck he killed was only wounded by the first shot. He turned on his assailant, and being on a side-hill, gave him a severe battle before he and his dog succeeded in killing him. The deer had him down, when the dog annoyed him, and they soon worked down the hill, which afforded Bensley a chance to rise and load his gun. He then went down and shot the buck. He also had a severe fight with a panther about fifty years ago. One of Bensley's sons is commissioner of the county. John Burke, John Titman (who had many lawsuits), John Litch and George Steward were on the hills when Bensley came.

THE HERMIT OF LEHMAN.—Probably no history of Lehman township would be complete without some account of Austin Sheldon, that eccentric missionary Yankee, who lived alone in the woods on the hills, two or three miles back of "Egypt Mills." He was born in Connecticut and was one of a family of eight or ten children. There are two theories to account for his singular conduct. One was that he was agent for a book concern, unwittingly spent the money and never had the courage to return, and another that he lost his wife, for whom he sorely grieved, which drove him to a hermit's life. Whatever the cause of his eccentricities, he first appeared in this State, in Canaan township, among the hills or Moosic Mountains. When the settlers encroached, he left and went to Blooming Grove, where he remained a short time, and then removed to the hills of Lehman, where he purchased about seventy acres of Pike County scrub pine and scrub oak barrens, and erected a sort of cabin, where he dwelt for a number of years. Finally abandoning this cabin, he went farther into the woods, where he lived in a wretched hovel built against a rock. The roof was covered with pieces of bark, old carpet and flat stones. A large flat stone against the entrance answered for a door, and in one corner adjoining he built a fire on the ground, having a hole in the roof above for a flue. Here he lived and suffered the rigors of this northern climate. Some writer described him in romantic style for the Milford paper and the New York Sun. His sister saw the account, made her way to Pike County and to the cave of her long lost brother. On seeing him in this forlorn condition she wept bitterly, and, being a person of some means, urged his return with her. After much persuasion he finally assented and accompanied her to Connecticut. He had been absent a quarter of a century or more and his home surroundings appeared as strangely to him as did those of Rip Van Winkle after his long sleep.

Soon tiring of the comforts of civilization, he again returned to the wilds of Pike County, where the majestic rocks and murmuring waterfalls ministered calm to his disquiet spirit. He was a good blacksmith, and had an anvil beside his cabin, where he made butcher knives for the neighbors. He was a great reader, particularly of the Bible, advocated temperance, which he practiced himself, and became a religious enthusiast towards the end of his life. He was found one cold winter day in his cabin in a stupefied state, with his face somewhat scorched by the fire. He was taken to Tony Heater's, where he died at an advanced age, and was buried in Delaware Cemetery about the 1st of February, 1886.

Elijah Van Auken, a hunter, lives in the backwoods of Lehman. He is now eighty-three years of age.

The schools of Lehman are Hemlock Grove, Brodhead, Schuyler's, Meadow Brook, Pine Ridge, Barn Timber and Bushkill Independent District.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

HENRY M. LA BAR.

Henry M. La Bar died at Bushkill, Pa., in December, 1884, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. In order that the character and life-work of such a man should be properly recorded in the local annals of the period, it has been deemed appropriate to publish this brief outline of his career.

H. M. La Bar

He was a decendant of the old La Bar family, whose early history and identification with this locality are elsewhere recorded. His father was George La Bar, who married Sarah Jayne and occupied during his life-time the old Jayne place in Middle Smithfield. The children were Daniel, Isaac, Henry M., Charles, George, Margaret (who married Rev. S. C. Bacon, of the Methodist Episcopal Church), Anna (who married Jacob Bush, of Middle Smithfield) and Sarah (who married Dr. P. M. Bush, of the same place).

The early life of Judge La Bar was passed in the home-place and he enjoyed only a common-school education. When quite young he engaged in school-teaching in Montgomery township, Sussex County, N. J., and subsequently clerked in the store of Solomon Westbrook, at Dingman's Ferry, Pike County, Pa., for several years. Later on he filled a similar position in the store of William Nyce, at Bushkill, and then bought him out and the firm of Henry Peters & La Bar was organized. He engaged in trade at Bushkill for about thirty years. During the same period he followed lumbering and got out ship-timber, hoop-poles and staves for the market. In connection with Henry Peters he also carried on the milling and store business at Marshall's Creek for a time. He acquired a large property by exercise of industry, integrity and economy, and enjoyed a good reputation among his neighbors. At the time of his death he owned about fifteen hundred acres of land. He was a member for many years of the Reformed Dutch Church of Bushkill, and in politics a Democrat. He was elected to serve on the bench as one of the lay judges of the county for several terms, and served his constituency with fidelity and ability. On May 15, 1838, he married Elsie G., daughter of Henry Peters, of Bushkill, who survives him. Few men have enjoyed a more enviable reputation in Pike County than Judge La Bar, and he has gone to his fathers with a name honored and respected by all.

CHARLES R. PETERS.

CHARLES RIDGWAY PETERS.

Charles Ridgway Peters, born February 12, 1822, died December 2, 1867, was a grandson of Peter Peters, who emigrated to this country from Holland about the period of the Revolution, in connection with two brothers, Henry and John, and landing at Philadelphia, resided for a number of years at Chestnut Hill, near that city. He was a miller by trade and finally worked his way up to Easton and Stroudsburg, Pa., pursuing his vocation all the time, and closed his days in the latter place. His son Henry was born near Philadelphia in September, 1787, and died March 2, 1857. On January 16, 1814, he married Sarah Gunsaules, of Middle Smithfield, born July 23, 1794, and still living, and soon after bought a large lumber tract of Judge John Coolbaugh and Mr. Van Horn (of Easton), including most of the present site of Bushkill, Pa., and located in a humble dwelling-house thereon. For many years he engaged in lumbering and rafting, also in the milling and mercantile business at Bushkill, of which he was the virtual founder. He was the first postmaster and the office has always remained in the family. His primitive dwelling was a log-house, containing one window with four window-lights, and there he established a sort of public-house for the entertainment of travelers, the first of its kind in the locality. The house was torn down after standing over one hundred years, and occupied a portion of the present site of the residence of Mrs. Chas. R. Peters. The public house was kept by Henry Peters for many years and was carried on by his son at a later period. He was a man of character and standing, just and exact in all his dealings and industrious and economical in his habits. His children were Elizabeth (1814–58); Elsie (1817), widow of Henry M. La Bar; Delinda P. (1819–71), who married Henry S. Mott, of Milford; Charles R.; Maria Louisa; Catharine Miller; Samuel G. and Wm. Nyce. The latter two are engaged in trade at Bushkill.

Charles R. Peters engaged in farming and hotel-keeping at Bushkill during the whole of his life. He was a Democrat in politics, active in church work, but no aspirant after public place. He was generally respected and esteemed for his integrity and uprightness of character. He married, February 4, 1852, Elizabeth E., daughter of John Coolbaugh, and left three sons,—Edwin F., Harry and Van,—who reside at Bushkill. That pleasant summer-resort, with its attractive homes and picturesque surroundings, is owned almost entirely by the descendants of Henry Peters, who so early came out into what was then a wild region and identified himself with its development. The aged mother of the family is still the central figure around whom clusters much of the interest of the place.

CHAPTER X.

PALMYRA TOWNSHIP.

Palmyra is one of the townships erected at the time of the organization of Wayne County, in 1798. Palmyra when first formed was bounded north by Damascus, east by the "Hilborn road," which was the west boundary of Lackawaxen, south by the township of Delaware and west by Canaan. The erection of Dyberry, in 1803, took five miles in breadth from the northern end of Palmyra, and by the formation of Pike County, in 1814, all that part of the township east of the Wallenpaupack was included in Pike and became Palmyra. That portion of Salem township lying east of the South Branch of the Wallenpaupack was assessed as Salem in Pike in 1815, but subsequently became a part of Palmyra, together with a slice from the western part of Delaware township. Thus when Greene township was erected, in 1829, it was taken from Palmyra. The present township of Palmyra is bounded on the north by Lackawaxen township, on the east by Blooming Grove township, on the south by Greene township, and on the southwest by the Wallenpaupack River and the townships of Paupack and Palmyra, in Wayne County. The Wallenpaupack has a slow current through the flats and formerly retained the waters a long time. In case of a freshet or flood, the stream would attain high-water mark on the flats thirty-six hours earlier than at Wilsonville, only six miles distant on an air line. From Ledgedale to Wilsonville, a distance of twelve miles, the stream is very sluggish. The Indians aptly named it "Deadwaters." In 1831–32 the people were stricken with fever, and but two well persons were to be found in the settlement. The inhabitants attributed the sickness to want of drainage, and asked aid from the State. An appropriation of three thousand dollars was accordingly made to be used in straightening the stream, Enos Woodward, Otto Kimble and Moses Killam being appointed commissioners to look after the expenditure of the money. The stream was shortened about four or five miles and several large rocks removed at Wilsonville, besides lowering the bed of the stream about two feet for one or two hundred feet near the bridge, giving the waters free vent.

WALLENPAUPACK SETTLEMENT. — Some time between 1750 and 1760 a family named Carter settled upon the Wallenpaupack Creek. This is supposed to have been the first white family who visited the neighborhood. The old Indian path from Cochecton to Wyoming crossed the Wallenpaupack about thirty rods below Carter's house. When the emigrants from Connecticut reached the Wallenpaupack, the chimney of the house and stone oven were still standing. Carter and his family had been killed and his house burned during the French and Indian War. When the first Wyoming emigrants from Connecticut reached the Wallenpaupack they halted and sent forward scouts to procure intelligence of the country along the Susquehanna. They took the old Indian trail across the Wallenpaupack, near the Marshall Purdy place, thence through what is now Paupack and Salem townships, westward still through Cobb's Gap to the Lackawanna Valley, and thus on to the Susquehanna River. They encamped at Cobb Mountain, built a beacon-fire that could be readily seen by those whom they had left behind on the Wallenpaupack, but their return is doubtful.

The names of the original Wallenpaupack colony were Uriah Chapman, Esq., Capt. Zebulon Parrish, Capt. Eliab Varnum, Nathaniel Gates, Zadock Killam, Ephraim Killam, Jacob Kimble, Enos Woodward, Isaac Parrish, John Killam, Hezekiah Bingham, John Ansley, Elijah Witters, John Pellet, Sr., John Pellet, Jr., Abel Kimble, Walter Kimble, Joshua Varnum, Amos Parks, Silas Parks, David Gates, Jonathan Haskell, William Pellet, Charles Forsyth, Roger Clark, James Dye, Nathaniel Washburn, James Hallett, Jasper Edwards, Reuben Jones, a man named Strong (probably the same man that lived at Little Meadows and was killed there by the Indians) and Mr. Frey, who was the school-teacher for the settlement. Of these, the first seventeen returned after the close of the Revolutionary War. Of the last thirteen named, but two or three returned to the settlement, a few of them having returned to Connecticut. Joshua Varnum was killed during the war; Dr. Amos Parks moved to Goshen, Orange County, N. Y.; Jonathan Haskell was killed at the battle of Minisink, in 1779; Jasper Edwards, Stephen Parrish and Reuben Jones were taken prisoners by the Indians. Reuben Jones was a powerful man and a good runner. He challenged the Indians to run a race one day, outstripped them, and thus made his escape and settled in Paupack, Wayne County, where he died in 1812.

Between the years 1774 and 1778 the following persons were added to the settlement: Ephraim Kimble, Jeptha Killam, Stephen Parrish (afterwards an Indian doctor), Uriah Chapman, Jr.,Silas Killam, Joseph Washburn, Stephen Kimble and Jesper Parrish. The several persons named, with their families, constituted the Wallenpaupack settlement from 1774 to 1778. The settlers laid off two townships, the one in which they were all included being named Lackaway, and the one farther up the Paupack, Bozrah. A warrant was issued from the proprietary office November 25, 1748, under which a tract of land upon the Wallenpaupack Creek, containing twelve thousand one hundred and fifty acres was surveyed, 14th of October, 1751, "for the use of the proprietaries of Pennsylvania," called "The Wallenpaupack Manor." February 21, 1793, this manor was conveyed to Hon. James Wilson, who gave a mortgage to John Penn the elder and John Penn the younger, the vendors. In 1804 the mortgage was foreclosed, and Samuel Sitgreaves, of Easton, purchased the land in trust for the Penn heirs. All the Wallenpaupack settlement was on this manor, and the first valid titles obtained by these settlers were from Sitgreaves. When the settlers first came, in 1774, they surveyed the land and fixed the boundaries of each settler's portion by mutual agreement. These surveys were carefully made and the boundaries well defined and the lots numbered. These boundaries became fixed and are those by which the lots are known and described to this day. The Wallenpaupack settlement seems to have been made very independently. They did not derive any title from Connecticut, although it is probable the Connecticut claim led them to this country. They took no pains to obtain any titles from Pennsylvania and purchased no title from the Indians, but simply proceeded on the old theory that title is acquired by the first occupant. They found the beautiful Paupack flats, with a small Indian clearing, and here they located. Miner says: "The most perfect equality existed throughout the settlement as to rights, privileges and property. The lands were disposed of, it is believed, by lot. The title of each man to his land was the consent, and the proof of this title was the memory of his neighbors. Until 1804, when land was purchased at sheriff's sale by Mr. Sitgreaves, no deed had been held by an occupant for a single acre." The Dutch settlers in the Minisink were assessed in Northampton County, but the Wallenpaupack settlement at Cushutunk, on the Delaware, and the straggling settlements in what is now Wayne County, do not appear to have been assessed by any Pennsylvania authority until Wayne County was set off, in 1798. The Wallenpaupack settlers established their own civil, military and ecclesiastical form of government. Silas Parks was chosen first justice of the peace. It is supposed he had a commission from Connecticut; but it was discovered that he played cards, which intelligence was immediately forwarded to Connecticut and he was superseded by Uriah Chapman. John Killam was elected constable by the settlers and Captain Zebulon Parrish made tithingman or tax-gatherer. Captain Eliab Varnum had command of the troops of the colony; Jonathan Haskell was lieutenant and Elijah Witters ensign.

As soon as the settlers had determined to locate permanently, they built a fort. It was of hewed timber, thick enough to be proof against the bullets of the Indians. These timbers were placed upright in deep ditches, well filled in and firmly secured. The inclosure contained about one acre of land, on which was a never-failing spring of water, now led out to the road at the Calvin Pellet place, on the corner where the East and West or Salem road and the River or Sterling road cross. This noble spring will ever exist to identify the place.

Within the fort was a block-house, on the top of which was a bullet-proof sentry box. A guard-house was also built just outside the inclosure. When trouble was anticipated with the Indians, the people with their families spent their nights in the fort. The men went in gangs to plant, hoe and cultivate each other's fields, with their guns slung over their backs. The settlers built cabins, made clearings and lived peaceably among themselves and with their neighbors, the Indians, for two years. "The population was generally composed of Presbyterians.[1] On the Sabbath the whole settlement was collected together, when a sermon was read. The observance of the Lord's day was rigidly enforced, and the morality and decorum of the settlers carefully insisted upon."

There was a saw-mill on Kimble Brook, about one and one-half miles from the fort. This mill was built very early (between 1774 and 1779), probably by Jacob Kimble, Sr., or his son Abel. The old mill was burned by the Indians in 1779, and one hundred years afterwards Joseph Atkinson had a saw-mill burned on the same site, not far from Marcus Killam's residence. After the settlers returned they built a saw-mill and a little tub grist-mill, which was the oldest mill in the settlement and the first grist-mill in the vicinity, with the exception of the mill at Wilsonville. It had one run of native stone, procured from a ledge up the Paupack, on the Wayne County side, in Dreher, according to Ephraim Killam; but old Thomas Bartleson claimed he helped Abel Kimble get the stone on Cobb Mountain. Both may be correct, having reference to different times. Abel Kimble died January 6, 1832, aged seventy-seven, and his wife Sybil, who was a daughter of Uriah Chapman, May 21, 1827, aged ninety. During the years 1777 and 1778, the settlers upon the Wallenpaupack were harassed by Indians and Tories, who had their headquarters at Cochecton. Brant had given orders to the Indians under his control not to molest the Wallenpaupack settlement. In 1777 Mary Gates, a daughter of Nathaniel Gates, discovered a body of men lurking in the swamp near the Wallenpaupack River, as she was looking for the cows. She notified Lieutenant Haskell, who collected the force of the settlement and succeeded in capturing the whole body of Tories, who had deserted from the American army. He conducted his eighteen prisoners to Hartford, Conn., where they were confined.

On the 3d of July, 1778, the battle of Wyoming occurred, and either Hammond or Stanton notified the settlers on the Wallenpaupack. All was consternation in the settlement and preparations were hastily made for immediate flight. Before sunset on the 4th of July, 1778, the Wallenpaupack settlers were on their way to the Delaware River.[2]

Captain Zebulon Parrish, his son Jasper and Stephen Kimble were captured by some Tories and Indians, who took them to the State of New York and kept them prisoners until the close of the Revolutionary War. Kimble died while imprisoned, and the elder Parrish returned to his family. Jasper Parrish married an Indian wife and was employed by the government as an interpreter among the Indians near Canandaigua, where he lived. Stephen Parrish, Jr., who was captured with Jones and Edwards, learned the mysteries of the Indian "Medicine Man," and on his return to the settlement practiced their healing art, and was known as "Doctor" Parrish. He left the settlement in 1818, and died near Canandaigua.

Many of the young men had enlisted in the American army. Ephraim Killam, son of Zadock Killam, and Abel Kimble, son of Jacob Kimble, Sr., were in the battle that led to the retreat of General Washington from Long Island.

"In August, 1778, four young men—John Rellet, Jr., Walter Kimble, Charles Forsythe and Uriah Chapman, Jr.—returned to the Wallenpaupack for the purpose of cutting hay. They commenced on the upper end of the settlement and had cut all the hay except that on the farm of Uriah Chapman, whose place was the lowest down the creek. One afternoon

[1] In this account we have followed Miner, but the early Connecticut settlers were Congregationalists, although they were the founders of the Presbyterian Churches in Northeastern Pennsylvania.

[2] See Chapter VII. of the General History.

young Chapman went to a neighboring spring for water. Stopping for a moment on the way, he sat whistling on the fence, when an Indian rose and fired at him. He sprang toward a sled near him, where the young men had left their guns, and on attempting to raise a gun, discovered that he was wounded. The gun dropped from his hand, when he ran for the fort, which was still standing, reaching it toward night. The ball had passed through his right arm into his shoulder, and fifty-one years afterward, on his death, it was found lodged against his spine. The Indians immediately seized the guns, and the other young men, who had heard the firing, ran to the fort. They were not attacked that night, and the next day left the settlement."

In the spring of 1779 five young men went back to the settlement to make maple sugar. Their names were Ephraim Killam, Jeptha Killam, Silas Killam, Ephraim Kimble and Walter Kimble. They stopped in one of the log houses about one-half mile southwest of the fort, which had been burned. The place is still marked by a mound made by the stones of the old chimney. They tapped the maple-trees and fitted up the house for temporary use. One evening Silas Killam and Walter Kimble were out of the house. As young Killam was proceeding leisurely along with two buckets of sap strung on a neck-yoke, a party of Indians, who lay in ambush, sprang across his path, with the evident intention of capturing him. He dropped his buckets of sap and started for the log house. The Indians gave chase, but young Killam outdistanced them. As his brother Ephraim opened the door to receive him into the house an Indian fired at him. The ball struck the head of a nail in the door-post. Some of the pieces wounded Ephraim in the arm. Walter Kimble, another young man, who was shooting ducks, seeing the Indians had cut off all hope of reaching the house in safety, started for the Delaware River. He was a tall, athletic man, and outran his pursuers, who followed him for some distance. He wore a pair of loose shoes, which he cast off, took a pair of Indian leggins and bound them around his feet, and in this way traveled all night in the snow, which melted as it fell. The next morning, about breakfast-time, he arrived at the house of his brother Abel, at a place called Vantyne Kill, a mile above Milford, in a pitiable plight. He had not eaten a morsel for more than twenty-four hours, and exclaimed as he entered the house, with tears in his eyes, "The boys are all dead!" The boys were not dead, however. Immediately after the Indians had driven Killam into the house, they built a fire near the barn and settled down for a regular siege. One of the Indians exposed himself while gathering wood and was wounded in the hip by Ephraim Kimble. It is said that the Indian afterwards died of this wound. When all was still and the Indians were quiet these four young men slipped out of the house and started for the Delaware River, which they crossed the next morning at Carpenter's Point. Ephraim Kimble afterwards located at what is now Kimble Station, Lackawaxen township, and his brother Walter died in Ohio. Moses Kimble, Sr., was in the battle of Lackawaxen, or Minisink, July 22, 1779. He blamed the officers for forcing the men into the unequal contest, as Brant's forces consisted of four or five hundred Indians and Tories; but he expressed the opinion that had the stone breast-works been thrown up earlier, the fortunes of the day might have been different. The Wallenpaupack settlers made no more attempts to return to the settlement until after the War of the Revolution had closed.

The following letter from Captain James Bonnel to Captain Westfall shows the condition of affairs in 1782, just before the settlers returned to the settlement:

"MINISINK, 31 August, 1782.

"Dear Sir:—

"I am exceeding happy to inform you that my scouts, which returned last evening and this morning from Sheholah, Bluminggrove and Laqueway, have made no discoveries of any savages or other Enemies. They inform me, that there is fourteen Houses Standing at Laqueway,[1] and that the grass and weeds have grown through the cracks of the Flour, and that they are confident from the appearance of things that there has not been any Enemy there this Summer. Pray let me know if you have heard anything from Colo. Wisenfelts or if you have made any late discoveries of the Enemy.

"I am Sir
"your most obedient
"Humble Servant
"CAPT. WESTFALL. "JAMES BONNEL."

[1] Laqueway or Lackaway was the Wallenpaupack settlement.

Such, then, was the condition of things when seventeen of the original settlers returned to the Wallenpaupack in 1783. Fourteen log houses were standing with the grass and weeds growing through the cracks in the floors, and the meadows were growing with scrub oak and pine. What a forlorn and dismal look the old settlement must have presented to the hardy pioneers as they returned to their desolate hearthstones to begin anew life's battle for existence.

They were a stalwart race of men and women, however, and with stout hearts commenced the work of improvement again. With less of danger to encounter than attended their first residence, they suffered many more hardships. The year of their return the corn crop failed, generally, and the little raised was pounded into a shape fit for use in mortars constructed of pieces of wood. The flour used in the settlement was carried on the backs of the inhabitants from Milford. The winter of 1783–84, was a severe one; the snow was very deep during most of the winter, and the only mode of getting to and from Milford was upon snowshoes. From this time forward the Wallenpaupack settlement was prosperous.

The Wallenpaupack Manor extends from near Wilsonville to within one-quarter of a mile of Ledgedale, the larger portion of which lies in Pike County. During a number of years the occupation of the people was farming. The beautiful flat land along the Wallenpaupack produced grain and luxuriant grass for cattle, and in a few years there was a demand for pine lumber along the Delaware, from Easton to Philadelphia. There was good pine along the Wallenpaupack and Lackawaxen Rivers. The settlers manufactured this into lumber and floated it down the Lackawaxen and Delaware Rivers to market in some cases; in others they ran the logs to the mills below. In this way the Wallenpaupack settlers became comparatively wealthy. They were generous, hospitable and honest, but a change came over the settlement. On their arrival they were Congregationalists of the old Puritan school, and strict in their adherence to religious worship and Sabbath observance; but the demoralization of war for eight years during the Revolution must have been great, especially among the young men.

This was not the only difficulty in this settlement. The people became divided in religious matters. Gideon Draper and some other Methodist preachers passed through in 1807, and made it their principal object to proselyte Abner Chapman, Esq., from the Congregationalists in Wallenpaupack, as it had been their principal object to proselyte Major Woodbridge from the same church in Salem; and from the manner in which Gideon Draper gloated over these conquests years afterward, as preserved in Peck's "History of Early Methodism," one would suppose it more important to proselyte one member from a sister church than to turn ten sinners from the error of their ways to repentance. He succeeded in organizing a small Methodist class. Hezekiah Bingham, Sr., Hezekiah Bingham, Jr., and Nancy Pellet helped organize the Salem and Palmyra Congregational Church in 1808. Rev. Mr. Purdy, a Baptist, of Purdy settlement, occasionally preached in Paupack. Last of all, an infidel moved into the place and circulated skeptical books among the settlers. The result of it all is that there is no church edifice in Palmyra township to this day, and but few church members. The Methodists have an appointment once in two weeks at a school-house in the old settlement. Rev. Benjamin Killam is said to have been an excellent man, and at one time the Methodists had a well-organized class in the place. Mr. Kincaid was one of the old schoolteachers and Ralph Waldo another.

There are now five schools in the township. The old school-house in which P. G. Goodrich taught was near Guerdon Pellet's house. He also taught in Paupack a number of years and formed a very high opinion of the people. He says, in his "History of Wayne County," "In doing justice to the memory of those old settlers we could write scores of pages. They and their children have passed over the river, and we, standing on its brink, aged seventy-six years (he is now nearly eighty-two years), cannot but look back with admiration of that noble people."

Uriah Chapman settled at Blooming Grove

and kept a tavern. He had a numerous family, all of whom are gone.

Ephraim Killam married a daughter of John Ansley. His family were men and women of intelligence. He had but one son, Ira, who married a daughter of Roswell Chapman. Ephraim Killam was a well-informed man and scouted the idea of civilizing the Indians. "Why," he used to say, "an Indian is just as much a wild man as a wolf is a wild dog; you cannot tame him."

Moses Kellam, or Killam, son of Zadock Killam, married and settled in Paupack settlement, Palmyra township, about three-fourths of a mile south of the fort. He was justice of the peace for many years; built a saw-mill on Kimble Brook at an early date, a grist-mill about 1825 and put in the first burr-stone in this place. His children were Rev. Benjamin T. Killam and Moses Killam, Jr. Benjamin T. Killam, who preached in the settlement and adjacent, was an active Christian and an excellent man. He married Elizabeth, a daughter of Elijah Witter (often miscalled Winter), and settled on the Paupack, at the mouth of Gifford's Creek, at what is now Beemerville. He was a farmer, lumberman and local preacher and lived to be about seventy-five years of age. His children were Anna (wife of Thomas Bortree, who died recently in Michigan at an advanced age), Lewis, Emeline, Alfred, Elijah, Moses, Lucy, Marcus N. B. and Polly (wife of James Van Camp, who lives in Salem). All of the family moved to Michigan with the exception of Anna, Marcus, Moses and Polly.

Marcus N. B. Killam stayed on the old place, purchased the Abel Kimble property in 1870 and built a saw-mill in 1871. He sold thirty-four hundred acres of wild or timbered land to Farnham, Collingwood & Co., and now has about five hundred acres, of which two hundred and fifty are Paupack flats. Mr. Killam lives on his large farm in a very comfortable manner and entertains his friends with the old-time hospitality for which Paupack settlement has ever been celebrated. Marcus N. B. Killam, without doubt, is the most successful living hunter in Northeastern Pennsylvania. He killed his first deer when eleven years old and did not miss a year without killing one or more from that time until recently. Some years he killed a dozen and one year secured forty, killing three in one day. He at three different times killed three bears in one day. He killed nine bears a year for three successive years. He has probably killed four or five hundred deer, more than one hundred bears and many wild-cats as well as smaller game. His success was owing to the fact that he lived near the edge of that thick spruce and pine swamp in and about "Promised Land," and was an almost unerring shot. The largest deer he killed weighed two hundred and fifty pounds, and the skin forty pounds. He has the antlers, which spread twenty inches apart.

Moses Killam, Jr., succeeded his father as justice of the peace, lived on the homestead and ran the grist-mill until other mills were built in the vicinity and the saw-mill was in operation. Joseph Atkinson afterward bought the place. He was a leading man in the place in his day and held the office of justice of the peace until so old that his son Ephraim did the writing and finally succeeded to the same office. He was seventy-eight at his death. He married Lucy, daughter of Ephraim Kimble, Sr., his children being Dan, Benjamin, Rush, Ephraim and George, sons, who all, with the exception of Rush, settled in the vicinity. The daughters were Irene, wife of Amzi L. Woodward; Esther, wife of William Conkling, of Hawley; Christine, wife of James Gibson, of Illinois; Milcenna, wife of Arthur Kimble, of Hawley; Eunice, wife of Mr. McComb; Augusta, unmarried. Silas Killam married Sarah, a daughter of Uriah Chapman, and settled northwest of the fort, on the road to Salem. He was a farmer, his sons being Ambrose, Isaac, Harvey, Silas and William. They all moved away but Isaac and William.

Asher Killam lives on the Calvin Pellet place and has the post-office. Ephraim Killam is a surveyor and justice of the peace in Hawley. He has given considerable attention to the history of the early settlers in the old Wallenpaupack settlement and contributed materially to this history of Palmyra township. Elizabeth Witter, wife of Benjamin T. Killam, was born September 3, 1773, lived to be ninety-eight years and ten months old and claimed to have been the first white child born in old Paupack settlement. The Indians had a field of about seven acres which they cultivated, by the old Ephraim Killam place. They also had another field of about four acres on the Gabriel Davis place.

Stephen Bennett married Mary, the daughter of Nathaniel Gates and settled about one mile east of the fort. He was a soldier of the Revolution. (Nathaniel Gates was secreted and escaped from the massacre at Wyoming by way of Paupack. He saw the Indians thrust burning pine-knots into the prisoners.) Stephen Bennett's sons were Francis, Frederick, Rufus, Jared, Stephen and Lebbeus. The daughters were Elizabeth, wife of John Miller, who settled in "the Beech," and Samantha, who was unmarried. Francis Bennett married Esther Daniels and lived in South Canaan township. Frederick Bennett married Jane Killam and moved to New York. Rufus settled in Purdytown, west of the homestead. Jared married Esther Killam and remained on a portion of the homestead. Stephen Bennett married Desire, a daughter of Joseph Ainsley, and was a lumberman. Lebbeus married Laura Ainsley and lived on a part of the old place. Of Jared Bennett's children, Isaac, who retains a portion of the homestead, and Nancy Jane, wife of M. N. B. Killam, alone remain in the place. The Bennetts were esteemed as honest and industrious citizens.

Uriah Chapman settled adjoining the Bennetts, and Hezekiah Bingham, Sr., next to Chapman. The latter was a good man and one of the first members of the Congregational Church organized in Salem in 1808. His sons were Hezekiah Bingham, Jr., Rodolphus and Solomon. His daughters were Nancy, wife of John Pellet, Jr.; Leura, wife of Simeon Chapman; Hannah, wife of Roswell Chapman; and Fanny, wife of Uriah Kimble. Hezekiah Bingham, Jr., married Eunice Killam, daughter of John Killam, and lived about one mile east of his father. His son Moses resided on the old place and was a justice of the peace. He died without children. John Bingham removed to the West. Rodolphus Bingham kept hotel on his father's property, which was the place of holding elections when Greene and Blooming Grove were part of Palmyra. His wife was Sally, a daughter of Abel Kimble's. Florence McCarty Bingham, one of the sons, went to Philadelphia and bought lumber as it was run down the river, becoming one of the largest lumber dealers in the city. He died without children about 1875, leaving a large property to his widow, who is devoting her fortune and her life to charity and nursing the sick.

Jacob Kimble, Sr., was a tall, bony man who lived to the advanced age of ninety-one. He was a miller, farmer and lumberman. His sons were Abel, Walter, Benjamin, Daniel, Ephraim and Jacob. One of his daughters, Lucretia, was the wife of Judge Abisha Woodward, of Bethany, Wayne County, Pa., and the mother of Hon. George W. Woodward, who became chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Abel Kimble built a grist-mill on Kimble Creek at an early day. He was succeeded by his son, Burnham Kimble, whose sons were Philip and Arthur, now living in Hawley, and Jackson, who is on the Peter Warner place. The daughters were Caroline, wife of Henry Edwards; Sybil, wife of Guerdon Pellet; Ada, who removed to the West; and Sarah Ann, wife of Jackson Nyce, who lives in the settlement. Jacob Kimble, 2d, resided on the farm afterward owned by his son, Heman Newton Kimble. He was the father of eighteen children. In the days when shoemakers went from house to house, boarded with the family and did their shoemaking for the year (which was called whipping the cat), it took one of these traveling cobblers three months each year to make boots and shoes enough for this family. His wife was Ann Ainsley, and Moses, Henry, Timothy M., Della (wife of Joseph Slocum), Walter, James, Newton, Harrison, Milton, George, Hannah (wife of Aaron Brown), Lucy Ann (wife of Judge Ridgway), and Jacob (who was at one time sheriff of Pike County) are all the children that Warren Kimble could remember. Walter Kimble, of the original family, moved to Indian Orchard. He raised a large family, who all went to Michigan with the exception of Stephen, who has a son Stephen living in Cherry Ridge. Benjamin and Daniel also settled in Cherry Ridge. Fannie Atkinson, the second wife of Joseph Atkinson, Sr., and mother of Joseph and Lot Atkinson, of Hawley, was a daughter of Benjamin Kimble's. She lived to an advanced age and was highly respected by all who knew her. Daniel's children located in the vicinity. Ephraim Kimble, Sr., settled at Mount Moriah (now Kimble's Station,) in Lackawaxen township, in the history of which an account of his family will be found.

The Kimbles are a race of strong, good-sized men, possessing vigorous constitutions and ruddy countenances. They have been active working people and contributed their share toward developing Pike and Wayne Counties, besides sending a large number of their sons and daughters to the West, particularly to the State of Michigan, where, as lumbermen, millers and farmers, they are an undoubted success. The Kimbles are long-lived and have families of from eight to ten children on an average. Like the La Bars in Monroe County, the descendants of Jacob Kimble, Sr., can now be counted by the thousands.

Jesper Edwards lived where Moses Bingham afterwards settled. His sons, Peleg and James, stayed in the settlement, and Sabra became the wife of Jonathan Brink. Peleg remained on the homestead. Of his children, Charles married Susan Roberts and lived in Lackawaxen till a short time before his death, when he removed to Beemersville; Henry Edwards lived in the settlement as a shoemaker; and Sabra became the wife of Jonas Ainsley.

John Ainsley, Sr., who was born in England, was a blacksmith, as was his son, John Ainsley, Jr. Simeon and Joseph were the other sons. John and Joseph married sisters, daughters of Levi Kimble, and Simeon married a daughter of Jacob Kimble, Sr. Joseph Ainsley was the inn-keeper for the settlement. His sons were Hudson, Brenson, Jonas and Joseph. Hudson and Joseph moved to Buffalo. Brenson's children were Leonard, who lives in St. Louis, and Joseph Ainsley, who has a large sash factory in Scranton. His factory and lumber pile were destroyed by fire a short time ago, without insurance; but like a hero, in his old age he is building up again. William, of Purdytown, is a brother. Jonas Ainsley remained on the homestead, kept tavern and farmed. His widow and son George live there still.

John Pellet, Jr., was in most of the conflicts with the Indians on the Paupack. He married Nancy Bingham, daughter of Hezekiah Bingham, Sr. Their children were Richard, John, George, William Calvin, Guerdon, Ira, Abigail (wife of Asa Kimble) and Nancy (wife of Meacham Kimble). A. D. Pellet, carpenter, of Salem, is a son of Richard Pellet. The Pellets are nearly all gone from the settlement. They were a prominent family.

David and Orrin Lester, who were Revolutionary soldiers, lived for some years in Paupack.

Nathan Sutton had a small tannery with four vats up at the Beemer place, where he tanned good upper and sole leather. He ground his bark with a horse and stone. His son Jonas lived on the homestead, which is now owned by John Burns, who has found clay adapted to the purpose, and makes a coarse earthenware at the place. Jonas Sutton married Ann, a daughter of Solomon Purdy. Their children were Colbern and William.

Peter Warner came to Paupack from Monroe County, and bought on the corner, across from the fort, in 1827. He was the village blacksmith and a good man.

Stephen Dimon came to Wilsonville from New Jersey in 1830, and in 1833 bought John Connet's improvements. His son, Cornelius C. Dimon, built an addition to the house, and started a hotel in 1856, which is still managed by him. Jane Dimon was the wife of Henry Gager, of Mt. Pleasant, and Lydia Dimon, the wife of Newton Kimble. The settlement of Palmyra township has latterly included many Germans.

Frazier Smith, Jacob Seaman, Conrad Gumble, Herman Gumble, Francis Singer and Casper Wesling settled on the road from Henry D. Clark's to Blooming Grove. Nelson B. Kirkendall lives one-half mile southwest of Dimon's. Thomas Robinson is one mile south of Dimon, on the Simpson place. Henry Valentine lives on the N. Kimble property. John Decker formerly kept a hotel at what was known as the Decker stand, on the Milford and Owego turnpike, and had a farm, it being a stopping-place of some importance in the day of stage-coaches. The Erie Railroad has, however, wrought many changes, and the place is growing.

Charles W. Down came from Easton to Sterling in 1830, and lived where Whittaker now is, on the Heman Newton place. He moved to Palmyra in 1858, and has held the office of justice of the peace. He has charge of the Ledgedale Tannery shipments at Hawley.

James Cromwell built the Cromwell Tannery about 1849, and his brothers, William and Joshua, bought his interest and run it until 1883. William Cromwell now has a planing-mill opposite Hawley, near the old tannery. He was associate judge of Pike County one term.

Tafton.—Amasa Daniels was a squatter and made an improvement where Tafton now is at an early day. Elizabeth Valentine bought the property for her son-in-law, Royal Taft, about 1821. The tract consisted of four hundred and forty acres of land. Mr. Taft built an addition to the old house, a barn and a hotel, known as the Tafton House. As he was on the Milford and Owego stage line, he soon after had a post-office established at Tafton, of which he was postmaster. He continued business in the hotel until 1841, and was succeeded by his son, Thomas V. Taft, who did not take out a license, but kept travelers simply as an accommodation for a number of years. He built a store, and as administrator conducted the business until the heirs were of age. Then the three brothers, Thomas, Charles and Theodore, were in partnership until Thomas and Theodore purchased Charles' interest and continued the business until 1868. Since that time the property has been in the hands of various Germans. Christopher Newberger has resided there a number of years and Joseph Atkinson manages a steam saw-mill. Thomas V. Taft now lives in Hawley. Charles V. Taft was for many years a merchant in that place and has been succeeded in business by his son, Royal Taft. The Tafts are an honest, enterprising family.

Wilsonville.—About 1768 Rev. Richard Peters, Henry Drinker and Abel James, of Philadelphia, cut a road, sometimes called the Wilderness road, from Stroudsburg to Wilsonville, or in that vicinity, to a point on the Wallenpaupack, which they then called Factoryville, and sent a colony, who commenced to build a woolen-factory on the Wallenpaupack rapids, between Wilsonville and Hawley. These Philadelphia gentlemen had a Utopian scheme whereby they expected to become rich. Before the days of steam, water was more highly esteemed than now, and the water-power furnished by the Wallenpaupack near its mouth was considered to be of great value even at that early day. They intended raising sheep on the hills about Wilsonville and having everything at hand for a woolen-factory. But this was a howling wilderness, the home of the wolf, the bear and the panther rather than a place for sheep-raising. The result of this project is soon told. In 1769 Rev. Richard Peters came to Stroudsburg and asked Colonel Jacob Stroud to take a load of provisions to his colony, as they were starving, which he immediately did, and the enterprise was soon after abandoned. The Wallenpaupack Falls, where Wilsonville is located, is an excellent water-power, and as it is impossible to run rafts over it in safety, the owners of this privilege have had a monopoly of the lumbering that comes from the forests of the region drained by the Wallenpaupack and its branches. The first mill where Wilsonville now is was a grist-mill built by Joseph Washburn and burned the 3d of July, 1778, according to Minor's "History of Wyoming." Subsequently there were other mills erected, and from 1799 until April 5, 1802, it was the county-seat of Wayne County. Leonard La Bar was in Wilsonville about 1818. He had two saw-mills on Pike County side and a grist-mill in Wayne County. After La Bar, Roberts & Fuller got the property; Roberts died and it was sold at sheriff's sale to Dan Brodhead for seven thousand dollars by the sheriffs of Wayne and Pike Counties, at the same time, one selling on Pike side of the river and the other on Wayne side. James M. Porter appears to have been interested. In 1843 William Shouse came to Wilsonville with his sons Jacob, John and Henry, and took charge of the mills. Jacob died and John and Henry assumed full charge of the business. They divided the property between them and Henry built a large sawmill on the Wayne County side. They did an immense lumber business and ran a store and grist-mill. In 1869 John Shouse sold his interest to Farnham, Collingwood & Co. for fifty-five thousand dollars and returned to Easton. The next year Henry Shouse sold his interest to the same parties for fifty thousand dollars and also returned to Easton. Shortly afterwards the new company purchased the Marcus Killam tract for sixty thousand dollars. The mills have a capacity of about ten million feet of lumber per year. Collingwood & Millard are now the principal owners. The large tracts of timber which have supplied these mills in years past are nearly all gone, and this, like other large lumbering establishments, will soon only be known historically.

William Shouse died at Easton in 1877, in the ninetieth year of his age. He began life as a cabinet and chair-maker. From 1819 to 1836 was proprietor of the Franklin House, at Easton. From 1836 to 1843 was engaged in carriage-making for the Southern market, and in 1843, as above mentioned, engaged in milling, lumbering and merchandising at Wilsonville. He left the latter place in 1870 and returned to Easton. He was the originator of the famous opposition line of stages to Philadelphia, and when Pardee Hall was opened, he was the oldest living trustee of Lafayette College. He was a life-long member of the Lutheran Church and a highly respected business man. His son, John Shouse, was a member of the Milford bar and associate judge of Pike County one term.[1]

[1] In writing the history of Wallenpaupack settlement, acknowledgment should be made for the assistance rendered by Ephraim Killam, Esq., of Hawley, M. N. B. Killam and wife, Thomas V. Taft and to P. G. Goodrich's "History of Wayne County" and Charles Miner's "History of Wyoming."

CHAPTER XI.

LACKAWAXEN TOWNSHIP.

Lackawaxen township was erected in 1798, after Wayne County was set off from Northampton. It is the northern township of Pike County, and is bounded on the northwest by Wayne County, on the northeast by Delaware River and New York, on the southeast by Shohola and on the south and southwest by Blooming Grove and Palmyra. It is named for the Lackawaxen River, which passes through the township from west to east and enters the Delaware at the village of Lackawaxen. Lackawack, Lackawaxon or Lackawaxen, as it is variously spelled, is an Indian name, meaning "swift waters," and it is very appropriately applied to this stream, which is a very rapid-flowing river. It rises among the hills of Mount Pleasant, in Wayne County, and flows southwardly through Honesdale, where it is joined by the Dyberry at the foot of Irving Cliff, whence it continues its onward course through a narrow valley scarcely more than one-quarter of a mile wide to Hawley, when it flows between Lackawaxen and Palmyra for a few miles through the famous Narrows, where was once a waterfall, blasted out by State appropriation, for the accommodation of the raftsmen, who formerly floated a large amount of lumber down this stream to the Delaware and thus down to Philadelphia. The valley is very narrow through Lackawaxen township and in many places the steep hills lay so close to the river as to become a mountain gorge rather than a valley, and the Delaware and Hudson Canal and Erie Railway Companies, which occupy the right and left banks of the stream respectively, have been compelled to blast out great rocks to pass through. The scenery along the Lackawaxen is rugged and grand, and often visited by city visitors in summer. The Lackawaxen receives the waters of Blooming Grove Creek and Tink Creek, outlet of Tink Pond. Wolf Pond and Westcalong Pond are the other principal lakes. The scenery along the Delaware is also fine. Masthope Creek flows through the northern part of the township and enters the Delaware at Masthope.

LACKAWAXEN VILLAGE.—Jonathan Conkling and John Barnes were the first settlers in Lackawaxen. They located at the mouth of the Lackawaxen River, Conkling on the south side of the stream and Barnes on the north side. They came before the Revolution. Absalom Conkling related that his father took his family and a few things in a canoe and paddled down the Lackawaxen and Delaware to the stone fort of the Westfalls. One day, after he thought the Indian trouble was over, he and two of his boys rowed up to their home at nightfall. They saw a light in the cabin, and creeping up carefully, looked through a crack of the house, when they discovered two Indians who had taken peaceable possession. They had a fire in the fire-place and one lay asleep while the other was busy picking the flint of his gun. Conkling and his boys slipped back to their canoe and floated down to the fort again, whence they and the Barneses came back after the war and again occupied their old homes.

Jonathan Conkling's children were John, Lewis,[1] Benjamin and Absalom, sons, who lived to great ages and died in the township, so far as ascertained. The name has become extinct in the township. Absalom died at Rowland's, aged eighty-four, more than forty years ago. Thyre, Tamar, Lydia and Freelove were the daughters. Tamar married a Brown and lived in Milford; Martha, a daughter by a second wife, married Samuel Barnard and lives below Hawley.

John Barnes married Betsey Haley. Their sons were Thomas, Abram, Cornelius, William, Nathan, John and Jeremiah. These children and their descendants are scattered through the West and elsewhere. Elizabeth, a daughter of John's, was the wife of Charles B. Ridgeway, who lived at Lackawaxen, and Judge Thomas J. Ridgeway, their son, still resides there. Henry Barnes, a brother of Mrs. Ridgeway, located in Milford. Lucian Barnes, attorney-at-law, and Britton Barnes were his sons. Virginia was the wife of Dr. Edward Haliday. Hortense is the wife of Rev. D. A. Sandford, and Martha married Samuel Thrall, of Milford. Jeremiah T. Barnes, a descendant of one of these Barnes, was once sheriff of Wayne County and an extensive lumberman. Peter S. Barnes, another descendant, is at present register and recorder of Wayne County.

Jacob Bonnel came to Lackawaxen shortly after the Conklings, and located on the south side of the Lackawaxen, near the canal bridge. William, Benjamin and Joseph Holbert were here early, likewise Elias Brown. Nathan Lord located one-half mile above the mouth of the Lackawaxen. Charles B. Ridgway came to Lackawaxen about 1807 and located on the Lackawaxen one mile above its mouth. John Armstrong was the first merchant, in 1827. William F. Dutcher and T. J. Ridgway have been merchants since. Benjamin Holbert had a store-room in his house about three miles above Lackawaxen at an early date. They formerly brought goods from Newburgh to Milford, thence up the Milford and Owego turnpike to Darlingville, and thus on to Lackawaxen.

After the canal was built they used it for shipping purposes, and now employ the Erie Railroad. Darlingville was on the turnpike, and was so named in honor of Samuel Darling, father of Deacon John P. Darling, who was its first postmaster, but since the advent of railroads, this, like many another turnpike village, has degenerated. John Williamson was the first postmaster at Lackawaxen. Rev. Dr. Thomas House Taylor built the first hotel, where the Williamson House afterward stood, in 1852. John Williamson purchased this property and made additions to it, when it burned down. He then built the present Williamson House, or New York Hotel. He also erected the Asher House; Calvin Van Benschoten built the National Hotel, and William Holbert the Lackawaxen House at the forks of the Delaware and Lackawaxen Rivers. The hotels will accommodate two hundred guests, and are designed for summer boarders who visit this delightful and healthful region annually, in search of health and rest.

[1] Lackawaxen is just opposite and about one and one-half miles from where the battle of Minisink was fought. Lewis Conkling went up with the reinforcements to the point of the hill after the whites gave back. They saw the Indians that were burning Terwilliger, but knew nothing of their force and did not dare attack them.

There is good fishing in the Delaware and lakes near by. The York Pond covers about one hundred acres, and is an immense mountain spring situated about four hundred feet above the Lackawaxen. There are a series of falls of about two hundred feet descent on the outlet of this pond, where is located a club-house. Dr. Debron was the first physician in Lackawaxen; Elder Kyte, a Baptist, was the first preacher in the township. They first organized about 1827, when the canal was built, and the Barryville preacher occasionally preached. Isaac Mills was the first deacon in the Baptist Church and John Johnson and family were among the earliest members. Jeremiah Barnes and family and John Barnes and family were the leaders among the Methodists who held their first meetings in Jeremiah Barnes' house. The Baptists and Methodists built a Union Church in 1848, in which they have a Union Sunday-School and which they occupy harmoniously for religious purposes. The Lutherans organized about 1856. Henry Banker and family, Anthony Arntz and family, George Bisel and family and John Hocker and family were the leading members. They use the school-house, which was built in 1856. The Catholics have a church which was built about 1865. The first school was taught by Mr. Layton at the Nathan Lord place.

Mordecai Roberts, a Quaker of some means from Philadelphia, settled one mile north of Rowland's Station, on the Lackawaxen, in 1791. Although he was a Quaker, General Washington so far conquered his prejudices as to make him a messenger to carry dispatches to different posts. In the performance of this duty he sometimes rode forty-eight hours without leaving his saddle. He had a horse shot from under him at one time and was severely wounded by a bayonet thrust at another time. His services were so valuable to the Americans that the British offered a reward for his head, but he lived to be one of the first settlers in Lackawaxen township after the war. His father, Hugh Roberts, was a wealthy man, and built a Quaker Church in Philadelphia. He had an immense fortune left him in England, said to amount to thirty-six million dollars, but lacked a marriage certificate and never obtained it. Mordecai Roberts purchased a large tract of land in Lackawaxen, built mills and otherwise improved the place. He married a New England woman. The children were Samuel, wife of John Monington, of Philadelphia; Anna, wife of Jacob Walters, of Philadelphia, one of whose daughters was the wife of Andrew Simons, of Hawley, and is now living, aged eighty-four. William, Julia, Ann, Mordecai and Thomas are children by the second wife.

Samuel Roberts, the eldest son above mentioned, cleared a farm about two miles southwest of his father. Now standing among the apple-trees there are pines eighteen inches through, the farm having all grown to a wilderness again. Pike County scrub oak and pine lands have to be kept under constant cultivation or they will soon be covered with native forest-trees; consequently, farming on the hills of Pike is a constant battle with scrub oaks and scrub pine. Here nature wages a constant warfare, and the primeval forests unceasingly claim the soil as their own. Whether Pike County humanity, animated by Pike County whiskey, will conquer the den of the rattlesnake and the lair of the bear is an undetermined question. Certain it is that several well cultivated farms, such as the Roberts place and the Sylvanian Societies' land, have been reclaimed by the forests.

Samuel Roberts' children were Betsey, Ann, Abbey, Lucy, Urban, John, Samuel, Mordecai, Susan and William, who all grew to mature years, married in the township and most of whom moved West. Ann was the wife of Moses Brink, son of Jonathan Brink, of White Mills, and is now living in the township, aged eighty-two. John Westfall afterward owned the old Mordecai Roberts place in 1834. He raised a large family of children, among them Solomon and James, of Rowland's, and Gabriel, of Columbia, D. T. Judge William Westfall, who died at the Westfall home in 1882, contributed many articles of a historical character to the press, and was for years a correspondent of the Milford Herald and Dispatch, a stanch Democrat. He was elected county commissioner in 1851, and served four years as county treasurer, five years as associate judge, five years as county auditor, and was a member of the Legislature when he died, besides being town clerk, justice of the peace and school director thirty-eight years. There is a small Methodist Church near this place.

Rowland's, which is only about one mile below Westfall's, was first started by Hon. George H. Rowland, who came to Lackawaxen with his parents in 1828, and beginning some years later, when a young man, carved out a home and a fortune on the side of the mountain. The Erie Railway passes through here, and the station is named in his honor. He has a store, farm, and had a mill which has been recently burned. Mr. Rowland, when he located in the wilderness among the rocks, proceeded on the Cæsarian theory that it is better to be first in a hamlet on the mountains than second at Rome, and he is undisputedly the first in that township.

G. H. Rowland

Hon. George H. Rowland. — Samuel Rowland and his two brothers came to New York from Ireland in 1720, and settled in Dutchess County. His son, Samuel Rowland, Jr. (1722–1800), had a son, Robert Rowland (1746–1812), who was justice of the peace in colonial times, and reared a family of children, among whom was Garrandus (1776–1834), grandfather of our subject, born at Troy, N. Y., who lived and died near Saratoga Springs, in Saratoga County, N. Y., on a farm owned, in 1886, by his youngest son, Joseph, now seventy years old, and the only surviving son of twelve children.

Garrandus Rowland married a Miss Davis, and reared a family of children. He was a farmer and carpenter and joiner, and resided in Saratoga County, N. Y. Samuel H. Rowland, a son of Garrandus, was born in Saratoga County, November 19, 1801, and there married Lucinda Rogers, a native of the same county. The building of the Delaware and Hudson Canal, between 1823 and 1830, offered large inducements to contractors in its construction, and, after its completion, great opportunities opened up to the early settlers of Wayne and Pike Counties for buying land very cheap that was covered with valuable timber, and within a three days' trip, at high water, from the great natural market, Philadelphia. To this new country Samuel H. Rowland and his young wife came, and took up their home in Pike County April 17, 1828. He was identified with the construction of the canal and was afterwards engaged in lumbering and merchandising, following the latter until his death, which occurred November 18, 1853. He had a good English education for the men of his time, and, during his early manhood, was a teacher. He was an ardent supporter of education in the vicinity where he resided, and was the first school director elected in his township after the law was passed creating that office. His judgment in matters, and his practical ideas of things in general, made his opinion sought by other people, and, besides being often selected to adjust settlements between others, and being appointed by the courts to settle difficulties, he was chosen and served for two terms as justice of the peace. At his death he had acquired a competency, and of his means, during his life, he was charitable and hospitable. They had five children, of whom George H. Rowland was eldest, and was born in Saratoga County, December 26, 1827. His early education, from books, was obtained at schools outside of home, largely at Honesdale, as there were no schools in the neighborhood when the family removed from New York State.

For two winter terms he was a teacher, a good experience to any young man and a stepping-stone to business. He early became a partner with his father in the mercantile business in Lackawaxen township, which has been the home of the family in Pennsylvania. In 1851 he began business for himself, and since that time has been largely engaged in the lumber and mercantile business, and also in farming. While a young man he took an active interest in politics, and for twenty-five years has served as school director, and been often selected a delegate to State Conventions, being once placed on the State electoral ticket. In 1861 he was elected to the State Legislature on the Democratic ticket, and, by re-election, served two consecutive terms. In 1872 he was elected to the State Senate and served three years, and, in the fall of 1885, he was chosen to fill a vacancy in the same office.

Mr. Rowland's life has been one of activity, industry and care. He inherits the sterling qualities of his father in his integrity of purpose, his devotion to principle and in his ability to accomplish whatever he undertakes. His wife is Catherine, daughter of Joseph Ammerman, of Salem township, whom he married November 3, 1849. They have four sons and four daughters.

The bridge was built at Rowland's by a stock company as a toll-bridge. It paid well but the inhabitants did not wish to pay toll when they believed the county ought to provide them with a bridge; consequently, an act was passed by the Legislature authorizing the county commissioners to buy the bridge. The commissioners agreed to buy it, but before the bargain was consummated a new board of commissioners was elected, who refused to ratify the action of the board. Then followed a tedious lawsuit, in which the matter was carried to the Supreme Court twice. Pending the decision, the bridge was carried away by a flood. Mr. Rowland immediately telegraphed to the commissioners at Milford "to get out with their pike-poles, as the bridge was coming." They were without a bridge again, and the commissioners did not care to incur any new obligations while the suit was pending; but finally agreed with Mr. Rowland that if he would build another bridge they would pay for it, providing the suit went against them. The suit was decided against them and the county paid the whole debt.

Jesse Walker brought two homeless boys with him from Philadelphia when he came into Lackawaxen township. They worked for him at the Narrows until of age and for some years after, for which they claim they never received adequate remuneration. Be that as it may, when these two young men, Israel Kelly and George Kelly, started life for themselves, they went up on the hills back of Rowland's, by honest industry cleared up a good farm and gained a competence. Israel married Ephraim Kimble's sister and one of his sons, Randall Kelly, is a leading merchant at the Narrows, or Kimble's Station, as it is now called, and his Uncle George, who was never married, lives with him, aged eighty-four.

Peter Killam first started on the Lackawaxen above Westfall's, where the Blooming Grove Creek enters the Lackawaxen, at what is now called Millville. He purchased six adjacant tracts of land, built a cabin and commenced lumbering on a large scale for that day. He built one saw-mill at Millville, and paid for his land. "Fortune smiled upon him. The tangled laurel and stately pine were cut away, a commodious dwelling-house erected and a willing bride established as mistress of his mansion." Flushed with success, he built another mill about one mile farther up the river and thus began a series of misfortunes.

About 1835 reverses came: his mills were destroyed by fire, his lumber was swept away by the floods. He remained until 1840, then abandoned his property to his creditors and moved farther up the river. Broken-hearted and finally ruined, he never recovered his losses. After he left, Dan Drake held the property until he was drowned, when it lay vacant a while and finally fell into the hands of John Torrey again, who sold it to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It is a railroad station and John Deming has a furniture factory and store on the site.

Kimble's, or the Narrows.—Colonel Hooper, of Philadelphia, bought a tract of land at Lackawaxen Falls, or Mount Moriah, afterward called the Narrows by the raftmen and now Kimble Station, at an early day,—some think as early as 1750 or 1760, others about the time Mordecai Roberts came, in 1791. He built saw-mills and got an act passed making the Lackawaxen navigable up to the falls, that gave him a monopoly above and an outlet below. This continued for many years, until those living above the falls had the stream chartered and obtained from the Legislature an appropriation to blast out the rocks at the Narrows and make the river navigable for rafts. After spending considerable money in blasting rocks the Narrows were rendered passable, but it has always been considered the most dangerous point on the river from the forks of the Dyberry to Philadelphia, because in blasting the rocks which constitute the fall it necessarily left the river rapid. It takes a sudden bend, while the rocks close in on either side, leaving the pass quite narrow, so that in avoiding Scylla on the one hand they encounter Charybdis on the other; hence raftmen who could navigate the Narrows safely always commanded greater wages for that service, and certain men spent their time during rafting season in steering through this dangerous pass.

One of the first rafts through the Narrows was run from Paupack by John Nelden, of New Jersey. William R. Walker, Ephraim Kimble, John Graham, Jonathan Brink, Joseph Atkinson, Sr., Jacob Correll, Abram Shimer, Peter Kellam, Moses Brink, Mordecai Roberts, Samuel Roberts, William Roberts, Jacob Kittle and Peter Decker were some of the old "Lackawack" raftsmen. They were sturdy men and used to gang together while running rafts. If they disliked a saloon-keeper along the river, he was cleared out. When in the city they held their own against all opposition. In saying this it should not be understood that these men were quarrelsome. They were simply great, bony, muscular fellows engaged in rough work that tended to make men strong and fearless. Abner Fish was a steersman and noted fighter. While rafting was carried on, the Delaware and Hudson Canal was built in 1827–28, beside the stream from Honesdale to its mouth at Lackawaxen village, and thence down the Delaware to Port Jervis and across to the Hudson River at Rondout. This canal is here mentioned because in its construction and operation many foreigners were employed, principally Irish. These stalwart lumbermen looked upon the canal as a kind of rival carrier and the Irishmen as intruders; hence many difficulties arose between them. Eb. Sheerer, a burly, stout man, was particularly opposed to them. He was a powerful man and there are many well authenticated stories of his physical prowess by living witnesses.

It is estimated that fifty million feet of lumber and logs were run down the Delaware River annually some years ago, and the Lackawaxen always furnished a considerable share of this lumber. The average raft of round timber was sixty-five thousand feet, although they often ran larger rafts, and of sawed lumber they sometimes had two hundred thousand feet in one raft. One of the largest rafts ever taken down the river was managed by Thomas Barnes. It consisted of three hundred sixteen-feet logs in one raft. Col. Hooper, as before stated, came to the Narrows probably after the Revolution and built a saw-mill on the east side of the river. Jesse Walker came from Philadelphia some time before 1800, purchased this property of Hooper and operated the mills. His son, William R. Walker, built the first saw-mill at Tink's Wig. He had two sons, Webb Walker and Rankin Walker, who emigrated to the West.

Ephraim Kimble, a son of Jacob Kimble, the first, of Paupack settlement, located at the Narrows after the Revolutionary War. He built a saw-mill, cleared up a place and married Eunice, a daughter of Major Ainsley's. His children were,—Elizabeth, wife of John Killam, who lived in Purdytown; William, a farmer and lumberman, who married Irena Rice and had a family of six children, Warren Kimble, the oldest son, lives at Matamoras. He is seventy-three years old and furnished most of the facts in relation to the Kimble family; Lucy was the wife of Moses Killam, Esq.; Ann was the first wife of Jos. Atkinson, Sr., and the mother of John, George and Asher M. Atkinson, who was superintendent of the Delaware and Hudson Canal; Esther was the wife of Chas. B. Seaman, who was sheriff and prothonotary of Pike County; Crissie was the wife of Dr. Mahony; Maria married David Rice, who lived at the Narrows; Sally was the wife of Israel Kelly, of Rowland's; Eunice married Calvin Pellet, of Paupack settlement; John married Phebe Rockwell and lived in the vicinity; Ephraim Kimble (2d) married Lucy Killam, built a store, and was succeeded by his son, Ephraim (3d), at Kimble s, as owner of the store and saw-mill. The station is well-named, Kimble's, in honor of the family who have lived in the same spot to the third generation, and done much to populate the surrounding country and develop its resources. Asa Kimble, one of the descendants, ought not to be forgotten. He married Abbey Pellet and moved up on the Dyberry; Ephraim, George, John P., William, Martin and Nancy, wife of Ezra Genung, were his children. Abram Skinner, a son of Captain Skinner, of Montague, cleared up a farm about two miles below Kimble's, and was one of the best farmers in Pike County. Jacob Correll made a clearing about 1791 on the opposite side of the river, where James Hanners afterward had a store, and his son, Alva Hanners, now conducts it. Eusebius Kincaid made a clearing about one and one-third miles from Kimble's, where Joseph Kimble now lives.

Israel, Abel and Eli Hammers, three brothers belonging to the Society of Friends of Philadelphia, came into Lackawaxen township about 1820, and located in the wilderness, three miles from the Lackawaxen River, on the outlet of Tink Pond, where they purchased three tracts of land, then covered with a heavy growth of white and yellow pine. One brother was a carpenter, one a tailor and the other a man of all work. They constructed a dam and saw-mill, which they put in running order without outside assistance. They manufactured lumber, built a comfortable house, then turned their attention to manufacturing lumber for the Philadelphia market, never cutting standing timber, but picking up that which had been felled by the wind. They hired it rafted, and thus received sufficient money to supply their simple wants. They cleared up a good farm, kept cows, made butter and were independent. The tailor did the mixing and baking. He stuck a notched stick into the dough and when it had raised to the notch it was fit to bake. They made their own furniture, and the tailor made their clothes.

About 1838 they adopted a colored boy, and the four lived in perfect seclusion. No female had ever crossed the threshold to that uninviting dwelling. They were growing old and two of them had never seen the canal or voted at an election. When William Westfall was a candidate for county treasurer he brought them all out to vote for the first time. After casting their ballots, they looked in wonder at the canal and the boats floating upon its waters. Their carpenter's tools were a curiosity. The stock of the fore-plane was four feet in length, while the jointer was eighteen inches longer. After growing feeble, they put their lumber out on shares. The parties ran away with the proceeds and left them in debt. One died, and the remaining two deeded their property to their sister in Philadelphia. She sold it to Benjamin Tanner, intimating that he should take care of the brothers, which would be satisfaction for the purchase money; but she enforced the payment in cash, to the last farthing, and, houseless and homeless, they became wards of the township, which fed and clothed them during their lives, and after death buried them decently on the bank of the Little Blooming Grove, opposite Millville.

Masthope village is located up the Delaware, where Masthope Creek enters it. It was formerly called Sim's Point, because Simeon Westfall began life there. This singular name was given to the place by some men who followed up the Delaware in search of a mast tall enough for a man-of-war they were constructing at Philadelphia. As they wended their way along the river and found nothing suitable for their purpose, they arrived at Simeon Westfall's, where Matamoras now is. He told them of a tree tall enough. They were nearly discouraged, having come so far without success, and accompanied Mr. Westfall up the Delaware as a last hope. At the point above indicated, which has since been known as Masthope, they found a pine, which, by digging down to the roots and cutting close to the ground, was tall enough for their purpose.

The first lot of land in Lackawaxen township surveyed and marked upon the ground was near this place. Simeon Westfall and William Little ran the first lumber to market. It was taken from a tract which still bears their name and since the property of S. M. Shutes. The Holberts were the first settlers at Masthope to make improvements, their farm being one of the oldest in the township. William Holbert's name appears on the assessment of Lackawaxen in 1800, with one mill, one house, four oxen, four cows and fifty acres of improved land. The next year he is assessed with two mills, showing that he was a stirring man of considerable means and a good farm for that early day. In 1813 Joseph Holbert is assessed, and Benjamin Holbert is assessed as an inn-keeper. The Holberts are an enterprising family, and by lumbering, tanning, farming and hotel-keeping have secured competence.

WILLIAM HOLBERT.—His great-grandfather, William Holbert (1755–1834), came from Connecticut about 1770, and settled in Montague township, Sussex Co., N. J., where he engaged in farming and lumbering. He owned a large tract of land in that vicinity, and also in what is now Pike County, Pa., across the Delaware River, since called Holbert's Bend. At his death he left a large property in real estate and two sons, of whom Benjamin (1781–1855) was grandfather of our subject. He began business for himself on the homestead property at Holbert's Bend, situate on the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware, where he continued successfully the business of a farmer and lumberman during his active life. His wife, Mary Rider, born 1783, bore him a family of thirteen children, one of whom was Joseph G. Holbert (1803–48). He acquired a good education at the home schools and at the Burlington (N. J.) Academy, was for many terms a teacher, was a farmer and lumberman, and gave considerable attention to surveying. He was a man highly esteemed by the public for his honesty of purpose, for his general intelligence and for his ability in business. His wife, Sabra, was a daughter of George W. Brown, of Damascus, Wayne County, who died about 1882, at the age of seventy-nine years.

William Holbert, eldest son of Joseph G. and Sabra (Brown) Holbert, was born on the homestead, in Lackawaxen township, Pike County, Pa., August 12, 1829. He obtained his early book education in the neighborhood schools and at the Milford Academy.

At the age of twenty years he engaged in mercantile business at Lackawaxen, but three years thereafter relinquished that business and engaged in farming and lumbering at Masthope, in the same county. In 1857 he went to Berlin township, Wayne County, where he continued his farming and lumbering interests on a more extensive scale, and cleared off a very large farm. In 1869 he removed to Equinunk, Wayne County, where the firm of Holbert & Branning engaged extensively in the tanning, lumbering and merchandise business. The large business of Holbert & Branning passed to the exclusive control of Mr. Holbert in 1878, which he continues in 1886. In connection with their lumber interest they carried on and owned and ran several saw-mills, and, in 1876, Mr. Holbert built a large saw-mill in Camden, N. J., in which for some time afterward he held an interest. He is a man of large business capacity, judicious management in all business affairs, and an active and through-going citizen. He is the owner of a large hotel at the confluence of the Delaware and Lackawaxen Rivers, and a member of the "Cooke Furniture Company," of Philadelphia. His life has been largely devoted to business pursuits; yet he has found time to serve the people of Wayne County for four years as commissioner, and has served in other official capacities where he has resided. He married, January 10, 1850, Emma Poole, by whom he has five surviving children,—Joseph G. and William P., at Equinunk; Emma, wife of John N. Cole, of Damascus; Frederick R., at Equinunk; and Nora, wife of Ephraim Kimble. The mother of these children died, April 26, 1861, and for his second wife he married Elizabeth Hornbeck, on Jan. 15, 1862, now surviving.

The single freemen were Lewis Conklin, Benjamin Conklin, Nathaniel Barnes, Samuel Morris, Israel Brink, Benjamin Brink, Henry Barnes, William Barnes, Nathan Lord, John Morris and Patrick Boyles. In 1813 there are fifty-three persons arrested. Peter Gaines, an old colored man, said to have been one of Col. Sam Seely's slaves, cleared up a good farm near the Westcalong Lake. This lake covers about seventy-five acres, and Tink and Corilla Lakes about two hundred acres more. The Thomas Ridgeway farm is one mile above Lackawaxen. Some Germans have made good farms opposite this place. The early settlers used to go down the Lackawaxen and Delaware Rivers for goods in a canoe a distance of thirty-three miles. The current is rapid and required four or five hours to go down light, but about two days to shove back loaded. Adam Haines probably lived on what is now called Haines' Creek. This name occurs in the early assessments, April 18, 1851. After the Erie Railroad passed up the Delaware, there was a sale of town lots. Messrs. J. W. Blackington and Allis Whitney, of Honesdale, bought an entire block and the Holberts nearly all the remainder. A terrible railroad disaster occurred at Masthope a few years ago. The cars plunged off the track, a number of passengers lost their lives, and others were badly bruised.

THE SYLVANIAN SOCIETY, ONE OF HORACE GREELEY'S FOND HOPES.—The history of Lackawaxen is associated with Horace Greeley's experiment at co-operative farming at Taylortown. This place is situated about sixty miles from Lackawaxen depot and four from Rowland's. In 1842 Mahlon Godley owned seven thousand acres of land, forty acres of which were cleared. The remainder was woodland. A branch of the Shohola Creek ran through the property. On this creek Godley had a saw and a grist-mill. Near the mills were a frame house and a log house. These improvements comprised the village of Godleyville. The stream was alive with trout, and the surrounding hills were equally well provided with the largest and liveliest of rattlesnakes. The soil was rough and rocky, and no wilder spot was found in Pike County. Horace Greeley, by lectures and Tribune editorials, had urged the common ownership of property and the equal division of labor. In 1842, Greeley, with others, organized the Sylvanian Society and purchased Godley's property to test the experiment. To join the society it was necessary to purchase at least one share of the stock, which cost twenty-five dollars. Many eminent persons interested themselves in the project; among them Edwin Forrest, Edward H. Dixon, (since famous as the editor of the Scalpel), Mrs.

George Law, Edward Courtright, of Albany, and Rev. J. D. Williamson were stockholders, but Horace Greeley had by far the largest amount invested. The stock amounted to ten thousand dollars. After the society took possession of the place, they improved the mills and erected an immense frame structure, which contained the living apartments of the members, a common dining hall, a social hall and work-rooms. A wagon-maker's shop, blacksmith shop, shoe shop and other manufacturing establishments were started. In 1843–44 the colony numbered three hundred and seemed to be progressing. No stated religious instruction was allowed, but any preacher could be invited to preach in the hall. Great attention was paid to social amusement, and dances and parties were of weekly occurrence. There were also weekly lectures on popular subjects. Mr. Greeley visited the colony frequently and delivered addresses. Socially and intellectually, matters were successful, but the labor problem disturbed the little community. The colony was governed by a board of directors chosen by the members. The board assigned laborers for the different branches of work in what were known as groups. One group was set to plowing, another to felling trees, another to laying walls and so on, until all the duties were variously delegated.

The female members were divided in the same way to attend to the domestic duties of the society. The principle of equality of labor was followed by changing the labor groups from one branch of work to another, day by day. The mechanics, and all who were skilled in labor, had their especial duties.

One source of trouble was the fact that a number of rich and prominent families in New York took advantage of the colony as a sort of reformatory for their wayward sons. They eagerly bought stock in the colony, and shipped to the care of the society material which they could do nothing with themselves, merely to get it off their hands. These young men had never done any work, and had a natural antipathy to it. Such an element in a community, where labor was the highest duty of all, could not help but be a disturbing one. Then there was trouble with the female members. The most of them had never done manual labor, and when such found themselves assigned to a day's duty at the washtub their complaints and opposition to such a system were loud and emphatic.

The dissatisfaction caused by these clashing views of the duty and dignity of labor was something that it was hoped time would remove; but when the first season's crops, upon which reliance was placed for the support of the colony, independent of outside resources, were grown and housed, and found to be utterly inadequate, the very foundation of the colony was endangered. A few withdrew from the society. The prevalence of rattlesnakes frightened more away. One member of the colony brought in seventeen large rattlers in one day. One of these serpents was so large that John Dutton, the foreman of the colony's shoe shops, had the skin tanned, and he then made from it a pair of slippers, which he presented to Mr. Greeley on his next visit.

After it became apparent that the tillable area of the society's land was not equal to providing it with necessary supplies, the members went to work with a will to increase it, and the planting for the season of 1845 was nearly double what it had been previously. Good markets had been found for the shoes and wagons that were made by the colony, and, although individual capital had been sadly drawn upon, the prospects that the colony would be self-supporting during 1845 were so cheering that the members remaining looked hopefully into the future. The crops never looked better, in all respects, than they did in the summer of 1845; but when the colony awoke on the morning of the 4th of July of that year, nothing was seen but a blackened waste of field, garden and orchard. Not a living thing remained on all the tract. The heaviest and most deadly frost that was ever known before or since in that region had destroyed all remaining hope for the colony's existence. Starvation stared the colonists in the face, and in two days, of all that busy community among the Pike County hills, not a single soul remained. Each one had taken his personal goods and chattels and gone his way. The Greeley colony was deserted.

The interest which Horace Greeley took in this socialistic experiment may be known when it is stated that the New York and Erie Railroad was then completed only as far as Middletown, N. Y. From there, to reach the colony, a most tedious coach ride of forty miles over the hills of Northern New Jersey and Pike County, Pa., was necessary; yet Mr. Greeley paid frequent visits to the wilderness community. He took the failure of the scheme much to heart.

Among the members of the colony was a certain farmer from Monroe County, Pa., named Kenzie. He was such an enthusiast in the idea of co-operative industry that he sold his farm in Monroe County for eighteen hundred dollars, invested it all in stock of the Sylvanian Society, and placed at the colony's disposal his team of horses. After the collapse of the scheme he went to New York, as he afterward said, to give Horace Greeley a Monroe County Democrat's opinion of him. He found Mr. Greeley at work in the Tribune office, and commenced to berate him. Greeley stopped him, and asked him how much he had lost by the failure. Kenzie told him. Mr. Greeley handed the farmer a check for the full amount. Kenzie, in relating the incident afterward, said that, although he had always been a Democrat, that act of Greeley's made him a Greeley Whig, and he remained a Whig until the day of his death. Among the other colonists no hard feeling was manifested against Mr. Greeley. They were grieved at the colony's failure, not angry at its founder.

There was a mortgage of three thousand dollars on the property at the time of the failure. It was foreclosed, and the Rev. Dr. Thomas House Taylor, of New York, purchased the property. He took up his residence at the place, and spent a great deal of money in improving it. He finally sold it to a gentleman in Virginia, but it has been sold time and time again since then for arrears of taxes. Not a vestige of mill, shop or hall remains. The lead pipe that conducted the water from mountain springs to the settlement was taken up years ago and run into bullets by Pike County hunters, and used in shooting deer and bears that have returned to the neighborhood of the overgrown fields, where lie buried some of the fondest hopes that Horace Greeley ever cherished.

Lackawaxen township has the following schools —two at Lackawaxen village, one at Rowland's, Masthope, Westfall's, Millville, Rosecrance, German school, Hanner's, Kimble's and Baisden's, which is at Baisdensville, nearly opposite Hawley. The Baisdens carry on boat-building for the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company at this point.

At the first auditor's meeting, in the year 1822, Benjamin Holbert acted as town clerk, retaining the position until the spring of 1831, a period of nine years, keeping the accounts of the township on sixteen pages of a common day-book (similar to those used by merchants at the present time). His successor was C. B. Ridgway, who officiated for two years. At an election held at the house of Abraham Shimer, on the 15th of March, 1833, it was decided to hold all future elections at the house of John Westfall, in said township. April 22, 1836, the auditors allowed James Lord $22.40 for himself and hired help for breaking roads on the 7th day of January, 1836. At the same meeting, John Barnes received eight and Benjamin Holbert seventy-two dollars for breaking roads in the winter of 1836, during the deep snow. At this time there was not one school-house in the township. James Wheiling and a Mr. Marsh had taught several months each, in out-houses and canal shanties, the scholars traveling from three to five miles to attend their schools. On the 27th day of June, 1837, the common-school law was put in force by dividing the township into nine districts and making an apportionment of two hundred and seventy-three dollars, according to the number of taxables in each district, as follows: Lackawaxen, fifteen taxables; Holbert's, twelve; Sim's Pond, twelve; Westfall's, nine; Shimer's, eleven; Narrows, twenty-five; Darlingsville, ten; Lord's Valley, ten; Blooming Grove, six,—total number, one hundred and ten. It must be remembered that at this time parts of Blooming Grove and Shohola were embraced in the division—in fact, two of the schools were located in what is now Blooming Grove township. Arrangements were immediately made for building school-houses at Lackawaxen and the Narrows. The one at Lackawaxen was built of stone. It stood a few years, and was abandoned as not fit for use. The one at the Narrows, built of wood, was destroyed by fire.

Abram Bross was an old settler at the Narrows. His sons were Henry, Abram and John. He died in his eightieth year.

Thomas J. Ridgeway

JUDGE THOMAS J. RIDGEWAY.—His grandfather, Thomas J. Ridgeway, who was of Scotch extraction, and a tailor by trade, and wife, who was a Miss Mathews, settled at Milford, Pike County, Pennsylvania, from Huntingdon County, New Jersey, in the early part of the present century, where they spent the remainder of their lives and were buried. Among their children was a son, Charles B. Ridgeway (1790-1857) a native of New Jersey, who removed to Pike County with his parents, and, although a shoemaker by trade, he took an active part in public matters, was an influential citizen, and highly esteemed by his fellow-townsmen. He was successful in business, was justice of the peace for many years, was a promoter of the educational interests of the county in its early history, and during his life sought to do his part well in the interest of all measures calculated to improve the social, moral and religious standing of the community in which he resided.

His wife, Elizabeth Barnes (1790–1832), a native of Lackawaxen, was a zealous member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a devoted wife and mother. She died of cholera in middle life.

SHOHOLA GLEN HOTEL,

SHOHOLA, PA.

Thomas J. Ridgeway, their son, was born in Lackawaxen township, where his father resided, October 25, 1811. He had limited opportunities for book knowledge in his boyhood, but early in life got practical ideas of life's work, and the necessity of a proper development of the faculties to be successful in business or profession. About the time of reaching his majority he began for himself as a lumberman, as at that time the largest and one of the most important and profitable in Wayne County was the lumber interest, and a large number of its people were engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and its shipments down its various streams to their confluence with the Delaware, and thence down the Delaware to Philadelphia, the great natural lumber market of Eastern Pennsylvania. He continued the lumber business until 1844, when he engaged in farming and merchandising, which he carried on successfully in Lackawaxen township until 1870, and then entered the official employ of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, with which he has since been identified.

Following the political affiliation of his father as a member of the Democratic party, he, while a young man, began to take an interest in local and State politics. He has served his township altogether some fifteen years as justice of the peace, the county two years as its treasurer, and he was appointed by the Governor of the State an associate judge on the bench with Judge Barrett, to fill the unexpired term of another. Judge Ridgeway's good judgment and counsel gave him prestige in the courts of the county, and upon the completion of his term to fill vacancy, he was elected for a full term of five years.

He married, in 1834, Lucy Ann, daughter of Jacob Kimble, of Palmyra township, Pike County. She died December 15, 1883, and, with her husband, have been members of the Universalist Church.

Their children surviving are Warren K.; Elizabeth R., wife of John C. Mott, of Milford; Anna K., wife of C. P. Milliken, of New York; George K.; Maria S., wife of George A. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y.

CHAPTER XII.

SHOHOLA TOWNSHIP.

Shohola was erected from Lackawaxen, Westfall and Milford, September 25, 1852. It is bounded on the north by the Delaware River, on the south by Dingman, on the southwest by Blooming Grove and on the west by Lackawaxen township. It is a rugged, rocky township, like most of Pike County, and largely covered with scrub pine and oak. The Big Brink Pond covers about five hundred acres, and the Little Brink Pond being near, although it has no visible outlet or inlet. Brink Creek, the outlet of Big Brink Pond, flows northwardly and enters Parker's Glen at the Delaware. The Great Walker and Little Walker Ponds are northwest of the Brink Ponds, and Walker Creek, their outlet, flows into Brink Creek above Parker's Glen. Shohola Creek rises on the High Knob, in Blooming Grove township, and breaks over the rocks in rapids and falls of about forty feet descent at Shohola Falls, thence onward in its tortuous course through the western part of Shohola township, till it bursts through the rocks at the beautiful Shohola Glen and enters the Delaware at Shohola village.

Shohola Village.—The first settler at Shohola was Jesse Wells or James Wells, who had a little tub grist-mill and a saw-mill at this point about the time of the Revolutionary War. Mrs. Cowan, whose maiden-name was Bishop, lives across the Delaware, at Handsome Eddy, where Canope was killed. She is nearly ninety years of age, and remembers hearing Mrs. Wells say she heard the gun when they shot Canope, in 1784.[1] Mrs. Cowan used to ride on horseback with her brother to mill at Shohola, seventy-five years ago. Van Zant & Robison had the mill then. One winter the streams were low and frozen. The Delaware could be crossed anywhere, and the little mill at Shohola was patronized by the pioneers along the Delaware and through Orange County.

[1] Mrs. Cowan's maiden-name was Wood. She has always lived along the Delaware and has a vivid recollection of early incidents. She used to ride to Milford to store, and make the horse swim the Delaware behind the little batteau in which she crossed. There she bought tea at three dollars per pound and molasses at two dollars per gallon. One day during the War of 1812 they were calling troops together at Milford. She was riding a horse that had been in the service. He became excited when he heard martial music and was determined to go to the place of rendezvous, and it required the assistance of a man to get the old war-horse out of town.

David Hickock had the first store at Shohola. He lived near the burying-ground where Henry Wurtzel's barn now stands. He kept the goods in his house, stored under the bed. His stock, which consisted of tea, tobacco, sugar, etc., was thus securely tucked away, and if any one called for an article he would reach under the bed and haul out the box that contained the goods. This led the ungrateful natives to call it "The Bed Store." He brought his goods from Newburgh, and thence across the ferry at Shohola. John . Johnston lived at Shohola and worked about the mills at an early day. There is an old burying-ground here, where the pioneers are buried.

The Shohola of to-day owes its growth to the formation of a stock company of Wayne County men—George Nelden, Hon. N. B. Eldred, Elias Calkins, Joseph F. Keyes, Moses Calkins and Chauncy Thomas. The last three of these moved to Shohola and made improvements there, but to Chauncy Thomas, who finally owned seven-eighths of the stock (all but Nelden's share), belongs the credit of building up the present village of Shohola. He first erected the hotel in 1849, Timothy Horton being the first hotel-keeper, then his handsome residence with its tastefully laid-out grounds, and following this, he built the store which he conducted successfully until 1882, the date of his death, leaving a large farm and property, which he had carved out of the wilderness by his untiring industry and perseverance. Stephen S. Gardner, administrator of Chauncy Thomas, sold the whole estate, consisting of about twenty-five hundred acres, to J. F. Kilgour, who is contemplating extensive improvements in Shohola Glen, which has already been rendered accessible and famous through expenditures made by him in making roads and building fenders along the edges of the high rocks and steep bluffs, and bridges across the Shohola. As it is on the Erie Railroad, it is easily reached from New York, and thousands have visited the romantic glen during the last year, and Barryville, which is just across the river from Shohola, is connected with it by a suspension bridge.

Suspension Bridge.—A bridge connecting the village of Shohola and Barryville had long been needed, but it was not until the year 1855 that steps tending toward the realization of that need were taken. In that year John E. Roebling was building the great suspension bridge at Niagara, and Chauncey Thomas conceived the idea of putting one across the Delaware at this point. By great effort he enlisted some of the leading men of the region, a stock company was formed and work commenced. It was a difficult undertaking, for none of the workmen were practical bridge-builders, and none of them had ever seen a suspension bridge. When it came to anchoring and stretching the cables, Mr. Thomas thought it best to have the aid of a practical man, and went to Niagara to secure the assistance of one of the force there engaged. Mr. Roebling, however, could not spare any of his employees, but made a few off-hand plans which made the work perfectly clear to Mr. Thomas, and he returned and completed it. The company was also furnished by Mr. Roebling with much of the material for the bridge. The structure was completed in the fall of 1855. On the 2d of July, 1859, it was blown down, but was rebuilt the same fall. In January, 1865, it again broke down, but was again erected in the fall of 1866.

The first meeting of the Germans to organize a Lutheran Church was held over Chauncy Thomas' store in 1857. After that their meetings were held in the school-house until a Lutheran Church was erected, in 1871. Rev. J. Goetz, of Honesdale, first preached here and organized the congregation. He was followed by Rev. J. Bockstaler, and Rev. J. U. Wagner, of Hawley, now supplies the pulpit once a month. When the township was organized, in 1852, there were only about fifteen voters in it. Deacon Bross, who had moved from Milford, and Stephen D. Wells, who lived at Woodtown, were the first justices of the peace, and Jennie Bross taught the first school in a log house. By far the greatest improvement made in farming in Shohola township is by a colony of Germans, nearly all from Hesse-Darmstadt, who came here shortly after the Erie Railway was built, and went into the dense pine forests up the Shohola Creek, about Chauncy Thomas' farm, where they have cleared good farms, built residences and comfortable barns, and saved money.

George Hess was the first of these Germans to come to Shohola. He had worked on the railroad in 1848, and in 1849 moved his family from the Hudson to Shohola. Through delays, he was eleven days in making the journey. With his axe he went into the forest above Shohola to clear up a farm. He was joined by Nicholas Shields shortly after, and Francis Kreiter, Peter Eckhart, Conrad Eckhart, Leonard Roman, Jacob Peaisbacher, Henry Bridge, Jacob and George Haas, Henry Worcer, Henry C. Knealing, Esq., George F. Hipsman, John Keller, Lewis Schadler, Nicholas Hess, Jacob Hess and John Vogt soon followed. These thrifty Germans all settled in the vicinity of Shohola and cleared productive farms. Henry and Daniel Kuhn have also farms farther back.

John Fletcher Kilgour.—The history of Pike County, with all its incidents of early settlement and subsequent development, would be very incomplete did it not give somewhat in detail an account of the blue-stone quarries located therein, and of the men who, by unprecedented example in the history of the State, have been foremost in making this one of the largest and most successful industries in this part of the country.

To Mr. Kilgour may be safely imputed the honor of opening up and developing the immense hidden beds of blue-stone in the northern part of the county. He is the son of Thomas and Julia Ann (Shutt) Kilgour—the former of Scotch extraction, the latter of Holland Dutch origin—and was born at Kingston, Ulster County, N. Y., March 14, 1841. His early education from books was obtained in the city schools and academy, where he learned theoretically what he has since been successful in putting into practice. At the age of sixteen, his labor being valuable to his father, he began driving a team, hauling stone from the quarry to the dock, and continued in his father's employ until he reached his majority. For two years following he quarried stone on his own account near Kingston, and for one year thereafter he conducted successfully a retail stone-yard at Newburgh, on the Hudson. Returning, he continued operating stone quarries until 1868, when, believing that large stone interests might be developed in Pike County, Pa., he purchased some four thousand acres of lumber property, known as "Pond Eddy." He began operations on the land the following year with fifty men, and inside of two months he increased his force to one hundred and fifty men. So successful was he in this venture that during the year 1869 the firm of Kilgour, Vignes & Co. was formed, comprising the following gentlemen: John F. Kilgour, James H. Rutter (afterwards president of the Hudson River Railroad), George S. Readington, of Port Jervis, and David Vignes, of Kingston.

In 1870 Mr. Kilgour, after long hesitation, entertained a proposition from James Fiske, on account of railroad facilities on the Erie, and the advantage to be had by having gentlemen in New York interested in the business for the purpose of making a ready sale of the products of the quarries, to organize a new company, which was finally agreed upon by making Mr. Fiske president and Mr. Kilgour general superintendent. Jay Gould, the great capitalist of New York, then beginning to attract attention in financial circles of the city, and William M. Tweed, then at the head of its business affairs, were stockholders in the company, the latter taking one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the stock. After one year's successful operation of the company, through the influence of Mr. Fiske, it issued a two hundred and fifty thousand dollar gold-bearing bond upon its franchise, and paid the interest until general disaster met the business men of New York in the panic of 1873. In the mean time the deposing of Mr. Tweed lost his valuable influence to the company in furnishing and collecting for large contracts of stone for the city. Mr. Fiske was shot and killed, and Mr. Gould left the Erie Railroad, thereby thwarting the entire plans, which had induced Mr. Kilgour to consent to the organization of this company. Still worse than this, his individual responsibility on the paper of the company caused his failure with that of the company, and what he supposed to be large wealth, mostly in real estate in Passaic City, N. J., and even his own residence, had to be largely mortgaged to secure the commercial paper indorsed by him. In 1877, soon after this collapse, which he had tried for four years to bridge over, being broken in health and without means, he spent the winter at the Hot Springs in Arkansas. With that resolution and indefatigable perseverance characteristic of him, although crowded to the wall through the unfortunate circumstances of others, and left only with experience and judgment for new capital to begin business with again, in 1878 he leased a yard and began working a score of men quarrying stone. After one year he increased the number to one hundred, and in 1883, so great had his success been, that he had a force of two hundred and fifty men. This large increase of force, superintendence, and consequent increase in business, led Mr. Kilgour to associate with himself, in January, 1883, E. S. Parker, formerly of the firm of Herskie, Parker & Co., of New York, and the firm thus organized is styled "The Kilgour Blue-Stone Company."

The business of the company has rapidly increased until now, in 1886, they employ by the day four hundred and fifty men, one hundred and fifty men by the piece, and to meet the demands of their trade, contemplate increasing the number of their men to eight hundred during the year. Within the last few years they have erected large mills for sawing, planing and polishing stone, and are prepared to do the finest kind of carving, moulding, etc. Their mills are erected at Parker's Glen, formerly known as Carr's Rock. The name is in honor of Mr. Parker, a member of the company. The mills are run day and night, and electric lights are used by night.

The company now owns some six thousand acres of land in fee-simple, lease as many more, have twenty-three quarries and their land extends along the Erie Railroad from "Saw-Mill Rift," to Hancock on the main line and on the branch to Hawley.

Their public enterprise is shown by the erection of a school-house for the benefit of the children of their employes, in which they place a competent teacher at their own expense, and they have erected a hall for the use of their men, as a temperance hall, for the "order" called "The Frank A. Kilgour Total Abstinence Society." Mr. Kilgour is the sole owner of some three thousand acres outside the company, at Shohola, of the famous "Shohola Glen Hotel," and also of the "Shohola Glen" property. The superior facilities afforded here for the pleasure-seeker,—skating rink, dancing-place and numerous other attractions—will gain wide circulation and afford a resting-place for busy men during their summer vacations. Mr. Kilgour is now engaged in building a "Switch-Back Railroad," by which people can be transported from the Erie Railroad through the Glen for the small sum of five cents. He anticipates being able to accommodate one hundred thousand people at the Glen during the season of 1886, intends erecting a silk-mill the present year on the site of the old saw-mill, and a Queen Anne residence, together with large additions to his hotel. He is the owner of the "old Thomas homestead" farm, which he carries on. In the Grant Presidential campaign of 1872 he erected, at an expense of seven thousand dollars, a wigwam at Passaic, N. J., which, after it had served political ends, he turned into what was known as "Kilgour Lyceum." Mr. Kilgour affiliates with the Republican party, and has been closely identified with its work of reform for many years. He was an intimate friend of the late Senator Madden, of Middletown, N. Y., who, at the time of his failure, assisted him largely to re-engage in business and thereby attain his present success.

Mr. Kilgour is a liberal supporter of church and educational interests at his own home at Passaic, where his large contributions for benevolent objects lighten the burdens of those less able, and secure to himself the satisfaction of feeling that, commensurate with his prosperity, the works of benevolent charity and every object and enterprise calculated to benefit his fellow-citizens should also be built up and sustained. He has always been known as a progressive citizen, large-hearted and generous, and has reached the royal road to wealth in the same way other men have found it—by dint of hard work, energy, patient perseverance and untiring industry. A correspondent of the Port Jervis Gazette says of him,—

"He is known all over the country as the 'Blue-Stone King.' Long may he enjoy the sobriquet, for he has well earned it. At Shohola, and at Parker's Glen, where the blue-stone works are located, Mr. Kilgour shows himself the same generous, liberal-minded citizen he is in Passaic. At Shohola he has just broken ground for the erection of five cottages and commenced building operations on the construction of a switch-back gravity road that is to carry visitors to points of interest in the glen. He takes a prominent part in the temperance work at both these places, and under the auspices of himself and son, Mr. Frank Kilgour, a live, practical reform club is in practical operation, to which he contributes liberally and judiciously. He is very much liked by his workmen, and in return for their faithful service, does all that is possible to render their work attractive."

He married, in the spring of 1864, Maggie, daughter of Silas Wood, of Kingston, N. Y., who died June 9, 1883, leaving the following children: Frank A., Albert Stearns, Maggie Belle, Lulu May, John Fletcher, Jr., Florence Edna and Maud Eva Kilgour.

Carr's Rock, or Parker's Glen.—Carr's Rock was so named by the Delaware raftsmen because one of their number was compelled to stay all night on a large rock at this point, by an accident to his raft, which cast him on the rock that ever after bore his name. When the Erie Railroad passed through, the station was so named, but recently it has been called Parker's Glen, in honor of the partner of J. F. Kilgour in the blue-stone quarry business. Judge John Ryerson, a Quaker from Philadelphia, had a saw-mill on Walker Creek years ago. He was an educated man, and lived on the river-bank near Carr's Rock. Peter Van Auken afterward resided there. In April, 1868, several passenger cars from the Erie Railway ran off at this point and caught fire. Six or more passengers were killed or burned to death, and a number wounded. Parker's Glen has now become the headquarters of J. F. Kilgour & Co.'s stone-works. They have stone-mills erected and machinery for sawing, planing and rubbing stone. The stone is cut to order for building purposes. A large quantity of stone is cut into water-table for stone and brick buildings. The material is not, strictly speaking, blue stone. It does not contain as much lime as blue-stone, and is consequently more durable than blue-stone or marble, and is a rival of granite for durability. This new industry, which is being developed on an extensive scale by J. F. Kilgour & Co., is likely to prove a great source of wealth to Pike County in the future. Her rock-ribbed hills are full of a fine-grained stone that can be worked, and is susceptible of a very good polish. Being of a durable quality and accessible to the New York market, Pike County quarries will be worked more in the near future than at present. Flag-stones are shipped from all the railroad stations in Shohola and Lackawaxen townships. Besides Mr. Kilgour, John Smith, Woodward & Maxwell and others, with headquarters at Pond Eddy, are engaged in the business. There are four or five hundred men employed in the quarries, and otherwise in connection with the business. A beautiful waterfall and rapids is seen up the Walker Creek, not far from Parker's Glen. Mr. Kilgour contemplates building a silk-mill at Parker's Glen, which will make it a place of considerable importance. Calvin Crane settled on the river about one mile north of Parker's Glen in 1839, and cleared up a good place; his son, Manning F. Crane, lived there many years. Valentine Eckhart has the place at present.

Pond Eddy.—A man by the name of Corey is said to have been the pioneer of this point. Levi Middagh, a son of Courtright Middagh, cleared a farm on the Delaware, between Parker's Glen and Pond Eddy. His sons, Levi and James, now live there. Pond Eddy, doubtless, received its name from the fact that the Delaware sweeps towards the Pennsylvania side, making a pond-like eddy. The old raftsmen, who gave names to the different points along the river, would soon discover the resemblance and thus christen it. The mountain comes down close to the river at this point and leaves but little room for buildings. George Conners has a store, however, and there is a suspension bridge crossing to the York State side, where most of the dwellings are located. It is a stopping-place on the Erie Railway, and is a shipping point for stone that is taken from the hills in the vicinity. The first attempt of importance made to develop the wealth combined in these blue-stone deposits was by two men named Johnson and Rowe, who formed a copartnership in 1865, and purchased a tract of land at Pond Eddy, upon which was a quarry. They quarried some splendid stone, but, owing to the hold the Hudson River stone had in the market, found little sale for it. In the spring of 1865 Rowe died and the quarry was disposed of to other parties, doubtless, the New York and Pennsylvania Blue-Stone Company. For miles along the Erie Railway, in Pike County, the mountains are filled with inexhaustible deposits of blue-stone, and their development on a large scale is only a matter of time.

Woodtown and the Upland Settlements.—Hermannis Brink settled at what is now known as Woodtown, about the time of the Revolution or shortly after. He was a lumberman and paid little attention to farming, having at that time a saw-mill on Brink Pond Brook. They cut the good pine all off of this section more than seventy years ago. Jonathan and Daniel were probably his sons. They left their improvement, being later owned by Hornbeck and David Case, who sold it to Charles Wood in 1830. Reeves Wood, his son, came with him and built a saw-mill on Brink Creek. He remained but a short time, however, though Charles Wood stayed and cleared a farm in what is now called Woodtown. Decatur Wells, his son-in-law, lives on the homestead and Bradner Wood, his son, adjoining on part of the homestead.

Parker Manning, a robust, powerful man, took up four hundred acres of land not far from the Walker Pond, he and his boys clearing two good farms and planting orchards. Besides, he cleared a considerable part of Taylortown land. He has improved altogether two or three hundred acres of Pike County land. Charles F. Higby lives on one of these places and George May on the other. Old David Canfield resided in the vicinity of Woodtown during the Indian troubles and his sons Jesse Canfield and John Canfield, who were rugged men, cleared productive farms. Charles Kirkpatrick and Jacob Keller now occupy these places. John Lee lives in the vicinity of Parker's Glen, on the old Knapp place. George Haas, Adam Haas and William Saddler have farms in the vicinity of the Manning clearing. Allen Coursen and his three sons—Allen N., John and Shaffer—improved land in the vicinity of Brink Ponds. John Curry also cleared a farm bordering on the pond. Lewis cultivated a farm two miles down the creek from Shohola Falls, his son Gabriel owning it now. Jesse McKane cleared a farm in that vicinity and reared a family of twenty-two children. There is a large saw-mill at Shohola Falls, employing about thirty-five men.

There are five public schools in Shohola township—The Walker School near Woodtown; Pond Eddy; Parker's Glen; Middagh's and Shohola Glen.

Shohola had seven hundred and fifteen inhabitants in 1880.

Tobias Hornbeck built a hotel and saw-mill at Shohola Falls, on the Milford and Owego turnpike, about 1815. He came about 1820.

Isaac Blackmore lived one mile east of Shohola at an early date, probably before 1800. He was from the Eastern States and an educated man. His children were Hiram, Ganges, Solomon, Paul and Darien.

Samuel Helm lived about one mile farther east. Hiram Helm married one of Blackmore's daughters. The Blackmores were large, tall men, and lived chiefly by hunting and fishing. Samuel Helm was a squatter at Lord's Valley, and when Levi Lord, who had purchased the property, came to his cabin-door, Helm said: "I know what you want; come in and welcome; you have paid for the land and it is yours." He was a descendant on his mother's side of Manuel Gonsales, the first white settler of Sullivan, and on his father's side of Simon Helm. His father was Peter Helm, a son of Michael Helm, killed near Summitville by the Indians. His mother's maiden-name was Elizabeth Gonsales. He was nearly six feet in height, broad-shouldered, muscles well developed, nerves as true as steel and bones as strong as a lion's. His fists would strike sledge-hammer blows. He could run like a deer and his eye was as piercing as an eagle's. His dress was homespun, hunting-shirt buckskin, pants of rough linen, with deer-skin leggins, his shoes moccasins. When prepared for a deer-hunt his appearance was truly regal.

SHOHOLA GLEN SILK MILLS,
SHOHOLA, PA.

Helm was a mighty hunter and killed wild turkeys, grouse, ducks and geese without number. He shot scores of deer on the runways, and many more when they came to the ponds at night to water and feed on the white pond-lilies. He was a splendid shot at a target, and at night could easily snuff a candle at fifty paces.

Sam always claimed that he knew of mines of valuable ore along the mountain, and among them coal and silver. He was not a scientist and knew nothing of the transit of Venus, but he possessed knowledge of immense value to a frontiersman. He had not studied grammar, yet used words that fully expressed his meaning. He knew nothing of maps and geography, but the moss on the trees was his compass by day and the "pointers" showed him north in the night-time. He had no watch, but the sun and stars told him the time unerringly. Addition, subtraction, multiplication and division were all the arithmetic he had ever learned, yet he could calculate great sums with wonderful exactness.

Sam was very clear-headed, a close calculator, never given to idleness, and yet he died comparatively poor at Shohola, Pa. Sam was noble-hearted and everywhere met a welcome; his only faults were a dogged perseverance in conquering an enemy, and the Helm-Gonsales trait of forgiving an insult when properly asked to, but never forgetting the aggressor.

At the time of Brandt's second invasion of the valley, Helm was down the river, near the old Van Auken fort. When the houses were burning at Peenpack, he was with the scouts watching their movements. When Colonel Tusten's force came across the mountain he joined them. He was present when Meeker's bad advice was given and complied with. He heard Brandt shout to our officers to surrender; that his force was three times the strongest, and that if they would lay down their arms he would give them protection. The answer he received was a bullet through his belt. Brandt now gave the order of battle, and by a masterpiece of strategy divided the forces of his opponents. Then came a long and bloody fight, commencing in the morning of that hot July day of 1779, and ending near sundown with the death and capture of Hathorn's forces. Not a single wounded soldier was left untomahawked and unscalped. The warriors buried their dead, cared for their wounded and left the field of battle triumphant, leaving the bodies of the white men food for ravenous beasts and carrion birds, and their bones to bleach amid the storms and snows and frosts of many winters.

Sam Helm was wounded through both thighs at the battle of Conashaugh, elsewhere described.

About the time that Sam Helm lived at Shohola there was an Englishman of good education trying to make a living about a mile from where Ira B. Rosencrance now lives. His success was very indifferent, and the father of Colonel Mott and the late C. C. D. Pinchot went up, moved him down to Milford, and succeeded in getting a school for him. He taught until he had sufficient funds to take him to New York, where he had friends in Maiden Lane—then the heart of the city. He was compelled to leave his wife in Milford, and she occasionally wrote rather complaining letters to him. In answering her letters, he wrote the following lines:

"When Carpenter's Point shall be crossed without ferry,
And the falls of Shohola shall boast of a store;
When Uncle Sam Helm shall cease to be merry,
Then, dearest Ellen, I'll love you no more."

When Helm would get a little more "tanglefoot" in his system than was good for him, he would repeat the above lines, and it was supposed by many that they were original with him, but they were written by the Englishman, as above stated.

Sam Helm married a Westfall. His sons were Solomon, Hiram and William. The last of the race remembered about Milford was young Sam Helm, the rattlesnake tamer. He was a descendant of the Helms heretofore mentioned. He would often appear on the streets of Milford with a box of rattlesnakes that he would wind around his neck and arms.

CHAPTER XIII.

BLOOMING GROVE.

Blooming Grove township was erected from Lackawaxen and Palmyra townships, December 17, 1850. It is the central township of Pike County, and the only one that does not border on some township outside of Pike. It is bounded on the north by Lackawaxen, northeast by Shohola, east by Dingman, south by Porter and Greene, and west by Palmyra. The High Knob is the highest point of land in Pike County, being seventeen hundred feet above the Water Gap. On this mountain, on what is called the West Knob, the Brodhead, Bushkill, Shohola and Blooming Grove Creeks rise, within one fourth of a mile of each other. The Big Knob and Grasser Ponds lie on top of the knob, about one-fourth mile apart. Another pond is at the foot of the knob. Edmond Lord says that the "Big Indian Swamp" was a pond when he first came there, in 1810, but that it has since grown and become a cranberry marsh. Blooming Grove is mostly unfit for cultivation. It consists of pine and scrub-oak barrens, off of which most of the valuable timber has been taken.

Dr. Philip P. Monington, a land speculator, sold a tract of land in Blooming Grove township to Levi Lord and his twelve English associates,—Joseph Brooks, Robert Hatton, Samuel Hunt, Wilson Croft, William Whittaker, John Whittaker, Thomas Harselden, Robert Ogden, Abram Johnson, James Powers and William Manly, who all came from England in the same ship, in 1809. On investigation they found Monington's title not good, and all but Levi Lord settled elsewhere in Pike County. Mr. Lord had a survey made and repurchased the land where Lord's Valley now is. He and his son Simeon settled there about 1810. They found the noted hunter, Sam Helm, and his son Solomon, as squatters, having built two log cabins. Sam gave possession peaceably. He remarked, "Come in; the land is yours, for you have bought it and paid for it." Sam Helm was a tall hunter and trapper, with an eagle eye. He lived by hunting and fishing, and had, probably, been there a number of years. They had made a small clearing, and Mr. Lord, having satisfied them for their improvement, moved into one of the Helm cabins. This cabin was located on the old Indian trail from Milford to Dolph Bingham's, and has, for many years, been known as Lord's Valley. The main, traveled road, at that time, was from Bushkill through by Shohola Farms. In 1850, after the stage route was opened, Levi Lord and his sons built a brick hotel, from brick which they burned on the premises.

James Ivison was a Methodist preacher at this place. Theodore Bowhannan built a sawmill near by, at Lord's Valley, which afterwards became the property of Levi Lord.

His children were Simeon, who succeeded his father in the hotel business. Simeon Lord's sons were Baron Lord, who lives in Hawley; Levi, who resides at the High Knob; and Simeon Lord, Jr., who succeeds his father at the old tavern-stand. Of Levi Lord's other children, William removed to Philadelphia; James lived in Blooming Grove until he was forty-six, and then went West; Edmond Lord remained until he was forty, and then moved to Lehman township. He is now eighty-four years of age, and a hale, hearty old man. He recently walked from Newton to Lord's Valley, a distance of thirty miles, carrying a load on his back, between the rising and setting sun. He has never used tobacco in any form, nor drank liquor, although brought up in a hotel and living in Pike County. His father's family consisted of sixteen children. One sister, Betsey, married William Manly, who built a stone tavern at the forks of the Bethany and Hawley roads, in Lackawaxen township. His sister Ellen still lives, in Philadelphia, aged ninety-six. Edmond Lord has been a great hunter, and killed many deer, wild-cats and bears.

William Spearing had a house thirty by forty feet, and two stories high, on the old Wilderness road, in Blooming Grove, before Solomon Westbrook bought it, in 1827. It was built of large square sticks of hewn pine timber. The old mill was up the Blooming Grove Creek about one and one-fourth miles from where the Paupack and Tafton roads fork, and was built by Charles B. Seaman, ex-sheriff of Pike County. In 1827 Solomon Westbrook rebuilt this mill, and John C. Westbrook, his son, the present saw-mill in 1847, and the grist-mill in 1855. Solomon Westbrook was a merchant and lumberman, and once sheriff of Pike County. He married Hannah Coolbaugh, a daughter of John Coolbaugh, once associate judge. His children were Margaret, who married John B. Stoll, of Newark, N. J.; John C. Westbrook, who was first elected prothonotary in 1845, and has been seven times re-elected. The prothonotary in Pike County is clerk of the several courts, register of wills and recorder of deeds. Mr. Westbrook is a competent officer, and merits the confidence which the voters of Pike County repose in him. Lafayette Westbrook has been a member of the Assembly from Pike several times, and now lives in Stroudsburg. Hiram is in Ridgewood, N. J. Moses C. Westbrook is on the homestead, and Susan lives in Newark, N. J. John Young resides in the vicinity, and Mr. Buskirk has a grist-mill at Westbrook's. Joseph Brown first settled where William H. Nyce afterward lived. Daniel Brodhead bought this property and sold it to Solomon and John Westbrook and William H. Nyce, about 1835, when John Nyce superintended the saw-mills, and in 1846 William H. Nyce came with his family. His wife was Margaret Westbrook, his children being John Nyce, who measured logs for the Wilsonville mills a number of years, and is now life insurance agent at Hawley; Safforyne W. Nyce, who lives in Milford; Andrew J., who lives in Paupack; and James, who lives in Deckertown.

Jacob Kreinhans bought the Blooming Grove property of William H. Nyce in 1851, and built a tannery on Blooming Grove Creek, containing fifty vats. He purchased in all about four thousand acres, and tanned sole leather until the bark was exhausted, in 1882, when he purchased the Dr. Edward Halliday property in Milford, where he now resides. John Ploss, Charles Durling and several other Germans have good farms in the western part of the township, on Egypt Creek. Squire L. Hazen, William Downey, John Pletcher and some others own farms in the vicinity of the High Knob. There are two post-offices in the township—one at Lord's Valley and another at Blooming Grove. There are also schools at each of these places and one near the High Knob. There are no churches, but occasionally preaching is heard in one of the school-houses. The population of the township in 1880 was four hundred and seventy-two.

The scrub oaks of Pike County make good railroad ties, of which a number of thousands are furnished every year to the Erie Railroad. There are also thousands of hoop-poles shipped to New York, and thence to the West Indies; but since the lumber and bark have become exhausted, the central part of Pike County, like Blooming Grove, is better adapted to hunting and fishing.

The Blooming Grove Park Association was projected by Wm. H. Bell, of Branchville, Sussex County, N. J., and Fayette S. Giles in 1870. John C. Westbrook and Lafayette Westbrook deeded thirteen thousand acres of land to the association, and they have since purchased one thousand acres in addition. F. S. Giles was the first president of the association. The stockholders have changed, and most of the stock is now held by New York parties. The lands lie in Blooming Grove, Greene and Porter townships, and include Lakes Beaver, Giles, Scott, Bruce, Westbrook, Laura, Ernest and Belle, according to the names which the association have given them. One square mile of the land is inclosed by a wire fence, as a breeding park, in which they have about two hundred deer. The club-house is erected on ground overlooking Giles Lake, or Blooming Grove Pond, as it was formerly called, at a cost of about ten thousand dollars.

The Shohola Farms are on the old Wilderness road, about three miles from Shohola Falls. This is a very old place, and was occupied by an Englishman before the Revolution (as early as 1754), who kept an inn, and had barn room for sixty horses. The shingles were nailed with four-inch wrought nails. This man, who was fourteen miles in the wilderness, lived in great style for those days, if we credit the story of an old lady who passed through about the time of the Revolution. A farm was cleared, and good-sized apple-trees were growing; but at the time of the Revolutionary War this owner, who appears to have been a Tory, abandoned his property. It was managed by agents for years, transferred from one stock company to another, and is now owned by a company who are running sawmills and lumbering on it.

During the struggle for the location of the county-seat Daniel Dingman, who was a member of the Legislature, secured an act removing the county-seat of Wayne County from Bethany to Blooming Grove, but the county commissioners bid defiance to the law, and refused to levy a tax to erect county buildings there. They justly claimed that the county was poor and unable to go to any extra expense. General Spearing, who owned land in Blooming Grove, had a village laid out in town plots and built several substantial log houses, but the erection of Pike into a new county changed the status of affairs, and Milford raised fifteen hundred dollars by the 1st of June, 1814, which was the condition under which the county-seat was established at Milford. The High Knob is on the most elevated land in Pike County, and forms the divide or water-shed between several creeks. The township of Blooming Grove contains a few good farms, but it is better adapted to hunting and fishing.

CHAPTER XIV.

PORTER TOWNSHIP.

PORTER TOWNSHIP was erected from Delaware and Lehman, December 16, 1851. It lies in the southern part of Pike County, is bounded on the southwest by Monroe, on the west by Greene, on the north by Blooming Grove and Dingman and on the east by Delaware and Lehman. The Blooming Grove Park Association's lands extend into the northeastern corner, through which runs Taylor's Creek, emptying into the Big Bushkill, which flows through the northwestern part of the township and receives the waters of Rocky Hill Creek, which joins it west of Porterville. Rocky Hill Creek is the outlet of Rocky Hill Pond, in Dingman township, and also receives the outlet of Porter Lake. Saw Creek rises in the northern part of Porter township, and flows south through the east central part of Porter and the southwestern part of Lehman, into the Big Bushkill. It receives the outlet of Twelve-Mile Pond, which is in the south central part of the township. Porter township was named in honor of Hon. James Madison Porter, who bought a large tract of land of James Place, cleared a farm and built the first house out by Porter Lake, at Porterville, in 1849. The following persons were assessed in 1853: William R. Brodhead, with a house and saw-mill; Wells L. Bowhanan, house and saw-mill; Moses and John Coolbaugh, sawmill; Martin Cortright & Co., house and sawmill; William Overwild, house and saw-mill; Elijah Quigley, saw-mill; Wallace & Bowhanan, house and saw-mill. Besides these, John Countryman, Albert Countryman, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob Decker, Charles Evans, J. Van Frast, J. B. Hall, John Kittle, Andrew Lake, William Overwell, James M. Porter, William Rake, William Smith, Charles Strunk, W. L. Smith, Andrew Shaft, Moses Smith, Nelson Waker, Jeffrey Wells, Christian Yerkes and John Titman. William Rhinehart and N. A. Rhinehart have the mill and hotel at Portersville now.

Philip B. Clark, Henry Evarts, William Harrison, Francis Mercer, Arthur Post, William Rake, William S. and William V. Rhine-

hart, Hiram, Moses C. and Jeffrey Smith, Luke Whittaker and Abram C. Heater were the principal inhabitants in 1880. The township contains some good timber land, but has been mostly slashed over and allowed to grow up without being cleared. There were but ninety-nine inhabitants in the township in 1880. They have about twelve voters, and divide up the offices among them. In fact, honors are plentiful in Porter township. The school board stood a tie for three years in relation to the propriety of building a certain school-house and the matter was referred to the courts. The court could not declare the seats of the six directors vacant, as there was not material enough in the township to fill their places. Abraham Coolbaugh furnished the money and finally one or more school-houses were built. Philip Clark is postmaster, supervisor, justice of the peace, etc. During the summer Porter Lake is visited by hunters and fishermen. There is a school near Twelve-Mile Pond and one on the Bushkill, above Porterville. A State road runs from Bushkill through the township and on through to Blooming Grove. Another road, called the Brodhead, Titman and Ridgeway road, runs from Egypt Mills to Porterville.

CHAPTER XV.

GREENE TOWNSHIP.

GREENE was taken from Palmyra in 1859. It is the southwestern township of Pike County and bounded on the north by Palmyra and Blooming Grove, on the east by Porter, on the south by Monroe County and on the west by Wayne County. The Seventeen-Mile Run, Nineteen-Mile Run, Sugar Hill Creek and East Branch all flow southeast into the south branch of the Wallenpaupack. The Big Bushkill takes its rise in the eastern part of the township. There are five ponds, among them the East Branch Pond and Promised Land Pond, which is an artificial or saw-mill pond covering about twelve hundred acres. It was formed by damming up the head-waters of the East Branch, a low, swampy region, covered with spruce, laurel, pine, etc., the lair of bears and wild-cats in former times. That part of Greene which adjoins the Paupack was part of Salem from 1808 until 1814, after which Pike was formed and the Paupack made the dividing line, when Greene was assessed and became part of Palmyra; previous to that it was included in Delaware township. Greene has several large hills. On approaching from Houcktown the first hill is Buck Hill, as it slopes south. It was a favorite resort of deer; hence the name. Panther Hill lies south of the Little Sugar Hill Creek. Big or Carleton Hill lies northeast of Sugar Hill, while Sugar Hill lies southwest of Sugar Hill Creek. The township has been principally settled from the Paupack Valley, and it is not known who first built a cabin on the flats, on the east side of the Paupack. The first settlers on the flats were mere squatters and located their cabins to suit their convenience. It is said that Thomas Dickerson cleared across the Paupack on what is now a part of the Josiah Whittaker place. Aside from these cabins on the flats, and perhaps before any of them were built in Greene, Abram Wissemere or Wismer, built a cabin in the eastern part of the township, back of Sugar Hill, on the road from Stroudsburg to the flats, known as the Wismer road. James Simons was assessed in 1809 with four hundred acres of land, Abram Simons with two hundred acres, Joseph Simons with two hundred acres—three acres of which is improved—one house and two cows. James and Abram were evidently non-residents at this time. James Simons located about one-half mile east of the Paupack and cleared up a good farm. He built the stone house now occupied by his son Samuel. His son Thomas located on part of the tract about one-half mile north of the homestead. Jabez Simons located north of his brother, on the lot that Benjamin Sheerer had squatted on, having cleared a large farm. James Simons, Jr., located about one and one-half miles southeast of his father. Abram Simons lives on the old Joseph Simons place, which joins the James Simons farm on the southwest. The Simonses live about two miles from Ledgedale. David Hartson Carleton, a chair-maker, came from New England and located at the foot of Big or Carleton Hill, south of Sugar Hill, in the year 1817. He built a log hut and made quite a clearing. His children were David H., Roxanna, Mary, Thomas, Emily, George W., Sally and Betsey. David H. Carleton located about one-half mile northwest of his father, was the first justice of the peace in Greene, and county commissioner at one time. He married Nancy S. Dickerson. Among his children are David Albert Carleton, who married Elizabeth Banks, located on Buck Hill, cleared a farm and built a comfortable dwelling. Carleton school-house is near by. John Carleton, a brother of the foregoing, married Mary Banks and located about three miles from his father. Roxanna married George Miller and lives in Wilkes-Barre. Mary was the wife of John Corey, who located in Greene, about three miles east of the Flats, at a place called Coreyville, in his honor. Thomas D. Carleton located in Dreher. Emily was the wife of Robert Bortree, who lived in Greene, opposite the Robert Bortree mill property. Sally was the wife of Joseph M. Kipp. Jacob Gilner bought the old D. H. Carleton place. Thomas Dickerson settled on Sugar Hill in 1814 or earlier. His son, Thomas J. Dickerson, who married Eliza Beech in 1830, probably obtained an education by reading and study at his humble home. He served with faithfulness as county commissioner for six years, and was justice of the peace for twenty years. He lived to be seventy-five years of age, and often related that he sat at the door of his father's cabin at close of day and heard the howl of the wolf and the screams of the panther and wild cat.

Of his children, Benjamin moved to Kansas; Silas J. lives on part of the homestead; Ruth, who married G. H. Bortree, and Esther, who married J. Butler, live on part of the homestead; Augusta, who married A. Hopps, lives on lands adjoining the homestead; Richmond went to Texas; John Wilmer Dickerson was a student, while others were telling bear stories or otherwise passing their time. The writer remembers him as a teacher of East School. He removed to Bedford County, became county superintendent and representative of Bedford and Fulton in the Assembly. He studied law, was admitted, finally became blind, but had some one read the Acts of Assembly to him and continued to plead cases until he died, when but a young man. Thomas T. Dickerson was fatally wounded at Charles City Court-House, Va., June 18, 1864, during the late war.

Isaac I. Kipp came from Philadelphia to Greene April 10, 1820, and settled in what is now known as Kipptown, where his son, John Kipp, now lives. He and Jacob Keene built the first frame house in the township, buying two hundred and thirty-four acres of land of Edward Tilghman. The settlers in the township, before they came, were nearly all squatters. Among them at the time of their advent was Abram Wissemore, who lived about one-half mile from Kipp's, on the southwest. He sold his squatter's right to John Dunning; afterward John Burns bought the land of Cadwalader, and Dunning got nothing for his improvement. Jacob Keene, who came with Kipp, located on the west. Andrew Corey and Jesse Ransberry purchased one hundred and ten acres, northeast of Kipp's, about 1831. They built log houses and cleared a farm. Thomas J. Dickerson purchased one hundred and seventeen acres north of Kipp's in 1835. He built a log house and made a clearing. Jacob Mash purchased one hundred and seventeen acres east of Kipp's in 1846. James Edwards came from Philadelphia and lived on the Jacob Keene place until 1847, when he purchased fifty-eight and one-half acres south of Kipp's, and Charles Batzel secured the other half. James Edwards now lives in Salem, aged eighty-seven. His sons were Joseph B., John and Jacob. Allen Megargel purchased four hundred acres where Ehrgood's mill now is in 1816. He built a saw-mill and grist-mill about 1825. Isaac Megargel, his son, took possession of the property in 1828 and sold it to William Ehrgood in 1830. The first saw-mill in Greene was built by John R. Galpin, about 1843. The next was the Joseph Atkinson, Sr., saw-mill at Promised Land, which was so named by Mr. Murray, who assisted in building the mill. The Promised Land Pond covers an almost impenetrable spruce swamp, which is but a continuation of the swamp known as "The Shades of Death," the name being doubtless given in derision. The title is well established and denotes all that wilderness region of scrub oak, pine and spruce about Atkinson's mill-pond. The Kipp saw-mill was built on the East Branch in 1851. Nathan Houck's mills and stick factory were erected at Houcktown, on the Buck Hill stream, in 1855. Thomas Bartleson purchased land of Megargel about 1828, cleared up fifty acres and built the largest barn in the township.

John K. Brink and George Smith came to Greene about 1842. After the ice freshet in Paupack, which destroyed Brink's cattle, his family, who succeeded in making their escape, came to the Abram Nye place, in Salem, and from thence to Greene. He purchased one hundred and seventeen acres and shortly after sold one-half of it to George Smith, who had a family of twelve children,—George and Lewis R. were twins; Emeline lives with her mother; Lunis lives in Greene; Levi, James R., John and Benjamin live elsewhere.

James Baillie settled, in 1845, about one mile west of East Branch Pond. Augustus Seifert and Adam Hazer also located in that vicinity, on the road from Kipp's mill to Roemerville. The Reichel brothers settled about 1846. Then came Charles Wolf and John Fribilie, and next the Waltz Hotel was built. Henry Roemer settled in Roemerville, which is on Nineteen-Mile Run. The Roemer, or Winooka, Falls at this place are about sixty feet high. Charles Monsette, a Frenchman, had a steam mill. Christian Bletz and John N. Walter located at Roemerville; John Barnhaff settled at Goose Pond. The first school-house was built on Allen Megargel's property; Joseph Simons and Isaac I. Kipp were the first teachers.

Isaac I. Kipp married Susan Vaughn. His children were Mary (wife of James Cross) and John (who married Hannah Correll). John's sons are Isaac M. (a blacksmith), Horace E. (a wagon-maker), Benjamin F. (who has the saw-mill), George W. (who was once commissioner of Wayne County and is now a lumberman in Bradford County) and John A. (superintendent of Pike County schools). His daughters are Mary (wife of Sylvanus Van Gorder), Susan (wife of Thomas H. Gilpin, who built a store near the saw-mill in 1866, the first store in Greene; he has a stick factory in connection with his saw-mill), Margaret (is the wife of Horatio Simons), Betsey (is the wife of George Banks) and Helen W. (is unmarried).

Joseph Kipp lived where Peter Mash now resides for a number of years, finally sold his place and moved to Vineland, N. J.

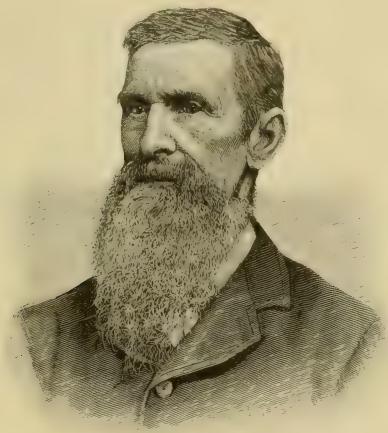
Robert G. Croft settled on the Allen Megargel property. David Robinson came to Greene with Allen Megargel in 1816. He was a squatter in Greene for a number of years, built several houses, but never owned any real estate. His son Wesley has property about one mile from Ledgedale. George N. Schwepenheiser, —which is the old way of spelling the name— came to Greene in 1860, and bought the James Edwards place. His son, George A. Swepeniser, lives with him. He took the census in 1880, when there were eleven hundred and sixty-seven inhabitants. On the township's erection, in 1829, there were but seventeen votes polled and about one hundred inhabitants. The names of the schools are Maple Grove, Kipptown, Sugar Cabin, Sugar Hill, Coreyville, Jones, Carleton's, German Valley, Roemerville. The Promised Land property, of several thousand acres, belongs to the Shakers. It contains a saw-mill and a small farm.

Peter Heberling came to Newfoundland in 1835. His son Peter bought a tract of land west of Sugar Hill, and cleared a farm. Old Peter Straub, the last of the old German settlers, lives with him, aged ninety-four. William Hebberling, John Kindt, Frederick Klein, Charles Augenstein, Anthony Roemer and a number of other Germans and Frenchmen have helped to clear and improve Greene township. William Banks came from England to Greene in 1843, and settled on the Howe & Elliott tract, near Sugar Hill. His children were William, James and Samuel, who assisted their father in clearing the farm. They dug a pit, and with one man in the pit and another above, sawed sufficient lumber by hand to build a plank house. Mr. Banks and his sons were ingenious and rendered themselves very comfortable.

The Hemlock Grove Church was built in 1875. The first class in Greene was organized by Rev. J. F. Williams. Lewis Robacker led the first class, consisting of Lewis Robacker and wife, Samuel Banks and wife, Horace Kipp and wife, Mrs. Hannah Kipp, Mrs. Shiffler, Mrs. John Corey, Mrs. Hoover and Mrs. Lavinia Kipp. William Banks was a local Methodist preacher.

When Henry Roemer went to the head of Sugar Hill Creek, where he settled, there were no neighbors within a distance of seven miles. He built a log cabin in 1840, covered it with bark, and logged up a field without any team. He lived to be eighty-three. His children were Matilda, Anthony and Adolphus. His first neighbors were John Walter, whose place is now occupied by Frank Miller; Felix Ollsommer, John Morro and some other Frenchmen. Alfred Jolen built a road in to Hicks' Pond, and Charles Low has a saw-mill located there.

Houcktown.—Christopher Betchler built a saw-mill at Coreyville in 1850. Richard D. Jones and H. A. Lancaster purchased this mill in 1882 and erected a large stick-factory, employing twenty-five hands. This property was bid in for the creditors by George G. Waller, Esq., and is now operated by George H. Lancaster.



H. A. and George H. Lancaster built an umbrella-stick factory at German Valley in 1878, and in 1881 George H. Lancaster sold his interest in this factory and the one at Coreyville to R. D. Jones, who employed about forty hands. The German Valley factory burned down March 15, 1886.

After Pike County was separated from Wayne a portion of Salem west of the Paupack River was assessed as Salem, in Pike County, in 1815. Thomas Dickerson, assessor, returns himself with three acres of improved land; Gabriel Davis, whose residence was on the other side of the river, with three-fourths acre; Abram Wissemore, six acres; Jacob Smith, nine acres; Henry Wissemore, single man, on eighteen and three-fourths acres improved land in Greene in 1815.

Greene township has been greatly improved within the last forty years, and is one of the best agricultural townships in Pike County. The hills of Greene were once covered with hemlock and hard-wood forests. The southern part of Greene, about Sugar Hill, Buck Hill and the vicinity of Houcktown, were grown with maple and beech. The maple-groves, in particular, were large and densely wooded. These woods were formerly the home of the deer and the streams were celebrated for trout.

Nathan Houck.—Very little is known of his ancestry beyond the fact that his paternal grandfather was Peter, who lived a long and useful life in Lehigh County, Pa. He was the first sheriff there, and an active member of the Lutheran Church. His maternal grandfather was Abraham Harp, who spent his life in Berks County, Pa. Peter Houck, son of Peter, and father of the subject of this notice, was born in Allentown June 25, 1777. He married his wife, Elizabeth Harp, in Berks County, Pa., May 10, 1801, and the majority of his years thereafter was spent in the vicinity of Boyertown. He was a carpenter and joiner, and in politics an active Democrat. He died December 30, 1854, and the death of his wife occurred February 19, 1875. Nathan Houck, son of Peter and Elizabeth (Harp) Houck, was born March 24, 1818, at Boyertown, Berks County, Pa. He served his father until about twenty-one years of age, and in the meantime acquired such an education as his opportunities at that time afforded. The next sixteen years of his life were divided between Philadelphia, Montgomeryville and Spruce Grove, during which time he was engaged in cabinet-making, lumbering, etc. In 1855 he purchased of John Torrey about three hundred acres of land in Greene township, Pike County, Pa., where he immediately settled with his family and has since resided. This tract of land was at that time an unbroken wilderness, and Mr. Houck cut the road through, leading the first team that entered there. He at once began the erection of a temporary residence, the material used in its construction being peeled bark. The first and only beds they had for some time on which to rest their weary bodies, consisted of boughs or brush. Here presented an opportunity for Mr. Houck to put into practical use the knowledge he had gained from lumbering. He lost no time in making a beginning, and for a number of years he applied himself with that will and determination which has characterized his whole life, and by careful management and economy became the possessor at one time of over two thousand acres of land, and now, at the close of the year 1885, he has many acres under a good state of cultivation, and has, besides, made extensive and valuable improvements thereon. During the War of the late Rebellion he furnished the government immense quantities of tent poles or sticks, and at about that time conceived the idea of umbrella and parasol sticks, also clothes-pins, toys, etc., and for that purpose erected a factory in 1872, and has since added to it until it is now one of the largest in the country of its kind. It employs one hundred and ten horse-power. Capacity per day, for umbrella and parasol sticks, two hundred gross; clothes-pins, two hundred boxes of five gross each; tops and balls, one hundred and fifty gross; and when in full operation their works give employment to seventy-five men, including those engaged in the woods preparing timber for the purposes above mentioned.

Nathan Houck was married, April 14, 1841, to Luanna, daughter of Abraham and Elizabeth (Berger) Deetz, of Bucks County, Pa. They have children,—John D., born September 28, 1842; Charles, born January 1, 1845; Franklin, born May 29, 1847 (died in infancy); Elizabeth, born March 17, 1849, wife of Dr. Fletcher Gilpin; Amanda, born September 6, 1851, wife of Emory Gilpin; Emma, born February 10, 1854, wife of Frank Nicholson; Anna M., born June 9, 1856, died October 5, 1864; Carrie M., born Nov. 26, 1860, wife of Dr. Arthur Simons. Mr. and Mrs. Houck are both members of the church, and in politics, he is an active Democrat. John D. and Charles Houck have recently succeeded to the business their father established, and, with the inheritance of his good name, success must surely await them.

HISTORY OF MONROE COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

ERECTION OF THE COUNTY — COUNTY-SEAT CONTEST—CIVIL LIST.

MONROE COUNTY had no organized existence until 1836. Prior to that time the territory now comprised within its limits belonged in about equal proportions to the mother-county of Northampton and to Pike. A glance at the map reveals the old line of Pike and Northampton Counties—prior to the erection of Pike, the south line of Wayne County, extending straight through the county, in a direction approximately east and west, and forming the northern line of Tobyhanna, Pocono, Stroud and Smithfield townships.

The county was brought into existence by an act of Assembly entitled, "An act erecting parts of Northampton and Pike Counties into a separate county to be called Monroe," which was approved by Governor Joseph Ritner, April 1, 1836. Following is an abstract of this enactment:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same. That the townships of Ross, Chestnut Hill, Tobyhanna, Pocono, Hamilton, Stroud and Smithfield north of the Blue Mountains, in Northampton County, together with the townships of Middle Smithfield, Price and Coolbaugh, in Pike County, shall be and the same are hereby declared to be erected into a separate county to be called Monroe.

"SEC. 2. Provided that the inhabitants of the new county, after the first of September following, should be entitled to 'the courts, jurisdictions, officers, rights and privileges' possessed by the inhabitants of other counties of the State.

"SEC. 3. Provided that the courts should be opened and held at such house as might be designated by the commissioners to be chosen at the next election, until a court-house should be erected in accordance with further provision.

"SEC. 4. Enacted that all suits pending in the courts of Northampton and Pike Counties on the first of September following, in which both parties should be at that time resident in Monroe, should be transferred to the courts of that county.

"SEC. 5. Was in relation to the collection of taxes and militia fines, and provided that all arrears of either due before the passage of the act should be collected as if the act had not been passed.

"SEC. 6. Provided for the giving of security by the several officers to be elected.

"SEC. 7. Authorized the officers of Northampton and Pike Counties to officiate until the officers of Monroe County should be qualified.

"SEC. 8. Declared that the inhabitants of the counties of Northampton, Wayne, Pike and Monroe should jointly elect such number of Representatives, and, in conjunction with Lehigh County, two Senators to serve in the State Legislature, as said counties were entitled to, or separately, as might thereafter be arranged. It was further specified that Monroe County should form a part of the district hitherto composed of Northampton, Wayne and Pike for the election of a member of Congress.

"SEC. 9. Was in regard to the manner of fixing the site of the court-house, and prescribed that it should be decided by popular ballot at a special election to be held on July 1st, and to be conducted by the same judges and clerks who presided at the preceding general election. It was further provided that one of the judges from each election district within the county should attend with the election returns on the second of July, at the house of S. J. Hollinshead, in Stroudsburg, between the hours of two o'clock and seven o'clock in the afternoon, and add the number of votes for each site. If there was no majority, a second election was to be ordered. Moses W. Coolbaugh, Benjamin V. Bush, William Van Buskirk, Michael Shoemaker and Joseph Trach were by the terms of the act made trustees, whose duties it should be to receive written offers of donations in real estate and money, towards defraying the expenses of the lands and public buildings for the use of the County of Monroe, the same to be held obligatory on the persons making them, and to be turned over to the county commissioners as soon as they should be elected. It was still further provided by this section that the county commissioners, so soon as they should be elected, should secure to themselves and their successors in office such lot or lots of land as had by popular vote been designated as the site of the court-house; that they should receive subscriptions or donations in money or material toward the erection of the same, a county-jail and public officers and also levy and collect a tax sufficient for the building of such structures.

"SEC. 10. Provided for the exercise of the powers of the Supreme Court judges in the new county.
